Now before I goe on with the reſt, it ſhall be neceſſary vpon the occaſion of Iephta's account of the times *Iud.*11.28. (where he ſayes that Iſrael had then poſſeſt the Eaſt ſide of Iordan 300. yeeres) to ſpeake ſomwhat of the times of the Iudges, and of the differing opinions among the Diuines & Chronologers: there being found three places of Scrip-
Iud.11.28. tures touching this point ſeeming repugnant, or diſagreeing: the firſt is in this diſpute Act.13.20. betweene Iephta and Ammon, for the right and poſſeſſion of Gilead: the ſecond is that of 3 Kings 6.1. S. Paul, Acts 13. the third is that which is in the firſt of Kings. Iephta heere challengeth the poſſeſſion of Gilead for 300. yeers: Saint Paul giueth to the Iudges, as it ſeemes, from the end of Ioſua, to the laſt of Heli, 450. yeeres. In the firſt of Kings it is taught, that from the departing of Iſrael out of Ægypt, to the foundation of Salomons Temple, there were conſumed 480. yeeres. To the firſt Beroaldus findeth Iephta's 300. yeeres to be but 266. yeeres, to wit, 18. of Ioſua, 40. of Othoniel, 80. of Aod and Samgar, 40. of Debora,
Id facit, numero certo pro incerto, propoſito. 40. of Gideon, 3. of Abimelech, 23. of Thola, and 22. of Iair: But Iephta (ſaith Beroaldus) putteth or propoſeth a certaine number, for an vncertaine: Sic vt dicat annum agi prope trecenteſimum, ex quo nullus litem ea de re mouerit Iſraeli; So hee ſpeaketh (ſaith he) as meaning, that then it was about or wel-nigh the three hundreth yeere, ſince Iſrael poſſeſſed thoſe Countries, no man making queſtion of their right. Codeman on the contrary findes more yeeres than Iephta named by 65. to wit, 365. whereof 71. were ſpent in Iſraels captiuity, at ſeuerall times, of which (as Codoman thinketh) Iephta forbare to repeate the whole ſumme or any great part, leſt the Ammonite ſhould haue iuſtly obiected, that 71. of thoſe yeeres, the Iſraelites were in captiuitie and vaſſals to their neighbour Princes, and therefore knowing that to name three hundred yeeres, it was enough for preſcription, hee omitted the reſt.

To iuſtifie this account of 365. yeeres, beſides the 71. yeeres of captiuity or affliction, to bee added to Beroaldus his 266. hee addeth alſo 28. yeeres more, and ſo maketh vp the ſumme of 365. Theſe 28. yeeres hee findeth out thus: twenty yeeres hee giues to the Seniors betweene Ioſua and Othoniel: and where Beroaldus alloweth eighteene yeeres to Ioſua his gouernment, Codoman accounts that his rule laſted 26. according to Ioſephus; whereas Saint Auguſtine and Euſebius giue him 27. Melanchton 32. The trueth is, that this addition of 28. yeeres is farre more doubtfull than the other of 71. But though wee admit not of this addition, yet by accounting of ſome part of the yeeres of affliction (to wit, 34. yeeres of the 71.) if wee adde them to the 266. yeeres of of Beroaldus, which reckoneth none of these, wee haue the iust number of 300. yeeres. Neither is it strange that Iephta should leaue out more then halfe of these yeeres of affliction: seeing, as it is already said, the Ammonites might except against these 71. yeeres, and say, that during these yeeres, or at least a good part of them, the Israelites had no quiet possession of the Countries in question. Martin Luther is the Author of a third opinion, making those 300. yeeres remembred by Iephta, to be 306. which odde yeeres, saith hee, Iephta omitteth. But because the yeeres of euery Iudge as they reigned, cannot make vp this number of 306: but doe onely compound 266. therefore doth Luther adde to this number, the whole time which Moses spent in the Desarts of Arabia Petraea; which fortie yeeres of Moses added to the number which Beroaldus findeth, of 266. make indeede 306.

But I see nothing in the Text to warrant Luthers iudgement herein: for in the dispute betweene Iephta and Ammon for the Land of Gilead, it is written in the person of Ammon in these words: Because Israel tooke my Land, when they came vp from Ægypt, from Arnon vnto Iaboc, &c. now therefore restore those Lands quietly or in peace. So by this place it is plaine that the time is not to bee accounted from Moses departure out of Ægypt: but from the time that the Land was possest. For it is said, Quia cepit Israel terram meam; Because Israel tooke my Land: and therefore the beginning of this account is to be referred to the time of the taking: which Iephas answere also confirmeth in these words: When Israel dwelt in Heshbon, and in her Townes, and in Aroer & in her Townes, and in all the Cities that are by the coast of Arnon 300. yeeres: why did ye not then recouer them in that space? Iud. 11. 28. so as this place speakes it directly, that Israel had inhabited and dwelt in the Cities of Gilead 300. yeers: and therefore to account the times from the hopes or intents, that Israel had to possesse it, it seemeth somewhat strained to me; for we doe not vse to reckon the time of our conquests in France, from our Princes intents or purposes, but from their victories and possessions.

Iunius neuertheless likes the opinion of Luther, and sayes, that this time of 300. yeeres hath reference, and is to take beginning from the first of Iephtas narration: when hee makes a briefe repetition of Moses whole iourney: to wit, at the sixteenth Verse of the eleuenth Chapter of Iudges, in our translation in these words: But when Israel came vp from Ægypt, &c. and therefore Moses his 40. yeers (as he thinkes) are to be accounted, which make the number of 305. yeeres: and not onely the time in which Israel possest Gilead, according to the Text and Iephtas owne words: of which I leaue the iudgement to others; to whom also I leaue to iudge, whether we may not beginne the 480. yeeres, from the deliuerance out of Ægypt to the Temple, euen from the first departure out of Ægypt, and yet finde a more probable reconciliation of Saint Pauls and Iephtas account with this reckoning, than any of those that as yet haue beene signified. For first, touching Iephtas three hundred yeeres of possession of the East side of Iordan, it is to bee remembred, that for a good while before the Israelites possessed it, Sehon and Og had dispossessed Moab and Ammon thereof: so that when the Israelites had conquered Sehon and Og, the right of possession which they had, passed to Israel; and so Iephta might say that they had possessed those Countries 300. yeeres, reckoning 266. yeeres of their own possession, and the rest of the possession of the two Kings Sehon and Og, whose right the Israelites had by the law of conquest. Iunius in the 11. of Iud. not.

The second place disputed in this of S. Paul, Act. 13. that from the end of Iosua to the beginning of Samuel, there past 450. yeeres. And this place Luther vnderstandeth also besides the letter (as I finde his opinion cited by Functius Krentzhemius, and Beza) for I haue not read his Commentaries. For he accounteth from the death of Moses, to the last yeere of Heli, but 357. yeeres: and this he doth the better to approue the times from the egression out of Ægypt to the building of the Temple, which in the first King. 6. is said to be 480. yeeres. Reade the 24. of Iosua, and the 2 Iud. 7. Funct. Chron. fol. 4. Beza in his Annotations vpon the 13. of the Act. v. 20.

Now forasmuch as S. Paul (as it seemes) findes 450. yeeres from the death of Iosua, to the last of Heli, and leaues but thirty yeeres for Saul and Samuel, who gouerned 40. for Dauid who ruled 40. and for Salomon who wore the Crowne three whole yeeres ere the foundation of the Temple was laid; therefore Luther takes it, that there was errour in the Scribe, who wrote out this piece of Scripture of S. Paul: to wit, Then afterward hee gaue vnto them Iudges about 450. yeeres, vnto the time of Samuel the Prophet: the words then afterward, being cleerely referred to the death or after the death Act. 13. 20.

of Iosua, as shall bee hereafter proued. But where Saint Luke rehearsing the words of Saint Paul, wrote 350. yeeres (saith Luther) the Scribe in the transcription being deceiued by the affinitie of those two Greeke words, whereof the one signifieth 300. and the other 400. wrote Tetracosiois, for Triacosiois; 400. yeeres, for 300. yeers; and 450. for 350. This he seeketh to strengthen by many arguments: to which opinion Beza in his great annotations adhereth. A contrary iudgement to this hath Codoman: where Luther and Beza begin at Moses death, hee takes his account from the death of Iosua, and from thence to the beginning of Samuel he makes 430. yeeres: to wit: of the Iudges (not reckoning Sampsons yeeres) 319. and of yeeres of seruitude and affliction vnder strangers, 111. The reason why he doth not reckon Sampsons twenty yeeres, is because hee thinkes that they were part of the 40. yeeres, in which the Philistims are said to haue oppressed Israel. For it is plaine, that during all Samsons time they were Lords ouer Israel. So then of the Iudges, besides the 111. yeeres of seruitude, Codoman reckoneth (as I haue said) 319. yeeres, which two summes put together make 430. yeeres, and whereas Saint Paul nameth 450. yeeres, hee findes 20. yeeres to make vp Saint Pauls number, to haue beene spent after the death of Iosua by the Seniors, before the Captiuitie of Cushan, or the election of Othoniel: which 20. yeeres added to 430. make 550. according to Saint Paul. To approoue this time of the Elders, he citeth two places of Scriptures, namely the 24. of Iosua, and the second of Iudges, in each of which places it is written, that Israel serued the Lord all the daies of Ioshua, and all the daies of the Elders that ouer-liued Ioshua: so as to these times of the Elders, Codoman giueth 20. yeeres, which make as before 450. according to Saint Paul. Neither would it breed any great difficultie in this opinion, if heere also the 20. yeeres of the Seniors, betweene Iosua and Othoniel, should be denied. For they which denie these yeeres, and make Othoniels 40. to beginne presently vpon the death of Iosua, as in the beginning of this reckoning they haue 20. yeeres lesse than Codoman, so toward the end of it (when they reckon the yeeres of affliction apart from the yeeres of the Iudges) in the number of Sampsons yeeres, and of the 40. yeeres of the Philistims oppressing the Israelites, they haue 20. yeeres more than Codoman. For they reckon these 40. yeeres of oppression all of them a-part from Sampsons 20. but Codoman, as is said, makes Sampsons 20. to bee the one halfe of the 40. of the Philistims oppressions; so that if the 20. yeeres of the Seniors, be not allowed to Codoman, then he may reckon (as the letter of the Text seemes to inforce) that the Philistims in any Inter-regnum, before Sampson iudged Israel, vexed the Israelites 40. yeeres, besides the 20. while Sampson was their Iudge; and so the reckoning will come to 450. yeeres betweene the end of Iosua, and the beginning of Samuel, though we admit not of an Inter-regnum of the Seniors, betweene Iosua and Othoniel: For, if the times of their affliction be summed, they make 111. yeeres, to which if we adde the yeeres of the Iudges, which are 339. wee haue the iust summe of 450. And this computation either one way or other, may seeme to bee much more probable, than theirs that correct the Text, although we should admit of their correction thereof, and reade with them 350. for 450. For whereas they conceiue that this time of 350. yeeres, is to beginne immediately, or soone after the death of Moses: certainely the place of Saint Paul doth euidently teach the contrary, though it bee receiued for true that there was vitium scriptoris in the rest. For these be Saint Pauls words: And about the time of fortie yeeres, God suffered their manners in the wildernesse: And hee destroyed seuen Nations in the Land of Canaan, and diuided their Land to them by lot. Then afterward hee gaue vnto them Iudges about 450. yeeres, vnto the time of Samuel the Prophet. So as first in the eighteenth verse hee speaketh of Moses and of his yeeres spent in the wildernesse, then in the ninteenth verse hee commeth vnto the acts of Iosua; which were, that hee destroyed seuen Nations in the land of Canaan, and diuided their Land to them by lot. In the twentieth verse it followeth: Then afterward hee gaue them Iudges about 450. yeeres, &c. and therefore to reckon from the death of Moses, is wide of Saint Pauls meaning, so farre as my weake vnderstanding can pierce it. The only inconuenience of any waight in opinion of Codoman touching this place in the Acts, is, that it seemes irreconciliable with the account, 1. Reg. 6. 11. For if indeede there were spent 450. yeeres betweene the end of Iosua and the beginning of Samuel, certainly there must needs be much more than 480. yeeres between the beginning of the Israelites iourneying from Ægypt, and the foundation of the Temple by Salomon. To this difficultie

Codoman

Codoman anſwereth, that theſe 480. yeeres, 1. Reg. 6. 1. muſt begin to be reckoned, not in the beginning, but in the ending of their iourneying from Ægypt, which he makes to be 25. yeeres after the beginning of Othoniels gouernment; from whence if wee caſt the yeeres of the Iudges, with the yeeres of ſeruitude (which ſummes according to his account, of which we haue already ſpoken, make 397. yeeres) and ſo to theſe yeeres adde the 40. of Samuel, and Saul, and the 40. of Dauid, and the 3. of Salomon, wee ſhall haue the iuſt ſumme of 480. yeeres. Neither is it hard (ſaith hee) that the annus egreſſionis, 1. Reg. 6. 1. ſhould be vnderſtood egreſſionis non incipientis ſed finitæ, the yeere of their comming out of Ægypt (for ſo it is in the originall) or the yeere after they came out of Ægypt, may well be vnderſtood for the yeere after they were come out thence, that is, after they had ended their wandring from thence. For ſo wee finde that things which were done 40. yeeres after they had ſet foot out of Ægypt, are ſaid to haue been done in their going out of Ægypt, as Pſal. 114. When Iſrael came out of Ægypt, Iordan was driuen backe, and Deut. 4. 45. Theſe are the teſtimonies which Moſes ſpake when they came out of Ægypt. And thus farre it ſeemes wee may very well agree with Codoman, for the interpretation of the ab exitu, to be as much as quùm exiuiſſent, or ab exitu finito: for if Iunius, Deut. 4. 45. doe well reade quum exiuiſſent, for in exitu, as it ſeemes that heerein he doth well, why may not we alſo, to auoid contradiction in the Scripture, expound ab exitu to be, poſtquàm exiuiſſent?

The next point to be cleered, is how their iourneying ſhould be ſaid not to haue had end vntill the 25. yeere after the victory of Othoniel. To this Codoman anſwereth, that then it had no end till when all the Tribes had obtained their portions, which happened not vntill this time: at which time the Danites at length ſeated themſelues, as it is declared Iud. 18. For doubtleſſe to this time the expedition may moſt conueniently be referred. And thus without any great inconuenience to him appearing doth Codoman reconcile the account of Iephta, and S. Paul, with that in the firſt of Kings, c. 6. Now whereas it is ſaid that the expedition of the Danites was when there was no King in Iſrael: to this Codoman anſwereth, that it is not neceſſary that wee ſhould ſuppoſe that Othoniel liued all thoſe 40. yeeres of reſt, of which Iud. 3. 11. ſo that by the 25. yeere after his victory, either he might haue beene dead, or at leaſt, as Gideon did, hee might haue refuſed all ſouereignty, and ſo either way it might truly be ſaid that at this time (to wit, the 25. yeere after Othoniels victorie) there was no King in Iſrael. This opinion of Codoman, if it were as conſonant to other Chronologers grounding their opinions on the plaine Text, where it is indiſputable, as it is in it ſelfe round enough and coherent, might perhaps bee receiued as good: eſpecially conſidering, that the ſpeeches of S. Paul haue not otherwiſe found any interpretation, maintaining them as abſolutely true, in ſuch manner as they ſound, and are ſet down. But ſeeing that he wanteth all helpe of authority, we may iuſtly ſuſpect the ſuppoſition whereupon his opinion is grounded; it being ſuch as the conſent of many Authors would hardly ſuffice to make very probable. For who hath told Codoman, that the conqueſt of Laiſh, by the Tribe of Dan, was performed in the fiue and twentieth yeere of Othoniel? Or what other probability hath he than his owne coniecture, to ſhew that Othoniel did ſo renounce the office of a Iudge after fiue and twenty yeeres, that it might then be truely ſaid there was no King in Iſrael, but euery man did that which was good in his owne eyes?

Iud. 18. 1.

Now concerning the rehearſall of the Law by Moſes, and the ſtopping of Iordan, they might indeed be properly ſaid to haue beene, when Iſrael came out of Ægypt; like as wee ſay that King Edward the firſt was crowned when hee came out of the holie Land, for ſo all iournies with their accidents commonly take name from the place eyther whence or whither they tend. But I thinke that hee can finde no ſuch phraſe of ſpeech in Scripture as limiteth a iourney by an accident, or ſaith by conuerting the propoſition, when Iordan was turning backe, Iſrael came out of Ægypt. Indeed moſt vnproper it were to giue date vnto actions commenced long after, from an expedition finiſhed long before, namely to ſay, that King Edward at his arriuall out of Paleſtina, did winne Scotland, or died at Carlile. How may wee then beleeue that enterprize performed ſo many yeeres after the diuiſion of the Land (which followed the conqueſt at the iourneys end) ſhould be ſaid to haue been at the time of the departure out of Ægypt? Or who will not thinke it moſt ſtrange, that the moſt notable account of time, ſeruing as the onelie guide for certaine ages in ſacred Chronologie, ſhould not take name and beginning from that illustrious deliuerance out of Ægypt, rehearsed often by God himselfe among the principall of his benefits to Israel, whereof the very day and moneth are recorded in Scripture (as likewise are the yeere and moneth wherein it expired) and the forme of the yeere vpon that occasion changed; but should haue reference to the surprizing of a Town by sixe huudred men, that robbed a Chappell by the way, and stole from thence Idols to be their guides, as not going to worke in Gods name? For this accident whereupon Codoman buildeth, hath either no time giuen to it, or a time farre different from that which he supposeth, and is indeed rather by him placed in such a yeere, because it best stood with his interpretation so to haue it, than for any certainety or likelihood of the thing it selfe.

Wherefore we may best agree with such as affirme that the Apostle Saint Paul did not herein labour to set downe the course of time exactly (a thing no way concerning his purpose) but onely to shew that God, who had chosen Israel to be his people, deliuered them out of bondage, and ruled them by Iudges and Prophets, vnto the time of Saul, did raise vp our Lord Iesus Christ out of the seede of Dauid the King, in whose succession the Crowne was established, and promise made of a Kingdome that should haue no end. Now in rehearsing briefly thus much which tended as a Preface to the declaration following (wherein hee sheweth Christ to haue beene the true Messias) the Apostle was so farre from labouring to make an exact calculation of times (the History being so well knowne and beleeued of the Iewes to whom he preached) that he spake as it were at large of the 40. yeeres consumed in the wildernesse, whereof no man doubted, saying that God suffered their manners in the wildernesse about 40. yeeres. In like manner he proceeded, saying, that from the diuision of the Land vnto the dayes of Samuel the Prophet, in whose time they required to haue a King, there passed about 450. yeers. Neither did he stand to tell them, that an hundred and eleuen yeeres of bondage mentioned in this middle while, were by exact computation to be included within the 339. yeeres of the Iudges: for this had beene an impertinent digression from the argument which hee had in hand. Wherefore it is not a worke so needfull as laborious, to search out of this place that which the Apostle did not heere intend to teach, when the summe of 480. yeeres is so expresly and purposely set downe.

Now that the words of S. Paul (if there be no fault in the Copie through errour of some Scribe) are not so curiously to be examined in matter of Chronologie, but must be taken, as hauing reference to the memorie and apprehension of the vulgar, it is euident by his ascribing in the same place 40. yeers to the reigne of Saul: whereas it is manifest that those yeeres were diuided betweene Saul and Samuel, yea, that farre the greater part of them were spent vnder the gouernment of the Prophet, how soeuer they are heere included in the reigne of the King. As for those that with so much cunning forsake the generall opinion, when it fauoureth not such exposition as they bring out of a good minde, to helpe where the need is not ouer-great; I had rather commend their diligence, than follow their example. The words of S. Paul were sufficiently iustified by Beroaldus, as hauing reference to a common opinion among the Scribes in those dayes, that the 111. yeeres of seruitude were to be reckoned apart from the 339. yeeres ascribed to the Iudges; which account the Apostle would not in this place stand to contradict, but rather chose to speake as the vulgar, qualifying it with a quasi, where he saith, quasi quadringentis & quinquaginta annis; As it were foure hundred and fifty yeeres. But Codoman being not thus contented, would needs haue it be so indeed, and therefore dis-ioynes the members to make the account euen. In so doing he dasheth himselfe against a notable Text, whereupon all Authors haue builded (as well they might and ought) that purposely and precisely doth cast vp the yeeres from the departure out of Ægypt, vnto the building of Solomons Temple, not omitting the very Moneth it selfe.

1. King. 6.

Now (as commonly the first apprehensions are strongest) hauing already giuen faith to his owne interpretation of Saint Paul, he thinketh it more needfull to finde some new exposition for that which is of it selfe most plaine, and to examine his owne coniecture vpon a place that is full of controuersie. Thus by expounding, after a strange methode, that which is manifest by that which is obscure, he loseth himselfe in those waies wherein before him neuer man walked. Surely if one should vrge him to giue reason of these new opinions, he must needs answere, That Othoniel could not gouerne aboue 25. yeres, because then was the taking of Laish, at which time there was no King in Israel; That the

Danites

Danites must needs haue taken Laish at that time, becauſe elſe we could not reckon backwards from the foundation of the Temple to any action that might bee termed the comming of Iſrael out of Ægypt, without excluding the yeeres of ſeruitude; And that the yeeres of ſeruitude muſt needs be included, for that otherwiſe hee himſelfe ſhould haue ſpent his time vainely, in ſeeking to pleaſure S. Paul with an expoſition. Whether this ground be ſtrong enough to vphold a Paradoxe, I leaue it to the deciſion of the iudicious Reader.

And now to proceed in our ſtorie. To the time of Iephta are referred the death of Hercules, the rape of Helen by Paris, and the prouiſions which her husband Menelaus, reigning then in Sparta, and his brother Agamemnon King of Mycena, made for her recouerie. Others refer this rape of Helen to the fourth yeere of Ibzan: from which time, if the Warre of Troy (as they ſuppoſe) did not begin till the third of Ailon or Elon, yet the Greekes had ſixe yeres to prepare themſelues: the rule holding not true in this War, longa praparatio belli celerem affert victoriam; That a long preparation begets a ſpeedy victorie: for the Greekes conſumed tenne yeeres in the attempt: and Troy, as it ſeemes, was entred, ſackt and burnt in the third yeere of Habdon.

Three yeeres after Troy taken, which was in the ſixt yeere of Habdon, Æneas arriued in Italie. Habdon in the eighth yeere of his rule, died, after hee had beene the Father of 40. ſonnes and 30. grand-children. And whereas it is ſuppoſed, that the 40. yeeres of Iſraels oppreſſion by the Philiſtims (of which Iud. 13. v. 1.) tooke beginning from the ninth yeere of Iair, and ended with the laſt of Habdon: I ſee no reaſon for that opinion. For Ephraim had had little cauſe of quarrell againſt Iephta, for not calling them to War ouer Iordan, if the Philiſtims had held them in ſeruitude in their owne Territories: and if Ephraim could haue brought 42000. armed men into the field, it is not likely that they were then oppreſt: and had it beene true that they were, who will doubt but that they would rather haue fought againſt the Philiſtims with ſo powerfull an Armie for their owne deliuerance, than againſt their owne brethren the Iſraelites? But Ammon being ouerthrowne, it ſeemed at that time, that they feared no other enemie. And therefore theſe 40. yeres muſt either be ſupplied elſewhere, as in the time of Sampſon, and afterward: or elſe they muſt be referred to the inter-regnum betweene the death of Habdon, and the deliuerance of Iſrael by Sampſon, ſuch as it was. Iud. 13. 14.

Chap. XIIII.

Of the Warre of Troy.

§. I.

Of the Genealogie of the Kings of Troy, with a note touching the ancient Poets how they haue obſerued Hiſtoricall truth.

THE Warre at Troy with other ſtories hereupon depending (becauſe the ruine of this Citie, by moſt Chronologers is found in the time of Habdon, Iudge of Iſrael, whom in the laſt place I haue mentioned) I rather chooſe here to intreat of in one entire narration, beginning with the lineall deſcent of their Princes, than to breake the ſtory into pieces by rehearſing a-part in diuers yeeres, the diuerſitie of occurrents.

The Hiſtorie of the ancient Kings of Troy is vncertaine, in regard both of their originall, and of their continuance. It is commonly held that Teucer and Dardanus were the two founders of that Kingdome. This is the opinion of Virgil: which if he (as Reineccius thinks) tooke from Beroſus, it is the more probable: if Annius borrowed it of him, then it reſts vpon the authority of Virgil, who ſaith thus:

In the maine Sea the Ile of Creete doth lie:
Where Ioue was borne, thence is our progenie.
There is mount Ida: there in fruitfull Land
An hundreth great and goodly Cities stand.
Thence (if I follow not mistaken fame)
Teucer the eldest of our grand-sires came To the Rhœtean shores: and reigned there
Ere yet faire Ilion was built, and ere
The Towers of Troy: their dwelling place they sought
In lowest vales. Hence Cybels rites were bought:
Hence Corybantian Cymbales did remoue:
And hence the name of our Idæan groue.

Thus it seemeth by Virgil, who followed surely good authoritie, that Teucer first gaue name to that Countrie, wherein he reigned ere Troy was built by Dardanus: of which Dardanus in the same booke he speakes thus:

Est locus, Hesperiam Graij cognomine dicunt:
Terra antiqua, potens armis atq; vbere glebæ,
OEnotrij coluere viri; nunc fama minores
Italiam dixisse, ducis de nomine gentem.
Hæ nobis propriæ sedes: hinc Dardanus ortus:
Iasiusq; Pater, genus à quo Principe nostrum.

Hesperia the Gracians call the place:
An ancient fruitfull Land, a warlike race,
OEnotrians held it; now the later progenie
Giues it their Captaines name, and calls it Italie;
This seate belongs to vs, hence Dardanus,
Hence came the Author of our stocke, Iasius.

Also Aeneid. l. 7.

Atq; equidem memini (fama est obscurior annis)
Auruncos ita ferre senes, hic ortus vt agris
Dardanus Idæas Phrygiæ penetrauit ad vrbes,
Threiciamq; Samum, quæ nunc Samothracia fertur.
Hinc illum Coryti Tyrrhena ab sede profectum,
Aurea nunc solio stellantis regia cœli
Accipit, &c.

Some old Aruncans, I remember well,
(Though time haue made the fame obscure) would tell
Of Dardanus, how borne in Italie:
From hence he into Phrygia did flie.
And leauing Tuscaine (where he earst had place)
With Corytus did saile to Samothrace;
But now inthronized he sits on high,
In golden Palace of the starrie skie.

But contrarie to this, and to so many Authors, approuing and confirming it, Reineccius thinkes that these names, Troes, Teucri, and Thraces, are deriued from Tiras or Thiras the son of Iaphet: and that the Dardanians, Mysians, & Ascanians, mixt with the Troians, were were Germane Nations, descended from Ashkenaz, the sonne of Gomer: of whom the Countrie, Lake, and Riuer of Ascanius in Asia tooke name. That Ashkenaz gaue name to those places and people, it is not vnlikely: neither is it vnlikely, that the Ascanij, Dardani, and many others, did in after-times passe into Europe: that the name of Teucer came of Tiras, the coniecture is somewhat hard. Concerning Teucer, whereas Halicarnassæus makes him an Athenian, I finde none that follow him in the same opinion. Virgil (as is before shewed) reporteth him to be of Crete, whose authority is the more to be regarded, because he had good meanes to finde the truth, which it is probable that he carefully sought, and in this did follow, seeing it no way concerned Augustus (whom other-whiles he did flatter) whether Teucer were of Crete or no. Reineccius doth rather embrace the opinion of Diodorus, and others that thinke him a Phrygian, by which report he was the Sonne of Scamander and Ida, Lord of the Countrie, not founder of the Citie; and his Daughter or Neece Batia was the second wife of Dardanus, founder of Troy. Reineccius further thinkes that Atlas reigned in Samothracia, and gaue his Daughter Electra to Corytus, or Coritus: and that these were Parents to Chryse, first wife to Dardanus. Virgil holds otherwise, and the common Tradition of Poets makes Dardanus the sonne of Electra by Iupiter, which Electra was the Daughter of Atlas, and wife to Coritus King of Hetruria, to whom she bare Iasius. Annius out of his Berosus finds the name of Camboblascon, to whom he giues the addition of Coritus, as a Title of dignitie, making him Father of Dardanus and Iasius; and further telling vs very particularly of the faction betweene these Brethren, which grew to such heate, that finally Dardanus killed his Brother, and thereupon fled into Samothrace. The obscuritie of the historie giues leaue to Annius of saying what he list. I that loue not to vse such libertie, will forbeare to determine any thing herein. But if Dardanus were the Sonne of Iupiter, it must haue beene of some elder Iupiter than the Father of those that liued about the Warre of Troy. So it is likewise probable that Atlas the Father of Electra was rather an Italian than an African, which also is the opinion of Boccace. For (as hath often beene said) there were many Iupiters, and many of almost euery name of the Gods; but it was the custome to ascribe to some one the acts of the rest, with all belonging to them. Therefore I will not greatly trouble my selfe with making any narrow search into these fabulous antiquities, but set downe the Pedigree according to the generall fame; allowing to Teucer such Parents as Diodorus giues, because others giue him none, and carrying the line of Dardanus in manner following.

Boccace, de gen. Deor. l. 4. c. 31.

Concerning the beginning and continuance, the Troian Kingdome, with the length of euery Kings reigne, I haue choſen good Authors to be my guides, that in a Hiſtorie, whereon depends the moſt ancient computation of times among the Greekes, I might not follow incertainties, ill cohering with the conſent of Writers, and generall paſſage of things elſewhere done. And firſt for the deſtruction of Troy, which was of greater note than any accident befalling that Citie whileſt it ſtood, it is reckoned by Diodorus to be 780. yeers more ancient than the beginning of the nintie fourth Olympiad. Whereas therefore 372. did paſſe betweene the beginning of the Olympiads, and the firſt yeere of the 94. it is manifeſt that the remainder of 780. yeers, that is, 408. yeers went betweene the deſtruction of Troy, and the firſt inſtitution of thoſe games by Ithitus, if the authoritie of Diodorus be good proofe, who elſewhere tels vs, that the returne of the Heraclidæ, which was 80. yeeres after the fall of Troy, was 328. yeeres before the firſt Olympiad. Diod. l. 14. Diod. in præf.

Hereunto agrees the authoritie of Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, who placing the foundation of Rome in the firſt of the ſeuenth Olympiad, that is, foure and twentie yeeres after the beginning of thoſe games, accounts it 432. later than the fall of Troy. Solinus in expreſſe words, makes the inſtitution of the Olympiads by Iphitus, whom he calleth Iphiclus, 480. yeeres later then the deſtruction of Troy. The ſumme is eaſily collected by neceſſarie inference out of diuers other places in the ſame booke. Hereunto doth Euſebius reckoning excluſiuely agree: and Eratoſthenes, (as he is cited by Clemens Alexandrinus) makes vp out of many particulars, the ſame totall ſumme, wanting but one yeere, as reckoning likewiſe excluſiuely. Dionyſ. Halic. Antiq. l. 2. Solin. Polihiſt. c. 2. Euſeb. de præp. Euang. l. 10. c. 3 Cle. Alex. ſtro. lib. 1.

The other collections of diuers Writers that are cited by Clemens in the ſame place, doe neither cohere any way, nor depend vpon any collaterall Hiſtorie, by which they may be verified.

The deſtruction of Troy being in the yeere before the Olympiads foure hundred and eight: we muſt ſeeke the continuance of that from the beginning to the end, out of Euſebius, who leades vs from Dardanus on-wards through the reignes of foure Kings, by the ſpace of two hundred and fiue and twenty yeeres, and after of Priamus, with whom alſo at length it ended. As for the time which paſſed vnder Laomedon, we are faine to doe, as others haue done before vs, and take it vpon truſt from Annius his Authors; beleeuing Manctho ſo much the rather, for that in his accompt of the former Kings reignes, and of Priamus, he is found to agree with Euſebius, which may giue vs leaue to thinke that Annius hath not herein corrupted him. But in this point we neede not to be very ſcrupulous: for ſeeing that no Hiſtorie or accompt of time depends vpon the reigne of the former Kings, but onely vpon the ruine of the Citie vnder Priamus, it may ſuffice that we are carefull to place that memorable accident in the due yeere.

True it is, that ſome obiections appearing waightie, may be alleaged in maintenance of different computations, which with the anſweres I purpoſely omit, as not willing to diſpute of thoſe yeeres, wherein the Greekes knew no good forme of a yeere; but rather to make narration of the actions which were memorable, and acknowledged by all Writers, whereof this deſtruction of Troy was one of the moſt renowned.

The firſt enterpriſe that was vnder-taken by generall conſent of all Greece, was the laſt warre of Troy, which hath beene famous euen to this day, for the numbers of Princes, and valiant Commanders there aſſembled: the great battailes fought with variable ſucceſſe: the long indurance of the ſiege; the deſtruction of that great Citie; and the many Colonies planted in ſundry Countries, as well by the remainder of the Troians, as by the victorious Greekes after their vnfortunate returne. All which things with innumerable circumſtances of eſpeciall note, haue beene deliuered vnto poſteritie, by the excellent wits of many writers, eſpecially by the Poems of that great Homer, whoſe verſes haue giuen immortalitie to the action, which might elſe perhaps haue beene buried in oblition, among other worthy deedes, done both before and ſince that time. For it is true which Horace ſaith;

Vixêre fortes ante Agamemnona
Multi, ſed omnes illachrimabiles
Vrgentur, ignotiq; longa
Nocte: carent quia vate ſacro.

Many by valour haue deſeru'd renowne
Ere Agamemnon: yet lye all oppreſt
Vnder long night, vnwept for, and vnknowne:
For with no ſacred Poet were they bleſt.

Yet ſo it is, that whileſt theſe writers haue with ſtrange fables, or (to ſpeake the beſt of them) with Allegories farre ſtrained, gone about to inlarge the commendations of thoſe noble vndertakers: they haue both drawne into ſuſpition that great vertue which they ſought to adorne, and filled after-ages with almoſt as much ignorance of the Hiſtorie, as admiration of the perſons. Wherefore it is expedient that wee ſeeke for the knowledge of ſuch actions, in Hiſtories; learning their qualities who did manage them, of Poets, in whoſe workes are both profit and delight: yet ſmall profit to thoſe which are delighted otherwiſe; but ſuch as can interpret their fables, or ſeparate them from the naked truth, ſhall finde matter in Poems, not vnworthy to be regarded of Hiſtorians. For thoſe things excepted which are gathered out of Homer, there is very little, and not without much diſagreement of Authors, written of this great warre. All writers conſent with Homer; that the rape of Helen by Paris the ſon of Priamus, was the cauſe of taking armes: but how he was hereunto emboldned it is doubtfull.

§. II.

Of the Rape of Helen: and ſtrength of both ſides for the warre.

HErodotus fetcheth the cauſe of this rape from very farre; ſaying, That whereas the Phœnicians had rauiſhed Io, and carried her into Ægypt, the Greekes to be reuenged on the Barbarians, did firſt rauiſh Europa, whom they brought out of Phœnicia into Creta, and afterward Medæa, whom they fetcht from Colchos, denying to reſtore her to her father, till ſuch time as they might be ſatisfied for the rape of Io. By theſe deedes of the Greekes, Paris (as the ſame Herodotus affirmes) was imboldened to doe the like; not fearing ſuch reuenge as enſued. But all this narration ſeemes friuolous. For what had the King of Colchos to doe with the iniurie of rhe Phœnicians? Or how could the Greekes, as in reuenge of Io, pleade any quarrell againſt him, that neuer had heard the name of Phœnicians? Thucydides a writer of vnqueſtionable ſinceritie, maketh it plaine, that the name of Barbarians was not vſed at all in Homers time, which was long after the warre of Troy; and that the Greekes themſelues were not then called all by one name, Hellenes, as afterwards. So that it were vnreaſonable to thinke, that they ſhould haue ſought reuenge vpon all Nations, as barbarous, for the iniurie receiued by one: or that all people elſe ſhould haue eſteemed of the Greekes, as of a people oppoſed to all the world; and that euen then when as the Greekes had not yet one common name among themſelues. Others with more probability ſay, that the rape of Helen was to procure the redeliuery of Heſione, King Priamus his ſiſter, taken formerly by Hercules, and giuen to Telamon. This may haue beene true. For Telamon (as it ſeemes) was a cruell man, ſeeing his owne ſonne Teucer durſt not come in his ſight, after the warre of Troy, but fled into Cyprus, onely becauſe his brother Ajax (which Teucer could not remedie) had ſlaine himſelfe. Yet, were it ſo, that Heſione was ill intreated by Telamon, it was not therefore likely, that Priamus her brother would ſeeke to take her from her husband, with whom ſhe had liued about thirtie yeeres, and to whom ſhe had borne children which were to ſucceede in his Dominion. Whereupon I thinke that Paris had no regard either to the rape of Europa, Medæa, or Heſione: but was meerely incited by Venus, that is, by his luſt, to doe that which in thoſe dayes was very common. For not onely Greekes from Barbarians, and Barbarians from Greekes, as Herodotus diſcourſeth, but all people were accuſtomed to ſteale women and cattell, if they could by ſtrong hand or power get them; and hauing ſtollen them, either to ſell them away in ſome farre Countrey, or keepe them to their owne vſe. So did Theſeus, and Pirythous attempt Proſerpina; and ſo did Theſeus (long before Paris) rauiſh Helen. And theſe practices, as it appeares in Thucydides, were ſo common, that none durſt inhabite neere vnto the Sea, for feare of pyracie, which was accounted a trade of life no leſſe lawfull then merchandiſe: wherefore Tyndareus the father of Helen, conſidering the beauty of his daughter, and the rape which Theſeus had made, cauſed all her wooers, who were moſt of the principall men in in Greece, to binde themselues by solemne oath, that if shee were taken from her husband, they should with all their might helpe to recouer her. This done, he gaue free choyse of a husband to his daughter, who chose Menelaus, brother to Agamemnon. So the cause which drew the Greekes vnto Troy in reuenge of Helens rape, was partly the oath which so many Princes had made vnto her father Tyndareus. Hereunto the great power of Agamemnon was not a little helping; for Agamemnon, besides his great Dominions in Peloponnesus, was Lord of many Ilands: he was also rich in mony, and therefore the Arcadians were well contented to follow his pay, whom he embarked for Troy in his owne ships, which were more then any other of the Greeke Princes brought to that expedition.

Thus did all Greece, either as bound by oath, or led by the reputation and power of the two brethren, Agamemnon and Menelaus; or desirous to partake of the profit and honour in that great enterprise; take armes against the Troians. The Greekes Fleet was (by Homers account) 1200. sayle, or thereabouts: but the vessels were not great: for it was not then the manner to build ships with deckes; onely they vsed (as Thucydides saith) small ships, meete for robbing on the Sea; the least of which carried fiftie men, the greatest 120. euery man (except the Captaines) being both a Marriner and a Souldier. By this proportion it appeares that the Grecian army consisted of 100000. men, or thereabout. This was the greatest armie that euer was raised out of Greece: and the greatnesse of this armie doth well declare the strength and power of Troy, which ten whole yeeres did stand out against such forces: yet were the Troians which inhabited the Citie, not the tenth part of this number, as Agamemnon said in the second of Homers Iliads; but their followers and aydes were very many and strong. For all Phrygia, Lycia, Misia, and the greatest part of Asia the lesse, tooke part with the Troians. The Amazones also brought them succour. And Rhesus out of Thrace, and Memnon out of Assyria (though some think, out of Æthiopia) came to their defence.

§. III.

Of the Græcians iourney, and Embassage to Troy, and of Helenaes being detained in Ægypt; and of the Sacrificing of Iphigenia.

WHerefore the Greekes vnwilling to come to triall of armes, if things might be compounded by treatie, sent Menelaus and Vlysses Embassadours to Troy; who demanded Helen and the goods were taken with her out of Menelaus his house. What answere the Troianes made hereunto it is vncertaine. Herodotus from the report of the Ægyptian Priests, makes it very probable, that Helen was taken from Paris before his returne to Troy. The summe of his discourse is this.

Paris in his returne with Helena, being driuen by foule weather vnto the coast of Ægypt, was accused for the rape of Helen by some bondmen of his, that had taken Sanctuary. Proteus then King of Ægypt, finding the accusation true by examination, detained Helen, and the goods taken with her, till her husband should require them: dismissing Paris without further punishment, because he was a stranger. When therefore the Greekes demanding Helen had answere, that she was in Ægypt, they thought themselues deluded, and thereupon made the warre, which ended with the ruine of Troy. But when after the Citie taken, they perceiued indeede she had not beene there, they returned home, sending Menelaus to aske his wife of Proteus. Homer and the whole Nation of Poets (except Euripides) vary from this Historie, thinking it a matter more magnificent and more gracefull to their Poems, for the retaining of a faire Lady, than that they endured all by force, because it lay not in their power to redeliuer her. Yet in the fourth of his Odysses, Homer speakes of Menelaus his being in Ægypt, before hee returned home to Sparta; which voyage it were not easily beleeued, that he made for pleasure: and if he were driuen thither by contrary windes, much more may we thinke that Paris was likely to haue beene driuen thither by foule weather. For Paris immediately vpon the rape committed, was enforced to flye, taking such windes as he could get, and rather enduring any storme, than to commit himselfe to any Hauen in the Greeke seas: whereas Menelaus might haue put into any port in Greece, and there haue remained with good entertainement, vntill such time as the winde had come about, and serued for his Nauigation.

One

One great argument Herodotus brings to confirme the ſaying of the Ægyptian Prieſts, which is, that if Helen had beene at Troy, it had beene vtter madneſſe for Priamus to ſee ſo many miſeries befall him, during the warre, and ſo many of his ſonnes ſlaine for the pleaſure of one, who neither was heire to the Kingdome (for Hector was elder) nor equall in vertue to many of the reſt. Beſides, it may ſeeme that Lucian ſpake not more pleaſantly than truely, when he ſaid that Helen, at the warre of Troy, was almoſt as old as Queene Hecuba, conſidering that ſhe had beene rauiſhed by Theſeus the companion of Hercules, who tooke Troy when Priamus was very young; and conſidering further, that ſhe was ſiſter to Caſtor and Pollux (ſhe and Pollux being ſaid by ſome to haue beene twins) who ſailed with the Argonautes, hauing Telamon the father of Aiax in their companie before the time that Heſione was taken; on whom Telamon begat Aiax, that was a principall Commander in the Troian warre. But whether it were ſo that the Troians could not, or would not reſtore Helen, ſo it was that the Embaſſadours returned ill contented, and not very well intreated; for there wanted not ſome that aduiſed to haue them ſlaine. The Greekes hereupon incenſed, made all haſte towards Troy: at which time Calchas (whom ſome ſay to haue beene a runnagate Troian, though no ſuch thing be found in Homer) filled the Captaines and all the Hoſte with many troubleſome anſwers and diuinations. For he would haue Agamemnons daughter ſacrificed to appeaſe Diana, whoſe anger he ſaid withſtood their paſſage. Whether the yong Lady were ſacrificed, or whether (as ſome write) the goddeſſe was contented with a Hinde, it is not needefull here to be diſputed of. Sure it is, that the malice of the diuell, which awaits for all opportunities, is neuer more importunate, than where mens ignorance is moſt. Calchas alſo told the Greekes, that the taking of Troy was impoſſible, till ſome fatall impediments were remoued: and that till ten yeeres were paſt, the towne ſhould hold out againſt them. All which notwithſtanding, the Greekes proceeded in their enterpriſe, vnder the command of Agamemnon, who was accompanied with his brother Menelaus; Achilles the moſt valiant of all the Greekes, his friend Patroclus, and his Tutor Phœnix; Aiax and Teucer, the ſonnes of Telamon; Idomeneus, and his companion Meriones; Neſtor, and his ſonnes Antilochus, and Thraſymedes; Vlyſſes; Mneſtheus the ſonne of Petreus, Captaine of the Athenians: Diomedes the ſonne of Tydeus, a man of ſingular courage; the wiſe and learned Palamedes, Aſcalaphus, and Ialmenus, the ſonnes of Mars, who had ſailed with the Argonautes; Philoctetes alſo the ſonne of Pean, who had the arrowes of Hercules, without which Calchas ſaid, that the Citie could not be taken; Aiax the ſonne of Oileus, Peneleus, Thoas, Eumelus, Tyſandrus, Euripilus, Athamas, Sthenelus, Tlepolemus the ſonne of Hercules; Podalyrius, and Machaon, the ſonnes of Æſculapius: Epeus, who is ſaid to haue made the woodden horſe, by which the towne was taken; and Proteſilaus, who firſt leapt on ſhore, neglecting the Oracle that threatned death to him that landed firſt.

Of the Acts of the Gracians at the ſiege.

THeſe, and many other of leſſe note, arriuing at Troy, found ſuch ſharpe entertainment, as might eaſily perſwade them to thinke that the warre would be more than one yeeres worke. For in the firſt encounter, they loſt Proteſilaus, whom Hector ſlew, and many other, without any great harme done to the Troians: ſaue onely that by their numbers of men, they won ground enough to incampe themſelues in, as appeareth in Thucydides. The principall impediment which the Greekes found, was want of victuals, which grew vpon them by reaſon of their multitude, and the ſmalneſſe of their veſſels, wherein they could not carry neceſſaries for ſuch an armie. Hereupon they were compelled to ſend ſome part of their men, to labour the ground in Cherroneſſe: others to rob vpon the Sea for the reliefe of the Campe. Thus was the warre protracted nine whole yeeres, and either nothing done, or if any skirmiſhes were, yet could the towne receiue little loſſe by them, hauing equall numbers to maintaine the field againſt ſuch Greekes as continued the ſiege, and a more ſafe retrait if the enemie got the better.

Wherefore Ouid ſaith, that from the firſt yeere, till the tenth, there was no fighting at all: and Heraclides commends as very credible, the report of Herodicus; That the Greeks did not lye before Troy the firſt nine yeeres: but onely did beate vp and downe the ſea, exerci-exerciſing their men, and inriching themſelues, and ſo by waſting the enemies Country, did blocke vp the towne, vnto which they returned not, vntill the fatall time drew neere when it ſhould be ſubuerted.

This is confirmed by the enquirie which Priamus made, when the Greeke Princes came into the field, the tenth yeere, for he knew none of them; and therefore ſitting vpon an high tower (as Homer tels) he learned their names of Helen: which though it is like to be a fiction, yet could it not at all haue beene ſuppoſed that he ſhould be ignorant of them, if they had ſhewed themſelues before the towne ſo many yeeres together. Hom. Iliad 3. Betweene theſe relations of Thucydides and Herodicus, the difference is not much, the one ſaying that a few of the Greeks remained in the Campe before Troy, whileſt the reſt made purueyance by land and by ſea: the other, that the whole armie did ſpend the time in waſting the ſea-coaſts. Neither doe the Poets greatly diſagree from theſe authors: for they make report of many townes and Ilands waſted, and the people carried into Captiuitie; in which actions Achilles was imployed, whom the armie could not well, nor would haue ſpared, if any ſeruice of importance had beene to be performed before the Citie. Howſoeuer it was, this is agreed by generall conſent, that in the beginning of that Summer, in which Troy was taken, great booties were brought into the Campe, and a great peſtilence aroſe among the Greekes: which Homer ſaith that Apollo ſent in reuenge of his Prieſts daughter, whom Agamemnon had refuſed to let goe, for any ranſome: but Heraclides interpreting the place, ſaith that by Apollo was meant the Sunne: who raiſed peſtilent fogs, by which the armie was infected, being lodged in a mooriſh piece of ground. And it might well be that the campe was ouer-peſtered with thoſe, who had beene abroad, and now were lodged all cloſe together: hauing alſo grounded their ſhips within the fortifications.

About the ſame time aroſe much contention betweene Agamemnon and Achilles about the bootie, whereof Agamemnon, as Generall, hauing firſt choſen for his part a captiue woman, and Achilles in the ſecond place choſen for himſelfe another, then Aiax, Vlyſſes, and ſo the reſt of the chiefe Captaines in order: When the Soothſayer Calchas had willed that Agamemnons woman ſhould be reſtored to her father Apollo's Prieſt, that ſo the Peſtilence might ceaſe, then did Agamemnon greatly rage and ſay, that hee alone would not loſe his part of the ſpoyle, but would either take that which had beene giuen to Achilles, or that which had fallen to Aiax, or to Vlyſſes. Hereupon Achilles defied him, but was faine to ſuffer all patiently, as not able to hold his Concubine by ſtrong hand, nor to reuenge her loſſe otherwiſe than by refuſing to fight, or to ſend forth his Captaines. But the Greekes incouraged by their Captaines, preſented themſelues before the Citie without him and his troupes.

The Troians were now relieued with great ſuccours, all the neighbour Countries hauing ſent them aide: partly drawne to that warre by their Commanders, who aſſiſted Priamus for money, wherewith he abounded when the warre began (as appeares by his words in Homer,) or for loue of himſelfe and his ſonnes, or hope of marriage with ſome of his many and faire daughters; partly alſo (as we may well gueſſe) incited by the wrongs receiued of the Greekes, when they waſted the Countries adioyning vnto Troy. So that when Hector iſſued out of the towne, he was little inferiour to his enemies in numbers of men, or qualitie of their Leaders. The principall Captaines in the Troian armie, were Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus and the other ſonnes of Priamus: Æneas, Antenor, and his ſonnes, Polydamas, Sarpedon, Glaucus, Aſius, and the ſonnes of Panthus, beſides Rheſus, who was ſlaine the firſt night of his arriuall; Memnon, Queene Pentheſilea, and others who came towards the end of the warre. Between theſe and the Greekes were many battels fought: the greateſt of which were, that at the tombe of King Ilus vpon the plaine: and another at the very trenches of the Campe, wherin Hector brake through the fortifications of the Greekes, and began to fire their ſhips; at which time Aiax, the ſonne of Telamon with his brother Teucer, were in a manner the onely men of note that remaining vnwounded, made head againſt Hector, when the ſtate of the Greekes was almoſt deſperate.

Another battell (for ſo antiquitie cals it) or rather the ſame renewed, was fought by Patroclus, who hauing obtained leaue, drew forth Achilles troopes, relieuing the wearie Greekes with a freſh ſuppy. Agamemnon, Diomedes, Vlyſſes, and the reſt of the Princes, though ſore wounded, yet were driuen to put on armour, and with helpe of Patroclus, repelled the Troians very hardly. For in that fight Patroclus was loſt, and his body, with much contention recouered by his friends, was brought backe into the Campe: the armour of Achilles which he had put on, being torne from him by Hector. It was the manner of thoſe warres, hauing ſlaine a man, to ſtrip him and hale away his body, not reſtoring it without ranſome, if he were one of marke. Of the vulgar little reckoning was made: for they fought all on foot, ſlightly armed, and commonly followed the ſucceſſe of their Captaines; who rode not vpon horſes, but in Chariots, drawne by two or three horſes, which were guided by ſome truſtie followers of theirs, which draue vp and downe the field, as they were directed by the Captaines, who by the ſwiftneſſe of their horſes preſenting themſelues where neede required, threw firſt their Iauelins, and then alighting fought on foot, with ſwords and battel-axes, retiring into the rankes of footmen, or elſe returning to their Chariots when they found cauſe, and ſo began againe with a new dart as they could get it, if their old were loſt, or broken. Their armes defenſiue were helmets, breſt-plates, bootes of braſſe or other metall, and ſhields commonly of leather plated ouer. The offenſiue were ſwords and battel-axes at hand; and ſtones, arrowes or darts when they fought at any diſtance. The vſe of their Chariots (beſides the ſwiftneſſe) was to keepe them from wearineſſe, whereto the leaders were much ſubiect, becauſe of their armour, which the ſtrongeſt and ſtouteſt ware heauieſt: alſo that from them they might throw their Iauelins downewards, with the more violence. Of which weapon I finde not that any carried more than one or two into the field: wherefore they were often driuen to returne to their Tents for a new one when the old was gone. Likewiſe of armours they had little change or none; euery man (ſpeaking of the chiefe) carried his owne compleat, of which if any piece were loſt or broken, he was driuen to repaire it with the like, if he had any fitting, taken from ſome Captaine whom he had ſlaine, and ſtripped: or elſe to borrow of them that had by ſuch meanes gotten ſome to ſpare. Whereas therefore Achilles had loſt his armour which Hector (as is ſaid before) had taken from the body of Patroclus, he was faine to await the making of new, ere he could enter the fight: whereof he became very deſirous, that he might reuenge the death of Patroclus his deare friend.

At this time Agamemnon reconciled himſelfe vnto Achilles, not onely reſtoring his concubine Briſeis, but giuing him very great gifts, and excuſing former matters as well as he might. In the next battell Achilles did ſo behaue himſelfe, that he did not onely put the Troians to the worſt, but alſo ſlew the valiant Hector, whom (if Homer may herein be beleeued) he chaced three times about the wals of Troy. But great queſtion may be made of Homers truth in this narration. For it is not likely that Hector would ſtay alone without the Citie (as Homer doth report of him) when all the Troian, were fled into it: nor that he could leape ouer the riuers of Xanthus and Simois, as he muſt haue done in that flight: nor that the Troians perceiuing Hector in ſuch an extremitie, would haue forborne to open ſome of their gates and let him in. But this is reported onely to grace Achilles, who hauing (by what meanes ſoeuer) ſlaine the noble Hector, did not onely carry away his dead body, as the cuſtome then was, but boring holes in his feet, and thruſting leatherne thongs into them, tyed him to his Chariot, and dragging him ſhamefully about the field, ſelling the dead body to his father Priamus for a very great ranſome. But his cruelty and couetouſneſſe were not long vnreuenged; for he was ſhortly after ſlaine with an arrow by Paris, as Homer ſayes, in the Scean gate, or as others in the Temple of Apollo, whither he came to haue married Polyxena the daughter of Priamus, with whom he was too farre in loue, hauing ſlaine ſo many of her brethren; and his body was ranſomed (as Lycophron ſaith) at the ſelfe-ſame rate that Hectors was by him ſold for. Not long after this, Pentheſilea Queene of the Amazons arriued at Troy; who after ſome proofe giuen of her valour, was ſlaine by Pyrrhus the ſonne of Achilles.

§. V.

Of the taking of Troy, the woodden Horſe, the Booke of Dares and Dyctis, the Colonies of the reliques of Troy.

FInally, after the death of many worthy perſons, on each ſide, the Citie was taken by night, as all writers agree: but whether by the treaſon of Æneas and Antenor; or by a woodden Horſe, as the Poets, and common fame (which

(which followed the Poets) haue deliuered, it is vncertaine. Some write that vpon one of the gates of Troy called Scæa, was the image of a horse, and that the Greekes entring by that gate, gaue occasion to the report, that the Citie was taken by an artificiall horse. It may well be that with some woodden engine, which they called an Horse, they either did batter the wals, as the Romanes in after-times vsed to doe with the Ramme: or scaled the wals vpon the sudden, and so tooke the Citie. As for the hiding of men in the hollow body of a woodden horse, it had beene a desperate aduenture, and seruing to no purpose. For either the Troians might haue perceiued the deceit, and slaine all those Princes of Greece, that were inclosed in it (which also by such as maintaine this report they are said to haue thought vpon:) or they might haue left it a few dayes without the Citie (for it was vnlikely, that they should the very first day both conclude vpon the bringing it into the towne, and breake downe their wals vpon the sudden to doe it:) by which meanes they who were shut into it, must haue perished for hunger, if they had not by issuing forth vnseasonably discouered the inuention. Whereas further it is said, that this horse was so high and great, that it could not be brought into the towne through any of the gates, and that therefore the Troians were faine to pull downe a part of their wall to make way for it, through which breach the Greekes did afterwards enter: it is hereby manifest that the inclosing of so many principall men was altogether needelesse, considering that without their helpe there was way sufficient for the armie, so that the surprising of any gate by them was now to no purpose.

Iohn Baptista Gramay in his Historie of Asia, discoursing of this warre, saith that the Greekes did both batter the wals with a woodden engine, and were also let into the Citie by Antenor, at the Scæan gate: the townesmen sleeping and drinking without feare or care, because the fleete of the Græcians had hoisted saile, and was gone the day before to the Ile of Tenedos, thereby to bring the Troians into securitie. That the Citie was betrayed, the bookes of Dares and Dictys must proue, which whether we now haue the same that were by them written, it may be suspected; for surely they who haue made mention of these writers in ancient times, would not, as they did, haue followed the reports of Homer and others quite contradictorie in most points to these two authors, without once taking notice of the opposition, which they hauing serued in that warre made against the common report: had it not beene that either those bookes were euen in those times thought friuolous, or else contained no such repugnancie to the other authors as now is found in them.

Also concerning the number of men slaine in this warre, which Dares and Dyctis say to haue beene aboue 600000. on the Troian side, and more than 800000. of the Greekes, it is a report meerely fabulous; for as much as the whole fleete of the Greekes was reckoned by Homer, who extolled their armie and deedes as much as he could, to be somewhat lesse than 1200. saile, and the armie therein transported ouer the Greeke seas, not much aboue 100000. men, according to the rate formerly mentioned. But it is the common fashion of men to extoll the deedes of their Auncients: for which cause both Homer magnified the Captaines of the Greekes that serued in the warre, and Virgil with others were as diligent in commending and extolling the Troians and their Citie, from which the Romans descended. Yea the Athenians long after in the warre which Xerxes the Persian King made against all Greece, did not forbeare to vaunt of the great cunning which Mnesteus the sonne of Peteus had shewed, in marshalling the Grecian army before Troy: whereupon, as if it had beene a matter of much consequence, they were so proud, that they refused to yeeld vnto Gelon King of almost all Sicily, the Admiraltie of their Seas, notwithstanding that he promised to bring 200. good fighting ships, and 30000. men for their defence.

The like vanitie possessed many other Cities of Greece, and many Nations in these parts of the world, which haue striuen to bring their descent from some of the Princes, that warred at Troy: all difficulties or vnlikelihoods in such their Pedigree notwithstanding. But those Nations which indeede, or in most probability came of the Troians, were the Albanes in Italy, and from them the Romans, brought into that Countrey by Æneas: the Venetians first seated in Padua, and the Country adioyning by Antenor: the Chaonians planted in Epirus by Helenus the sonne of King Priamus. To which Hellanicus addeth, that the posteritie of Hector did resemble such of the Trojans as were left, and reigned ouer them about Troy.

§. VI.

Of the distresses and dispersions of the Greekes returning from Troy.

CONcerning the Greekes, they tasted as much misery as they had brought vpon the Troians. For Thucydides notes, that by reason of their long abode at the siege, they found many alterations when they returned: so that many were driuen by their borderers from their ancient seats: many were expelled their Countries by faction: some were slaine anon after their arriuall: others were debarred from the Soueraignty among the people, by such as had stayed at home. The cause of all which may seeme to haue beene the dispersion of the armie, which weakened much by the calamities of that long warre, was of little force to repell iniuries, being diuided into so many pieces vnder seuerall Commanders, not very well agreeing. For (besides other quarrels arising vpon the diuision of the bootie, and the like occasions) at the time when they should haue set saile, Agamemnon and his brother fell out, the one being desirous to depart immediatly, the other to stay and performe some sacrifices to Minerua. Hereupon they fell to hot words, halfe the fleet remaining with Agamemnon, the rest of them sailed to the Ile of Tenedos; where when they arriued, they could not agree among themselues, but some returned backe to Agamemnon; others were dispersed, each holding his owne course. But the whole fleet was sore vexed with tempests: for Pallas (as Homer saith) would not be perswaded in haste.

They who returned safe were Nestor, and Pyrrhus, whom Orestes afterwards slew: also Idomeneus, and Philoctetes, who neuertheless, as Virgill tels, were driuen soone after to seeke new seats: Idomeneus among the Salentines, and Philoctetes at Petilia in Italie. Agamemnon likewise returned home, but was forthwith slaine by his wife and by the adulterer Ægysthus, who for a while after vsurped his Kingdome. Menelaus wandring long vpon the Seas, came into Ægypt, either with Helen, or (as may rather seeme) to fetch her. Vlysses, after ten yeeres, hauing lost all his company, got home in poore estate, with much adoe recouering the mastership of his own house. All the rest either perished by the way, or were driuen into exile, and faine to seeke out new habitations.

Aiax the sonne of Oileus was drowned; Teucer fled into Cyprus; Diomedes to King Daunus, who was Lord of the Iapyges in Apulia; some of the Locrians were driuen into Africke, others into Italie, all the East part whereof was called Magna Græcia, by reason of so many townes which the Greekes were driuen to erect vpon that coast. Finally, it appeares in Homer, that the Grecian Ladies, whose husbands had beene at the warre of Troy, were wont to call it; The place where the Greekes suffered miserie, and the vnluckie Citie not to be mentioned. And thus much for Troy and those that warred there: the ouerthrow of which Citie, as hath beene said, happened in the time of Habdon Iudge of Israel, whom Samson after a variance or Interregnum for certaine yeeres succeeded.

CHAP. XV.

Of Samson, Eli, and Samuel.

§. I.

Of Samson.

2970. THE birth and acts of Samson are written at large in the 13. 14. 15. and 16. of Iudges; and therefore I shall not neede to make a repetition thereof. But these things I gather out of that Storie. First, that the Angell of God forbad the wife of Manoah the mother of Samson, to drinke wine or strong drinke, or to eate any vncleane meate, after shee was conceiued with childe; because those strong liquors hinder the strength, and as it were wither and shrinke the childe in the mothers wombe. Though this were euen the counsell of God himselfe, and deliuered by his Angell, yet it seemeth that many women of this age haue not read, or

or at least will not beleeue this precept: the most part forbearing nor drinkes, nor meats, how strong or vncleane soeuer, filling themselues with all sorts of wines, and with artificiall drinkes farre more forcible: by reason whereof, so many wretched feeble bodies are borne into the world, and the races of the able and strong men in effect decayed.

Secondly, it is to be noted, that the Angell of God refused the sacrifice which Manoah would haue offered him, commanding him to present it vnto the Lord: and therefore those that professe diuination by the helpe of Angels, to whom also they sacrifice, may assuredly know that they are Diuels who accept thereof, and not good Angels, who receiue no worship that is proper to God.

Thirdly, this Samson was twice betrayed by his wiues, to wit, by their importunitie and deceitfull teares: by the first he lost but a part of his goods: by the second his life. Quem nulla vis superare potuit, voluptas euertit; Whom no force could ouermaster, Voluptuousnesse ouerturned.

Fourthly, we may note, that he did not in all deliuer Israel from the oppression of the Philistims; though in some sort he reuenged, and defended them: for notwithstanding that he had slaine 30. of them in his first attempt, burnt their Corne in haruest time, and giuen them a great ouerthrow instantly vpon it: yet so much did Israel feare the Philistims, as they assembled 3000. men out of Iuda, to besiege Samson in the rocke or mountaine of Etam, vsing these words: Knowest not thou that the Philistims are Rulers ouer vs, &c. After which they bound him, and deliuered him vnto the Philistims, for feare of their reuenge; though he was no sooner loosened, but he gaue them an otherouerthrow, and slew 1000. with the iawbone of an Asse.

Lastly, being made blinde, and a prisoner by the treason of his wife, he was content to end his owne life, to be auenged of his enemies, when he pulled downe the pillars of the house at the feast whereto they sent for Samson, to deride him, till which time he bare his affliction with patience: but it was truely said of Seneca; Patientia sæpe læsa vertitur in furorem, Patience often wounded is conuerted into furie: neither is it at any time so much wounded by paine and losse, as by derision and contumelie.

§. II.

Of Eli, and of the Arke taken; and of Dagons fall, and the sending back of the Arke.

THe Storie of Eli the Priest, who succeeded Samson, is written in the beginning of Samuel; who foretold him of the destruction of his house, for the wickednesse of his sonnes, which he suppressed not, neither did he punish them according to their deserts: whose sinnes were horrible, both in abusing the Sacrifice, and prophaning and polluting the holy places: though Leui Ben Gerson, to extenuate this filthy offence of forcing the women by the sonnes of Eli, hath a contrary opinion. In this time therefore it pleased God to cast the Israelites vnder the swords of the Philistims; of whom there perished in the first incounter 4000. and in the second battell 30000. footmen; among whom the sonnes of Eli being slaine, their father (hearing the lamentable successe) by falling from his chaire, brake his necke. He was the first that obtained the High-Priesthood of the stocke of Ithamar the sonne of Aaron, before whose time it continued successiuely in the race of Eleazar the eldest brother of Ithamar: for Aaron was the first, Eleazar the second, Phinees the sonne of Eleazar the third, Abisue the sonne of Phinees the fourth, his sonne Bocci the fift, Ozi the sonne of Bocci the sixt, and then Eli, as Iosephus and Lyranus out of diuers Hebrew authors haue conceiued. In the race of Ithamar the Priesthood continued after Eli to the time of Salomon who cast out Abiathar, and established Sadock and Achimaas and their successors. The Arke of God which Israel brought into the field, was in this battell taken by the Philistims. For as Dauid witnesseth, God greatly abhorred Israel, so that he forsooke the habitation of Shilo: euen the Tabernacle where he dwelt among men, and deliuered his power into captiuitie, &c.

1 King. c. 2. 27. and 1 Chron. 6.

Psal. 78.

Now as it pleased God at this time, that the Arke whereby himselfe was represented, should fall into the hands of the Heathen, for the offences of the Priests and people: so did he permit the Chaldæans to destroy the Temple built by Salomon; the Romans to ouerthrow the second Temple; and the Turkes to ouerthrow the Christian Churches in Asia and Europe. And had not the Israelites put more confidence in the sacrament, or representation which was the Arke, then in God himselfe, they would haue obserued his Lawes, and serued him onely: which whensoeuer they did, they were then 1 Sam. 5. v. 6. victorious. For after the captiuitie they had no Arke at all, nor in the times of the Machabees: and yet for their pietie it pleased God to make that familie as victorious as any that garded themselues by the signe in stead of the substance. And that the Arke was not made to the end to be carried into the field as an ensigne; Dauid witnessed when he fled from Absalon. For when the Priests would haue carried the Arke with him; he forbad it, and caused it to be turned into the Citie, vsing these words: If I shall finde fauour in the 2 Sam. 15. eyes of the Lord, he will bring me againe: if not, let him doe to me as seemeth good in his eyes.

The Troians beleeued that while their Palladium or the image of Minerua was kept in Troy, the Citie should neuer be ouerturned: so did the Christians in the last fatall battell against Saladine carry into the field, as they were made beleeue, the very Crosse whereon Christ died; and yet they lost the battell, their bodies and the wood. But Chrysostome vpon Saint Matthew (if that be his worke) giueth a good iudgement, speaking of those that wore a part of Saint Iohns Gospell about their neckes, for an amulet or preseruatiue: Si tibi ea non prosunt in auribus, quomodò proderunt in Collo? If those words doe not profit men in their eares, (to wit, the hearing of the Gospell preached) how should it profit them by hanging it about their neckes? For it was neither the wood of the Arke, nor the wood of the Crosse, but the reuerence of the Father, that gaue the one for a memorie of his Couenant: and the Faith in his Sonne, which shed his blood on the other for redemption, that could or can profit them and vs, either in this life or after it.

The Philistims returning with the greatest victorie and glory which euer they obtained, carried the Arke of God with them to Azotus, and set it vp in the house of Dagon their Idoll: but that night the Idoll fell out of his place, from aboue to the ground, and lay vnder the Arke. The morning following they tooke it vp, and set it vp, and set it againe in his place. And it fell the second time, and the head brake from the body, and the hands from the armes, shewing that it had nor power, nor vnderstanding in the presence of God; for the head fell off, which is the seat of reason and knowledge, and the hands (by which we execute strength) were sundred from the armes. For God and the diuell inhabit not in one house, nor in one heart. And if this Idoll could not endure the representation of the true God, it is not to be maruailed, that at such time as it pleased him to couer his onely Begotten with flesh, and sent him into the world, that all the Oracles, wherein the Diuell derided and betrayed mortall men, lost power, speech, and operation at the instant. For when that true light which had neuer beginning of brightnesse, brake though the clouds of a Virgins body, shining vpon the earth which had bin long obscured by Idolatry, all those foule and stinking vapours vanished. Plutarch rehearseth a memorable accident in that age concerning the death of the great god Pan, as he stileth him; where (as ignorant of the true cause) he searcheth his braines for many reasons of so great an alteration: yet finds he none out but friuolous. For not onely this old Diuell did then die as he supposed, but all the rest, as Apollo, Iupiter, Diana, and the whole rabble became speechlesse.

Now while the Philistims triumphed after this victory, God strooke them with the grieuous disease of the Hæmorrhoides of which they perished in great numbers. For it is written that the Lord destroyed them. It was therefore by generall consent ordered, that the Arke should be remoued from Azotus to Gath or Geth another of the fiue great Cities of the Philistims; to proue, as it seemeth, whether this disease were fallen on them by accident, or by the hand of God immediatly: but when it was brought to Gath and receiued by them, the plague was yet more grieuous and mortall. For the hand of the 1 Sam. 5. v. 9. Lord was against this Citie with a very great destruction, and he smote the men of the Citie both small and great, &c. And being not yet satisfied, they of Gath sent the Arke to Ekron or Accaron, a third Citie of the Philistims: but they also felt the same smart, and cryed out that themselues and their people should be slaine thereby; For there was a destruction and death throughout all the Citie. In the end, by the aduice of their Priests, the Princes of the Philistims did not onely resolue to returne the Arke, but to offer gifts vnto the God of Israel, remembring the plague which had fallen on the Ægyptians, when their hearts were hardned to hold the people of God from their inheritance, and from his seruice by strong hand. Wherefore confessing the power of the God of Israel to be almightie, & that their owne Idols were subiect thereunto, they agreed to offer a sinne offering, vsing these words; So ye shall giue glorie to the God of Israel, that hee may take his hand from you, and from your gods, and from your land. And what can be a more excellent witnessing, than where an enemie doth approue our cause? according to Aristotle; Pulchrum est testimonium, quo nostra probantur ab hostibus. So did Pharao confesse the liuing God, when he was plagued in Ægypt: and Nabuchodonosor, and Darius, when they had seene his miracles by Daniel. C. 6. v. 5.

This counsell therefore of the Priests being imbraced, and the golden Hemorrhoides, and the golden Mice prepared, they caused two milch kine to be chosen, such as had not beene yoked, and a new Cart or carriage to be framed: but they durst not driue or direct it to any place certaine, thereby to make tryall whether it were indeed the hand of God that had strucken them. For if the Arke of God were carried towards Bethshemesh and into the territorie of Israel: then they should resolue that from God only came their late destruction. For the Philistims knew that the milch Kine which drew the Arke, could not be forced from their Calues, but that they would haue followed them whersoeuer; much lesse when they were left to themselues would they trauell a contrary way. For in the darkest night in the world if calues be remoued from their dammes, the kine will follow them through woods, and desarts by the foote, till they finde them. But the kine trauelled directly towards Bethshemesh: and when they came into the fields thereof, to wit, of one Iosua of the same Citie, they stood still there; which when the Princes of the Philistims perceiued, they returned to Ekron. After which, God spared not his owne people the Bethshemites, in that they presumed to looke into the Arke. And because they knew God and his commandements, and had beene taught accordingly: he strook them more grieuously then he did the Heathen, for there perished of them fiftie thousand and seuentie. From hence the Arke was carried to Kiriath-iearim and placed in the house of Abinadab; where it is written that it remained twentie yeers in the charge of Eleazar his sonne, vntill Dauid brought it to Hierusalem.

Now whereas it is said, that in the meane while the Arke was in Nob, Misspah, and Galgala, it was the Tabernacle, which was at this time seuered from the Arke: or at least, it was for the [a] present occasion brought to these places, and anon returned to Kiriath-iearim. 1. Sam. c. 6. & 1. Chron. c. 12.

§. III.
Of Samuel, and of his Gouernment.

THese Tragedies ouerpast and ended, Samuel, to whom God appeared while hee was yet a childe, became now Iudge and Gouernour of Israel. He was descended of the familie of [b] Chore or Korach. For Leui had three sonnes; Gerson, Cheath, and Merari: Cheath had Amram, and Izaar; of Amram came Moses and Aaron; of Izaar, Chore: and of the familie of Chore, Samuel. His father Elcana a Leuite, was called an Ephratean, not that the Leuites had any proper inheritance, but because he was of [c] Mount Ephraim, like as Iesse, Dauids father was called an Ephratean, because borne at Ephrata, or Bethleem. Hannah his mother being long fruitlesse, obtained him of God by prayers and teares: it being an exceeding shame to the Iewish women, to be called barren in respect of the blessing of God both to Abraham that his seed should multiplie as the Starres of Heauen, and the sands of the Sea; as in the beginning to Adam, Increase and multiply, &c. and in Deuteronomie the seauenth; There shall bee neither male nor female barren among you. [b] 1. Chro. 6. 22.

[c] Which region was called Ephrata, as appeareth, Iud. 12. 5. whence for distinction we read Ruth. 1. 2. Ephratai è Bethleehemo Iehudæ, the town Ephratha which is Bethleem in Iuda, Gen. 35. 19 from the region of Ephrata, which is in Mount Ephraim, whēce Psalm. 132. v. 6 Ephratha is put for Silo, which was in the Tribe of Ephraim.

Samuel was no sooner borne, but that his mother, according to her former vow, dedicated him to God, and his seruice, to which she deliuered him euen from the dugge. For as the first borne of all that were called Nazarites, might be redeemed till they were fiue yeeres old for fiue sheckles, and betweene fiue yeeres add twentie for twentie sheckles: so was it not required by the Law that any of the race of the Leuites should bee called to serue about the Tabernacle, till they were fiue and twenty yeeres.

Saint Peter reckons in the Acts the Prophets from Samuel, who was the first of the writers of holy Scriptures, to whom vsually this name of a Prophet was giuen, and yet did Moses account himselfe such a one; as in the 18. of Deuteronomie, The Lord thy God will raise vp vnto thee a Prophet like vnto mee, &c. But hee is distinguished from those that preceded him, who were called Seers; as Beforetime in Israel, when a man went to seeke an answere Verse 15. 1. Sam. 9.

answere of God, thus he spake; Come and let vs goe to the Seer: for he that is now called a Prophet, was in old time called a Seer. And although it pleased God to appeare by his Angels to Moses, as before to Abraham, Isaac, and Iacob; yet in the time of Eli, there was no manifest vision; not that God had altogether with-drawne his grace from Israel: but as the Chaldean Paraphrast hath it, those reuelations before Samuels time, were more clouded and obscure. The places wherein Samuel iudged were Mastpa or Mitspa, seated on a hill in Beniamin neere Iuda: also Gilgal, and Bethel, of which wee haue spoken elsewhere.

The Philistims taking knowledge of the assembly and preparation for Warre at Mispa in the beginning of Samuels gouernment, gathered their Armie and marched towards the Citie: at whose approach the Israelites strucken with feare, and with the memorie of their former slaughters and seruitude, besought Samuel to pray to God for them; who was * then performing his sacrifice when the Philistims were in view. But God being moued with Samuels prayers (as he was by those of Moses, when Israel fought against the Amalekites at their first entrance into Arabia.) It pleased him with thunder and tempest to disperse and beate downe the Armie of the Philistims, according to the prophecie of Hanna, Samuels Mother, The Lords aduersaries shall be destroyed, and out of heauen shall he thunder vpon them, &c. Iosephus affirmes, that a part of the Philistims were swallowed with an earth-quake: and that Samuel himselfe led the Israelites in the prosequution of their victory. After which Samuel erected a Monument in memorie of this happy successe, obtained by the miraculous hand of God, which Iosephus called, Lapidem fortem: Samuel, Ebenezer, or the stone of assistance: and then following the opportunitie and aduantage of the victory, the Israelites recouered diuers Cities of their owne formerly lost, and held long in possession of the Philistims, who for a long time after did not offer any inuasion or reuenge. And the better to attend their purposes, and to withstand any of their attempts, the Israelites made peace with the Amorites, or Canaanites, which lay on their backes, and to the North of them, that they might not be assaulted from diuers parts at once; hauing the Philistims towards the West and Sea-coast, the Canaanite toward the North and East, and the Idumite on the South. The estate being thus setled, Samuel for the ease of the people gaue audience and iudgement in diuers places by turnes, as hath beene elsewhere said.

* Plutarch reports of Numa the second King of Rome, that when as hee was sacrificing it was told him that the enemies approched, he nothing dismaied, answered, Ego autem sacrifico. 1 Sam. 2. 10.

CHAP. XVI.

Of SAVL.

Of the deliberation to change the gouernment into a Kingdome.

BVT when age now began to ouer-take Samuel, and that he was not able to vnder-goe the burthen of so carefull a gouernment, he put off from himselfe the waight of the affaires on his sonnes, Ioel and Abijah, who iudged the people at Beersheba, a Citie, the very vtmost towards the South of Iudea. And as the place was inconuenient and farre away, so were themselues no lesse remoued from the iustice and vertue of their Father: For the thirst of couetousnesse, the more it swalloweth, the more it drieth, and desireth, finding taste in nothing but gaine; to recouer which, they set the Law at a price, and sold Iustice and Iudgement to the best Chapmen. Which when the Elders of Israel obserued, and saw that Samuel as a naturall man (though a Prophet) could not so well discerne the errours of his owne, they prayed him to consent to their change of gouernment, and to make them a King, by whom they might be iudged as other Nations were; who might also leade them to the Warre and defend them against their enemies. For after the ill and lamentable successe which followed the rule of Eli his sonnes, when those of Samuel by their first blossomes promised to yeelde fruit no lesse bitter, they saw no way to put the gouernment from out his race, whom they so much reuerenced, but by the choice of a King.

In

In a cause of so great consequence and alteration, Samuel sought counsaile from God: which surely he did not for the establishing of his owne Sonnes; who being as they were, God would not haue approued his election. Now as it appeares by the Text, this speech or motion displeasing him, hee vsed his best arguments to dehort them: which when he perceiued to be ouer-feeble, he deliuered vnto them from Gods reuelation, the inconueniences and miseries which should befall them. And yet, all which hee foreshewed was not intolerable, but such as hath beene borne, and is so still by free consent of the Subiects towards their Princes. For first hee makes them know, that the King will vse their sonnes in his owne seruice to make them his Horse-men, Chariotters, and Foot-men; which is not onely not grieuous, but by the Vassals of all Kings according to their birth and condition, desired: it being very agreeable to subiects of the best qualitie to command for the King in his Warres, and to till the ground no lesse proper and appertaining to those that are thereto breed and brought vp: so are likewise the offices of women-seruants to dresse meate, to bake bread, and the like. But whereas immediately it is threatned, Hee will take your Fields, and your Vineyards, and your best Oliue trees, and giue them to his seruants; with other oppressions; this hath giuen, and giues dayly occasion to such as would be ruled by their owne discretion, to affirme that Samuel describeth heere vnto them the power of a King, gouerned by his owne affections, and not a King that feareth God. But others vpon further examination construe this Text farre otherwise, as teaching vs what Subiects ought with patience to beare at their Soueraigns hand. The former opinion is grounded first vpon that place of Deuteronomie, where God foreshewеth this change of gouernment from Iudges to Kings; and after hee had forbidden many things vnto the Kings, as many wiues, couetousnesse, and the like: hee commandeth that the Kings which were to reigne ouer Israel, should write the Law of Deuteronomie, or cause it to bee written: and to shew how greatly the King should honour the Law, he addeth, It shall be with him, and he shall reade therein all the dayes of his life: that he may learne to feare the Lord his God, and to keepe all the words of this Law, and these ordinances for to doe them: that hee may prolong his daies in his Kingdome, hee and his Sonnes. But to take away any other mans field, say they, is contrary to the Lawes of God, in the same booke written. For it is said, That which is iust and right shalt thou follow, that thou mayest liue. Now if it be not permitted to carrie away grapes more than thou canst eat out of another mans vineyard, but forbidden by God: it is much lesse lawfull to take the vineyard it selfe from the owner, and giue it to another. Neither are the words of the Text (say they) such as doe warrant the Kings of Israel, or make it proper vnto them, to take it will any thing from their vassalls. For it is not said that it shall be lawfull for the King, or the King may doe this or that: but it is written, that the King will take your sonnes: and againe, This shall be the manner of the King that shall reigne ouer you. God thereby foreshewing what power seuered from pietie, (because it is accountable to God onely) will doe in the future. And hereof we finde the first example in Achab, who tooke from Naboth both his Vineyard and his life, contrary to the trust which God had put in him, of gouerning well his people. For God commanded, That his people should bee iudged with righteous iudgement. Wherefore, though the King had offered vnto Naboth composition, as a Vineyard of better value, or the worth in money which he refused: yet because hee was falsly accused, and vniustly condemned (though by colour of law,) how grieuously Achab was punished by God, the Scriptures tell vs. Neither was it a plea sufficient for Achab against the all-righteous God, to say that it was done without his consent, and by the Elders of Israel. For God had not then left his people to the Elders, but to the King, who is called a liuing Law, euen as Dauid testifieth of himselfe: Posuisti me in caput gentium: For this of S. Augustine is very true: Simulata innocentia, non est innocentia: simulata æquitas non est æquitas: sed duplicatur peccatum in quo est iniquitas & simulatio. Fained innocence, and fained equitie, are neither the one nor the other: but the fault or offence is there doubled, in which there is both iniquitie and dissimulation. Such in effect is their disputation, who thinke this place to containe the description of a Tyrant. But the arguments on the contrary side, as they are many and forcible, so are they well knowne to all; being excellently handled in that Princely discourse of The true Law of free Monarchies, which Treatise I may not presume to abridge, much lesse here to insert. Onely this much I will say, that if practice doe shew the greatnesse of authoritie, euen the best Kings of Iuda and Israel were not so tied by any lawes; but that they did whatsoeuer they pleased in the

the greatest things; and commanded some of their owne Princes, and of their owne brethren to be slaine without any triall of law, being sometime by Prophets reprehended, sometime not. For though Dauid confessed his offence for the death of Vriah; yet Salomon killing his elder brother and others, the same was not imputed vnto him as any offence.

That the state of Israel should receiue this change of gouernment; it was not onelie fore-told by Moses in Deuteronomie, but perceiued by Iacob in this Scripture: The Scepter Gen. 49. shall not depart from Iuda, &c. It was also promised by God to Abraham for a blessing: Gen. 15. For it was not only assured that his issues should in number equall the Starres in heauen, Gen. 17. but that Kings should proceed of him: Which state seeing it is framed from the patterne of his sole rule, who is Lord of the Vniuersall; and the excellencie thereof in respect of all other gouernments, hath beene by many iudicious men handled and prooued, I shall not need to ouer-paint that which is garnished with better colours already, than I can lay on.

In the time of the Iudges euery man hath obserued what ciuill Warre Israel had: what outragious slaughters they committed vpon each other: in what miserable seruitude they liued for many yeeres: and when it fared best with them, they did but defend their owne Territories, or recouer some parts thereof formerly lost. The Canaanites dwelt in the best vallies of the Countrie. The Ammonites held much of Gilead ouer Iordan; the Philistims the Sea-coasts; and the Iebusites Hierusalem it selfe, till Dauids time: all which that King did not onely conquer and establish, but hee mastered and subiected all the neighbour Nations, and Kings, and made them his tributaries and vassals. But whether it were for that the Israelites were moued by those reasons, which allure the most of all Nations to liue vnder a Monarch, or whether by this meanes they sought to bee cleered 1. Sam. 8. from the sonnes of Samuel, they became deafe to all the perswasions and threats which Samuel vsed; insisting vpon this point, that they would haue a King, both to iudge them and defend them: whereunto when Samuel had warrant from God to consent; hee sent euery man to his owne Citie and abiding.

§. II.

Of the election of Saul.

After that Samuel had dismissed the assembly at Mizpah, hee forbare the election of a King, till such time as he was therein directed by God: who fore-told him the day before, that he would present vnto him a man of the Land of Beniamin, whom he commanded Samuel to annoint. So Samuel went vnto Ramath Sophim, to make a feast for the entertainment of Saul (whom yet he knew not, but knew the truth of Gods promises) and Saul also hauing wandred diuers daies to seeke his fathers asses, at length by the aduice of his seruant trauelled towards Ramath, to finde a Seer or Prophet, hoping from him to be told what way to take, to finde his beasts. In which iourney it pleased God (who doth many times order the greatest things by the simplest passages, and persons) to elect Saul, who sought an Asse, and not a Kingdome: like as formerly it had pleased him to call Moses, while he fed the sheepe of Iethro; and after to make choyce of 1. Sam. 16. Dauid the yongest of eight sonnes, and by the Scriptures called a little one, who was then keeping of beasts; and changed his sheep-hooke into a Scepter, making him of all other the most victorious King of Iuda and Israel. So Iohn and Iacob were taken from casting their nets, to become fishers of men, and honoured with the titles of Apostles, a dignitie that died not in the graue, as all worldly Honours doe: but permanent and euerlasting in Gods everlasting Kingdome.

When Samuel was entred into Ramath, he prepared a banquet for the King, whom he expected, and stayed his arriuall at the gate. Not long after came Saul, whom God shewed to Samuel, and made him know that it was the same whom hee had fore-told him of, that hee should rule the people of God. Saul finding Samuel in the gate, but knowing him not, though a Prophet and Iudge of Israel, much lesse knowing the Honour which attended him, asked Samuel in what part of the Citie the Seer dwelt. Samuel answered, that himselfe was the man hee sought, and prayed Saul to goe before him to the high place, where Samuel setting him according to his degree, aboue all that were inuited, conferred with him afterwards of the affaires of the Kingdome, and of Gods graces to bee bestowed on him, and the morning following annointed him King of Israel.

Gods

After this he told him all that should happen him in the way homeward, that two men should incounter him by Rahels Sepulcher, who should tell him that his Asses were found, and that his Fathers cares were changed from the feare of losing his beasts, to doubt the losse of his Sonne: that he should then meet three other men in the plaine of Tabor; then a company of Prophets: and that hee should be partaker of Gods spirit, and prophecie with them: and that thereby his condition and disposition should be changed from the vulgar, into that which became a King elected and favoured by God.

But the Prophets here spoken of, men indued with spirituall gifts, were not of the first and most reuerenced number, who by diuine reuelation fore-told things to come, reprehended without feare the errors of their Kings, and wrought miracles; of which number were Moses, Iosua, Samuel, & after them Gad, Nathan, Ahias, Elias, Eliseus, Isay, Ieremie, and the rest; for these Prophets, saith S. Chrysostome, Omnia tempora percurrunt, praterita, præsentia, & futura: but they were of those of whom S. Paul speaketh of 1. Cor. 14. 14. who inriched with spirituall gifts, expounded the Scriptures and the Law. Chrysost in Ps 43

At Mispeth Samuel assembled the people, that he might present Saul to them, who as yet knew nothing of his election: neither did Saul acquaint his owne Vncle therewith, when he asked him what had past betweene him and Samuel: for either hee thought his estate not yet assured, or else that it might be dangerous for him to reueale it, till he were confirmed by generall consent. When the Tribes were assembled at Mizpeth, the generall opinion is, that he was chosen by lot. Chimhi thinkes by the answere of * Vrim and Thummim: that is, by the answere of the Priest, wearing that mysterie vpon his brest when he asked counsaile of the Lord. But the casting of lots was not onely much vsed among the Iewes, but by many others, if not by all nations. The Land of promise was diuided by lot: God commanded lots to be cast on the two Goates, which should be sacrificed, and which turned off: a figure of Christs suffering, and our deliuerance, for whose garments the Iewes also cast lots. Cicero, Plautus, Pausanias, and others haue remembred diuers sorts of lots, vsed by the Romanes, Grecians, and other Nations: as in the diuision of grounds or honours; and in things to bee vnder-taken: the two first kindes were called diuisorie; the third, diuinatory; and vnto one of these three all may be reduced: all which kindes howsoeuer they may seeme chancefull, are yet ordered and directed by God: as in the Prouerbs: The lot is cast into the lap, But the whole disposition is of the Lord. And in like sort fell the Kingdome of Israel on Saul, not by chance, but by Gods ordinance, who gaue Samuel former knowledge of his election: from which election Saul with-drew himselfe in modestie, as both Iosephus consters it, and as it may bee gathered by his former answeres to Samuel, when hee acknowledged himselfe the least of the least Tribe. But Samuel inlightened by God, found where Saul was hidden, and brought him among the people, and hee was taller then all the rest by the shoulders. And Samuel made them know that hee was the chosen King of Israel, whereupon all the multitude saluted him King, and prayed for him; yet some there were that enuied his glorie (as in all estates there are such) who did not acknowledge him by offring him presents, as the manner was: of whom Saul, to auoide sedition, tooke no notice. 1. Sam. 10.

* The Vrim & Thumim in the ornaments of the High-Priest were inserted within the pectorall, which therfore was duplicatū, they were placed in the pectorall ouer against the hart of the High Priest. It is plain that they were not the precious stones nor any thing made by the Artificers. See Exod. 28. Cic de diuin. Paus. in Mes.

§. III.

Of the establishing of Saul by his first victorie.

SO sooner was Saul placed in the Kingdome, but that hee receiued knowledge that Nahas King of the Ammonites prepared to besiege Iabes Gilead: which Nation since the great ouerthrow giuen them by Iephta, neuer durst attempt anie thing vpon the Israelites, till the beginning of Saul his rule. And although the Ammonites did alwaies attend vpon the aduantage of time, to recouer those Territories which first the Amorite, and then Israel dispossest them of; which they made the ground of their inuasion in Iephta's time; yet they neuer perswaded themselues of more aduantage than at this present. For first, they knew that there were many of the Israelites that did not willingly submit themselues to this new King: secondly, they were remembred that the Philistims had not long before slaine 34000. of their men of Warre: and besides had vsed vſed great care and policie that they ſhould haue no Smithes to make them ſwords or ſpeares: neither was it long before, that of the Bethſhemeſites and places adioyning, there periſhed by the hand of God more then 50000. and therefore in theſe reſpects, euen occaſion it ſelfe inuited them to inlarge their Dominions vpon their borderers: Iabes Gilead being one of the neereſt. Beſides, it may further be coniectured, that the Ammonites were imboldened againſt Iabes Gilead, in reſpect of their weakeneſſe: ſince the Iſraelites Iud. 21. deſtroyed a great part of them, for not ioyning with them againſt the Beniamites: at which time they did not onely ſlaughter the men and male-children, but took from them their yong women, and gaue them to the Beniamites: and therefore they were not likelie to haue beene increaſed to any great numbers: and if they had recouered themſelues of this great calamitie, yet the Ammonite might flatter himſelfe with the opinion, that Iſrael hauing for long time beene diſarmed by the Philiſtims, was not apt to ſuccour thoſe whom they had ſo deepely wounded and deſtroyed. But contrariwiſe, when the tidings came to Saul of their danger, and that the Ammonites would giue them no other condition to ranſome themſelues, but by pulling out their right eyes, by which they ſhould be vtterly diſabled for the Warre, as elſewhere hath beene ſpoken: Saul, both to value himſelfe in his firſt yeeres reigne, and becauſe perchance hee was deſcended of one of thoſe 400. Maides taken from the Gileadites, and giuen to the Beniamites, gaue order to aſſemble the forces of Iſrael, hewing a yoke of Oxen into pieces, and ſending them by meſſengers ouer all the coaſts, proteſting thus: That whoſoeuer came not forth after Saul and after Samuel, ſo ſhould his Oxen be ſerued: threatning the people by their goods, and not by their liues at the firſt. Seuen dayes had Saul to aſſemble an Armie, by reaſon that the Gileadites had obtained the reſpite of theſe ſeuen daies to giue Nahas the Ammonite an anſwer: who, could they haue obtained any reaſonable condition, were contented to haue ſeuered themſelues from Iſrael, and to become Vaſſals and Tributaries to the Heathen. In the meane while Saul aſſembled the forces which repaired vnto him at Bezec, neere Iordan, that he might readily paſſe the Riuer; which done, he might in one day with a ſpeedie march arriue at Iabes, vnder the Hills of Gilead.

1. Sam. 11. 8. The Armie by Saul led, conſiſting of three hundred and thirty thouſand, hee returned an anſwer to thoſe of Iabes, that they ſhould aſſure themſelues of ſuccour by the next day at noone. For, as it ſeemeth, Saul marched away in the latter part of the day, and went on all night; for in the morning watch hee ſurprized the Armie of Nahas the Ammonite. And to the end that hee might ſet on them on all ſides, hee diuided his forces into three parts, putting them to the ſword vntill the heat of the day, and the wearineſſe of Sauls troupe inforced them to giue ouer the purſuit. Now the Ammonites were become the more careleſſe and ſecure, in that thoſe of Iabes promiſed the next morning to render themſelues and their Citie to their mercie. After this happie ſucceſſe the people were ſo farre in loue with their new King, that they would haue ſlaine all thoſe Iſraelites that murmured againſt his election, had not himſelfe forbidden and reſiſted their reſolutions. Such is the condition of worldly men, as they are violent louers of the proſperous, and baſe Vaſſals of the time that flouriſheth: and as deſpightfull and cruell without cauſe againſt thoſe, whom any miſaduenture, or other worldly accident hath throwne downe.

1. Sam. 11. After the Armie remoued, Samuel ſummoned the people to meet at Gilgal, where Saul was now a third time acknowledged, and as ſome Commenters affirme, anointed King: and here Samuel vſed an exhortation to all the Aſſembly, containing precepts, and a re-
1. Sam. 12. hearſall of his owne Iuſtice, during the beginning of his gouernment to that day. After Saul had now reigned one yeere before he was eſtabliſhed in Gilgal, or Galgala, he ſtrengthened himſelfe with a good guard of 3000. choſen men, of which he aſſigned 1000. to attend on Ionathan his ſonne at Gibeah, the Citie of his natiuitie: the reſt hee kept about his owne perſon in Micmas, and in the Hill of Bethel.

§. IIII.

Of Sauls diſobedience in his proceedings in the Warres with the Philiſtims and Amalekites, which cauſed his finall reiection.

IOnathan with his ſmall Armie or Regiment that attended him, taking a time of aduantage, ſuprized a Garriſon of Philiſtims: the ſame, as ſome thinke, which Saul paſt by, when he came from Rama, where hee was firſt anointed by Samuel, which which they thinke to haue beene Cariath-iearim: becauſe a place where the Philiſtims had a Garriſon, 1. Sam. 10. is called the Hill of God, which they vnderſtand of Cariath-iearim: but Iunius vnderſtands this Garriſon to haue beene at Gebah in Beniamin neere Gibba, where Ionathan abode with his thouſand followers. Howſoeuer, by this it appeareth that the Philiſtims held ſome ſtrong places, both in the times of Samuel, and of Saul, within the Territorie of Iſrael: and now being greatly inraged by this ſurprize, they aſſembled thirty thouſand armed Chariots, and ſixe thouſand Horſe, wherewith they inuaded Iudea, and incamped at Machmas or Michmas, a Citie of Beniamin, in the direct way from Samaria to Hieruſalem, and in the middeſt of the Land betweene the Sea and Iordan. With this ſudden inuaſion the Iſraelites were ſtrucken in ſo great a feare, as ſome of them hid themſelues in the caues of the mountaines; other fledde ouer Iordan into Gad and Gilead: Saul himſelfe with ſome 2000. men of ordinarie, and many other people, ſtaid at Galgala in Beniamin, not farre from the paſſage of Ioſua when he led Iſrael ouer Iordan. Heere Saul by Samuels appointment was to attend the comming of Samuel ſeuen daies: but when the laſt day was in part ſpent, and that Saul perceiued his forces to diminiſh greatly, he preſumed (as ſome expound the place 1. Sam. 13. 9.) to exerciſe the office which appertained not vnto him, and to offer a burnt offering and a peace offering vnto God, contrary to the Eccleſiaſticall lawes of the Hebrewes, and Gods Commandements: others expound the word, obtulit, in this place, by obtulit per Sacerdotem, and ſo make the ſinne of Saul not to haue beene any intruſion into the Prieſts office, but firſt a diſobedience to Gods Commandement, in not ſtaying according to the appointment, 1. Sam. 10. 8. ſecondly a diffidence or miſtruſt in Gods helpe, and too great relying vpon the ſtrength of the people, whoſe departing from him hee could not beare patiently; and laſtly a Contempt of the holy Prophet Samuel, and of the helpe which the prayers of ſo godly a man might procure him. But whatſoeuer was his ſinne, notwithſtanding his excuſes, hee was by Samuel reprehended moſt ſharply, in termes vnfitting his eſtate, had not extraordinarie warrant beene giuen to Samuel ſo to doe, from God himſelfe; at which time alſo Samuel feared not to let him know, that the Kingdome ſhould be conferred to another (a man after Gods owne heart) both from Saul and his poſteritie.

1. Sam. 13. 5.

Verſe. 14.

After this Samuel and Saul returned to Gibeah, where Saul, when hee had taken view of his armie, found it to conſiſt of 600. men: for the moſt were fled from him and ſcattered, yea and among thoſe that ſtaid, there was not any that had either ſword or ſpeare, but Saul and his ſonne Ionathan onely. For the Philiſtims had not left them any Smyth in all Iſrael, that made weapons; beſides, they that came to Saul came haſtily, and left ſuch weapons and armor as they had, behind them in their garriſons: for if they had had none at all, it might be much doubted how Saul ſhould be able the yeere before, or in ſome part of this very yeere, to ſuccour Iabes Gilead with 300. and thirty thouſand men, if there had not now beene any yron weapon to defend themſelues withall, ſaue onely in the hand of Saul and Ionathan his ſonne. But howſoeuer, all the reſt of the people were formerly diſarmed by the Philiſtims, and all thoſe crafteſmen carried out of the land that made weapons: there being left vnto the Iſraelites only files to ſharpen and amend ſuch ſtuffe as ſerued for the Plough, and for nought elſe: yet that they had ſome kind of armes it is manifeſt, or elſe they durſt not haue attempted vpon the Philiſtims as they did. And it is not ſaid in the Text that there was not any ſword in all Iſrael, but onely that there was not any found among thoſe 600. ſouldiers which ſtayed with Saul after Samuels departure: and it ſeemeth that when Samuel had ſharpely reprehended Saul, that his owne guards forſooke him, hauing but 600. remaining of his 3000. ordinarie ſouldiers, and of all the reſt that repaired vnto him, of which many were fledde from him before Samuel arriued.

1. Sam. 13. 22.

With this ſmall troope he held himſelfe to his owne Citie of Gibeah, as a place of more ſtrength, and better aſſured vnto him, than Gilgal was. Neither is it obſcure how it ſhould come to paſſe that the Philiſtims ſhould thus diſarme the moſt part of the Iſraelites, howſoeuer in the time of Samuel much had beene done againſt them. For the victories of Samuel were not got by ſword or ſpeare, but by thunder from heauen: and when theſe crafteſmen were once rooted out of the Cities of Iſrael, no maruell if they could not in a ſhort peace vnder Samuel be replanted againe. For this tyrannie of the Philiſtims is to bee vnderſtood, rather of the precedent times, than vnder Samuel: and yet vnder him it is to be thought that by their crafts they proceeded in the policie, not ſuffering their artificers to teach the Iſraelites, and ſo euen to the times of Saul kept them from hauing any ſtore of armour. The ſame policie did Nabuchodonoſor vſe after his Conqueſt in Iudea: Dionyſius in Sicilie; and many other Princes elſe-where in all ages. But theſe loſt weapons in part the Iſraelites might repaire in Gilead, for ouer Iordan the Philiſtims had not inuaded. The reſt of their defences were ſuch as antiquitie vſed, and their preſent neceſſity miniſtred vnto them; to wit, clubs, bowes, and ſlings. For the Beniamites exceeded in caſting ſtones in ſlings: and that theſe were the naturall weapons, and the firſt of all nations, it is manifeſt; and ſo in the firſt of Chronicles the 12. Chapter, it is written of thoſe that came to ſuccour Dauid againſt Saul, while he lurked at Siklag, That they were weaponed with bowes, and could vſe the right and the left hand with ſtones; and with a ſling it was that Dauid himſelfe ſlew the Gyant Goliah.

While the State of Iſrael ſtood in theſe hard termes, the Philiſtims hauing parted their armie into three troupes, that they might ſpole and deſtroy many parts at once; Ionathan ſtrengthened by God, and followed with his Eſquire onely, ſcaled a mountaine, whereon
1. Sam. 14. 12. a companie of Philiſtims were lodged: the reſt of their armie (as may bee gathered by the ſucceſſe) being incamped in the plaine adioyning. And though he were diſcouered before he came to the hill top, and in a kinde of deriſion called vp by his enemies: yet he ſo behaued himſelfe, as with the aſſiſtance of God he ſlew 20. of the firſt Philiſtims that he encountred. Whereupon the next companies taking the alarme, and being ignorant of the cauſe, fled away amazed altogether. In which confuſion, feare, and iealouſie, they ſlaughtered one another in ſtead of enemies: whereupon thoſe Hebrewes which became of their partie, becauſe they feared to be ſpoyled by them, tooke the aduantage of their deſtruction, and ſlew of them in great numbers. And laſtly, Saul himſelfe taking knowledge of the rout and diſorder, together with thoſe Iſraelites that ſhrouded themſelues in
1. Sam. 14. mount Ephraim, ſet vpon them and obtained (contrary to all hope and expectation) a moſt happie and glorious victory ouer them. Heere was that prophecie in Deuteronomie fulfilled by Ionathan, That one of thoſe which feared God, ſhould kill a thouſand, and two of them ten thouſand.

This done, the ſmall armie of Iſrael made retrait from the purſuit. And although Saul had bound the people by an oath not to take food till the euening, yet his ſonne Ionathan being infeebled with extreame labour and emptineſſe, taſted a drop of hony in his paſſage: for which Saul his father would haue put him to death, had not the people deliuered him from his crueltie.

The late miraculous victorie of Saul and Ionathan, ſeemes to haue reduced vnto the Philiſtims remembrance their former ouerthrow likewiſe miraculous in the daies of Samuel; ſo that for ſome ſpace of time they held themſelues quiet. In the meane while Saul being now greatly encouraged, vndertooke by turnes all his bordering enemies;
1. Sam. 14. namely, the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and the Arabians of Zobah, againſt all which he preuailed. He then aſſembled all the forces he could make, to wit, 210000. men, and receiuing the commandement of God by Samuel, he inuaded Amalec, waſting and deſtroying all that part of Arabia Petræa, and the Deſart belonging to the Amalekites, from Hauilah towards Tigris vnto Shur, which bordereth Ægypt; in which warre hee tooke Agag their King priſoner. But whereas he was inſtructed by Samuel to follow this Na-

Therefore did Samuel now a ſecond time make him know that God would caſt him from his royall eſtate to which he was raiſed, when he was of baſe condition, and as the Text hath it, little in his owne eyes. And though the offence was ſo great in Saul for not obeying the voyce of God by Samuel, had there beene no former precept to that effect: yet ſeeing Saul could not bee ignorant how ſeuerely it pleaſed God to inioyne the Iſraelites to reuenge themſelues vpon that Nation, he was in all vn-Deut. 25. 19 excuſable. For God had commanded that the Iſraelites ſhould put out the remembrance of Amalec from vnder heauen. For the cruelty which the predeceſſors of this Agag vſed againſt the Iſraelites, eſpecially on thoſe which were ouer-wearied, faint, ſicke, and aged people, was now to be reuenged on him, and his Nation aboue 400. yeeres afterward; and now hee was to pay the debt of bloud, which his forefathers borrowed from the innocent: himselfe hauing also sinned in the same kinde, as these words of Samuel witnesse: As thy sword hath made other women childelesse, so shall thy mother be childelesse among other women; at which time Samuel himselfe (after he had beene by many bootlesse intreaties perswaded to stay a while with Saul) did cut Agag in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal, and soone after he departed to Ramath, and came no more to see Saul, vntill the day of his death. 1 Sam 15.33

§. V.

Of the occurrents betweene the reiection of Saul and his death.

NOw while Samuel mourned for Saul, God commanded him to choose a King for Israel, among the sonnes of Isha: which Samuel (doubting the violent hand of Saul) feared in a sort to performe, till it pleased God to direct him, how hee might auoid both the suspition, and the danger. And if Samuel knew that it was no way derogating from the prouidence of God, that by his cautious care and wisedome, hee sought to auoid the inconuenience or dangers of this life; then doe these men mistake the nature of his diuine ordinance, who neglecting the reason that God hath giuen them, doe no otherwise auoid the perills and dangers thereof, than as men stupified in the opinion of fate or destinie, neglecting either to beg counsaile at Gods hands by prayer, or to exercise that wisdome or forefight, where-with God hath inriched the mind of man, for his preseruation. Neither did the all-powerfull God (who made and could destroy the world in an instant) disdaine here to instruct Samuel, to auoid the furie of Saul, by the accustomed cautious waies of the world.

Of the sonnes of Ishai, Samuel by God directed, made choice of Dauid, the yongest, hauing refused Eliab, the first borne: who though he were a man of a comely person and great strength; yet vnto such outward appearance, the Lord had no respect. For as it is written, God seeth not as man seeth, &c. but the Lord beholdeth the heart. He also refusing the other sixe brethren, made choice of one whom his Father had altogether neglected, and left in the field to attend his flocke, for of him the Lord said to Samuel, Arise and annoynt him, for this is he: which done, Samuel departed and went to Ramath. Neyther was it long after this that Saul began to seeke the life of Dauid: in which bloudy minde he continued till he died, ouercome in battell by the Philistims. 1. Sam. 16.

The Philistims hauing well considered (as it seemes) the increase of Saul his power through many victories by him obtained, whilest they had sitten still & forborne to giue impediment to his prosperous courses, thought it good to make new triall of their fortune, as iustly fearing that the wrongs which they had done to Israel, might be repayed with aduantage, if euer opportunity should serue their often iniured neighbours against them, as lately it had done against Moab, Ammon, and the rest of their ancient enemies. Now for the qualitie of their Souldiers, and all warlike prouisions, the Philistims had reason to thinke themselues equall, if not superiours to Israel. The successe of their former wars had for the most part beene agreeable to their own wishes; as for late disasters, they might, according to humane wisedome, impute them to second causes, as to a tempest happening by chance, and to a mistaken alarme, wherby their Armie possessed with a needlesse feare had fallen to rout. Hauing therefore mustered their forces, and taken the field, encamping so neere to the Armie which King Saul drew forth against them, that they could not easily depart without the triall of a battel, each part kept their ground of aduantage for a while, not ioyning in grosse, but maintaining some skirmishes, as refusing both of them to passe the Valley that lay betweene their Camps. Iust causes of feare they had on both sides; especially the Philistims, whose late attempts had been confounded by the angrie hand of God. Vpon this occasion perhaps it was, that they sought to decide the matter by single combat, as willing to try in one mans person, whether any stroake from heauen were to bee feared. Goliah of Gath a strong Giant, fearing neither God nor Man, vndertooke to defie the whole hoste of Israel, prouoking them with despightfull words, to appoint a Champion that might fight with him hand to hand; offering condition, that the partie vanquished in Champion, should hold it selfe as ouercome in grosse, and become vassall to the other. This gaue occasion to young Dauid, whom Samuel by Gods appointment had annointed, to make a famous entrance into publike notice of the people. For no man durst expose himselfe to encounter the great strength of Goliah, vntill Dauid (sent by his father of an errand to the campe) accepted the combat, and obtained the victorie, without other armes offensiue or defensiue than a sling, wherewith he ouerthrew that haughtie Gyant, and after with his owne sword strooke off his head. Hereupon the Philistims, who should haue yeelded themselues as subiects to the Conquerour, according to the couenant on their owne side propounded, fled without stay; and were pursued and slaughtered euen to their owne gates. By this victorie the Philistims were not so broken, that eyther any of their townes were lost, or their people discouraged from infesting the Territories of Israel. But Dauid, by whom God had wrought this victorie, fell into the grieuous indignation of his Master Saul, through the honour purchased by his well-deseruing. For after such time as the spirit of God departed from Saul and came vpon Dauid, hee then

1. Sam. 16. v. 13 became a cruell Tyrant, faithlesse, and irreligious. Becausse the high Priest Abimelech fedde Dauid in his necessitie with hallowed bread, and armed him with a sword of his owne conquest taken from Goliah; Saul not onely by his wicked Edomite Doeg murthered this Abimelech and 85. Priests of Nob, but also hee destroyed the Citie, and smote
1. Sam. 22. 18. with the edge of the sword both man and woman, both childe and suckling, both Oxe and Asse, and Sheepe. And hee that had compassion on Agag the Amalekite, who was an enemy to God and his people, and also spared and preserued the best of his Cattell, contrarie to the Commandement and ordinance of God, both by Moses and Samuel; had not now any mercie in store, for the innocent, for the Lords seruants the Priests of 1 Sam. 24. 23. Israel. Yea hee would haue slaine his owne sonne Ionathan, for pittying and pleading Dauids innocencie, as also once before for tasting the hony, when his fainting for hunger made him forget his fathers vnreasonable commination. The companions of cruelrie are breach of faith towards men, and impietie towards God. The former he shewed in denying Dauid his daughter, whom he had promised him: and againe in taking her away from him, to whom he had giuen her; also in that when as Dauid had twice spared his life in the Territorie of Ziph, and Saul twice sworne to do him no hurt, and confessed his errors, yet hee sought still to destroy him, by all the meanes he could. His impietie towards God he shewed, in that he sought counsell of the witch of Endor, which was the last preparatiue for his destruction. For whereas when he sought counsell from God he had bin alwaies victorious: from the Oracle of the Deuill this successe followed, that both himselfe, and his three sons, with his neerest and faithful seruants, were all slaughtered by the Philistims: his bodie with the bodies of his sons (as a spectacle of shame and dishonour) were hung ouer the walls of Bethsan: and there had remained till they had found buriall in the bowels of rauenous birds, had not the gratefull Gileadites of Iabes stolne their carcases thence, and interred them. This was the end of Saul, after he had gouerned Israel, together with Samuel 40. yeres, and by himselfe after Samuel 20. yeres, according
Act. 13. 21. to Cedrenus, Theophilus, and Iosephus. But yet it seemeth to me, that after the death of Samuel, Saul did not rule very long. For in the beginning of the 25. chapter, it is written that Cedren. pa. 69. Theop. l. 3. p. 3. Iosep. l. 28. Samuel died: and in the rest of the same chapter the passages are written of Dauid, Nabal, and Abigail, after which the death of Saul quickly ensued.

An exceeding valiant man he was, and gaue a faire entrance to all those victories which Dauid afterward obtained; for hee had beaten the Ammonites with their neighbouring Nations; crusht the Syrians, and their adhærents; broken the strength of the Amalekites; and greatly wasted the power and pride of the Philistims.

§. VI.

Of such as liued with Samuel and Saul; of Hellen and Hercules, and of their issues: vpon occasion of the Dores, with the Heraclidæ, entring Peloponnesus about this time.

IN the second yeere of Samuel, according to Eusebius, was Dauid borne: after Codoman later, and in the ninth yeere: after Bunting in the tenth. For Dauid, saith he, was thirty yeeres old when hee began to reigne: whence it followeth, that hee was borne in the tenth of the fortie yeeres, which are giuen to Samuel and Saul. About the 11. yeere of Samuel, Æneas Siluius the sonne of Posthumus began his reigne ouer the Latines in Alba, who gouerned that State one and thirty yeeres. There are who place before him Latinus Syluius, as brother to Posthumus, calling him the fifth from Æneas, and fourth King of Alba, whereof I will not ſtand to diſpute. In the eleuenth of Samuel, Dercilus ſate in the Throne of Aſſyria, being the one and thirtieth King; he ruled that Empire fortie yeeres. In this age of Samuel the Dores obtained Peloponneſus, and at once with the Heraclidæ, who then led and commanded the Nation, poſſeſt a great part thereof 328. yeeres before the firſt Olympiad, according to Diodorus and Eratoſthenes. For all Greece was anciently poſſeſſed by three Tribes or Kindreds, viz. the Ionians, Dorians, and Æolians: at length it was called Hellas, and the people Hellenes of Hellen, the ſonne of Deucalion, Lord of the Countrie of Pthiotis in Theſſalie. But before the time of this Hellen, yea and long after, Greece had no name common to all the inhabitants, neither were the people called Hellenes, till ſuch time as partly by trading in all parts of the Land, partly by the plantation of many Colonies, and ſundrie great victories obtained, the iſſues of Hellen had reduced much of the Countrie vnder their obedience, calling themſelues generally by one name, and yet euery ſeuerall Nation after ſome one of the poſteritie of Hellen, who had reigned ouer it. And becauſe this is the furtheſt antiquitie of Greece, it will not be amiſſe to recount the Pedigree of her firſt planters.

Iapetus (as the Poets fable) was the ſonne of Heauen and Earth, ſo accounted, eyther becauſe the names of his Parents, had in the Greeke tongue ſuch ſignification: or perhaps for his knowledge in Aſtronomie and Philoſophie.

Iapetus begat Prometheus, and Epimetheus: of whom all men haue read that haue read Poets. Prometheus begat Deucalion: and Epimetheus, Pyrrha. Deucalion & his wife Pyrrha reigned in Theſſalie, which was then called Pyrrha (as Cretenſis Rhianus affirmeth) of Pyrrha the Queene. In Deucalions time was that great floud, of which we haue ſpoken elſewhere. Deucalion begat Hellen: whoſe ſonnes were Xuthus, Dorus, and Æolus: of Dorus and Æolus, the Dores and Æolians had name. The Æoles inhabited Bœotia. The Dores hauing firſt inhabited ſundrie parts of Theſſalie, did afterward ſeate themſelues about Parnaſſus, and finally became Lords of the Countries about Lacedæmon: Xuthus the eldeſt ſonne of Hellen, being baniſhed by his brethren, for hauing diuerted from them to his owne vſe ſome part of their Fathers goods, came to Athens: where marrying the Daughter of King Erictheus, hee begat on her two ſonnes, Achæus and Ion. Of theſe two, Achæus, for a ſlaughter by him committed, fledde into Peloponneſus: and ſeating himſelfe in Laconia, gaue name to that region: from whence (as ſome write) hee afterwards departed; and leuying an Armie; recouered the Kingdome of his Grand-father in Theſſalie.

Ion being Generall for the Athenians, when Eumolpus the Thracian inuaded Attica, did obtaine a great victorie, and thereby ſuch loue and honour of the people, that they committed the ordering of their State into his hands. Hee diuided the Citizens into Tribes, appointing euery one to ſome occupation, or good courſe of life. When the people multiplied, hee planted Colonies in Sycionia, then called Ægialos, or Ægialia: In which Countrie Solinus then reigning, thought it ſafer to giue his Daughter Helice in marriage to Ion, and make him his Heire, than to contend with him. So Ion married Helice, and built a Towne called by his Wiues name in Ægialia, where he and his poſterity reigned long, and (though not obliterating the old name) gaue to that Land denomination. But in after-times the Dores aſſiſting the Nephewes of Hercules, inuaded Peloponneſus, and ouer-comming the Achæans, poſſeſſed Laconia, and all thoſe parts which the Achæi had formerly occupied. Hereupon the Achæi driuen to ſeeke a new ſeate, came vnto the Ionες deſiring to inhabit Ægialia with them, and alleadging in vaine, that Ion and Achæus had beene brethren. When this requeſt could not be obtained, they ſought by force to expell the Ionians, which they performed; but they loſt their King Tiſamenes, the ſonne of Oreſtes in that Warre.

Thus were the Ionες driuen out of Peloponneſus, and compelled to remoaue into Attica, from whence after a while they ſailed into Aſia, and peopled the Weſterne coaſt thereof; on which they built twelue Cities, inhabited by them, euen to this day, at the leaſt without any vniuerſall or memorable tranſmigration. This expedition of the Ionες into Aſia hath beene mentioned of all which haue written of that Age, and is commonly placed 140. yeeres after the warre of Troy, and 60. yeeres after the deſcent of the Heraclidæ into Peloponneſus. Theſe Heraclidæ were they of whom the Kings of Sparta iſſued; which race held that Kingdome about 700. yeeres. Of their Father Hercules many strange things are deliuered vnto vs by the Poets, of which some are like to haue beene true, others perhaps must be allegorically vnderstood. But the most approued Writers thinke that there were many called Hercules, all whose exploits were by the Greekes ascribed to the sonne of Alcmena, who is said to haue performed these 12. great labours.

First, he slew the Nemean Lyon: secondly, he slew the Serpent Hydra, which had nine heads, whereof one being cut off, two grew in the place: The third was the ouer-taking a very swift Hare: The fourth was the taking of a wilde Bore aliue, which hanted mount Erymanthus in Arcadie: The fifth was the cleansing of Augias his Oxe-stall in one day; which he performed by turning the Riuer Alpheus into it: The sixt was the chasing away of the Birds from the Lake Stymphalis: The seuenth was the fetching a Bull from Crete: The eight was the taking of the Mares which Diomedes King of Thrace fed with humane flesh: The ninth was to fetch a Girdle of the Queen of the Amazons: The three last were, to fetch Gerions Beeues from Gades; the golden Apples of the Hesperides; and Cerberus from hell. The Mythologicall interpretation of these I purposely omit, as both ouer-long to be heere set downe, and no lesse perplexed than the labours themselues. For some by Hercules vnderstand Fortitude, Prudence, and Constancie, interpreting the Monsters, Vices. Others make Hercules the Sunne, and his trauailes to bee the twelue signes of the Zodiac. There are others who apply his workes historically to their owne conceits; as well assured, that the exposition cannot haue more vnlikelihood, than the fables: That hee tooke Elis, Pylus, OEchalia, and other Townes, being assisted by such as eyther admired his vertues, or were beholding vnto him. Also that hee slew many Theeues, and Tyrants, I take to be truely written, without addition of Poeticall vanitie. His trauailes through most parts of the world are, or may seeme, borrowed from Hercules Labycus. But sure it is that many Cities of Greece were greatly bound to him: for that hee (bending all his indeuours to the common good) deliuered the Land from much oppression. But after his death no Citie of Greece (Athens excepted) requited the vertue and deserts of Hercules, with constant protection of his children, persequuted by the King Eurystheus. This Eurystheus was sonne of Sthenelus, and grand-childe of Perseus; hee reigned in Mycena, the mightiest Citie then in Greece. He it was that imposed those hard taskes vpon Hercules, who was bound to obey him (as Poets report) for expiation of that Murther, which in his madnes he had committed vpon his owne children; but as others say, because he was his Subiect and Seruant: wherefore there are who commend Eurystheus for imploying the strength of Hercules to so good a purpose. But it is so generally agreed by the best writers, that Hercules was also of the stocke of Perseus, and holden in great iealousie by Eurystheus because of his vertue, which appeared more and more in the dangerous seruices, wherein he was imployed, so that he grew great in reputation and power through all Greece; and had by many wiues and Concubines aboue threescore children. These children Eurystheus would faine haue got into his power, when Hercules was dead: but they fled vnto Ceyx King of Thracinia, and from him (for he durst not withstand Eurystheus) to Athens. The Athenians not onely gaue them entertainment, but lent them ayde, wherewith they encountred Eurystheus. Iolaus the brothers son of Hercules, who had assisted him in many of his trauels, was captaine of the Heraclidæ. It is said of him, that being dead, hee obtained leaue of Pluto to liue againe till hee might reuenge the iniuries done by Eurystheus: whom when he had slaine in battell, hee died againe. It seemes to mee, that whereas he had ledde Colonies into Sicilie, and abode there a long time forgotten: hee came againe into Greece to assist his cousins, and afterwards returned backe. When the Peloponnesians vnderstood that Eurystheus was slaine, they tooke Atreus the sonne of Pelops to their King: for hee was rich, mighty, and fauoured of the people. Against him the Heraclidæ marched vnder Hyllus the sonne of Hercules. But to auoid effusion of blood, it was agreed, that Hyllus should fight with Echenus King of the Tegeatæ a people of Arcadia, who assisted Atreus; with condition, that if Hyllus were victor, he should peaceably enioy what he challenged as his right: otherwise the Heraclidæ should not enter Peloponnesus in an hundred yeeres. In that combat Hyllus was slaine, and the Heraclidæ compelled to forbeare their Country, till the third generation: at which time they returned vnder Aristodemus (as the best authoritie doth shew, though some haue said, that they came vnder the conduct of his children) and brought with them the Dores, whom they planted in that countrey, as is before shewed, hauing expelled the Achai, ouer whom the issue of Pelops had reigned after the death of Eurysthem foure generations.

Of Homer and Hesiod, and many changes in the world, that happened about this age.

ABout this time that excellent learned Poet Homer liued, as many of the best Chronologers affirme. He was by race of the Magnes, descended (as Panctius imagineth) of Berosus his Anamem, who gaue name to that people. But this Panctius imagineth Homer the Poet to haue beene long after these times, rashly framing his Aera according to Archilochus in the tract, or rather fragment de temporibus, and makes seauen more of this name to haue florished in diuers Cities in Greece. Whence, perhaps, sprang the diuersitie of opinions, both of the time and of the native Citie of Homer. According to this Archilochus, Panctius finds Homer about the time of Manasse King of Iuda, and Numa of Rome. He was called Melesigenes from the place of his birth, and at length Homer, because blinde men follow a guide, which signification among others, is in the verbe ὁμηρεύειν for this Homer in his latter time was blinde. [a] Clemens Alexandrinus recites many different opinions touching the question of the time when Homer liued. So also [b] Aulus Gellius, and Tatianus Assyrius in his Oration ad gentes. Paterculus reckons that Homer florished 950. yeeres before the Consulship of Marcus Vinutius: which Mercator casteth vp in the worlds yeere 3046. and after Troy taken, about 260 yeeres: and about 250. yeeres before the building of Rome, making him to haue florished about the time of Iehosaphat King of Iuda. But Clemens Alexandrinus and Tatianus aboue named, mention authors that make him much ancienter. The difference of which authors in this point is not vnworthy the readers consideration, that by this one instance he may guesse of the difficultie, and so pardon the errours in the computations of ancient time: seeing in such diuersitie of opinions a man may hardly finde out what to follow. For Crates the Grammarian (as Clemens Alexandrinus reports) gaue being to Homer about 80. yeeres after Troy taken, neere the time that the Heraclidæ returned into Peloponnesus: and * Eratosthenes after Troy 100. yeeres. Theopompus 500. yeeres after the armie of Greece sailed into Phrygia for the warre of Troy. Euphorion makes him contemporarie with Gyges, who began to reigne in the 18. Olympiad (which was 45. yeeres after Rome was built) and Sosibius saith, that he was 90. yeeres before the first Olympiad: which he seekes to proue by the times of Charillus and his sonne Nicander; Phylochorus placeth him 180. after Troy: Aristarchus 140. in the time of the seating of the Colonies in Ionia. Apollodorus affirmes that he liued while Agesilaus gouerned Lacedemon, and that Lycurgus in his yong yeeres, about 100. yeeres after the Ionian plantations, came to visit him, neere 240. yeeres after Troy taken. Herodotus findes Homer florishing 622. yeeres before Xerxes enterprise against the Grecians: which Beroaldus accounteth at 168. yeeres after the Troian warre. Eusebius seemes to make him to haue beene about the time of Ioas King of Iuda, 124. yeeres before Rome built: though elsewhere in his Chronologie he notes, that some place him in the time of Samuel, and others in the end of Dauid, and others in other ages. In his Euangelicall Preparation, where out of Tatianus Assyrius he citeth sundry opinions touching the time when Homer liued, he reckoneth many other Greeke writers more ancient than Homer, as Linus, Philammon, Epimenides, Phemius, Aristæus, Orpheus, Musæus, Thamyras, Amphion, and others.

Now whether Homer or Hesiodus were the elder, it is also much disputed. Aulus Gellius reports that Philochorus and Xenophanes affirme, that Homer preceded Hesiod: and on the contrary, that Luc. Accius the Poet, and Ephorus the Historian, make Hesiod of an elder time than Homer. Varro leaues it vncertaine which of these learned fablers was first borne: but he findes that they liued together some certaine yeeres, wherein he confirmes himselfe by an Epigram, written vpon a Treuit, and left by Hesiod in Helicon.

Cornelius Nepos reports that they both liued 160. yeeres before Rome built: while the Siluij reigned in Alba, about [a] 140. yeeres after the fall of Troy. [b] Euthymenes findes them both 200. yeeres after Troy taken, in the time of Acastus the sonne of Pelias, King of of Thessaly. For my selfe, I am not much troubled when this Poet liued; neither would I offend the Reader with these opinions, but onely to shew the vncertainty and disagreement of Historians, aswell in this particular, as in all other questions and dispute of time. For the curiositie of this mans age is no lesse ridiculous, than the inquisition why he began his Iliades with the word Menin, as perhaps containing some great mysterie. In derision whereof Lucian faining himselfe to haue beene in hell, and to haue spoken with Homer, there asked him the cause why he began his booke with that word: who answered, That he began in that sort, because it came in his head so to doe.

It seemeth that Senyes, or after Macrobius, Seuenires, ruled Aegypt at this time; for Tanephersobris was his successour, who preceded Vaphres, father in law to Salomon.

And besides the ouerthrow of that famous State of Troy (which fell 103. yeeres before Dauids time) there were many other changes in the middle part of the world, not onely by reason of those Northerne Nations: but there sprung vp somwhat neerely together, sixe Kingdomes into greatnesse not before erected. In Italie, that of the Latines: in the South part of Greece, those of Lacedamon, Corinth, and the Achaei. In Arabia, Syria Soba, and Damascus, the Adads made themselues Princes, of which there were ten Kings, which began and ended with the Kings of Israel in effect: and somewhat before these, the State of the Israelites hauing now altered the forme of Gouernment, began to florish vnder Kings, of which Dauid, in a few yeers, became master of all those neighbouring Nations who by interchange of times had subiected the Iudeans, corrupted their religion, and held them vnder in a most abiect and grieuous slauerie; to wit, the Edumeans, Moabites, Ammonites, Midianites, Ituraans, and the rest of the Arabians; with the Philistims, Iebusites, Geshurites, Machathites; all which acknowledged Dauid for their Soueraigne Lord, and paid him tribute.

CHAP. XVII.

Of Dauid.

§. I.

Of Dauids estate in the time of Saul.

THE hazards which Dauid ran into while he was yet onely designed King, and liuing as a priuate man, expected the Empire, were very many. The first personall act of fame, was his killing of Goliah in the view of both armies, whereby he became knowne to Saul, and so highly affected of Ionathan the sonne of Saul, that he loued him as his owne soule: In so much as when Saul sought to perswade his son, that Dauid would assuredly be the ruine of his house, and estate, and offered him violence when he pleaded his cause; Ionathan could neuer be perswaded, neuer forst, nor euer wearied from the care of Dauids life, & well doing. It was not long after this signall act of Dauid, but that Saul became exceeding iealous of him, though he were become as his houshold seruant, and his Esquire, or armor-bearer. Saul being vexed with an euill spirit, was aduised to procure some cunning Musician to play before him vpon the Harpe; whereby it was thought that he might finde ease; which came to passe accordingly. He entertained Dauid for this purpose, and began to fauour him, giuing him a place of Command among the men of warre. But the iealous tyrant soone waxed wearie of his good affection, and sought to kill Dauid, being thereunto moued onely through enuie of his vertue. This passion first brake forth in the middest of his raging fit, at which time he threw a speare at Dauid that was then playing on his Harpe to doe him ease.

Censor. 12. & 14. Censorinus remembreth one Asclepius a Physician, who practised the curing of the Frenzie, by the like Musicke: and tempered thereby those diseases which grew from passion. That Pythagoras did also the like by such a kinde of harmonie, Seneca in his third booke of anger witnesseth. But the madnesse of Saul came from the cause of causes, and was thereby incurable, howsoeuer it sometimes left him, and yeelded vnto that Musicke, which God had ordained to be a meane of more good to the Musician than to the King.

Saul hauing failed in such open attempts, gaue vnto Dauid the Command ouer 1000. souldiers, to confront the Philistims withall. For hee durst not trust him as before, about his person, fearing his reuenge. Now the better to couer his hatred towards him, he promised him his daughter Merab to wife: but hauing married her to Adriel, he gaue to Dauid his yonger daughter Michol, but with a condition, to present him with an hundred foreskins of the Philistims: hoping rather (in respect of the valour of that Nation,) that the Philistims would take Dauids head, than he their foreskins. This hope failing, when as now Dauids victories begat new feares and iealousies in Saul, he practised with Ionathan, and afterwards with his owne hands attempted his life, but his purposes were still frustrated. After all this he sought to murther him in his owne house, but Michol his wife deliuered him. So Dauid sought Samuel at Ramah, and being pursued by Saul, fled thence vnto Nob in Beniamin, to Abimelech, then to Achis the Philistim, Prince of Geth: where to obscure himselfe, he was forc't to counterfeit both simplicitie and distraction. But being ill assured among the Philistims, he couered himselfe in the Caue of Adullam: and after conueying such of his kinsfolks as were not fit to follow him, into Moab, he hid himselfe in the desarts of Ziph, Maon and the hils of Engaddi, where he cut off the lap of Sauls garment, and spared his life: as he did a second time in the desart of Ziph, after his passage with Nabal and Abigail. After which he repaired to Achis of Geth the second time, and was kindely entertained in regard of the hatred, with which his master Saul was knowne to prosecute him.

Iansen in Psal.

Of Achis Dauid obtained * Siklag in Simeon, pretending to inuade Iudæa: but he bent his forces another way and strooke the Amalekites, with other enemies of Israel, letting none liue to complaine vpon him. Achis supposing that Dauid had drawne bloud of his owne Nation, thought himselfe assured of him: and therefore preparing to inuade Israel, summoneth Dauid to assist him, who dissembling his intent, seemeth very willing thereto. But the rest of the Philistim Princes knowing his valour, and doubting his disposition, liked not his company, and therefore he withdrew himselfe to Siklag. At his return he found the towne burnt, his two wiues with the wiues and children of his people taken by the Amalekites: Hereupon his fellowes mutined, but God gaue him comfort, and assurance to recouer all againe: which he did.

* It seemeth that Simeon neuer obtained Siglag till this time, for it is said in the 1. of Sam. c. 27. v. 6 therefore Siglag pertaineth vnto the King of Iuda vnto this day.

This armie of the Philistims commanded by Achis, encountred Saul at Gilboa, in which he and his three sonnes were slaine. The newes with Sauls Crowne and bracelets were brought to Dauid at Siklag, in his returne from being victorious ouer Amalech, by a man of the same Nation, who auowed (though falsly) that himselfe at Sauls request had slaine him. Dauid, because he had accused himselfe, made no scruple to cause him to be slaine at the instant: and the sooner, because the probabilities gaue strong euidence withall. Otherwise it followeth not that euery man ought to be beleeued of himselfe to his owne preiudice. For it is held in the law; Confessio reorum non habenda est pro explorato crimine, nisi approbatio alia instruit religionem cognoscentis. The prisoners confession must not be taken for an euidence of the crime, vnlesse some other proofe informe the conscience of the Iudge. For a man may confesse those things of himselfe, that the Iudge by examination may know to be impossible. But because it is otherwise determined in the title de custodia reorum l. si confessus, & in cap. de pœnis l. qui sententiam, therefore doth the Glosse reconcile these two places in this sort: Si quis in iudicio sponte de seipso confiteatur, & postea maneat in confessione, id est satis. If any man in iudgement doe confesse of himselfe, of his owne accord, and after doth perseuere in his confession, it is enough.

That Dauid greatly bewailed Saul it is not improbable, for death cutteth asunder all competition: and the lamentable end that befell him, being a King, with whom in effect the strength of Israel also fell, could not but stirre vp sorrow, and moue compassion in the heart of Dauid.

The victorie which the Philistims had gotten was so great, that some townes of the Israelites, euen beyond the riuer of Iordan, were abandoned by the inhabitants, and left vnto the enemie, who tooke possession of them without any resistance made. Wherefore it may seeme strange, that a Nation so warlike and ambitious as were the Philistims, did not follow their fortune with all diligence, and seeke to make the Conquest entire.

Most

Most like it seemes, that the Ciuill warre immediatly breaking out betweene Dauid and the house of Saul, wherein Iuda was diuided from the rest of Israel, gaue them hope of an easie victorie ouer both; and thereby caused them to attempt nothing at the present, lest by so doing they should inforce their disagreeing enemies to a necessarie reconciliation; but rather to permit that the one part should consume the other, by which meanes, both the victors, and the vanquished, would become a prey to the violence of such as had beaten them, when their forces were vnited.

§. II.

Of the beginning of Dauids reigne, and the warre made by Abner for Isboseth.

AFter the death of Saul, Abner, who commanded for Saul in the warre, sought to aduance Isboseth (or Iebostus, according to Iosephus) though he had no right to the Kingdome of Israel: for Mephiboseth the first son of Ionathan liued. Against this Abner, and Isboseth, Dauid made a defensiue warre, till Abner past Iordan, and entred the border of Iuda; at which time he sent Ioab with such forces as he had, to resist Abner: Isboseth remaining in Gilead, and Dauid in Hebron. The armies encountred each other neere Gibeon, where it seemeth, that Abner made the offer to trie the quarrell by the hands of a few; like to that Combat betweene the Lacedamonians, and the Argiues, remembred by Herodotus, 300. being chosen of each Nation, of which number three persons were onely left vnslaine. The like triall by a farre lesse number was performed by the Horatij and Curiatij for the Romanes and Latines. The same challenge Goliah the Philistim made, whom Dauid slew: a custome very ancient. Edward the third offered the like triall in his own person to the French King; and Francis the French King to Charles the Emperour. There were twelue chosen of each part, in this warre of Dauid with the house of Saul, to wit, so many of Beniamin, and as many of Iuda: whose force and valor was so equall, as there suruiued not any one to challenge the victory. But the quarrell staide not heere: for the army of Iuda prest Abner in grosse, and brake him. Three hundreth and sixtie men of Abners companions were slaine, and but twenty of Iuda: whereof Asahel the brother of Ioab was one: who when he would needes pursue Abner, and by Abners perswasions could not be moued to quit him, he was forced to turne vpon him, wounded him to death, with the stroake of his speare. For though Asahel were an excellent footman, and as it is written in the Text, as light as a wilde Roe, and as Iosephus reporteth, contended not onely with men, but with horses; and hoped to haue gotten great fame, if he could haue mastered Abner (who, as Asahel perswaded himselfe, had, by being ouerthrowne and flying away lost his courage) yet here it fell out true; That the race is not to the swift.

Eccles. 9. Vers. 10.

That this ciuill warre lasted two yeeres, we finde it written in the second of Samuel the second Chapter; though in the beginning of the third it is againe made probable, that this contention dured longer; and therefore the matter resteth still in dispute, and some of the Rabbines conceiue that Isboseth had then reigned two yeeres, when this was written, the warre as yet continuing a longer time. For Abner held for the partie of Isboseth after this, and till such time as there grew iealousie betweene him and Isboseth for Sauls concubine: neither did the death of Isboseth instantly follow; but how long after the muther of Abner it happened, the same doth not certainly appeare.

§. III.

Of the death of Abner slaine by Ioab, and of Isboseth by Rechab and Baanah.

ABner, reconciled to Dauid, was anon by Ioab murdered; for Ioab could not endure a companion in Dauids fauour, and in the commandement of his forces, by which he was growne so powerfull, as Dauid forbare to call him to account; for thus much he confesseth of himselfe: I am this day weake, and these men of the sonnes of Zeruiah be too hard for me. In this sort Dauid complained after Abners death; and to make it cleare that he hated this fact of Ioab, he followed him with this publike imprecation; Let the blood fall on the head of Ioab, and on all his fathers house: and let them be be ſubiect to vlcers, to the leproſie, to lameneſſe, to the ſword, and to pouertie, &c. For could anything haue withſtood the ordinance of God; this murther committed by Ioab might greatly haue indangered Dauids eſtate, Abner being the mouth and truſt of all the reſt of the Tribes, not yet reconciled. This miſchance therefore Dauid openly bewailed, ſo that all Iſrael perceiued him to be innocent of that fact. The place which Abner held, being Generall of the men of warre, was of ſuch importance, that the Kings themſelues were faine to giue them great reſpect, as hath beene already ſhewed more at large. This office Ioab held in the armie of Iuda, and thought himſelfe worthy to hold the place entire, if once his Lord might obtaine the whole Kingdome. For he was neere to Dauid in kinred, and had beene partaker of all his aduerſitie; wherefore he did not thinke it meete, that an old enemy ſhould in reward of new benefits, be made his partner. Indeede he was by nature ſo iealous of his dignitie and place, that he afterward ſlew Amaſa his owne kinſman and the Kings, vpon the ſame quarrell, taking it in high diſdaine to ſee him ioyned with himſelfe as captaine of the hoſte of Iuda; much leſſe could hee brooke a ſuperiour, and ſuch a one as had ſlaine his brother, and beene beaten himſelfe in battell. But howſoeuer Ioab did hate or deſpiſe Abner, Dauid eſteemed highly of him as of a Prince, and a great man in Iſrael, excuſing the ouerſight by which he might ſeeme to haue periſhed, by affirming that he died not like a foole, nor a man vanquiſhed, But as a man falleth before wicked men, ſo (ſaid he) diddeſt thou fall. And certainly it is no error of wit, nor want of valour and vertue in him whom a ſtronger hand deſtroyed vnawares, or whom ſubtiltie in free truſt bringeth to confuſion. For all vnder the Sunne are ſubiect to worldly miſeries and miſaduentures. Howſoeuer Iſboſeth meant to haue dealt with Abner, yet when he heard of his death, he deſpaired greatly of his eſtate, and with him all Iſrael were poſſeſt with great feare: inſomuch as two of Iſboſeths owne Captaines, Rechab and Baanah, murthered Iſboſeth, and preſenting his head to Dauid, receiued the ſame reward that the Amalekite lately did, for pretending to haue ſlaine Saul. Iſboſeth being dead, all the Elders of Iſrael repaired to Dauid at Hebron, where he was the third and laſt time annointed by generall conſent.

§. IIII.

Of the flouriſhing time of Dauids Kingdome, the taking of Ieruſalem, with two ouerthrowes giuen to the Philiſtims, and the conduction of the Arke to the Citie of Dauid.

WHen Dauid was now eſtabliſhed in the Kingdome, his firſt enterpriſe was vpon the Iebuſites, who in deriſion of his force, and confident in the ſtrength of the place (as is thought) manned their wals with the blinde and lame of their Citie; which Dauid ſoone after entred: all their other forces notwithſtanding. For hauing maſtered the fort of Zion (which was afterward the Citie of Dauid) he became Lord of Hieruſalem, without any great danger, expelling thence the Iebuſites, who had held it from the foundation, to the times of Moſes and Ioſua, and after them almoſt 400. yeeres. There are who expound this place otherwiſe: Except thou take away the blinde and the lame, thou ſhalt not come in hither. For ſome thinke that it was meant by the Idols of the Iebuſites: others, that it had reference to the Couenant made long before with Iſaac, and Iacob: the one blinde by nature and age, the other made lame by wreſtling with the Angell, and that therefore till thoſe (that is, till that Couenant) be broken, Dauid ought not to moleſt them. But for my ſelfe I take it with Ioſephus, that they armed their wals with certaine impotent people at firſt, in ſcorne of Dauids attempt. For they that had held their Citie about 400. yeeres againſt all the children of Iſrael, Ioſua, the Iudges, and Saul, did not doubt but to defend it alſo againſt Dauid.

2 Sam. 5.

When he had now poſſeſt himſelfe of the very heart and Center of the Kingdome, and receiued congratulatorie Embaſſadours and preſents from Hiram King of Tyre: he entertained diuers other concubines and married moe wiues, by whom he had ten ſons in Ieruſalem, and by his former wiues he had ſixe in Hebron where he reigned 7. yeeres.

The Philiſtims hearing that Dauid was now annointed King, as wel of Iuda as of Iſrael, they thought to try him in the beginning, before he was fully warme in his ſeat. And being encountred by Dauid at two ſeuerall times in the Valley of Rephaim, or of the Giants, they were at both times ouerthrowne. After which he called the place Baalperazim.

2 Sam. 5.

Then Dauid aſſembled 30000. choice Iſraelites to conduct the Arke of God from the houſe house of Abinadab in Gibea, to the Citie of Dauid, which businesse was interrupted by the death of Vzzah the sonne of Abinadab, whom the Lord slew for presuming to touch the Arke, though it were with intent to stay it from taking harme, when it was shaken. But after three yeeres it was with great solemnity brought into the Citie with sacrifices, musicke, dances, and all signes of ioyfulnesse, in which Dauid himselfe gladly bare a part. Hereupon Michol derided him for dancing before the Arke, and afterward told him in scorne, That he was vncouered as a foole in the eyes of the maidens his seruants; namely that he forgat his regall dignity both in apparell and behauiour; and mixed himselfe among the base multitude, dancing as fooles doe in the wayes and streetes: not that she disliked Dauids behauiour (as I take it) though she made it the colour of her derision; but rather the aboundant griefe, which this spectacle stirred vp, beholding the glory of her husband to whom she was deliuered lastly by force, and remembring the miserable end of her father and brethren, out of whose ruines she conceiued that the sonne of Ishai had built this his greatnesse: together with the many new wiues and concubines imbraced since his possession of Ierusalem, made her breake out in those despitefull tearmes, for which she remained barren to her death.

1 Chro. c. v. 3. This done, Dauid consulted with the Prophet Nathan for the building of the Temple or house of God: but was forbidden it, becausse he was a man of warre, and had shed bloud. So greatly doth the Lord and King of all detest homicide; hauing threatned, not in vaine, that he would require the bloud of man, at the hand of man and beast. The wars which Dauid had made were iust, and the bloud therein shed was of the enemies of God, and his Church: yet for this cause it was not permitted that his hands should lay the foundation of that holy Temple. Hereby it appeares how greatly those Princes deceiue themselues, who thinke by bloudshed and terrour of their warres, to make themselues in greatnesse like to the Almightie, which is a damnable pride; not caring to imitate his mercie and goodnesse, or seeke the blessednesse promised by our Sauiour vnto the peacemakers.

Now although it was not pleasing to the Lord to accept a Temple of Dauids founding, yet was his religious intent so well accepted, that hereupon he receiued both a confirmation of the Kingdome to him and his heires, and that happie promise of the euerlasting throne, that should be established in his seede.

§. V.

The ouerthrow of the Philistims and Moabites.

2 Sam. 8. v. 1: SOone after this Dauid ouerthrew the Philistims, which made them altogether powerlesse, and vnable to make any inuasion vpon Israel in haste. For it is written, Accepit frænum Amgaris è manu Philisthæorum; which place our English Geneua conuerts in these words, And Dauid tooke the bridle of bondage out of the hand of the Philistims. The Latine of Iunius giueth another and a better sense; for by that bridle of Amgar was meant the strong Citie of Gath, or Geth, and so the Geneua hath it in the marginall note. This Citie of Gath was the same which was afterward Dio-Cæsarea, set on the frontier of Palæstina at the entrance into Iudæa and Ephraim. From thence they made their incursions, and thereinto their retrait in all their inuasions; which being taken by Dauid and demolished, there was left no such frontier towne of equall strength to the Philistims on that part. The hill whereon Geth or Gath stood, the Hebrews call Amma, wherof and of the word Gar is made Amgar, of which Plinie in his first book, and Chap. 13. This exposition is made plaine and confirmed in the first of Chro. the 18.

Iunius in 2. c. of the second of Sam.

There was no nation bordering the Iewes that so greatly afflicted them as the Philistims did, who before the time of Saul, (to the end they might not sharpen any weapon against them) did not leaue one Smith in all their Cities and villages of that kinde, but inforst them to come downe into their territorie, for all iron worke whatsoeuer they needed; so as the Israelites till this time of Dauid were seldome free from paying tribute to the Philistims.

1 Sam. 13.

After this he gaue them foure other ouerthrowes: but the war of the Moabites and Arabians came betweene. In the first of which he was indangered by Ishbi-benob, the head of whose speare weighed 300. sheckles of brasse, which make nine pound three quarters of our poizes: at which time Abishai succoured Dauid and slew the Philistim, wherupon the the Counsellors and Captaines of Dauid (lest the light of Israel might by his losse be quenched) vowed that he should not thenceforth hazard himselfe in any battaile. The second and third incounter and ouerthrow of the Philistims was at Gob a place neere Gesar, and the last at Gath or Geth. And being now better assured of the Philistims by the taking of Geth, he inuaded Moab, from whom notwithstanding in his aduersitie he sought succour and left his parents with him in trust. But whether it were the same King or no it is not knowne. 2 Sam 21. v. 17

The Rabbines faine that Moab slew those kinsfolkes of Dauid, which liued vnder his protection in Sauls time; but questionlesse Dauid well knew how that Nation had bin alwayes enemies to Israel, and tooke all the occasions to vex them that were offered. And he also remembred that in the 23. of Deut. God commanded Israel not to seeke the peace or prosperity of the Moabites, which Dauid well obserued, for he destroyed two parts of the people, leauing a third to till the ground. This victory obtained, he led his army by the border of Ammon towards Syria Zobah, the region of Adadezer the sonne of Rehob King thereof. The place is set downe in the description of the holy Land: to which I referre the Reader.

§. VI.

The warre which Dauid made vpon the Syrians.

IT is written in the Text: Dauid smote also Hadadezer, &c. as he went to recouer his border at the riuer Euphrates. Now whether the words (as he went to recouer his border) be referred to Dauid or Hadadezer, it is not agreed vpon. Iunius thinkes that the article (hee) hath relation to Dauid, who finding Tohu oppresst by Hadadezer, ouerthrew the one, and succoured the other. But the ancient and most receiued opinion, that this recouery hath reference to the Syrian, is more probable. For if Dauid had intended any such enterprize towards Euphrates, he was in farre better case to haue proceeded after his victory than before: seeing that (Adadezer being taken) he had now left no enemy on his backe, either to pursue him, to take victuals and supplies from him, or to stop the passages of the mountaines vpon him at his returne.

Againe, seeing Dauid was either to passe through a part of Arabia the desart, or by the plaines of Palmyrena, his army consisting of footmen, for the most, if not all: He had now both horse and chariots good store to carry his prouisions through those vncultiued places, by which he was to haue marched before he could haue reached Euphrates or any part thereof. But we finde that Dauid returned to Hierusalem, after he had twice ouerthrowne the Syrian army, not bending his course towards the riuer Euphrates, but seeking to establish his purchases already made. Whereby it may appeare, that it was the Syrian, and not King Dauid, that was going to inlarge his border, as afore is said.

The king of Syria Damascena, and of Damascus, whereof that region is so called, hearing that Adadezer was ouerthrowne by the Israelites, fearing his owne estate, and the losse of his owne country which adioyned to Syria Zoba of Hadadezer, sent for an army of Aramites or Syrians to his succour: but these, as it appeareth, came too late for Adadezer, and too soone for themselues: for there perished of those supplies 22000. This king of Damascus, Iosephus (out of Nicholaus an ancient Historian) calleth Adad, who was also of the same name and family as all those other Adads were: which now began to grow vp in greatnesse, and so continued for ten descents, till they were extinguished by the Assyrians, as is shewed heretofore. Dauid hauing now reduced Damascus vnder his obedience, left a garrison therein, as he did in Edom: hauing also sackt the adioyning cities of Betah, and Berathi, belonging to Adadezer, of which Cities Ptolomie calleth Betah, Tauba: and Berathi he nameth Barathena. Tohu or Thoi whose country of Hamath ioyned to Adadezer (as in the description of the Holy land the reader may perceiue) sent his sonne Ioram to congratulate this successe of Dauid: partly because he had warre with Adadezer, and partly because he feared Dauid now victorious. He also presented Dauid with vessels of gold, siluer, and brasse; all which together with the golden shields of the Aramites, and 2 Sam. 8.

the best of all the spoiles of other Nations, Dauid dedicated vnto God at his returne. Iunius translated the words (clypeos aureos) by vmbones, as if all the parts of the targets were not of gold but the bosses only. The Septuagint cal them bracelets: Aquila, golden chains. But because Roboam made shields of brasse in place of these of Adadezer, at such time as Shicah the Ægyptian sackt the Temple of Hierusalem, it may be gathered thereby that those of Adadezer were golden shields.

2 Sam. 8. This done, Dauid sent Embassadours to Hanum King of the Ammonites to congratulate his establishment in his fathers Kingdome: for Dauid in the time of his affliction vnder Saul, had beene relieued by Nahash, the father of Hanum. But this Ammonite being ill aduised, and ouer-iealous of his estate, vsed Dauids messengers so barbarously, and contemptuously (by curtailing their beardes, and their garments) as hee thereby drew a warre vpon himselfe, which neither his owne strength, nor all the aydes purchased could put off, or sustaine. For notwithstanding that hee had waged three and thirtie thousand Souldiers of the Amalekites, and their confederates; to wit, of the vassalles of Adadezer twentie thousand, and of Maachah and Ishtob thirteene thousand (for which hee disbursed a thousand talents of siluer) yet all these great armies together with the strength of the Ammonites, were by Ioab and his brother Abishai easily broken and put to ruine: and that without any great losse or slaughter at that time. And it is written, that when the Aramites fled, the Ammonites also retraited into their Cities, the one holding themselues within the walles, the other in their desarts adioyning, till Ioab was returned to Hierusalem.

2 Samad.

Hadadezer hearing that Ioab had dismissed his armie, assembled his forces againe, and sent all the companies that he could leuie out of Mesopotamia, who vnder the command of Shobach passed Euphrates, and incamped at Helam, on the South side thereof. Dauid hearing of this new preparation, assembled all the ablest men of Israel, and marched towards the Syrian armie in Palmyrena, not yet entred into Arabia; to wit, at Helam, a place no lesse distant from Damascus, towards the North-east, than Hierusalem was towards the Southwest. Now Dauid (speaking humanely) might with the more confidence goe on towards Euphrates (which was the farthest-off iourney that euer hee had) because hee was now Lord of Damascus, which lay in the midway. Hee also possest himselfe of * Thadmor or Palmyrena, which Salomon afterward strongly fortified, and this Citie was but one dayes iourney from Helam, and the riuer Euphrates. So had he two safe retraites, the one to Thadmor, and the next from thence to Damascus. In this encounter betweene Dauid and the Syrians, they lost 40000. horsemen, and 700. chariots, together with Shobach Generall of their armie, The Chronicles call these 40000. Souldiers footmen, and so Iunius conuerts it, and so is it very probable. For the armie of Israel consisting of footemen, could hardly haue slaughtered 40000. horsemen, except they quitted their horse and fought on foote. So are the chariots taken in this battell, numbred at 7000. in the first of Chronicles the ninth; in which number, as I conceiue, all the Souldiers that serued in them with the conductors are included: so as there dyed of the Syrians in this warre against Dauid, before he forc't them to tribute, 100000. footemen, besides all their horsemen and waggoners, and besides all those that Ioab slew, when they fled at the first encounter, together with the Ammonites before Rabbah. Notwithstanding all which, the Adads in following ages gathered strength againe, and afflicted the Kings of Iuda often: but the Kings of Israel they impouerished euen to the last end of that State.

* See c. 18. §. 2.

Dauid hauing now beaten the Arabians and Mesopotamians, from the partie and confederacie of Ammon: He sent out Ioab the Lieutenant of his armies to forradge and destroy their territorie, and to besiege Rabbah, afterward Philadelphia, which after a while the Israelites mastered and possest. The Kings crowne which weighed a talent of gold, garnished with precious stones, Dauid set on his owne head, and carried away with him the rest of the riches and spoile of the Citie. And though Dauid stayed at Hierusalem, following the warre of Vriah his wife, till such time as the Citie was brought to extremitie, and ready to be entred: yet Ioab in honour of Dauid forbare the last assault, and entrance thereof, till his masters arriuall. To the people he vsed extreame rigour (if we may so call it being exercised against heathen Idolaters,) for some of them he tare with harrowes, rowes, some he sawed asunder, others he cast into burning kils, in which he baked tile and bricke.

§. VII.

Of Dauids troubles in his reigne, and of his forces.

BVt as victory begetteth security, and our present worldly felicity a forgetfulnesse of our former miseries, and many times of God himselfe the giuer of all goodnesse: so did these changes, in the fortune and state of this good King, change also the zealous care which formerly he had to please God in the precise obseruation of his Lawes and Commandements. For hauing now no dangerous apparant enemie (against whom he was wont to aske counsaile from the Lord) he began to be aduised by his owne humane affections and vaine desires. For hee was not onely satisfied to take Vriahs wife from him, and to vse her by stealth: but he imbrodered his adultery with Vriahs slaughter, giuing order to his trustie seruant Ioab to marshall him in the front or point of those Israelites, which gaue an assault vpon the suburbes of Rabba, when there was not as yet any possibility of preuailing. And, that which could no lesse displease God than the rest, hee was content that many others of his best seruants and Souldiers should perish together with Vriah, hoping thereby to couer his particular ill intent against him. After which he began by degrees to fall from the highest of happinesse; and his dayes then to come were filled with ioyes and woes interchangeable, his trodden-downe sorrowes began againe to spring; and those perils which he had pulled vp by the rootes (as hee hoped) gaue him an after-harueſt of many cares and discontentments. And if it had pleased God to take the witnesse of Dauids owne mouth against him, as Dauid himselfe did against the Amalekite, which pretended to haue slaine Saul, he had then appeared as worthy of reprehension as the other was of the death he suffered. For when Nathan the Prophet propounded vnto him his owne errour, in the person of another, to wit, of him that tooke the poore mans sheepe that had none else, the bereauer being Lord of many: Hee then vowed it to the liuing Lord, that such a one should die the death. And hereof, although it pleased God to pardon Dauid, for his life, which remission the Prophet Nathan pronounced: yet he deliuered him Gods iustice together with his mercy in the tenour following; Now therefore the sword shall neuer depart from thy house, &c. Because thou hast taken his wife to be thy wife, and hast slaine Vriah with the sword of the children of Ammon. Soone after this Dauid lost the childe of adulterie which he begot on Bersheba. Secondly, his owne sonne Amnon being in loue with his halfe sister Thamar, by the aduise of his Cousin-german the sonne of Shimeah Dauids brother, possest her by force: which when he had performed, he thrust her from him in a careless and despightfull manner. Two yeeres after which foule and incestuous act, Absalom caused him to be murthered, at the feast of his sheepeshearing; not perchance in reuenge of Thamars rauishment alone: but hauing it in his heart to vsurpe the Kingdome; in which, because he could not in any sort be assuren of Amnon, he thought his affaire greatly aduanced by his destruction. So the one brother hauing rauished his owne sister, and then despised her; the other after a long dissembled malice, first, made his owne brother drunken, and then slaughtered him; which done he fled away, and liued vnder the sauegard of Talmai King of Gessur, neere Damascus, who was his grandfather by the mother, but a heathen King. Thirdly, when Absalom by the inuention of Ioab, (but chiefly because of the great affection of Dauid towards his sonne) was brought againe: first to the Kings fauour, and then to his presence; Hee began instantly to practise against Dauid his father, seeking by the pretence of common iustice, and by lowly and familiar manner to all men, and by detracting from his fathers equitie, to win vnto himselfe a popular reputation. Here began the great affliction, threatned by the Lord as a punishment of Dauids sinne.

of a vow to God. There when Achitophel repaired vnto him, and many troopes of people from all places, he proclaimed himselfe King, and was by the people (whose hearts God had turned from their lawfull Prince) accepted so readily, that Dauid doubting to be set vpon on the suddaine, durst not trust himselfe in his owne Citie of Hierusalem, nor in any other walled towne for feare of surprise: but incamped in the fields and desarts with some 600. of his gards, and few else. The priests he left in Hierusalem with the Arke of God, from whom he desired to be aduertised of those things that chanced; to whom he directed Hushai his trustie friend, and seruant, praying him to make himselfe in 2 Sam. 15. all his outward actions and counsels of Absaloms party and confederacy, thereby the better to discouer vnto him the purposes of Achitophel, a reuolting Counsailor, whose practices he greatly doubted. And now when treason was in fashion, Ziba also sought to betray his master Mephiboseth the sonne of Ionathan: And Shimei of the house of Saul (the fire of whose hatred Dauids prosperity had smothered, but his aduersity illightned) holding himselfe vpon the aduantage of a mountaine side, cast stones at Dauid, and most
2 Sam. 16. despightfully cursed him to his face: but Dauid attending no priuate reuenges, forbad Abishai to pursue him for the present, yet left him among others in the rolle of his reuenge, to his sonne Salomon. Absalom being now possest of Hierusalem, was aduised by Achitophel to vse his fathers concubines in some such publique place, as all Israel might assure themselues, that he was irreconciliable to his father: whereof being perswaded, they would then resoluedly adhere to Absalom and his cause, without feare of being
2 Sam. 17. giuen vp vpon a reconciliation betweene them. This saluage and impious (though crafty counsaile) Achitophel indeede vrged for his owne respect, as fearing that this rebellion might take end to his destruction; who most of all other inflamed Absalom against his father. And now was it fulfilled that Nathan had directly foretold Dauid: I will raise vp euill against thee out of thine owne house, and will take thy wiues before thine eyes, and
2 Sam. c. 12 v. 11. giue them vnto thy neighbour, and he shall lye with thy wiues in the sight of the Sunne: for thou diddest it secretly, but I will doe this thing before all Israel, and before the Sunne. He also gaue aduice to Absalom, that himselfe with an armie of 12000. men might be imployed at the instant for the surprizing of Dauid; which had willingly beene imbraced
2 Sam. 17. v. 14 by Absalom, had not Hushai Dauids faithfull seruant giuen counter-aduice, and swayed it: perswading Absalom, that it was fitter and more safe for him with all the strength of Israel, to pursue his father, than by such a troope, which Dauids valour and those of his attendants might either indanger or resist. This delay in Absalom, and aduantage of time gained by Dauid, was indeede, after God, the losse of the one, and deliuery of the 2 Sam. 17. 23. other. Whereupon Achitophel rightly fearing (by the occasion fore-shewed) the successe which followed, disposed of his owne estate, and then forsooke both the party and the care of Absalom, and of his owne life.

Dauid being aduertised of this enterprize against him, marched away all night, and past Iordan, possessing himselfe of Mahanaim in the tribe of Gad: the same wherein Iboseth himselfe in the warre against Dauid after Sauls death seated himselfe. To which place there repaired vnto him Shobi, the sonne of Nahash the Ammonite, whom Dauid loued, the same which Iosephus calleth Shiphar. And though it be greatly disputed, what this Shobi was, yet the most generall and probable opinion makes him a second brother to Hanum, whom Dauid for his fathers sake established in the Kingdome, after Hanums ouerthrow. In thankefulnesse whereof he relieued Dauid in this his extremity. There came also to Dauids assistance Machir of Lodabar, Guardian in former times to Mephibaseth, and among others Barzillai the Gileadite, who willingly fed Dauid and all his companie.

In the meane time both the King and Absalom prepared to fight; Absalom made Amasa Commander of the armie of Israel, the same place which Ioab held with Dauid; an office next the King himselfe, like vnto that of the Maiors of the Palace aunciently in France. Dauid, perswaded by his companie, stayed in Mahanaim, and disposed the forces he had to Ioab, Abishai, and Ittai, giuing them charge in the hearing of all that issued out of the port of Mahanaim, that they should spare the life of Absalom. But Ioab, besides that he was very cruell by nature, remembred that Absalom had lately disposed of his gouernment to Amasa, and therefore the victory being obtained, and newes brought him
15. 16. that Absalom hung by the haire of his head on a tree, when he could not perswade the 2 Sam. 18. 14. messenger to returne and kill him, he himselfe with his owne seruants dispatcht him.

Ie

It appeared also by the sequell that Ioab affected Adonijah whom he afterward acknowledged, Dauid yet liuing; and fearing the disposition of Absalom, he imbraced the present aduantage offered. 2 Sam. 18.

Hereof, together with newes of the victorie, when knowledge was brought to Dauid, he mourned and sorrowed, not onely as a man that had lost a sonne, but as one that had outliued all his worldly ioyes, and seene euery delight of life interred. For he so hid himselfe from his people, as those which hoped for honour and reward after so great a victory, couered themselues also in the Citie, as if they had committed the greatest offences, and had rather deserued death than recompence. Whereupon Ioab presenting himselfe before Dauid, perswaded him to dissemble his sorrow for the present, and to shew himselfe to the Armie. For first, he told him that he had discountenanced his faithfull seruants, who had that day preserued his life; inferring that nothing could be more dangerous to a King, than not onely not to acknowledge so great a loue and constancie in his people, who being but few in number, did yet resoluedly expose themselues to great perils for his sake: but on the contrary, grieue and lament at their good successe. For, no doubt, they might all haue bought their peace of Absalom at an easie rate. Secondly, he vrged that it was generally beleeued, that he loued his enemies and hated his friends, and that he witnessed by this his mourning, that he had not any respect of his Princes, and others his faithfull seruants, but would more haue ioyed if they had all perished, and Absalom liued, than in the victory by their faithfulnesse and approued valour gotten.

Lastly, he vsed this preualent argument, that if the King came not out and shewed himselfe publikely to his men of warre, that they would all that very night abandon him, and returne: concluding with this fearefull threatning: And that will be worse vnto thee than all the euill that fell on thee from thy youth hitherto. By these ouer-bold and arrogant speeches (though perchance vttered with a good intent) Ioab raised Dauid from his bed of sorrow, and brought him to the gates of the Citie among the people, whom he assured of his loue and affection, especially Amasa, who commanded the Armie of Absalom, to whom he promised the office of Lieutenantship; the same which Absalom had giuen him, and which Ioab now enioyed. For Dauid doubted, that if Amasa were not satisfied, he might draw from him a great part of the strength of Israel, now vnder his commandement. 2 Sam. 19.

This done, the King marched towards Iordan homeward, where in his passage he pardoned Shimei, who had lately reuiled him to his face; but this remission was but externall, as appeared afterward. He also accepted of Mephibosheth his excuse, whom Ziba had formerly falsly accused and betrayed. 2 Sam. 19. 23.

He also intreated Barzillai the Gileadite, his late liberall Oast, to follow him to Ierusalem, that he might reward his seruice done him; who excusing himselfe by his age, appointed his sonne Chimham to attend the King. 2 Sam. 19. 38.

At Gilgal on this side Iordan, all the Tribes assembled, and after some contention which of them ought to haue most interest in Dauid, the Armie brake, and Dauid returned to Ierusalem. But Sheba the sonne of Bichri, a Beniamite, of the faction of the house of Saul, finding some discontent among the Israelites, withdrew them from Dauid, as from a stranger in whom they had no interest, and it seemeth that many of the people of the out Tribes, and in effect of all but Iuda, bare still a good affection to the issues of their first King. Dauid imployed his reconciled Captaine Amasa, to giue him contentment, and to witnesse his trust, as also becaus he conceiued that Amasa had interest in those reuolts of Israel more than Ioab had. He receiued commandement from Dauid to assemble the Armie within three dayes, which he foreslowed: but being onward on his way, Abishai, Ioabs brother, was sent after him, with Dauids guard and best Souldiers, whom also Ioab accompanied: and ouertaking Amasa neere Gibeon, pretending to imbrace him, gaue him a wound, whereof he fell dead, being no lesse iealous of Amasa than he was of Abner, whom he murdered in the same manner, and out of the same impatient ambition. This done, he pursued Sheba, and finding him inclosed in Abel, assaulted the Citie with that furie, that the Citizens by the perswasions of a wise woman there inhabiting, cut off Sheba his head, and flung it to Ioab ouer the wals: which done, he retraited his Armie to Ierusalem, and commanded, as before, all the hoste of Israel. 2 Sam. 20. 10. 2 Sam. 20. 22.

The next act of Dauids, was the deliuerie of Sauls ſons or kinſemen to the Gibeonites, whom thoſe Citizens hung vp in reuenge of their fathers cruelty. Dauid had knowledge from the Oracle of God, that a famine which had continued on the land three yeeres, came by reaſon of Saul and his houſe; to wit, for the ſlaughter of the Gibeonites: and therefore he willingly yeelded to giue them this ſatisfaction, both becauſe he had warrant from God himſelfe, as alſo if we may iudge humanely, to rid himſelfe of Sauls line, by whom he and his might, as well in the preſent as in the future, be greatly moleſted and indangered; onely he ſpared Mephiboſheth the ſonne of Ionathan, both for the loue he bare to his father, as for his oath and vow to God.

Now where it is written in the Text; The King tooke the two ſonnes of Riſpah, whom 10 2 Sam. 21. ſhe bare vnto Saul, and the fiue ſonnes of Michol the daughter of Saul, whom ſhe bare to Adriel, and deliuered them to the Gibeonites:

Iunius cals this Michol the ſiſter of her that was Dauids wife, ſhe whom Saul married to Phaltiel; but Michol here named had Adriel to her husband: the ſame which is named Merab in the firſt of Samuel the eighteenth, who was firſt promiſed to Dauid, when he ſlew Goliah in the valley of Raphaim: and becauſe it is written that Michol loued Dauid, which perchance Merab did not, whether Dauid had any humane reſpect in the deliuerie of her children, it is onely knowne to God.

Now whereas the Geneua nameth Michol for Merab the wife of Adriel: the better tranſlation were out of the Hebrew word here vſed, hauing an eclipſis or defect, and ſig- 20 nifieth, as I am informed, one of the ſame kinred, as in the 19. verſe of the ſame 21. Chapter it is ſaid of Goliah whoſe ſpeare was weightie as a weauers beame, when as by the ſame Eclipſis it muſt be vndeſtood by the brother of Goliah: Goliah himſelfe being formerly ſlaine.

As by the death of Sauls children God ſecured the houſe of Dauid, leauing no head vnto rebellion; ſo did he ſtrengthen both the King and Nation againſt forreine enemies, by the valour of many braue Commanders, the like of whom, for number and qualitie, that people of Iſrael is not knowne to haue had at any time before or after. Thirtie Captaines of thouſands there were, all men of marke, and great reputation in warre. Ouer theſe were ſixe Coronels, whoſe valour was ſo extraordinary, that it might be well 30 held as miraculous. Theſe Coronels had ſome difference of place and honour, which ſeemeth to haue beene giuen vpon meere conſideration of their vertue. For Abiſhai the brother of Ioab, who in the warre againſt the Ammonites and Aramites was Lieutenant, and commanded halfe the army, could not attaine to the honour of the firſt ranke, but was faine to reſt contented with being principall of the three Coronels of the ſecond order, notwithſtanding his neereneſſe of bloud vnto the King, the flouriſhing eſtate of his owne houſe, and his well approued ſeruices. All theſe Coronels and Captaines, with the Companies belonging to them, may ſeeme to haue beene ſuch as were continually retained, or at the leaſt kept in readineſſe for any occaſion, conſidering that the numbers which were muſtered and drawne out, if neede required, into the field, very farre exceeded thirty thouſand, yea, or thirty times as many. They were moſt of them ſuch as had followed the King in Sauls time, and beene hardened with his aduerſities. Others there were very many, and principall men in their ſeuerall Tribes, that repaired vnto him after the death of Saul; but theſe Captaines and Coronels, (who with Ioab, that was Generall of all the Kings forces, make vp the number of 37.) were the eſpeciall men 2 Sam. c. 23. v. 39. of warre, and reckoned as Dauids Worthies. The long reigne of Dauid, as it is knowne to haue conſumed many of theſe excellent men of warre, ſo may it probably be geſſed to haue waſted the moſt of thoſe whoſe deaths we finde no-where mentioned. For the ſonnes of Zeruia, who had beene too hard for Dauid, were worne away, and onely Ioab left in the beginning of Salomon, who wanted his brother Abiſhai to ſtand by his ſide in 50 his laſt extremitie.

By the actions forepaſſed in the time of Dauid, it is gathered that he had reigned now 33. yeeres, or thereabout; when the poſterity of Saul was rooted out, ſo that he enioyed about ſeauen yeeres of entire quiet and ſecurity, wherein it pleaſed God to remoue all impediments that might haue troubled the ſucceſſion of Salomon in his Fathers throne. In this time alſo Dauid hauing eſtabliſhed all things in Iuda and Iſrael, and the borders thereof, he againe diſpleaſed God by numbring the people, as in oſtentation of his power: in which he employed Ioab, with other Captaines of his armie, who after nine

nine moneths and twentie dayes trauell, returned with the account and regiſter of all the people, able and fit to beare Armes, and they amounted to the number of thirteene hundred thouſand, beſides Leui and Beniamin, whereof in Iuda and the Cities thereof fiue hundred thouſand, and in Iſrael eight hundred thouſand. 2. Sam. 24. 1. Chron. 21.

For this, when by the Prophet Gad he was offered from God the choice of three puniſhments, whereof he might ſubmit himſelfe to which he pleaſed; to wit, ſeauen yeeres famine; three moneths warre, wherein hee ſhould be vnproſperous in all attempts, and be chaced by his enemies; or a generall peſtilence to laſt three dayes: Dauid made choice to bow himſelfe vnder the hand of God onely, and left himſelfe ſubiect to that cruell diſeaſe, which hath no compaſſion or reſpect of perſons, of which there periſhed 70. thouſand. And heereby hee hath taught all that liue, that it is better to fall into the hands of God than of men; whereof he giueth vs this diuine reaſon; For his mercies are great. 2. Sam. 24.

§. VIII.

Of the laſt acts of Dauid; Adoniahs faction; the reuenge vpon Ioab and Shimei.

LAſtly, when he grew weake and feeble, and paſt the acts and knowledge of women, hee was yet aduiſed to lie in the armes of a young and well complexioned maiden, to keepe him warme. In this his weake eſtate of bodie, when hee was in a manner bed-rid, Adonijah his eldeſt ſonne (Amnon and Abſalom being now dead) hauing drawne vnto his partie that inuincible, renowned and feared Ioab, with Abiathar the Prieſt, began manifeſtly to prepare for his eſtabliſhment in the Kingdome after his father. For being the eldeſt now liuing of Dauids ſonnes, and a man of goodly perſonage, Salomon yet yong, and borne of a mother formerly attainted with adultery, for which her name was omitted by S. Matthew (as Beda, Hugo, Thomas, and others ſuppoſe) he preſumed to carry the matter without reſiſtance. Hereof when Dauid had knowledge by Berſabe the mother of Salomon, who did put him in minde of his faithfull promiſe, that Salomon her ſonne ſhould reigne after him (Nathan the Prophet affirming the ſame thing vnto the King, and ſeconding her report of Adonijah his preſumption) the King calling vnto him Zadoc the Prieſt, Nathan the Prophet, and Benaiah the Captaine of his guard, gaue charge and commiſſion to annoint Salomon, and to ſet him on the Mule whereon himſelfe vſed to ride in his greateſt ſtate: which done, Salomon attended, and ſtrongly guarded by the ordinarie and choyce men of warre, the Cherethites and Pelethites, ſhewed himſelfe to the people. Thoſe tidings being reported to Adonijah, hee preſently abandoned his aſſiſtants, and for the ſafety of his life he held by the hornes of the Altar, whom for the preſent Salomon pardoned. After this, Dauid had remaining two eſpeciall cares, whereof he was deſirous to diſcharge his thoughts; the one concerning the peace of the land, which might be diſturbed by ſome rebellion againſt Salomon, the other concerning the building of the Temple, which he ſought by all meanes to aduance, and make the buſineſſe publique. To bring theſe intentions to good effect, hee ſummoned a Parliament, conſiſting of all the Princes of Iſrael, the Princes of the ſeuerall Tribes, all the Captaines and Officers, with all the mighty, and men of power; who did repaire vnto Ieruſalem. 1. Kings 1. 1. Chron. 28. v. 1.

In this aſſembly the King ſtood vp, and ſignified his purpoſe of building the Temple, ſhewing how the Lord had approoued the motion. Heerein he tooke occaſion to lay open his owne title to the Crowne, ſhewing that the Kingdome was by Gods ordinance due to the Tribe of Iuda (as Iacob in his bleſſing prophetically bequeathed it) and that GOD himſelfe was pleaſed to make choyce of him among all his Fathers ſonnes. In like manner hee ſaid that God himſelfe had appointed Salomon by name to be his ſucceſſor: whereupon he earneſtly charged both the people and his ſonne, to conforme themſelues vnto all that God had commanded, and particularly to goe forward in this worke of the Lords houſe, which Salomon was choſen to build. Then produced he the patterne of the worke according to the forme which God himſelfe had appointed; and ſo laying open his owne preparations, hee exhorted all others to a voluntary contribution. 1. Chron. 29. 9

The Kings propoſition was ſo well approued by the Princes and people, that whereas hee himſelfe had giuen three thouſand talents of gold, and ſeuen thouſand of ſiluer, they added vnto it ſauen thouſand of gold, and ten thouſand of ſiluer, beſides braſſe, iron, and iewels, heartily reioycing in the aduancement of so religious a worke. This businesse being so well dispatched, a solemne feast with great sacrifice was made, at which time Salomon was againe annointed King, and receiued fealtie of all the Princes and people of the Land, and of all the Princes his brethren, the sonnes of King Dauid. Salomon being thus established King, his Father Dauid finding himselfe euen in the hands of death, first exhorted his sonne to exercise the same courage and strength of minde, which himselfe had done in all his attempts: and to the end that a happy end might follow the beginning

1. King. 2. 3. of all his enterprizes, he vttered these mighty words; Take heede to the charge of the Lord thy God, to walke in his wayes, and keepe his statutes and his commandements, and his iudgements, and his testimonies, as it is written in the Law of Moses, &c. to the performance of which, GOD fastened the succession, and prosperitie of his issues. For this done
1. Kin. 2. 20. (saith GOD himselfe) Thou shalt not want one of thy posteritie to sit vpon the Throne of Israel.

Secondly, he aduised him concerning Ioab, who out of doubt had serued Dauid from the first assault of Ierusalem to the last of his warres, with incomparable valour and fidelitie, sauing that he fastened himselfe to Adonijah (his master yet liuing) and thereby vexed him in his feeble age. But as God hath neuer left cruelty vnreuenged, so was it his will that Ioab should drinke of the same cup, whereof he had enforced other men to taste, and suffer the same violence which himselfe had vniustly strooken others withall, Qui gladio percutit, gladio peribit: for he had bereaued Abner and Amasa of their liues, hauing against the one the pretence onely of his brothers slaughter, whom Abner had slaine in the time of warre, and could not auoyd him: against the other but a meere iealousie of his growing great in the fauour of Dauid. And though Ioab assured himselfe that Abner & Amasa being dead, there was none left eyther to equall him or supplant him, yet God (deriding the policies of wicked men) raised vp Benhaiah the sonne of Iehoiadah, to pull him from the Sanctuary, and to cut him in peeces. For Dauid giueth this cause to Salomon against
1. King. 2. Ioab, that he slue the Captaines of the hoste of Israel, and shed bloud of battell in peace; and to this apparant and iust cause, it is not improbable but that Dauid remembred the ill affection of Ioab towards Salomon; which Ioab made manifest by the vntimely setting vp of Adonijah, Dauid yet liuing. Some other offence Ioab had committed against Dauid, of
1. King 2. which in these words he put his sonne Salomon in minde; Thou knowest also what Ioab the sonne of Seruiah did to me, &c. Now whether this were meant by the killing of Absalom, contrary to the Kings desire, or by the proud words vsed to him when hee mourned in Mahanaim for Absalom; or whether it were the publishing of Dauids letter vnto him for the killing of Vriah, thereby to disgrace Salomon as descended of such a mother, the Scriptures are silent. True it is, that those great men of warre doe oftentimes behaue themselues exceeding insolently towards their Princes, both in respect of their seruice done, as also because they flatter themselues with an opinion, that eyther their masters cannot misse them, or that they dare not offend them. But this kinde of pride hath ouerthrown many a worthy man otherwise deseruing great honour and respect.

He also gaue order to Salomon, to ridde himselfe of Shimei, who not long before had cast stones at Dauid, and cursed him to his face. And albeit by reason of his oath and promise Dauid spared Shimei all the time himselfe liued, yet being dust and in the graue, hee
1. King. 2. slue him by the hand of Salomon his Sonne. Hence it seemeth that King Henry the seuenth of England had his patterne, when hee gaue order to Henrie the eight to execute Pool as soone as himselfe was buried, hauing made promise to the King of Spaine when he deliuered Pool vnto him, that while he liued he would neuer put him to death, nor suffer violent hands to be laid vpon him.

And yet did not the execution of Ioab yeeld vnto Salomon any such great profit or as-
1. King. 11. surance as he hoped for. For he found a yong Adad of Idumæa, and Resin of Damascus to vexe him: who, as the Scriptures witnesse, were emboldened to enterprize vpon Salomon, hearing that Dauid slept with his fathers, and that Ioab the Captaine of the host was dead. Now when Dauid had reigned in all fortie yeeres, to wit, in Hebron 7. yeeres, and in Ierusalem three and thirtie, he died.

For his person, he was of small stature, but exceeding strong. For his internall gifts and graces hee so farre exceeded all other men, as putting his humane frailtie apart, he was said by God himselfe to be a man according to his owne heart. The Psalmes which hee wrote witnesse his pietie, and his excellent learning: of whom Hierome to Paulinus:

Paulinus: Dauid Simonides noster, Pindarus, & Alcæus, Flaccus, quoque Catullus, & Serenus, Christum lyra personat, & in decachordo Psalterio ab inferis suscitat resurgentem; Dauid (saith he) our Simonides, Pindarus, Alcæus, Horace, Catullus and Serenus, hee playeth Christ on his harpe, and on a ten stringed Psalter he raiseth him vp rising from the dead. And being both a King and a Prophet, he foretelleth Christ more lightsomely and liuely than all the rest.

The booke of the Psalmes, saith Glycas, was diuided, ordered and distinguished by Ezekias: but whether all the Psalmes were written by Dauid, it is diuersly disputed. For Athanasius, Cyprian, Lyranus, and others conceiue diuers Authors answering the titles of the seuerall Psalmes, as Moses, Salomon, and the rest hereafter named, and that onely 73. Psalmes were composed by Dauid himselfe, namely, those which are intituled ipsius Dauid. For the 50. and the 72. with the ten that follow, are bestowed on Asaph the son of Barachia, eleuen other on the sonnes of Korath; and eleuen are ascribed to Moses, to wit, the 89. and the ten following, and so they are intituled in the olde Hebrew Copies, though the vulgar and Septuagint (three excepted) stile them otherwise. The supposed nine Authors of these Psalmes which Dauid wrote not, Sixtus Senensis nameth as followeth; Salomon, Moses, (whom Aben Ezra, contrarie to Hierome, maketh one of Dauids singers) Asaph, Ethan-Eziachi, Eman-Ezraita, Idithum, and the three sonnes of Chore. But S. Chrysostome makes Dauid the sole Author of all the Psalmes, and so doth S. Augustine, reasoning in this manner: Although (saith he) some there are that ascribe those Psalmes onely to Dauid, which are ouer-written ipsius Dauid, and the rest intituled ipsi Dauid, to others, this opinion (saith he) Voce Euangelica Saluatoris ipsius refutatur, vbi ait quòd ipse Dauid in spiritu Christum dixerit esse suum Dominum, quoniam Psalmus 109. sic incipit, Dixit Dominus Domino meo, Sede à dextris meis, &c. The voyce of the Gospell refutes this opinion, where it saith, that Dauid himselfe in the spirit called Christ his Lord, because the 109. Psalme begins thus: The Lord said vnto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, &c. Lastly, his testimonies are vsed both by Christ and the Apostles, and hee was as a paterne to all the Kings and Princes that succeeded him.

His Storie and all his particular actions, were written by the Prophets, Samuel, Nathan and Gad, as it is in the first of Chron. 29. vers. 29. For the seuerall parts of the books of Samuel which intreate chiefly of Dauid, were as it seemes written by these three holy men.

Constantine Manasses hath an opinion, that the Troians during the time of the siege, sought for succour from Dauid, and that hee stayed neuter in that warre. But it seemeth that Manasses did miscast the time twixt Dauid and the Troian warre. For it is generally receiued that Troy fell betweene the times of Abdon and Samson Iudges of Israel, about the worlds yeere 2848. and Dauid died in the yeere 2991.

Of the treasures of Dauid and Salomon.

HIs treasures were exceeding great. For it is written in the 22. of the first of Chronicles, that he left Salomon for the building of the Temple a hundred thousand talents of Gold, and a thousand thousand talents of siluer, and of brasse and yron passing all weight, which is more than any King of the world possest besides himselfe, and his sonne to whom he left it. For it amounteth to three thousand three hundred thirty & three cartload, and a third of a cartload of siluer, allowing two thousand weight of siluer or sixe thousand pound sterling to euery cartload, besides threescore and seuenteene millions of French Crownes, or of our money twenty three millions and a thousand pound: a matter, but for the testimony of the Scriptures, exceeding all beleefe. For that any riches were left him it doth not appeare, seeing that the Iudges had not any treasure, nor any souereigne power to make leuies: but when they went to the warres, they were followed by such voluntaries as the seuerall tribes by turnes gaue them: seeing also that Saul who was of a meane Parentage, and perpetually vexed and inuaded by the Philistims, could not in all likelihood gather great riches (if any at all) his Territories being exceeding narrow, and thereof the better part possest by his enemies.

Vers. 14.

Therefore it were not amisse to consider how Dauid within the space of not very many yeeres, might amasse vp such mighty treasures. For though parsimonie be it selfe a great great reuenue, yet needs there must haue beene some other great meanes. It seemes that he made the vttermost profit of all that he had, that was profitable. Eusebius in his ninth booke and last Chapter de præparatione Euangelica, citeth the words of Eupolemus, who reporteth that Dauid, among other preparations for the Temple, built a nauie in Melanis (or as Villalpandus corrects it, Achanis) a Citie of Arabia, and from thence sent men to digge for gold in the Iland Vrphe, which Ortelius thinkes, was Ophir, though Eupolemus in this place of Eusebius (erring perhaps in this circumstance) saith that this Iland is in the red Sea; from whence, saith this Eupolemus, they brought gold into Iury. Pineda, lib. 4. de rebus Salamonis, c. 1. thinkes that Dauid did this way also inrich himselfe, and citeth this testimony of Eupolemus: and yet certainly Dauid had many other waies to gather riches. Much land doubtlesse he gained by conquest, from the Canaanites and Philistims, besides those fruitfull valleys neere Iordan in Trachonitis and Basan, and the best of Syria, and other Countries bordering the Israelites. These demaines belike he kept in his owne hands, and with his infinite number of captiues, which hee tooke in his warres, which were not able to redeeme themselues, husbanded those grounds for his greatest aduantage. For it is written, 1. Chron. 17. that Iehonathan was ouer his treasures in the field, in the villages, in the Cities, in the townes; that Ezri was ouer the labourers that tilled his ground; Simei ouer the vineyards; and Sabdi ouer the store of the wine; Baal Hanan ouer the Oliue trees, and Ioash ouer the stare of the oyle: also that hee had herdsmen that had charge ouer his cattell, both in the high Lands, and in the plaines, ouer his Sheepe, Camels, and Asses. And this custome of enriching themselues by husbandrie and Cattell, the ancient Kings euery where held, both before and after Dauids time.

Gen 47. For wee reade of Pharao, that he spake to Ioseph to appoint some of his brethren or of their seruants, to bee Rulers ouer his cattell. Wee reade of Vzzia, that hee loued

2. Chron. 26. husbandrie, had much cattell, and plough-men, and dressers of Vines: likewise we reade it in all Greeke Poets, that the wealth of the ancient Kings did specially consist in their Heards and flockes, whereof it were needlesse to cite Augeas and Admetus or any other for examples, the rule holding true in all. Now concerning Dauid it is not vnlikely, but that those captiues which were not imployed in husbandrie, were many of them vsed by him in all sorts of gainefull professions, as the ancient Romans in like manner vsed their slaues.

To these profits (besides the tributes and impositions which doubtlesse were great, and besides the innumerable presents which yeerely were brought him, or extraordinarilie sent him, by Tohu and others) wee may adde the great spoyles which hee found in the Cities and Countries which hee conquered: also the head money which was gathered per legem capitationis; By the law of capitation or head money, euery man rich or poore paying halfe a sickle of the Sanctuarie, which is about as much as fourteene pence, and so in all it amounted to a wondrous summe in that Kingdome: wherein one

1. Chron 21. thousand thousand fiue hundred and seuentie thousand fighting men were numbred by Ioab. Now although this Law of capitation bee thought by some very learned not to haue beene perpetuall (which opinion of theirs neuertheless they confesse is against the Hebrew expositions) yet Dauid vpon this occasion is not vnlikely to haue put it in practize. And by these meanes might he be able to leaue those huge treasures to Salomon. Yet it may seeme that this great masse of gold and siluer left by Dauid, the least part was his owne in priuate, and so will it appeare the lesse wonderfull that hee left so much. Of his owne liberalitie we finde, that hee gaue to the building of the Temple three thousand talents of gold, and seuen thousand talents of siluer, a great summe: but holding a very small proportion to the other. Wherefore wee are to consider, that the treasures of the sanctuarie it selfe were exceeding great, as needs they must haue beene hauing receiued continuall encrease, without any losse or diminution euer since the time of Moses and Iosuah. The reuenues of the Sanctuarie (besides all manner of tithes and oblations, which defraied the daily expences, and maintained the Priests and Leuites) were partly raised out of the head money before mentioned, partly out of the spoyles

Num. 31. 27. gotten in warre. For all the bootie was diuided into two parts, whereof the Souldiers had one, and the people which remained at home, had the other halfe; whereby all the Countrie receiued benefit of the victorie, yet so, that the Souldiers had a farre greater proportion than the rest, as being fewer, and therefore receiuing more for euerie single share.

Out

Out of this purchase was deducted the Lords tribute, which was one in fiftie; of that which the people receiued, and one in fiue hundred, of that which was giuen to the Souldiers; namely one hundred and one thousand part of the whole bootie. So in the spoyle of Midian, thirty two thousand women being taken, the armie had sixteene thousand of them for slaues, and the Congregation had other sixteene thousand; but out of the sixteene thousand giuen to the Armie, were exempted two & thirtie for the Lords tribute. Num. 31 40. Out of the peoples number were taken three hundred and twenty. By this meanes, the lesser that the Armie was which had exposed it selfe to danger, the greater profit had euery Souldier; but when it consisted of many hands, they who remaining at home were faine to vndergoe more than ordinarie trauaile in domesticall affaires, did receiue by so much the greater portion. But the Lords tribute was alwaies certaine, yea many times it was increased, either by some especiall commandement, as when all the gold, and siluer; and other mettalls found in Iericho, were consecrated vnto God; or by thankefulnesse of the Rulers and People, as when after the victorie obtained against the Midianites without the losse of one man, all Iewells, Bracelets, Eare-rings, and the like, were offered vp, as voluntarie presents. Ios. 6. 19. Num. 31 50.

Now howsoeuer the Israelites were many times oppressed, and troden down by other Nations, yet were not these treasures robbed or spoyled; for the enemies neuer gat possession of the Tabernacle that was in Shilo. Wherefore it cannot otherwise be, than that the wealth of the Sanctuarie must haue beene exceeding great; as containing aboue one hundreth part of all the money and other goods found by the Israelites in the whole Land of Canaan; and of all that was purchased by so many victories, as they obtained against the bordering Nations. For that this treasurie was not defrauded of the due portion, it is euident; seeing that before the time of Dauid and his Lieutenant Ioab, it is recorded that Saul and Abner, and before them Samuel, had vsed to dedicate of the spoyles obtained in warre, to maintaine the house of the Lord: the like whereof may be well presumed of the former Iudges and Captaines of other Ages. Certaine it is, that the Conquest of Dauid brought into the Land farre greater abundance of riches, than any former victories had purchased, those of Iosua perhaps excepted: but these vast summes of an hundred thousand Talents of siluer, may seeme rather to haue beene made vp, by the addition of his winnings and liberalitie, to the treasures laid vp in many former Ages, than to haue beene the meere fruits of his owne industrie. 1. Chron. c 26. v. 27. & 28.

Now concerning the riches of Salomon, it is more manifest how he gathered them; for he receiued of yeerely reuennues with his tributes 666. Talents of gold, besides the Customes of Spices. He had also sixe rich Returnes from the East India, which greatly increased his store. For his ships performed that voyage euery three yeeres, and he began that trade in the two and twentieth yeere of his reigne, and ruled fortie yeeres. Besides this, all Iudaa and Israel were now mastered to his hands; all the Arabians his borderers, the Syrians of Zobah, of Damascena, of Palmyrena, of Iturea; all of Idumea, Moab, and Ammon, paid him tribute; as likewise did the Hittites, who with the Perizzites, Heuites, Iebusites, and other races of the Canaanites, were not as yet dextinguished, though subjected. A Talent of gold is 770. french crowns 1. King. 10. 14. 1. King c. 9. v. 20. & c. 10. v. 25.

Into this flourishing estate was the Kingdom of Israel reduced by Dauid, who after 40 yeers raigne, and 70. yeeres of life, dyed in a good age, full of dayes, riches, and honour, and was buried in the Citie of Dauid. It is written by Iosephus that there was hid in Dauids Tombe a maruailous quantitie of treasures, insomuch as Hyrcanus (who first of the Chasmanai, or race of Maccabees, called himselfe King) one thousand and three hundred yeeres after, drew thence three thousand Talents, to rid himselfe of Antiochus then besieging Ierusalem; and afterward Herod opening another Cell, had also an exceeding masse of gold and siluer therein. And it was an ancient custome to burie treasure with the dead. So the Peruvians and other Americans did the like, which being discouered by the Spaniards, they inriched themselues by nothing so much in their first Conquest. That Salomon did burie so much treasure in his fathers graue, it would hardly be beleeued, in regard of the great exactions with which hee was faine to burthen the people, notwithstanding all the riches which hee got otherwise, or which were left vnto him: were it not withall considered that his want of monie grew from such magnificent imployments. Particularly of the Sepulcher of Dauid the Scriptures haue no mention, but onely the Sepulchers of the Kings of Iuda, as of an honourable place of buriall. Yet the 1. Chro. 29 28. *Ioseph. §. X.

Of the Philistims, whom Dauid absolutely mastered: and of sundry other contemporaries with Dauid.

OF the Philistims, whose pride Dauid was the first that absolutely mastered, in this conclusion of Dauids time somewhat heere may be spoken.

Iust l. 9. 19. Ios l. 1. ant. 17. They descended of Casloim, who, according to Isidor and Iosephus, was one of the sonnes of Misraim, and was surnamed Philistim, as Esau was surnamed Edom, and Iacob Israel. There were of them fiue Cities of pettie principalities; namely, Azotus, or Asdod, Gaza or Aczaph, Ascalon, Geth or Gath, and Accaron. It seemeth that Casloim was the first founder of this nation, because of his kindred on either hand, the Cananites and the Ægyptians.

1. Sam. 6.

Gen. 20. The first King of these Philistims, which the Scriptures haue named, was that Abimelech which loued Sara, Abrahams wife.

The second Abimelech liued at once with Isaac, to whom Isaac repaired in the time of famine, Abimelech then residing at Gerar in the border of Idumæa, which Abimelech sanctified Isaac his wife: as his father had done Sara.

Gen. 26.

After Abimelech the second, the Philistims Kings are not remembred in the Scriptures, till Dauids time: perhaps the gouernment was turned into Aristocraticall. For they are afterwards named Princes of the Philistims, howsoeuer Achis be named king of Gath, the same to whom Dauid fled, and who againe gaue him Siklag to inhabit in Sauls time.

Iud 16. 1. Sam. 18. 29. 1. Sam 21. 11. 1. King. 2.

After him we reade of another Achis who liued with Salomon, to whom Semei trauelled to fetch backe his fugitiue seruant, what time the seeking of his seruant was the losse of his life. Ieremie the Prophet speaketh of the Kings of Palestin or Philistim. Amos nameth the King of Ascalon: Zacharias, a King of Gaza. The rest of the warres of the Philistims are remembred in the Catalogue of the Iudges, of Saul and Dauid, and therefore I shall not need to collect the particulars in this place.

There liued at once with Dauid, the third of the Siluij King of Alba, called Latinus Siluius, who is said to haue ruled that part of Italie fiftie yeers. And about his fourteenth yeere Codrus the last King of the Athenians died, to whom succeeded the first Prince of those, who being called after Medon, Medontidæ, without regall name gouerned Athens during their life.

The reasons which moued the Athenians to change their gouernment, were not drawn from any inconuenience found in the rule of Soueraignetie, but in honour of Codrus onelie. For when the Græcians of Doris, a region betweene Phocis and the mountain of Oeta, sought counsaile from the Oracle, for their successe in the warres against the Athenians, it was answered, that then vndoubtedly they should preuaile and become Lords of that State, when they could obtaine any victorie against the Nation, and yet preserue the Athenian King liuing. Codrus by some intelligence being informed of this answere, withdrew himselfe from his owne forces, and putting on the habit of a common souldier, entred the Campe of the Dorians, and killing the first hee encountred, was himselfe forthwith cut in pieces.

Eupales the 31. King of Assyria, which others account but the 30. began to rule that Empire, about the 13. yeere of Dauid, and held it 38. yeeres.

Neere the same time began Ixion the second King of the Heraclidæ, the sonne of Eurysthenes in Corinth; and Agis the second of the Heraclidæ in Lacedæmon: in honour of which Agis, his successours were called Agidæ, for many yeeres after. Hee restored the Laconians to their former libertie: hee ouercame the Citizens of Helos in Laconia, who had refused to pay him tribute: hee condemned them and theirs to perpetuall slaueric; whereof it came, that all the Messenians, whom at length they brought into the like bondage, were after called Helotes.

In like sort from the Sclaui came the word Slaue. For when that Nation issuing out of Sarmatia, now called Russia, had seized vpon the country of Illyria & made it their owne by conquest, their victorie pleased them so highlie, that thereupon they called themselues by by a new name, Slauos, which is in their language glorious. But in after times (that warmer Climate hauing thawed their northerne hardines, and not ripened their wits) when they were troden downe, and made seruants with their neighbours; the Italians which kept many of them in bondage, began to call all their bondmen Slaues, vsing the word as a name of reproach: in which sense it is now currant through many countries.

Other Chronologers make this Agis, the third King of Sparta, and somewhat later, about the 23. yeere of Dauid, and say, that Acheſtratus was the fourth King of this race, the same whom Euſebius calls Labotes, and sets him in the thirteenth yeere of Salomon. Euſeb. in Chron.

In the tenth yeere of Acheſtratus, Androclus the third sonne of Codrus assisted by the Ionies, built Epheſus in Caria, who after the adioyning of the Ile of Samos to his territorie, was slaine by the Carians whose countrie he vsurped. He was buried (saith Pauſanias) in one of the gates of Epheſus called Magnetes, his armed Statua being set ouer him. Strabo reports that after Androclus had subdued the Ionians (the next prouince to Epheſus on the sea coast of Asia the lesse) he inlarged his Dominions vpon the Æoles, which ioyneth to Ionia: and that his posteritie gouerned the Cities of Epheſus and Erythra by the name of Baſilidæ in Strabo his owne time. Of the expedition of the Ionies how they came hither out of Peloponeſus, I haue *spoken alreadie vpon occasion of the returne of the Heraclidæ into Peloponeſus, wherein with the Dores, they expelled the Aeolæ, and inhabited their places in that land: though this of the Ionies succeeded that of the Heraclidæ 100. yeeres.

The Citie of Epheſus became exceeding famous: first, for the temple of Diana therein built: which had in length 425. foote, and 220. in breadth, sustained with 127. pillars of marble, of 70. foote high: whereof 27. were most curiously grauen, & all the rest of choyce marble polisht, the worke being first set out by Cteſiphon of Gnoſſos. Secondly, it became renowned by being one of the first that receiued the Christian faith, of which Timothie was Bishop; to whom, and to the Ephesians, Saint Paul wrote his Epistles so intituled. The other Citie possest by Androclus in Æolis was also vniuersally spoken of by reason of Sibylla, surnamed Erythræa: who liued 740. yeeres before Christ was borne. Saint Augustine auoweth that a Romane Proconsul shewed him in an ancient Greek coppie certaine verses of this Propheteſſe: which began (as Saint Augustine changed them into Latine) in these words: Ieſus Chriſtus Dei filius, ſaluator. Iesus Christ sonne of GOD, the Saviour.

Plin. l. 2. c. 98. & l. 36. 37.

About the time that Ioab besieged Rabba in Moab, Vaphres began to gouerne in Egypt, the same that was father in Law to Salomon, whose Epistles to Salomon, and his to Vaphres, are remembred by Euſebius out of Polemon. In the 21. of Dauid, was the Citie of Magneſia in Asia the lesse founded, the same which is seated vpon the riuer Mæander, where Scipio gaue the great ouerthrow to Antiochus. In this territorie are the best Horses of the lesser Asia bred, whereof Lucan:

Et Magnetis equis, Mimya gens cognita remis.

About the same time Cuma in Campania was built by the inhabitants of Chalcis in Euboea, according to Seruius, with whom Strabo ioyneth the Cumæans of Æolis, saying, that to the one of these people the gouernment was giuen, with condition that the other should giue name to the City. Of this Cuma was Ephorus the famous scholler of Isocrates.

Seru. in Aeneid. 3. Strabo l. 5.

Euſebius and Caſsiodor finde the building of Carthage at this time, to wit, in the 31. yeere of Dauid, but much mistaken. For the father of Dido was Metinus the sonne of Badezor, brother to Iezabel, who married Achab King of Israel; and betweene the death of Dauid, and the first of Achab, there were wasted about 95. yeeres.

In this time also Acaſtus liued, the second of the Athenian Princes after Codrus, of which there were thirteene in descent before the State changed into a Magistracie of ten yeeres. Some writers make it probable that the Æolians led by Graus, the grand nephew of Oreſtes, possest the Citie and Island of Thebes about this time. In the 32. yeere of Dauid, Hiram began to reigne in Tyre, according to Ioſephus, who saith that in his twelfth yeere Saloman began the worke of the Temple. But it is a familiar errour in Ioſephus, to misreckon times, which in this point he doth so strangely, as if hee knew not how at all to cast any accompt. For it is manifest that Hiram sent messengers, and Cedars vnto Dauid, soone after his taking of Ieruſalem, which was in the very beginning of Dauids reigne ouer Israel, when as yet hee had reigned onely seauen yeeres in Hebron, ouer the house of Iuda. Wherefore it must needes bee that Hiram had reigned aboue

30. yeeres before Salomon; vnlesse more credit should be giuen to those Tyrian records which are cited by Iosephus, than to the plaine words of Scripture contradicting them. For that it was the same Hiram which liued both with Dauid and with Salomon, the Scriptures make it plainely manifest.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of SALOMON.

§. I.

Of the establishing of Salomon: of birthright, and the cause of Adonijahs death, and of Salomons wisedome

SALOMON, who was brought vp vnder the Prophet Nathan, began to reigne ouer Iuda and Israel, in the yeere of the World 2991. He was called Salomon by the appointment of God: hee was also called Iediddia, or Theophilus, by Nathan, because the Lord loued him.

Hiram King of Tyre, after Salomons anointing, dispatched Embassadours toward him, congratulating his establishment: a custome betweene Princes very ancient. Whence wee reade that
2. Sam. 10. Dauid did in like sort salute Hanum King of the Ammonites, after his obtaining the Kingdome.

The beginning of Salomon was in bloud, though his reigne were peaceable. For soone after Dauids death, hee caused his brother Adonijah to be slaine by Benaiah the sonne of Iehoiada, taking occasion from Adonijah his desiring by Bersheba, that the young maide Abishag (which lay in Dauids bosome in his latter dayes, to keepe him warme) might be giuen to him. Whatsoeuer hee pretended, it was enough that Adonijah was his elder brother, and sought the kingdome contrary to the will of Dauid, whom God inclined towards Salomon. And yet it is said that a word is enough to the wise, and hee that sees but the claw, may know whether it be a Lyon or no: so it may seem that to the quick-sighted wisedome of Salomon, this motion of Adonijahs, was a demonstration of a new treason. For they which had beene concubines to a King, might not after be touched but by a
2. Sam. 16. 21. King: whence Achitophel wished Absalon to take his Fathers Concubines as a part of the Royaltie. And Dauid after that wrong, determining to touch them no more, did not giue them to any other, but shut them vp, and they remained widowed vntill their death.
2. Sam. 2. 3. And this it seemes was the depth of Isboshethes quarrell against Abner, for hauing his Fathers Concubine. And some signification of this custome may seeme too in the words of God by Nathan to Dauid; I haue giuen thee thy masters house, and thy masters wiues.
1. Sam. 20. 30. And in the words of Saul vpbraiding Ionathan, that he had chosen Dauid to the shame of the nakednesse of his Mother. Hereunto perhaps was some reference to this purpose of Adonijah, to marrie with her that was alwaies present with Dauid in his latter daies, and who belike knew all that was past, for the conueying of the Kingdom to Salomon. There might be diuers further occasions, as either that hee would learne such things by her as might be for the aduantage of his ambition, or that hee would perswade her to forge some strange tale about Dauids last Testament, or any thing else that might preiudice the title of Salomon.

1. King. 2. 15. As for the right of an elder brother which Adonijah pretended, though generally it agreed both with the law of Nations, & with the customes of the Iewes: yet the Kings of the Iewes were so absolute, as they did therein, and in all else what they pleased. Some examples also they had (though not of Kings) which taught them to vse this paternall authoritie in transferring the birthright to a younger sonne: namely, of Iacobs disheriting Reuben, and giuing the birthright (which was twice as much as any portion of the other brethren) to Ioseph: of whom hee made two tribes. And that it was generally acknowledged that this power was in Dauid, it appeareth by the words of Bersabe and Nathan to Dauid, and of Ionathan to Adonijah. For as for popular election, that it was necessarie to confirme, or that the refusall of the people had authoritie to frustrate the elder brothers right to the Kingdome, it now here appeares in the stories of the Iewes. It is said indeed that the people made Saul King at Gilgal: that is, they acknowledged and established him. For that he was King long before, no man can doubt. In like manner elsewhere the phrase of chusing or making their King, is to be expounded: as where in the prohibition, that they should not make themselues a King, it is said, Thou shalt make him King whom the Lord shall chuse. 1. Sam. 11. 14. Deut. 17. 30.

But to proceed with the acts of Salomon: at the same time that hee put Adonijah to death, he rid himselfe also of Ioab, and three yeeres after of Shimei, as Dauid had aduised him: he displaced also the Priest Abiathar, who tooke part with Adonijah against him: but in respect of his office, and that he followed Dauid in all his afflictions, and because he had borne the Arke of God before his Father, hee spared his life. And thus being established in his Kingdome, he tooke the daughter of Vaphres King of Ægypt to Wife: for so Eusebius out of Eupolemus calls him. He offered a thousand Sacrifices at Gibeon, where God appearing vnto him in a dreame, bade him aske what he would at his hands: Salomon chooseth wisedome, which pleased God. And God said vnto him, Because thou hast asked this thing, and hast not asked for thy selfe long life, neither hast thou asked riches for thy selfe, nor hast asked the life of thine enemies, behold, I haue done according to thy words: by which wee may informe our selues what desires are most pleasing to God, and what not. For the coueting after long life in respect of our selues, cannot but proceed of selfe-loue, which is the roote of all impietie: the desire of priuate riches is an affection of couetousnesse which God abhorreth; to affect reuenge, is as much as to take the sword out of Gods hand, and to distrust his Iustice. And in that it pleased God to make Salomon know that it liked him, that he had not asked the life of his enemies, it could not but put him in minde of his brothers slaughter, for which he had not any warrant eyther from Dauid, or from the Law of God. But because Salomon desired wisedome onely, which taught him both to obey God, and to rule men, it pleased God to giue him withall that which he desired not. And I haue also giuen thee (saith God) that which thou hast not asked, both riches and honour. This gift of wisedome our Commentators stretch to almost all kindes of learning: but that it comprehended the knowledge of the nature of plants and liuing creatures the Scripture testifieth, though no doubt the chiefe excellencie of Salomons wisedome, was in the knowledge of gouerning his kingdome: whence, as it were for an example of his wisedome, the Scripture telleth how soone he iudged the controuersie betweene the two harlots. 1. §. II.

Of Salomons building and glorie.

HE then entred into league with Hiram King of Tyre, from whom hee had much of his materials, for the Kings Palace and the Temple of God: for the building whereof he had receiued a double charge, one from his father Dauid, and another from God. For like as it is written of Dauid, that Hee called Solomon his sonne, and charged him to build a house for the Lord God of Israel: so doth Tostatus giue the force of a diuine precept to these words, Behold, a sonne is borne vnto thee, &c. Hee shall build an house for my Name. 1. Chron. 22. 6. Tost. 9. 26. in 1. Chron.

He began the worke of the Temple, in the beginning of the fourth yeere of his reigne, at which time also he prepared his fleete at Esiongaber to trade for gold in the East Indies, that nothing might be wanting to supply the charge of so great a worke. For that the Temple was in building, while his fleets were passing to and fro it is manifest. For the pillars of the Temple were made of the Almuggim trees brought from Ophir. Of this most glorious building, of all the particulars (whereof the forme and example was giuen by God himselfe) many learned men haue written, as Salmeron, Montanus, Ribera, Barradas, Azorius, Villalpandus, Pineda, and others, to whom I referre the Reader. 1. King. 6. 1. Chro. 28. 19.

For the cutting and squaring of the Cedars which serued that building, Salomon employed 30. thousand Carpenters, 10. thousand euery moneth by course: he also vsed 80. thousand Masons in the mountaine, and 70. thousand labourers that bare burdens, which it is conceiued, hee selected out of the Proselites, besides three thousand three hundred masters of his worke, so as hee paid and imployed in all one hundred eightie three thousand and three hundred men, in which number the Sidonians which were farre more 1. skilfull in hewing timber than the Israelites, may (as I thinke) bee included. For Hiram caused his seruants to bring downe the Cedars and Firres from Libanon to the sea, and
1 King. 5. v. 9 thence sent them in raffes to Ioppe, or the next port to Hierusalem. For in the second of Chronicles the second Chapter, it is plaine, that all but the thirtie thousand Carpenters, and the ouer-seers, were strangers, and as it seemeth, the vassals of Hiram, and of Vaphres
1 King. 5 11. King of Ægypt. In recompence of all this timber and stone, Salomon gaue Hiram twentie thousand measures of wheate, and twentie measures of pure oyle yeerely. Eusebius out of Eupolemus in the ninth booke of his preparation, the last Chapter, hath left vs a Copie of Salomons Letter to Suron (which was the same as Huram and Hiram) King of Tyre in these words:

REx Salomon Suroni, Tyri, Sydonis, atque Phœniciæ regi, Amico paterno salutem. Scis me à Deo magno Dauid patris mei regnum accepisse, cumq; mihi pater præcepit templum Deo, qui terram creauit, condere, vt etiam ad te scriberem præcepit: Scribo igitur, & peto à te vt artifices atque fabros ad ædificandum Templum Dei mittere velis.

KIng Salomon to King Suron, of Tyre, Sydon, and Phœnicia King, and my fathers friend, sendeth greeting; You may vnderstand that I haue receiued of the great God of my father Dauid, the Kingdome: and when my father commanded mee to build a Temple to God which created heauen and earth, hee commanded also that I should write to you. I write therefore to you, and beseech you, that you would be pleased to send me Artificers and Carpenters to build the Temple of God.

To which the King Suron made this answere.

SVron, Tyri, Sydonis, & Phœniciæ rex, Salomoni regi salutem Lectis literis gratias egi Deo, qui tibi regnum patris tradidit: & quoniam scribis fabros ministrosq; ad condendum Templum esse tibi mittendos, nisi ad te millia hominum octoginta, & Architectum Tyriumhominem ex matre Iudæa, virum in rebus architecturæ mirabilem. Curabis igitur vt necessarijs non egeant, & Templo Dei condito ad nos redeant.

SVron of Tyre, Sidon and Phœnicia King, to King Salomon greeting: when I read your letters, I gaue God thankes, who hath installed you in your fathers Kingdome. And because you write, that Carpenters and workemen may be sent to build Gods Temple, I haue sent you fourescore thousand men, and a Master-builder a Tyrian, borne of a Iewish woman, a man admirable in building. You will be carefull that all necessaries be prouided for them, and when the Temple
Ios. Ant. l. 8. c. 2 of God is built, that they come home to vs.

The Copies of these letters were extant in Iosephus time, as himselfe affirmeth, and to be seene, saith he, Tam in nostris quàm in Tyriorum annalibus, as well in our owne, as in the Tyrian annals. But he deliuereth them somwhat in different tearmes, as the Reader may finde in his Antiquities. But were this intercourse betweene Salomon and Hiram either by message or by writing, it is somewhat otherwise deliuered in the Scriptures, than either Eupolemus or Iosephus set it downe, but so, that in substance there is little difference
3 King. 5. from the 1. vnto the 9 betweene the one and the other.

The like letter in effect Salomon is said to haue written to Vaphres King of Egypt, and was answered as from Hiram.

But whereas some Commentors vpon Salomon finde that Hiram King of Tyre, and Vaphres King of Egypt, gaue Salomon the title of Rex magnus, and cite Eupolemon in Eusebius, I doe not finde any such addition of magnus in Eusebius in the last chapter of that ninth booke; neither is it in Iosephus in the eight booke and second chapter of the Iewes Antiquities: it being a vaine title vsed by some of the Assyrian and Persian Kings, and vsed likewise by the Parthians, and many other after them, insomuch as in latter times it grew common, and was vsurped by meane persons in respect of the great Hermes the first, which was honoured by that name for his noble qualities, as much or more than for his mightinesse.

After the finishing and dedication of the Temple and house of the Lord, Salomon fortified Ierusalem with a treble wall, and repaired Hazor which had beene the auncient Metropolis of the Canaanites, before Iosuahs time: so did he Gaza of the Philistines: hee Ios. Ant. l. 8. c. 2 built Beræthon, Gerar, and the Millo or munition of Hierusalem. For Pharaoh (as it seemeth in in fauour of Salomon) came vp into the edge of Ephraim, and tooke Gezar, which place the Canaanites yet held, and put them to the sword, and burnt their Citie. The place and territorie hee gaue Salomons wife for a dowrie. And it is probable that because Salomon was then busied in his magnificent buildings, and could not attend the warre, that he entreated his father in law to rid him of these neighbours, which Pharaoh performed. But hee thereby taught the Ægyptians to visit those parts againe before they were sent for; and in his sonne Rehoboams time Shesback this mans successor did sacke Ierusalem it selfe.

Salomon also built Megiddo in Manasse, on this side Iordan, and Balah in Dan: also Thadmor, which may be either Ptolomies Thamoron in the desart of Iuda, or (as Iosephus thinks) Palmyra in the desart of Syria, which Palmyra because it stood on the vtmost border of Salomons dominion to the northeast of Libanus, and was of Dauids conquest when hee wan Damascus; it may seeme that Salomon therefore bestowed thereon the most cost, and fortified it with the best Art that that age had. Iosephus calls this place Thadamora, by which name (saith hee) giuen by Salomon, the Syrians as yet call it. Hierom in his booke of Hebrew places, calls it Thermeth. In aftertimes, when it was rebuilt by Adrian the Emperour, it was honoured with his name, and called Adrianopolis. In respect of this great charge of building Salomon raised tribute through all his Dominions, besides an hundred and twentie talents of gold receiued from Hirams seruants; Salomon offered Hiram twenty townes in or neere the vpper Galilee, but because they stood in an vnfruitfull and marish ground, Hiram refused them, and therefore was the territorie called Chabul.

Ioseph. l. 8. ant. c. 2.

These townes, as it is supposed, lay in Galilee of the Gentiles, Non quod gentes ibi habitarent: sed quia sub ditione regis gentilis erat, Not that it was possest by the Gentiles (saith Nauclerus) but because it was vnder the rule of a King that was a Gentile. Howsoeuer it were, it is true that Salomon in the 21. yeere fortified those places, which Hiram refused. Further, hee made a iourney into Syria Zobah, and established his tributes; the first and last warre (if in that expedition he were driuen to fight) that he made in person in all his life. He then visited the border of all his Dominions, passing from Thadmor to the North of Palmyrena, and so to the Desarts of Idumæa, from whence he visited Eziongaber and Eloth, the vttermost place of the South of all his territories, bordering to the red sea: which Cities I haue described in the Storie of Moses.

§. III.

Of Salomons sending to Ophir, and of some seeming contradictions about Salomons riches, and of Pinedas conceit of two strange passages about Africke.

HEre Salomon prepared his Fleet of Ships for India, with whom Hiram ioyned in that voyage, and furnished him with Mariners and Pilots, the Tyrians being of all other the most expert sea-men. From this part of Arabia, which at this time belonged to Edom, and was conquered by Dauid, did the Fleet passe to the East Indies, which was not farre off, namely to Ophir, one of the Islands of the Moluccas, a place exceeding rich in gold: witnesse the Spaniards, who notwithstanding all the abundance which they gather in Peru, doe yet plant in those Islands of the East at Manilia, and recouer a great quantitie from thence, and with lesse labour than they doe in any one part of Peru, or new Spaine.

The returne which was made by these Ships amounted to foure hundred and twentie talents, but in the second of Chronicles the eight, it is written 450. talents: whereof 30. talents went in expence for the charge of the fleet, and wages of men, and 420. talents, which makes fiue and twenty hundred and twenty thousand Crownes, came cleere. And thus must those two places bee reconciled. As for the place 1. Reg. 10. 14. which speaketh of sixe hundred sixty and sixe talents of gold, that summe, as I take it, is of other receipts of Salomons which were yeerely, and which came to him besides these profits from Ophir.

My opinion of the land of Ophir, that it is not Peru in America (as diuers haue thought) but a Countrey in the East Indies, with some reason why at those times they could not make more speedie returne to Ierusalem from the East Indies then in three yeers; and that Tharsis in Scripture is diuers times taken for the Ocean, hath beene already declared in the first booke.

C. 8. §. 9. 10. 15. Lib. 4. de rebus Salomonis c. 6. & 15.

Onely it remaineth that I ſhould ſpeake ſomewhat of Pineda his ſtrange conceits, who being a Spaniard of Batica, would faine haue Gades or Calis-malis, in olde times called Tarteſſus, which is the Southweſt corner of that Prouince, to be the Tharſis from whence Salomon fetcht his gold; for no other reaſon, as it ſeemes, but for loue of his own countrie, and becauſe of ſome affinitie of ſound betweene Tharſis and Tarteſſus. For whereas it may ſeeme ſtrange that it ſhould be three yeres ere they that tooke ſhip in the red ſea, ſhould returne from the Eaſt Indies to Ieruſalem, this hath beene in part anſwered alreadie. And further, the intelligent may conceiue of ſundry lets, in the digging and refining of the metall, and in their other trafficke, and in their land-carriages betweene Ieruſalem and the red ſea, and perhaps alſo elſewhere: ſo that wee haue no need to make Salomons men to goe many thouſand miles out of their way to Gades, round about all Affrick, that ſo they might be long a comming home.

For the direct way to Gades (which if Salomon and the Iſraelites knew not, the Tyrians which went with them, could not haue beene ignorant of) was along the Mediterran ſea, and ſo (beſides many wonderfull inconueniences, and terrible nauigation in rounding Affrica) they ſhould haue eſcaped the troubleſome land-carriage betweene Ieruſalem and the red ſea through drie, deſart, and theeuiſh Countries: and within 30. mile of Ieruſalem at Ioppe, or ſome other hauen in Salomons owne Countrie, haue laden and vnladen their ſhips.

But this direct courſe they could not hold (ſaith Pineda) becauſe the huge Iſland of Atlantis in largeneſſe greater than all Affrick and Aſia, being ſwallowed vp in the Atlantik Ocean hindred Salomons ſhips from paſſing through the ſtraits of Gibraltar: for this he alleadgeth Plato in Timæo. But that this calamitie happened about Salomons time, or that thereby the Straights of Gades were filled with mud and made vnpaſſable, that there could be no comming to Gades by the Mediterran ſea: or that this indraught where the ſea runneth moſt violently, and moſt eaſily ſcowreth his channell, ſhould be filled with mud, and not alſo the great Ocean in like manner, where this huge Iland is ſuppoſed to haue ſtood: or that Salomons ſhips being in the red ſea, ſhould neglect the golden mines of the Eaſt Indies (which were infinitely better and neerer to the red ſea, than any in Spain) to ſeeke gold at Cadyz by the way of compaſſing Affrica, it is moſt ridiculous to imagine. For the Spaniard himſelfe that hath alſo the rich Peru in the Weſt, fortifieth in the Eaſt Indies, and inhabites ſome part thereof, as in Manilia, finding in thoſe parts no leſſe quantitie of gold (the ſmall territorie which hee there poſſeſſeth conſidered) than in Peru.

De rebus Sal. l. 4. c. 12. 11. As it appeares he tooke a ſhip at Iapho or Ioppe. 2. v. 3.

The ſame Pineda hath another ſtrange paſſage round about all Africa, which elſewhere he dreames of: ſuppoſing whereas Ionas ſailing to Tharſis the Citie of Cilicia, was caſt out in the Mediterran ſea, and taken vp there by a Whale, that this Whale in three dayes ſwimming aboue twelue thouſand Engliſh miles, along the Mediterran ſeas, and ſo through the ſtreights of Gades, and along all the huge ſeas round about Africa, caſt vp Ionas vpon the ſhore of the red ſea, that ſo hee might haue perhaps ſome ſixe miles the ſhorter (though much the worſe) way to Niniuie. This conceit he grounds onely vpon the ambiguitie of the word Suph, which oftentimes is an Epitheton of the red ſea (as if we ſhould call it mare algoſum, the ſea full of weeds) for the red ſea. But in Ionas 2. 5. it is generally taken in the proper ſignification for weeds, and not as Pineda would haue it, who in this place againſt his owne rule (which elſewhere he giueth vs) ſuppoſeth ſtrange miracles without any need. For this long voyage of the Whale finiſhed in three dayes, is a greater miracle, than the very preſeruation of Ionas in the bellie of the Whale: and therefore ſeeing there is no neceſſitie of this miracle, we ſend it backe vnto him, keeping his owne rule which in this place he forgets; Miracula non ſunt multiplicanda. And againe, Non ſunt miracula gratis danda, nec pro arbitrio noua fingenda, Miracles are not to be multiplied without neceſsitie, nor deliuered without cauſe, nor fained at pleaſure. Therefore we leaue this man in his dreames, which (were he not otherwiſe very learned and iudicious) might bee thought vnworthy the mentioning. But to proceed with our ſtorie of Salomon.

The Queene of Sabaes comming from farre to Salomon, (as it ſeemes, from Arabia fœlix, and not, as ſome thinke, from Æthiopia) and her rich preſents, and Salomons reciprocall magnificence, and his reſoluing of her difficult queſtions, thoſe are ſet downe at large in the text. But herein Ioſephus is greatly miſtaken, who calls this Queene of Saba

Nicaules,

Nicaules, the succeſſour (ſaith he out of Herodotus) of thoſe thirty and eight Ægyptian Kings which ſucceeded Menes the founder of Memphis; adding, that after this Ægyptian, and the father in Law of Salomon, the name of Pharaoh was left off in Ægypt. For as it is elſewhere proued that the Queene was of Arabia, not of Ægypt and Æthiopia; ſo were there other Pharaohs after the father in Law of Salomon. Yea, aboue three hundred yeeres after Salomon, Pharao Necho ſlew Ioſias King of Iuda. Ioſ. ant. 8. 1. 2. 2 King. c. 23. & 2 Chron. c. 25. Ier. c. 46. v. 2.

It is alſo written of Salomon, that he kept in garriſons foureteene thouſand Chariots, and twelue thouſand horſemen; that he ſpent in Court euery day thirtie meaſures of fine flower, threeſcore meaſures of wheat, one hundred ſheepe, beſides ſtags and fallow deare, bugles and fowle; foure thouſand ſtalles of horſes he had for his chariots and other vſes, and for the twelue thouſand horſemen of his guard. For, the ten thouſand ſtals in the firſt of Kings the fourth, are to be taken but for ſo many horſes, whence in the ſecond of Chronicles the ninth, it is written but foure thouſand ſtals or teemes, and in euery teeme ten horſes, as Iunius and the Geneua vnderſtand it. He was ſaid to be wiſer than any man, yea than were Ethan the Ezrahite, than Heman, Chalcal, or than Darda, to which Iunius addeth a fift, to wit, Ezrak. For the Geneua maketh Ethan an Ezrahite by Nation. Ioſephus writes them Athan, Æman, Chalceus and Donan the ſonnes of Hemon. He ſpake three thouſand Prouerbes, and his ſongs were one thouſand and fiue, whereof either the moſt part periſhed in the Captiuitie of Babylon, or elſe becauſe many acts of Salomons were written and kept among the publique Records of Ciuill cauſes and not Eccleſiaſticall, therefore they were not thought neceſſary to be inſerted into Gods booke. 2 King. 4. 31.

§. IIII.

Of the fall of Salomon, and how long he liued.

NOw as he had plentie of all other things, ſo had he no ſcarcitie of women. For beſides his ſeuen hundred Wiues, he kept three hundred Concubines, and (forgetting that God had commanded that none of his people ſhould accompanie the daughters of Idolators) he tooke Wiues out of Ægypt, Edom, Moab, Ammon, Zidon and Heth: and when hee fell a doting, his Wiues turned his heart after other Gods, as Aſteroth of the Zidonians, Milcom or Molech of the Ammonites, and Chemoſh of Moab.

Theſe things God puniſhed by Adad of Idumæa, Rezin of Damaſcus, and by Ieroboam his owne ſeruant, and one of the maſters of his workes, who by the ordinance of God tare from his ſonne Roboam, ten of the twelue parts of all the territorie he had. Deus dum in peccatores animaduertit, aliorum peccatis vtitur, quæ ipſe non fecit. God in puniſhing ſinners, vſeth the ſinnes of others, which he himſelfe wrought not. P. Mart. in reg.

In the reigne of Salomon (as in times of long peace) were few memorable actions by him performed, excepting his buildings with other workes of magnificence, and that great Indian voyage already mentioned. Fortie yeeres he reigned: how many he liued, it is not written, and muſt therefore be found onely by coniecture. The moſt likely way to gueſſe at the truth in this caſe, is by conſidering the actions of Dauid before and after Salomons birth, whereby we may beſt make eſtimation of the yeeres which they conſumed, and conſequently learne the true, or moſt likely yeere of his natiuitie. Seauen yeeres Dauid reigned in Hebron: in his eighth yeere he tooke Ieruſalem, and warred with the Philiſtims, who alſo troubled him the yeere following. The bringing home of the Arke ſeemes to haue beene in the tenth yeere of Dauid, and his intention to build the Temple in the yeere enſuing, at which time he had ſufficient leiſure, liuing in reſt. 2 King. c. 7. v. 3

After this he had warres with the Philiſtims, Moabites, Aramites and Edomites, which muſt needes haue held him fiue yeeres, conſidered that the Aramites of Damaſco raiſed warre againſt him, after ſuch time as he had beaten Hadadezer; and that in euery of theſe warres he had the entire victory. Neither is it likely that theſe ſeruices occupied any longer time, becauſe in thoſe dayes and places there were no wintering campes in vſe, but at conuenient ſeaſons of the yeere Kings went forth to warre, diſpatching all with violence, rather than with temporizing; as maintaining their armies, partly vpon the ſpoyle of the enemies countrie, partly vpon the priuate prouiſion which euery ſouldier made for himſelfe. The 17. yeere of Dauid, in which he tooke Mephiboſeth the ſonne 2 Sam. c. 11. v. 1. 1 Sam. c. 17. v. 17. & 18.

of Ionathan into his Court, appeareth to haue passed away in quiet; and the yeere following to haue begun the warre with Ammon; but somewhat late in the end of Summer perhaps, it came to triall of a battaile (for Ioab after the victorie, returned immediately to Ierusalem) the causes and preparations for that warre taking vp all the Summer. Dauids personall expedition against the Aramites wherein he brought all the tributaries of Hadadezer vnder his owne allegiance, appeares manifestly to haue beene the next yeeres worke, wherein he did cut off all meanes of succour from the Ammonites; all Syria, Moab and Idumæa being now at his owne deuotion. By this reckoning it must haue beene the 20. yeare of Dauids reigne, and about the fiftieth of his life, in which he sent forth Ioab to besiege Rabba, and finished the warre of Ammon: wherein also fell out the matter of Vriahs wife. So one halfe of Dauids reigne was very prosperous: in the other halfe he felt great sorrow by the expectation, execution, and sad remembrance of that heauie iudgement laid vpon him by God for his foule and bloudy offence.

Now very manifest it is, that in the yeere after the death of that childe which was begotten in adulterie, Salomon was borne, who must needs therefore haue beene nineteene yeeres old or thereabout, when he began to reigne at the decease of his father, as being begotten in the 21. yeere of his fathers reigne, who reigned in all fortie.

This account hath also good coherence with the following times of Dauid, as may be collected out of ensuing actions: for two yeeres passed ere Absalon slew his brother Ammon; three yeeres ere his father pardoned him; and two yeeres more ere he came into the Kings presence. After this he prepared horses and men, and laid the foundation of his rebellion, which seemes to haue beene one yeeres work. So the rebellion it selfe with all that happened thereupon, as the Commotion made by Sheba, the death of Amasa and the rest, may well seeme to haue beene in the 30. yeere of Dauids reigne.

Whether the three yeeres of famine should be reckoned apart from the last yeeres of warre with the Philistims, or confounded with them, it were more hard than needfull to coniecture. Plaine enough it is, that in the ten remaining yeeres of Dauid there was time sufficient, and to spare, both for the three yeeres of famine, for foure yeeres of warre, and for numbring the people, with the pestilence ensuing; as also for his owne last infirmitie, and disposing of the Kingdome. Yet indeede it seemes that the warre with the Philistims, was but one yeeres worke, and ended in three or foure fights, of which the two or three former were at Gob or Nob neere vnto Gezer, and the last at Gath. This war the Philistims vndertooke, as it seemeth, vpon confidence gathered out of the tumults in Israel, and perhaps emboldened by Dauids olde age: for hee fainted now in the battaile, and was afterwads hindered by his men from exposing himselfe vnto danger any more. So Dauid had sixe or seauen yeeres of rest, in which time it is likely, that many of his great men of Warre died (being of his owne age) whereby the stirring spirit of Adonijah found little succour in the broken partie of Ioab the sonne of Zeruia.

1 Kin. c. 2. v. 9. & c. 3. v. 7. At this time it might both truely be said by Dauid to Salomon, Thou art a wise man, and by Salomon to God, I am but a yong childe; for nineteene yeeres of age might well agree with either of these two speeches.

Neuertheless there are some that gather out of Salomons professing himselfe a child, that he was but eleuen yeeres old when hee began to reigne. Of these Rabbi Salomon seemes the first Author, whom other of great learning and iudgement haue herein followed: grounding themselues perhaps vpon that which is said of Absolons rebellion, that it was after fortie yeeres, which they vnderstood as yeeres of Dauids reigne. But whereas Rehoboam the sonne of Salomon was 41. yeeres old when he began to reigne, it would follow hereby that his Father had begotten him, being himselfe but a child of nine or ten yeeres old; the difference betweene their ages being no greater, if Salomon (who reigned fortie yeeres) were but eleuen yeeres old when his reigne began. To auoide this inconuenience, Iosephus allowes 80. yeeres of reigne to Salomon; a report so disagreeing with the Scriptures, that it needes no confutation. Some indeede haue in fauour of this opinion construed the words of Iosephus, as if they included all the yeeres of Salomons life. But by such reckoning he should haue beene 40. yeeres old at his Fathers death; and consequently should haue beene borne long before his Father had wonne Ierusalem; which is a manifest vntruth. Wherefore the 40. yeeres remembred in Absalons rebellion, may either seeme to haue reference to the space betweene Dauids first anointment, and the trouble which God brought vpon him for his wickednesse, or perhaps be read (according to Iosephus, Theodoret, and the Latine translation) foure yeeres; which passed betweene the returne of Absalon to Ierusalem, and his breaking out.

§. V.

Of Salomons writings.

THere remaine of Salomons workes, the Prouerbs, the Preacher, and the Song of Salomon. In the first he teacheth good life, and correcteth manners; in the second, the vanity of humane nature; in the third he singeth as it were the Epithalamion of Christ and his Church. For the Booke intituled, The wisedome of Salomon, (which some giue vnto Salomon, and some make the elder Philo the Author thereof) Hierome and many others of the best learned make vs thinke it was not Salomon that wrote it. Stylus libri sapientiæ (saith Hierome) qui Salomonis inscribitur, Græcam redolet eloquentiam; The stile of the booke of wisedome, which is ascribed to Salomon, sauoureth of the Grecian eloquence; and of the same opinion was S. Augustine, and yet he confesseth in the nineteenth Booke and twentieth Chapter of the Citie of God, that the Author of that Booke hath a direct foretelling of the Passion of Christ in these words: Circumueniamus iustum quoniam insuauis est nobis, &c. Let vs circumuent the righteous, for he is vnpleasing to vs, he is contrary to our doings, he checketh vs for offending against the Law, he makes his boast to haue the knowledge of God, and he calleth himselfe the sonne of the Lord, &c. and so doth the course of all the following words point directly at Christ. The Bookes of Ecclesiastes, Prouerbs, and Cantica Canticorum, Rabbi Moses Kimchi, ascribeth to Isay the Prophet. Suidas and Cedrenus report that Salomon wrote of the remedies of all diseases, and graued the same on the sides of the Porch of the Temple, which they say Ezechias pulled downe, because the people neglecting helpe from God by prayer, repaired thither for their recoueries.

Reinecc. in Iul. Hist.

Of Salomons bookes of Inuocations and Inchantments to cure diseases, and expell euill spirits, Iosephus hath written at large, though as I conceiue, rather out of his owne inuention, or from some vncertaine report, than truely.

He also speaketh of one Eliazarus, who by the roote in Salomons ring dispossest diuers persons, of euill spirits in the presence of Vespasian, and many others, which I will not stand to examine.

Certainely so strange an example of humane frailty hath neuer beene read of as this King: who hauing receiued wisedome from God himselfe, in honour of whom, and for his onely seruice, he built the first and most glorious Temple of the world: he that was made King of Israel and Iudea, not by the law of Nature, but by the loue of God, and became the wisest, richest, and happiest of all Kings, did in the end, by the perswasion of a few weake and wretched Idolatrous Women, forget and forsake the Lord of all the world, and the giuer of all goodnesse, of which he was more liberall to this King, than to any that euer the world had. Of whom Siracides writeth in this manner: Salomon reigned in a peaceable time and was glorious, for God made all quiet round about, that hee might build a house to his name, and prepare the Sanctuary for euer; How wise wast thou in thy youth, and wast filled with vnderstanding, as with a floud? Thy minde couered the whole earth, and hath filled it with grane and darke sentences. Thy name went abroad in the Iles, and for thy peace thou wast beloued, &c. but thus he concludeth: Thou didst bow thy loynes to Women, and wast ouer-come by thy body, thou didst staine thine honour, and hast defiled thy posteritie, and hast brought wrath vpon thy children, and felt sorrow for thy folly. cap. 47.

Of the Contemporaries of Salomon.

HEere the beginning of Salomons reigne, Agesilaus the third of the Heraclidæ in Corinth, Labotes in Lacedemon, and soone after Sylurius Albus the fourth of the Sylui swayed those Kingdomes: Laosthenes then gouerning Assyria: Agasius and Archippus the second and third Princes after Codrus, ruling the Athenians.

In

In the sixe and twentieth of Salomons reigne Hiram of Tyre died, to whom Baliastrus succeeded, and reigned seuenteene yeeres, after Mercators account, who reckons the time of his rule by the age of his sonnes. Iosephus giues him fewer yeeres. Theophilus Antiochenus against Autolicus finds Bozorius the next after Hiram, if there be not some Kings omitted betweene the death of Hiram, and the reigne of Bozorius.

Vaphres being dead, about the twentieth of Salomon, Sesac or Shisak (as our English Geneua termes him) began to gouerne in Ægypt, being the same with him whom Diodorus calleth Sosachis; Iosephus, Susac; Cedrenus, Susesinus, Eusebius in the columne of the Ægyptian Kings, Smendes, and in that of the Hebrewes, Susac. Iosephus in the eight of his Antiquities reproueth it as an errour in Herodotus, that he ascribeth the acts of Susac to Sesostris, which perchance Herodotus might haue done by comparison, accounting Sesac another Sesostris, for the great things he did.

Of the great acts and vertues of King Sesostris I haue spoken already in the story of the Ægyptian Princes: onely in this he was reproued, that he caused foure of his captiue Kings to draw his Caroch, when he was disposed to be seene, and to ride in triumph: one of which foure, saith Eutropius, at such time as Sesostris was carried out to take the aire, cast his head continually backe vpon the two fore-most wheeles next him; which Sesostris perceiuing, asked him what he found worthy the admiration in that motion? to whom the captiue King answered, that in those he beheld the instability of all worldly things; for that both the lowest part of the wheele was suddainely carried about, and became the highest, and the vpmost part was as suddainly turned downe-ward and vnder all: which when Sesostris had iudiciously weighed, he dismissed those Princes, and all other from the like seruitude in the future. Of this Sesostris, and that he could not be taken for Sesac, I haue spoken at large in that part of the Ægyptian Kings preceding.

CHAP. XIX.

Of Salomons Successors vntill the end of Iehosaphat.

§. I.

Of Rehoboam his beginnings: the defection of the ten Tribes, and Ieroboams Idolatry.

REhoboam the Sonne of Salomon by Nahama an Ammonitesse, now forty yeeres old, succeeded his Father Salomon, and was anointed at Sichem, where the ten Tribes of Israel were assembled: who attended a while the returne of Ieroboam as yet in Ægypt, since he fled thither fearing Salomon. After his arriuall the people presented a Petition to Rehoboam, to be eased of those great Tributes laid on them by his Father, Sic enim firmius ei fore Imperium, si amare mallet quam metui; So should his Empire (saith Iosephus) be more assured, if he desired rather to be beloued than feared: whereof he tooke three dayes to deliberate before his answere; of whom therefore it could not be said as of Dauid, that he was wiser than all his Teachers. For as of himselfe he knew not how to resolue, so had he not the iudgement to discerne of counsels, which is the very test of wisedome in Princes, and in all men else. But notwithstanding that he had consulted with those graue and aduised men, that serued his Father, who perswaded him by all meanes to satisfie the multitude: he was transported by his familiars and fauourites, not onely to continue on the backs of his subiects those burdens which greatly crusht them; but (vaunting falsly of greatnesse exceeding his Fathers) he threatned in sharpe, or rather in terrible tearmes, to lay yet heauier, and more vnsupportable loades on them. But as it appeared by the successe, those yonger aduisers greatly mistooke the nature of seuerity, which without the temper of clemency is no other than cruelty it selfe: they also were ignorant that it ought to be vsed for the helpe, and not for the harme of subiects. For what is the strength of a King left by his people? and what cords or fetters haue euer lasted long, but those which haue beene twisted twisted and forged by loue onely? His witlesse parasites could well iudge of the Kings disposition: and being well learned therein, though ignorant in all things else, it sufficed and inabled them sufficiently for the places they held. But this answere of Rehoboam did not a little aduance Ieroboams designes. For being fore-told by the Prophet Achiah of his future aduancement, these the Kings threats (changing the peoples tou.. into furie) confirmed and gaue courage to his hopes. For he was no sooner arriued, than elected King of Israel: the people cryed out, What portion haue we in Dauid? we haue no inheritance in the Sonne of Isbai. Now though themselues, euen all the Tribes of Isral, had consented to Dauids anointing at Hebron the second time, acknowledging that they were his bones and his flesh: yet now after the manner of rebels, they forgat both the bands of nature, and their dutie to God, and, as all alienated resolued hearts doe, they serued themselues for the present with impudent excuses. And now ouer-late, and after time, Rehoboam sent Adoram, one of the Taxers of the people, a man most hatefull to all his Subiects, to pacifie them: whom they instantly beat to death with stones. Whereupon the King affrighted, got him from Sichem with all speede, and recouered Ierusalem, where preparing to inuade Israel, with an hundred and foure-score thousand chosen men, Shemai in the person of God commanding to the contrary, all was stayed for the present. In the meane time Ieroboam the new King fortified Sechem on this side, and Penuel on the other side of Iordan; and fearing that the Vnion and exercise of one Religion would also ioyne the peoples hearts againe to the House of Dauid; and hauing in all likelihood also promised the Ægyptians to follow their Idolatry: he set vp two Calues of gold for the Children of Israel to worship, impiously perswading them that those were the Gods, or at least by these he represented those Gods, which deliuered them out of Ægypt: and refusing the seruice of the Leuites, he made Priests fit for such gods. It must needes be that by banishing the Leuites which serued Dauid and Salomon through all Israel, Ieroboam greatly inriched himselfe: as taking into his hands all those Cities which were giuen them by Moses and Iosua, for as it is written, The Leuites left their suburbs, and their possession, and came to Iuda, &c. This irreligious policie of Ieroboam (which was the foundation of an Idolatry that neuer could be rooted out, vntill Israel for it was rooted out of the Land) was by prophecie and miracles impugned sufficiently when it first began; but the affections maintaining it, were so strong, that neither Prophecie nor Miracle could make them yeelde. Ieroboam could not be moued now by the authority of Abia, who from the Lord had first promised vnto him the Kingdome; nor by the withering of his owne hand as he stretched it ouer the Altar, which also clue a-sunder, according to the signe, which the man of God had giuen him by the commandement of God, who againe recouered and cured him of that defect; yet he continued as obstinate an Idolater as before, for he held it the safest course in policie to proceede as he had begun. This impious inuention of Ieroboam, who forsooke God, and the Religion of his forefathers, by God and his Ministers taught them, was by a moderne Historian compared with the policies of late Ages; obseruing well the practice of his Nation, being an Italian borne. Sic qui hodiè (saith he) politici vocantur, & propria commoda, præsentésq; vtilitates sibi tanquam vltimum finem constituunt, causam quam vocant status in capite omnium ponunt: pro ipsa tuenda, promouenda, conseruanda, amplianda, nihil non faciendum putant. Si iniuria proximo irroganda, si iustitia honestatisq; leges subuertenda, si religio ipsa pessundanda, si denique omnia iura diuina, & humana violanda, nihil intentatum, nil per fas nefasq; relinquendum censent; cuncta ruant, omnia pereant, nihil ad ipsos, modò id, quod è re sua esse sibi persuadent, obtineant, ac si nullus sit qui talia curet, castigareue possit Deus; So they who are now called Politicians, propounding to themselues, as their vtmost end and scope, their owne commoditie and present profit; are wont to alleage the case of state forsooth, as the principall point to be regarded: for the good of the state, for aduancing, preseruing, or encreasing of the state, they thinke that they may doe any thing. If they meane to oppresse their neighbour, to ouerturne all lawes of iustice and honestie, if religion it self so must goe to wracke, yea if all rights of God and Man must be violated, they will try all courses, be it right, be it wrong, they will doe any thing; let all goe to ruine, what care they, so long as they may haue what they would; as who should say, there were no God that would offer to meddle in such matters, or had power to correct them.

Indeede this allegation of raggione del stato, did serue as well to vp-hold, as at the first first it had done to bring in this vile Idolatry of the ten Tribes. Vpon this ground Amazia the Priest of Bethel, counsailed the Prophet Amos, not to prophecie at Bethel; For (saith he) it is the Kings Court. Vpon this ground euen Iehu that had massacred the Priests of Baal, in zeale for the Lord, yet would not in any wise depart from that politique sinne of Ieroboam the sonne of Nebat, which made Israel to sinne. It was reason of state that perswaded the last famous French King Henrie the fourth to change his Religion, yet the Protestants whom he forsooke, obeyed him, but some of the Papists whom he followed, murdered him. So strongly doth the painted vizzor of wise proceeding delude euen those that know the foule face of impietie lurking vnder it, and behold the wretched ends that haue euer followed it; whereof Iehu and all the Kings of Israel had to and were themselues very great examples.

§. II.

Of Rehoboam his impietie; for which he was punished by Sesac: of his end and Contemporaries.

WHile Ieroboam was occupied in setting vp his new Religion, Rehoboam on the other side, hauing now little hope to recouer the Prouinces lost, strengthened the principall places remaining, with all endeuour: for he fortified and victualled fifteene Cities of Iudah and Beniamin: not that he feared Ieroboam alone, but the Ægyptians, to whom Ieroboam had not onely fastned himselfe, but withall inuited them to inuade Iudæa: laying perchance before them the incountable riches of Dauid and Solomon, which might now be easily had, seeing ten of the twelue Tribes were reuolted, and become enemies to the Iudæans. So as by those two wayes (of late yeeres often troden) to wit, change of Religion, and inuitation of forraigne force, Ieroboam hoped to settle himselfe in the seate of Israel, whom yet the powerfull God for his Idolatry in a few yeeres after rooted out, with all his. Rehoboam also, hauing as he thought, by fortifying diuers places, assured his estate, forsooke the Law of the liuing God, and made high places, and Images, and Groues on euery high Hill, and vnder euery greene Tree.

1 Kings 14.23.

And therefore in the fifth yeere of his reigne, Sesac or Shishac before spoken of, being now King of Ægypt, and with whom as well Adad of Idumæa, as Ieroboam, were familiar, and his instruments; entred Iudæa with twelue thousand Chariots, and threescore thousand Horse, besides foot-men, which Iosephus numbers at foure hundred thousand. This Armie was compounded of foure Nations: Ægyptians, Lubæans, Succæans, and Cusites. The Lubæans were Lybæans, the next bordering Region to Ægypt, on the West-side. The Cusites were of Petræa, and of the Desart Arabia, which afterward followed Zerah against Asa King of Iuda. The Succæans according to Iunius his opinion, were of Succoth, which signifieth Tents: he doth suppose that they were the Troglodita, mentioned often in Plinie, Ptolomie, and other Authors. The Troglodites inhabited not farre from the bankes of the red Sea, in 22. degrees from the line Northward, about sixe hundred English miles from the best and Maritimate part of Ægypt: and therefore I doe not think that the Succims, or Succei were those Troglodita, but rather those Arabians which Ptolomie cals Arabes Ægyptij, or, Ichthyophagi, which possesse that part of Ægypt betweene the mountaines called Alabastrini, and the red Sea, farre neerer Ægypt, and readier to be leuied then those remoued Sauages of the Troglodytæ.

2 Kings 14.
Annot. in 12. Chron.
Plin. l. 6. c. 29.
Ptol. Asiæ tab. 3. Cap. 47. v. 13.

With this great and powerfull Army, Sesac inuaded Iudæa, and (besides many other strong Cities) wan Ierusalem it selfe; of which, and of the Temple, and Kings house, he took the spoile, carrying away (besides other treasures) the golden shields which Salomon had made, in imitation of those which Dauid recouered from Adadezer, in the Syrian war: these Rehoboam supplied with Targets of brasse, which were fit enough to guard a King of his quality: whom Syracides calleth, The foolishnesse of the people.

From this time forward the Kings of Ægypt claimed the soueraignetie of Iudæa, and held the Iewes as their Tributaries: Sesac, as it seemes, rendring vp to Rehoboam his places on that condition. So much may be gathered out of the word of God, where promising the deliuerance of Iuda after their humiliation, he doth notwithstanding leaue them vnder the yoke of Ægypt, in these words: Neuertheless, they (to wit, the Iudæans) shall be his seruants, that is, the seruants of Sesac.

After

After this ouerthrow and dishonour, Rehoboam reigned twelue yeeres, and his losses receiued by Sesac, notwithstanding, he continued the warre against Ieroboam all his life time. After his death Ieroboam gouerned Israel foure yeeres.

Rehoboam liued 58. yeeres, and reigned 17. his storie was written at large by Shemeiah and Hiddon the Prophets, but the same perished with that of Nathan, and the rest.

With Rehoboam, Archippus, and Tersippus, the third and fourth Archontes or Gouernors for life after Codrus, gouerned in Athens. Abdastrartus, or Abstrartus, in Tyre. Doristhus the fift of the Heraclidæ in Sparta, according to Eusebeus (others make him the sixt) and Priminas the fourth in Corinth. Ouer the Latines reigned Syluius Alba, and Syluius Atys, the fourth and fifth of the Syluij. Euseb. Chron.

About the 12. of Rehoboam, Abdastrartus King of Tyre was murthered by his Nurses sons, or foster brethren, the elder of which vsurped the Kingdome twelue yeeres.

Towards his latter times Periciades, or Pyrithiades, began to gouerne Assyria, the 34. King thereof: and not long after Astartus, the sonne of Baleastartus, recouered the Kingdome of Tyre from the Vsurpers.

§. III.

Of the great battaile betweene Ieroboam and Abia, with a Corollarie of the examples of Gods iudgements.

ABijah the sonne of Rehoboam, inherited his Fathers Kingdome, and his vices. He raised an Armie of foure hundred thousand, with which he inuaded Ieroboam, who encountred him with a double number of eight hundred thousand: Both Armies ioyned neere to the Mount Ephraim, where Ieroboam was vtterly ouerthrowne, and the strength of Israel broken; for there fell of that side fiue hundred thousand, the greatest ouerthrow that euer was giuen or receiued of those Nations. Abijah being now master of the field, recouered Bethel, Ieshanah, and Ephron; soone after which discomfiture, Ieroboam died: who reigned in all 22. yeeres. Abijah, the better to strengthen himselfe, entred into league with Hesion, the third of the Adads of Syria; as may be gathered out of the second of Chronicles: he reigned but three yeeres, and then died: the particulars of his acts were written by Iddo the Prophet, as some part of his Fathers were. 2 Chron. 16. 23

Here we see how it pleased God to punish the sinnes of Salomon in his Sonne Rehoboam: first, by an Idolator and Traitor: and then by the successor of that Ægyptian, whose daughter Salomon had married, thereby the better to assure his estate, which while he serued God, was by God assured against all and the greatest neighbouring Kings; and when he forsooke him, it was torne asunder by his meanest Vassals: Not that the Father wanted strength to defend him from the Ægyptian Sesac. For the sonne Abijah was able to leuie foure hundred thousand men, and with the same number he ouerthrew eight hundred thousand Israelites, and slew of them fiue hundred thousand; God giuing spirit, courage, and inuention, when, and where it pleaseth him. And as in those times the causes were expresst, why it pleased God to punish both Kings and their People: the same being both before, and at the instant deliuered by Prophets; so the same iust God, who liueth and gouerneth all things for euer, doeth in these our times giue victory, courage, and discourage, raise, and throw downe Kings, Estates, Cities, and Nations, for the same offences which were committed of old, and are committed in the present: for which reason, in these and other the afflictions of Israel, alwayes the causes are set downe, that they might be as precedents to succeeding ages. They were punished with famine in Dauids time for three yeeres, For Saul and his bloudy house, &c. And Dauid towards his latter end suffered all sorts of afflictions, and sorrowes in effect, for Vriah. Salomon had ten Tribes of twelue torne from his sonne for his Idolatry. Rehoboam was spoyled of his riches and honour by Sesac of Ægypt, because the people of Iuda made images, high places, and groues, &c. And because they suffered Sodomites in the Land. Ieroboam was punished in himselfe and his posteritie, for the golden Calues that he erected. Ioram had all his sonnes slaine by the Philistims, and his very bowels torne out of his body by an excoriating flixe, for murthering his brethren. Ahab and Iezebel were slaine, the bloud of the one, the body of the other eaten with dogges: for the false accusing and killing of Naboth. So also hath God punished the same and 2 Sam. 21. 1.

the like sinnes in all after-times, and in these our dayes by the same famine, plagues, warre, losse, vexation, death, sickenesse, and calamities, howsoeuer the wise men of the world raise these effects no higher than to second causes, and such other accidents; which, as being next their eyes and eares, seeme to them to worke euery alteration that happeneth.

§. IIII.
Of Asa and his Contemporaries.

TO Abijah succeeded Asa, who enioyed peace for his first ten yeeres, in which time he established the Church of God, breaking downe the altars dedicated to strange gods, with their images, cutting downe their groues, and taking away their high places. He also spared not his owne mother, who was an Idolatresse, but deposing her from her regencie, brake her Idoll, stampt it, and burnt it. Hee also fortified many Cities, and other places, prouiding (as prouident Kings doe) for the troubles of war in the leasure of peace. For not long after he was inuaded by Zerah, who then commanded all the Arabians bordering Iudæa, and with such a multitude entred the territorie of Asa, as (for any thing that I haue read) were neuer assembled of that Nation, either before or since. For it is written, that there came against the Iudæans, Zerah of Aethiopia, with an hoste of ten hundred thousand, and three hundred Chariots, which Asa encountred with an Armie of fiue hundred and foure score thousand, leuied out of those two Tribes of Iuda and Beniamin, which obeyed him, and with which hee ouerthrew this fearefull multitude, and had the spoyle both of their Cities and Campes

2 Chron. 14. — 2 Chron. 15. 16. — 2 Chron. 14. 9.

That this Zerah was not an Æthiopian, I haue * proued already, and were it but the length betweene Æthiopia and Iudæa, and the strong flourishing Regions of Ægypt interiacent (who would not suffer a million of strangers to passe through them) it were sufficient to make it appeare how foolish the opinion is, that these inuaders were Æthiopians. But in that the Scriptures acknowledge that Gerar was belonging to Zerah, and the Cities thereabouts were spoyled by the Iudæans, in following their victory, as places belonging to Zerah, and that all men know that Gerar standeth vpon the torrent of Besor, which Dauid past ouer when he surprized the Amalekites or Arabians; this proueth sufficiently, that Zerah was leader of the Arabians, and that Gerar was a frontier towne, standing on the vttermost South-border of all Iudæa, from all parts of Æthiopia sixe hundred miles. Also the spoyles which Asa tooke, as the cattell, Camels, and sheepe, whereof he sacrificed fiue thousand, shew them to be Arabians adioyning, and not farre off, and not vnknowne Æthiopians. And if it be obiected that these desart countries can hardly yeelde a million of men fit for the wars, I answer, that it is as like that Arabia Petræa, and the Desart which compasse two parts of the holy Land, should yeeld ten hundred thousand, as that two Tribes of the twelue, should arme fiue hundred and foure score thousand Besides, it answereth to the promise of God to Abraham, that these Nations should exceede in number; for God spake it of Ismael, that hee would make him fruitfull, and multiply him exceedingly, that hee should beget twelue Princes, &c.

* In the former booke c. 4 §. 14. item c. 8. §. 10. * 6.

2 Chron. 14.

Baasha a King of Israel began to reigne in the third of Asa, and fearing the greatnes of Asa after his great victory, entertained Benhadad King of Syria, of the race of Adadezer, to ioyne with him against Asa; and to the end to blocke him vp, he fortified Rama, which lieth in the way from Ierusalem towards Samaria.

2 Chro. 16. v. 1.

This warre began according to the letter of the Scriptures in the 36. yeere of Asa his reigne: but becausse in the first of Kings the 16. it is said that Baasha died in the 26. yeere of Asa; therfore could not Baasha begin this war in the 35. of Asa his reigne, but in the 35. yeere of the diuision of Iuda and Israel; for so many yeeres it was from the first of Rehoboam, who reigned 17. yeeres, to the 16. of Asa. It may seeme strange, that Asa being able to bring into the field an Armie of fiue hundred and foure score thousand good Souldiers, did not easily driue away Baasha, and defeat him of his purposes; the victories of Abia against Ieroboam, and of Asa himselfe against Zerah, being yet fresh in minde, which might well haue emboldened the men of Iuda, and asmuch disheartened the enemies. Questionlesse there were some important Circumstances, omitted in the Text, which caused cauſed Aſa to fight at this time with money. It may be that the imployment of ſo many hundred thouſands of hands, in the late ſeruice againſt Zerah, had cauſed many mens priuate buſineſſes to lye vndiſpatched, whereby the people being now intentiue to the culture of their lands and other trades, might be vnwilling to ſtir againſt the Iſraelites, chooſing rather to winke at apparant inconuenience, which the building of Rama would bring vpon them in after-times. Such backwardneſſe of the people might haue deterred Aſa from aduenturing himſelfe with the leaſt part of his forces, and committing the ſucceſſe into the hands of Gods. Howſoeuer it were, he took the treaſures remaining in the Temple, with which he waged Benhadad the Syrian againſt Baaſha, whoſe imployments Benhadad readily accepted, and brake off confederacy with Baaſha. For the Iſraelites were his borderers, and next neighbours, whom neither himſelfe (after his inuaſion) nor his ſucceſſors after him euer gaue ouer, till they had made themſelues maſters of that Kingdome. So Benhadad being now entred into Nepthalim, without reſiſtance, he ſpoyled diuers principall Cities thereof, and inforced Baaſha to quit Rama, and to leaue the ſame to Aſa, with all the materials which he had brought thither, to fortifie the ſame: which done, Benhadad, who loued neither party, being loden with the ſpoiles of Iſrael, and the treaſures of Iuda, returned to Damaſcus. After this, when Hanani the Prophet reprehended Aſa, in that he now relyed on the ſtrength of Syria, and did not reſt himſelfe on the fauour and aſſiſtance of God, he not onely cauſed Hanani to be impriſoned, but he began to burden and oppreſſe his people, and was therefore ſtrooken with the grieuous paines of the gout in his feete, wherewith after he had beene two yeeres continually tormented, he gaue vp the ghoſt when he had reigned 41. yeeres. 2 Chron. 16. 4. 1 Kings 15. 2 Chron. 16.

There liued with Aſa, Ageſilaus the ſixt of the Heraclidæ, and Bacis the fift King of the ſame race in Corinth, of whom his ſucceſſors were afterward called Bacidæ. Aſtartus, and Aſtarimus were Kings in Tyre. Aſtarimus tooke reuenge on his brother Phelletes, for the murther of Ithobalus Prieſt of the goddeſſe Aſtarta, whom Salomon in dotage worſhipped. Atys and Capys ruled the Latines: Pirithiades and Ophrateus the Aſſyrians: Terſippus and Phorbas the Athenians: Chemmis reigned in Ægypt; who dying in the 36. yeere of Aſa, left Cheops his ſucceſſour, that reigned fiftie ſixe yeeres, euen to the 16. of Ioas. Euſeb. in Chron.

§. V.

Of the great alteration falling out in the ten Tribes during the reigne of Aſa.

IN the reigne of Aſa the Kingdome of Iſrael felt great and violent commotions; which might haue reduced the ten Tribes vnto their former allegeance to the houſe of Dauid, if the wiſedome of God had not otherwiſe determined. The wickednеſſe of Ieroboam had in his latter dayes, the ſentence of heauy vengeance laid vpon it, by the mouth of Ahia, the ſame Prophet which had foretold the diuiſion of Iſrael, for the ſinne of Salomon, and his reigne ouer the ten Tribes. One ſonne Ieroboam had among others, in whom onely God found ſo much pietie, as (though it ſufficed not to with-hold his wrath from that Family) it procured vnto him a peaceable end; an honourable teſtimony of the peoples loue, by their generall mourning and lamentation at his death, and (wherein he was moſt happy) the fauourable approbation of God himſelfe.

After the loſſe of this good ſonne, the vngodly father was ſoone taken away: a miſerable creature, ſo conſcious of his vile vnthankefulneſſe to God, that he durſt not ſuffer his owne name to be vſed in conſulting with an holy Prophet, aſſured of the ruine hanging ouer him and his, yea of Gods extreame hatred; yet forbearing to deſtroy thoſe accurſed Idols, that wrought his confuſion. So loath he was to forſake his worldly wiſdome, when the world was ready to forſake him, and all belonging to him, his hatefull memory excepted.

Nadab the ſonne of Ieroboam, reigned in the ſecond and third yeeres of Aſa, which are reckoned as two yeeres, though indeede his fathers laſt yeere of two and twenty did run along (how farre is vncertaine) with the ſecond of Aſa, whoſe third yeere was the firſt of Baaſha, ſo that perhaps this Nadab enioyed not his Kingdome one whole yeere. He did not alter his fathers courſes, neither did God alter his ſentence. It ſeemes that hee little feared the iudgements denounced againſt his fathers houſe: for as a Prince that 1 Kings 15. 26.

was secure of his owne estate, he armed all Israel against the Philistims, and besieged one of their Townes. There (whether it were so, that the people were offended with his ill successe, and recalled to minde their grieuous losse of fiue hundred thousand vnder Ieroboam, counting it an vnluckie family to the Nation; or whether by some particular indiscretion, he exasperated them) slaine he was by Baasha, whom the Army did willingly accept for King in his stead, Baasha was no sooner proclaimed King, than he began to take order with the house of Ieroboam, that none of them might molest him, putting all of them, without mercy, to the sword. That he did this for priuate respects, and not in regard of Gods will to haue it so, it is euident by his continuing in the same forme of Idolatry which Ieroboam had begun. Wherefore he receiued the same sentence from God that had beene laid vpon Ieroboam; which was executed vpon him also in the same sort. He began to infest Asa, by fortifying Ramah; but was diuerted from thence by the Syrian Benhadad, who did waste his Countrey, destroying all the Land of Nepthalim. Foure and twenty yeeres he reigned: and then dying, left the Crowne to Ela his sonne; who enioyed it, as Nadab the sonne of Ieroboam had done, two yeeres currant, perhaps not one compleat.

Ela was as much an idolater as his father: and withall a riotous person. Hee sent an Armie against Gibbethon, the same Towne of the Philistims, before which Nadab the son of Ieroboam perished; but he sat at home the whilest, feasting and drinking with his Minions, whereby he gaue such aduantage against himselfe, as was not neglected. Zimri, an ambitious man, remaining with the King at Tirza, finding his Master so dissolute, and his behauiour so contemptible, conceiued hope of the like fortune as Baasha had found, by doing as Baasha had done. Wherefore he did set vpon Ela in his drunkennesse, and slue him. Presently vpon which fact, he stiled himselfe King of Israel: and began his reigne with massacring all the house of Baasha; extending his cruelty not onely to his children, and kinsfolke, but vnto all his friends in Tirza. These newes were quickly blowne to the Campe at Gibbethon, where they were not welcommed according to Zimri his expectation. For the Souldiers instead of proclaiming him King, proclaimed him Traitor: and being led by Omri, whom they saluted King, they (quitted the siege of Gibbethon) presented themselues before Tirza; which in short space they may seeme to haue forced. Zimri wanting strength to defend the Citie, not courage to keepe himselfe from falling aliue into his enemies hands, did set fire on the Palace, consuming it and himselfe together to ashes. Seauen dayes he is said to haue reigned: accounting (as is most likely) to the time that Omri was proclaimed in the Campe. For Zimri was also 1 Kings 16. 19. an idolater, walking in the way of Ieroboam; and therefore is likly to haue had more time wherein to declare himselfe, than the reigne of seauen dayes, and those consumed partly in murthering the friends of Baasha, partly in seeking to haue defended his owne life. After the death of Ela, there arose another King to oppose the faction of Omri; whereby it may seeme, that Zimri had made his party strong, as being able to set vp a new head, who doubtlesse would neuer haue appeared, if there had not beene ready to his hand, some strength, not vnlikely to resist and vanquish the Army which maintained Omri. How long this Tibni, the new Competitor of Omri, held out, I doe not finde; onely it appeares that his side was decayed, and so he died, leauing no other Successor than his concurrent.

§. VI.

A coniecture of the causes hindering the reunion of Israel with Iuda, which might haue beene effected by these troubles.

ANy man that shall consider the state of Israel in those times, may iustly wonder how it came to passe, that either the whole Nation, wearied with the calamities already suffered vnder these vnfortunate Princes, and with the present ciuill warres, did not returne to their ancient Kings, and reunite themselues with the mighty Tribes of Iuda and Beniamin; or that Zimri and Tibni, with their oppressed factions, did not call in Asa, but rather chose the one to endure a desperate necessity of yeelding, or burning himselfe, the other to languish away, a man forsaken: than to haue recourse vnto a remedy, so sure, so ready, and so honourable. To say that God was pleased to haue it so, were a true, but an idle answere (for his secret will is the cauſe of all things) vnleſſe it could be proued, that he had forbidden Aſa to deale in that buſineſſe, as he forbad Rehoboam to force the rebellious people to obedience. That the reſtraint laid by God vpon Rehoboam, did onely binde his hands from attempting the ſuppreſſion of that preſent inſurrection, it appeares by the Warre continued betweene Iſrael and Iuda, ſo many yeeres following: wherein Abia ſo farre preuailed, that he wan a great battaile, and recouered ſome Townes belonging to the other Tribes, which he annexed to his owne Dominion. Wherefore we may boldly looke into the ſecond cauſes, mouing the People and Leaders of the ten Tribes, to ſuffer any thing vnder new vpſtarts, rather than to caſt their eyes vpon that Royall houſe of Dauid, from which the ſucceſſion of fiue Kings in lineall deſcent, had taken away all imputation, that might formerly haue beene laid vpon the meane beginnings thereof. To thinke that Omri had preuented his Competitors, in making peace with Aſa, were a coniecture more bold than probable. For Omri was not onely an Idolater, but did worſe than all that were before him; which as it might ſerue alone to proue, that Aſa, being a godly King, would not adhere to him, ſo the courſe which he profeſſed to take at the very firſt, of reuenging the maſſacre committed vpon the family and friends of Baaſha, (Aſa his mortall enemy) giues manifeſt reaſon, why Zimri, who had wrought that great execution, ſhould more iuſtly than he haue expected the friendſhip of Iuda in that quarrell. Wherefore, in ſearching out the reaſon of this backwardneſſe in the ten Tribes (which was ſuch that they may ſeeme to haue neuer thought vpon the matter) to ſubmit themſelues to their true Princes; it were not amiſſe to examine the cauſes, mouing the people to reuenge the death of Ela, an idle drunkard, rather than of Nadab the ſon of Ieroboam, who followed the wars in perſon, as a man of ſpirit and courage. Surely it is apparant, that the very firſt defection of the ten Tribes, was (if we looke vpon humane reaſon) occaſioned by deſire of breaking that heauie yoke of bondage wherewith Salomon had galled their neckes. Their deſire was to haue a King that ſhould not oppreſſe them; not to haue no King at all. And therefore when the arrogant folly of Rehoboam had cauſed them to renounce him, they did immediatly chooſe Ieroboam in his ſtead, as a man likely to affoord that liberty vnto them, for which he had contended in their behalfe. Neither were they (as it ſeemes) herein altogether deceiued. For his affectation of popularity appeares in his building of decayed Townes, and in the inſtitution of his new deuiſed idolatry; where he told the people, that it was too much for them, to trauaile ſo farre as to Ieruſalem. But whether it were ſo, that his moderation, being voluntary, began to ceaſe, towards the latter end of his reigne, and in the reigne of his ſonne, when long time of poſſeſſion had confirmed his title, which at the firſt was onely good by courteſie of the people: or whether the people (as often happens in ſuch caſes) were more offended by ſome prerogatiues of a King that he ſtill retained in his owne hands, than pleaſed with his remiſſion of other burdens: it is cleerely apparant, that the whole armie of all Iſrael ioyned with Baaſha, taking in good part the death of Nadab, and eradication of Ieroboams houſe.

1 Kings 16. 25.

Now the reigne of Baaſha himſelfe, was (for ought that remaineth in writing of it) euery way vnfortunate; his labour and coſt at Rama was caſt away; the other ſide of his Kingdome harried by the Syrians; neither did he win that one towne of Gibbethon from the Philiſtims, but left that buſineſſe to his ſonne, who likewiſe appeares an vnprofitable ſluggard. Wherefore it muſt needes be, that the fauour of the people toward the houſe of Baaſha grew from his good forme of Ciuill gouernment, which happely he reduced to a more temperate method than Ieroboam euer meant to doe. And ſurely he that ſhall take pains to looke into thoſe examples, which are extant of the different courſes, held by the Kings of Iſrael and Iuda, in adminiſtration of iuſtice, will finde it moſt probable, that vpon this ground it was that the ten Tribes continued ſo auerſe from the line of Dauid; as to thinke all aduerſity more tolerable, than the weightie Scepter of that houſe. For the death of Ioab and Shimei was indeede by them deſerued; yet in that they ſuffered it without forme of iudgement, they ſuffered like vnto men innocent. The death of Adonijah was both without iudgement, and without any crime obiected, other than the Kings iealouſie: out of which by the ſame rule of arbitrary iuſtice (vnder which it may be ſuppoſed that many were caſt away) hee would haue ſlaine Ieroboam (if hee could haue caught him) before he had yet committed any offence, as appeares by his confident returne out of Ægypt, like one that was knowne to haue endured wrong, hauing not offered any.

The like and much more barbarous execution, to wit, without law, Iehoram did vpon his brethren, and vpon ſundry of his greateſt men; as alſo Ioaſh did ſo put to death Zachariah, the ſonne of Iehoiada, who had made him King, euen in the court of the houſe of the Lord: and Manaſſes did ſhed innocent bloud exceeding much, till he repleniſhed Ieruſalem from corner to corner: and this was imputed to him as another fault; beſide his ſinne, wherewith he made Iuda to ſinne. Contrariwiſe, among the kings of Iſrael we finde no monument of ſuch arbitrary proceeding, vnleſſe perhaps the words of Iehoram the ſonne of Ahab (which were but words) may be taken for an inſtance, when he ſaid, God doe ſo to me, and more alſo, if the head of Eliſha the ſonne of Shaphat ſhall ſtand on him this day: whereby it is not plaine whether he meant to kill him without more adoe, or to haue him condemned as a falſe Prophet, that had made them hold out againſt the Aramites, till they were faine to eate their owne children; which he thought a ſufficient argument to proue, that it was not Gods purpoſe to deliuer them. The death of Naboth ſheweth rather the liberty which the Iſraelites enioyed, than any peremptory execution of the Kings will. For Naboth did not feare to ſtand vpon his owne right, though Ahab were euen ſicke for anger; neither was he for that cauſe put to death, as vpon commandement, but made away by conſpiracie, the matter being handled after a iudiciall forme, which might giue ſatisfaction to the people, ignorant of the deuice, though to God it could not.

2 Chro. 24. 21. 2 King. 21. 16. 2 King. 6. 31.

The murther of the Prophet is continually aſcribed to Iezabel, an impudent woman, and not vnto the King her husband. Neither is it certaine, that there was no Law made whereby their liues were taken from them; but certaine it is, that the people, being idolaters, were both pleaſed with their death, and laboured in the execution. So that the doings of the Kings of Iuda (ſuch as are regiſtred) proue them to vſe a more abſolute manner of command, than the Kings of the ten Tribes. Neither doe their ſufferings witneſſe the contrary. For of thoſe which reigned ouer Iuda, from the diuiſion of the Kingdome, to the captiuity of the ten Tribes, three were ſlaine by the people, and two were denied a buriall amongſt their anceſtors. Yea, the death of Ahazia and his brethren, ſlaine by Iehu, with the deſtruction of all the Royall ſeede of Athalia, did not (for ought that we can reade) ſtirre vp in the people any ſuch thirſt of reuenge, as might by the ſuddenneſſe and vniformity teſtifie the affection to be generall, and proceeding from a louing remembrance of their Princes; vnleſſe we ſhould thinke that the death of Athalia, after ſeauen yeeres reigne, were occaſioned rather by the memory of her ill purchaſing, than by the preſent ſence of her tyrannicall abuſing the gouernment, whereon ſhe had ſeiſed. On the other ſide, ſuch of the Kings of Iſrael as periſhed by treaſon (which were ſeauen of the twenty) were all ſlaine by conſpiracie of the great men, who aſpired by treaſon to the Crowne: the people being ſo farre from embruing their hands in the bloud of their Soueraignes, that (after Nadab) they did neuer forbeare to reuenge the death of their Kings, when it lay in their power; nor approue the good ſucceſſe of treaſon, vnleſſe feare compelled them. So that the death of two Kings, being throughly reuenged vpon other two, namely the death of Ela and Zacharia, vpon Zimri and Shallum, who traiterouſly got and vſurped, for a little while, their places; onely three of the ſeauen remaine, whoſe ends how the people tooke, it may be doubtfull. Though indeede it is preciſely ſaid of the ſlaughter, committed on Ahabs children by Iehu, that the people durſt not fight with him that did it, becauſe they were exceedingly afraid: and the ſame feare might be in them at the death of Peka, whoſe hiſtory (as others of that time) is curſorily paſſed ouer. The like may be pronounced, and more abſolutely, of the Kings of England, that neuer any of them periſhed by fury of the people, but by treaſon of ſuch as did ſucceed them; neither was there any motiue vrging ſo forcibly the death of King Edward and King Richard when they were in priſon, as feare leſt the people ſhould ſtirre in their quarrell. And certainely (howſoeuer all that the Law cals treaſon, be interpreted, as tending finally to the Kings deſtruction) in thoſe treaſonable inſurrections of the vulgar, which haue here moſt preuailed, the furie of the multitude hath quenched it ſelfe with the bloud of ſome great Officers; no ſuch rebellions, howſoeuer wicked and barbarous otherwiſe, thirſting after the ruine of their naturall Soueraigne, but rather forbearing the aduantages gotten vpon his Royall perſon: which if any man impute vnto groſſe ignorance, another may more charitably, and I thinke, more truely, aſcribe to a reuerent affection. Wherefore that fable of Briareus,

who, being loosened by Pallas, did with his hundred hands giue assistance to Iupiter, when all the rest of the gods conspired against him, is very fitly expounded by Sir Francis Bacon, as signifying, that Monarches need not to feare any courbing of their absolutenes by mightie subiects, as long as by wisedome they keepe the hearts of the people, who will be sure to come in on their side. Though indeed the Storie might very well haue borne the same interpretation, as it is rehearsed by Homer, who tells vs that Pallas was one of the conspiracie, and that Thetis alone did marre all their practice, by loosening Briareus. For a good forme of gouernment sufficeth by it selfe to retaine the people, not onely without assistance of a laborious Wit, but euen against all deuices of the greatest and shrewdest politicians: euery Sherife and Constable, being sooner able to arme the multitude, in the Kings behalfe, than any ouer-weening Rebell how mightie soeuer, can against him.

This declaration of the peoples loue, being seldome found in Iuda, makes it very likely, that the rule it selfe of gouernment there was such, as neither gaue occasion of contentment vnto the subiects, nor of confidence in their good affection to the Kings. Vpon which reasons it may seeme that the multitude was kept vsually disarmed. For otherwise it would haue beene almost impossible, that Athalia the sister of Ahab, a stranger to the royall bloud of Iuda, should by the onely authoritie of a Queene mother haue destroyed all the seed of Dauid, and vsurped the Kingdome very neere 7. yeeres, without finding any resistance. Yea when Iehoiada the high Priest had agreed with the Captains and principall men of the Land to set vp Ioash their lawfull King, whereunto the whole nation were generally well affected; hee was faine to giue to these Captaines and their men, the speares and the shields that were King Dauids, and were in the house of the Lord. But we need not enter into such particulars. Questionlesse, the Tribes which thought obedience to their Princes to be a part of their dutie toward God, would endure much more with patience, than they which had Kings of their owne choice or admission, holding the Crowne by a more vncertaine tenure.

And this, in my opinion, was the reason, why the ten Tribes did neuer seek to returne to their ancient Lords: but after the destruction of their sixe first Kings, which died in the reigne of Asa, admitted a seuenth of a new familie, rather than they would consubiect themselues, with those of Iuda and Beniamin, vnder a more honourable, but more heauie yoke.

So Asa hauing seene the death of 7. kings of Israel, died himselfe after one and fortie yeeres reigne, leauing Iehosaphat his sonne to deale with Ahab the sonne of Omri, who was the eight King ouer the tenne Tribes.

Of Iehosaphat and his contemporaries.

Iehosaphat, who succeeded Asa, was a Prince religious and happie; he destroyed all the Groues, Altars, and high places dedicated to idolatrie, and sent teachers to all places and people wanting instruction; he recouered the tribute due vnto him by the Arabians and Philistims: from the one hee had siluer, from the other sheepe and goates to the number of fifteene thousand and foure hundred. The numbers of men of warre were more then admirable: for it is written that Adnah had the command of three hundred thousand, Iehohanan of two hundred and fourescore thousand, and Amasia of two hundred thousand; also that hee had, besides these, in Beniamin of those that bare shields, which wee call Targetiers, and of Archers vnder Eliada, two hundred thousand, and vnder the commandement of Iehozabad a hundred and fourescore thousand: which numbred together, make eleuen hundred and sixtie thousand, all which are said to haue waited vpon the King, besides his garrisons. 2. Chron. 17.

That Iuda and Beniamin, a territorie not much exceeding the Counte of Kent, should muster eleuen hundred and sixtie thousand fighting men, it is very strange, and the number farre greater than it was found vpon any other view. Ioab in Dauids time found fiue hundred thousand: Rehoboam found but an hundred and fourescore thousand: Abia foure hundred and eight thousand: Asa fiue hundred and fourescore thousand: Amaziah inrolled all that could beare armes, and they amounted to three hundred thousand. Surelie, whereas it is written that when newes was brought to Iehosaphat that Moab & Ammon 2. Sam. 24.4.

were entred his territorie to the West of Iordan, and that their numbers were many, hee feared (to wit) the multitude, it is not likely that he would haue feared euen the armie of Xerxes, if hee could haue brought into the field 11. hundred and 60. thousand fighting men, leauing all his strong Cities manned. I am therefore of opinion (referring my selfe to better iudgement) that these numbers specified in the second of Chronicles the 17. distributed to seuerall Leaders, were not all at one time, but that the 300. thousand vnder Adnah, and the 200. and foure-score thousand vnder Iehohanam, were afterward commanded and mustered by Amasiah, Eliada, and Iehosabad: for the grosse and totall is not in that place set downe, as it was vnder the other Kings formerly named. Againe, as the aydes which Iehosaphat brought to Ahab did not shew that hee was a Prince of extraordinarie power, so the Moabites and Ammonites which hee feared, could neuer make the one halfe of those numbers, which he that commanded least among Iehoshaphats Leaders had vnder him.

This mightie Prince notwithstanding his greatnesse, yet he ioyned in friendship with Ahab King of Israel, who had married that wicked woman Iezabel. Him Iosaphat visited at Samaria, and caused his sonne Ioram to marry Athalia, this Achabs daughter.

Ahab perswaded Iosaphat to assist him in the Warre against the Syrians, who held the Citie of Ramoth Gilead from him, and called together foure hundred of his Prophets, or Baalites to foretell the successe: who promised him victorie. But Iehosaphat beleeued nothing at all in those diuiners, but resolued first of all to conferre with some one Prophet of the Lord God of Israel. Hereupon Achab made answere that he had one called Michaiah, but he hated that Prophet, because hee alwaies foretold of euill, and neuer of any good towards him. Yet Michaiah was sent for to the King, but by the way the messenger prayed him to consent with the rest of the Prophets: and to promise victory vnto them as they did. But Michaiah spake the truth, and repeated his vision to both the Kings, which was, that God asked who shall perswade Ahab, that hee may goe vp and fall at Ramoth Gilead? to whom a spirit that stood before the Lord answered, that hee would enter into his Prophets, and be in them a false spirit to delude. For as it is said by Christ: Non enim vos estis qui loquimini, sed spiritus patris vestri loquitur in vobis: It is not you that speake, but the Spirit of your Father speakes in you: so in a contrary kinde did the deuill in the Prophets of Baal, or Satan, incourage Achab to his destruction. And as P. Martyr vpon this place well obserueth, these euill spirits are ministers of Gods vengeance, and are vsed as the hangmen and tormentors, which Princes sometime imploy. For as it pleaseth God by his good Angels, to saue and deliuer from destruction, of which the Scriptures haue many examples: so on the contrarie, it is by the euill that hee punisheth and destroyeth, both which are said to performe the will of their Creator, licet non eodem animo. Ecclesiasticus remembreth a second sort of malignant natures, but they are euery-where visible. There are spirits, saith he, created for vengeance, which in their rigour lay on sure stroakes. In the time of destruction they shew foorth their power, and accomplish the wrath of him that made them.

Now Michaias hauing by this his reuelation greatly displeased the King, and the Prophets whose spirit he discouered, was strooken by Zidkiah one of Baals Prophets, and by Achab himselfe committed to prison: where he appointed him to be reserued and fedde with bread of affliction till he returned in peace. But Michaiah, not fearing to reply, answered, If thou returne in peace, the Lord hath not spoken by mee. Neuertheless Achab went on in that warre, and was wounded to death. Iehosaphat returned to Ierusalem, where he was reprehended by Iehu the Prophet for assisting an idolatrous Prince, and
2. Chron. 18. one that hated God.

After this the Aramites or Damascens, ioyned with the Moabites, Ammonites and Idumeans to inuade Iudea: who passe Iordan and encampe at Engaddi, and when Iehosaphat gathered his armie, the Prophet Iahaziel foretold him of the victorie, which should bee obtained without any bloud-shed of his part: and so when Iehosaphat approached, this assembly of Nations, the Ammonites and Moabites, disagreeing with the Idumeans, and quarrelling for some causes among themselues, those of Ammon and Moab set vpon the Idumeans, and brake them vtterly: which done, they also inuaded each other; in which broile Iehosaphat arriuing tooke the spoyle of them all without any losse of his part, as it was foretold and promised by God. Notwithstanding this victorie, Iehosaphat arriuing,
2. Chron. 20. tooke the spoyle of them all, without any losse of his part, as it was foretold and promised miſed by God. Notwithſtanding this victory, Iehoſaphat forgetting that he was formerly reprehended for aſſiſting an Idolatrous King, did notwithſtanding ioyne with Ochazias, the ſonne of Achab, in preparing a Fleet to ſend to Ophir, hoping of the like return which Salomon had: but as Eliezer the Prophet foretold him, his ſhips periſhed, and were broken in the port of Ezion Gaber, and ſo that enterprize was ouerthrowne. 2. Chron 20.

Yet hee taketh part with Iehoram the brother of Ochazias, againſt the Moabites, with which Kings of Iuda and Iſrael the Edomites ioyne their forces, not forgetting, it ſeemes, that the Moabites aſſiſted by the Ammonites, had not long before deſtroyed their armie.

The Moabites, ſubiects to Dauid & Salomon, forſaking the Kings of Iuda, gaue themſelues for vaſſals to Ieroboam, and ſo they continued to his ſucceſſors till the death of Achab: but Iehoſaphat, notwithſtanding the Idolatry of his Colleague, yet as it ſeemeth, he was drawne into this warre both to be auenged of the Moabites for their defection from Iuda to Iſrael, as alſo becauſe they had lately ioyned themſelues with the Syrians againſt Ioſaphat, & thirdly, to puniſh their double rebellion who firſt forſooke Iuda & now Iſrael.

Both Kings reſolued to paſſe by the way of Idumæa, thereby the better to aſſure that Nation, for we finde that both Moab, Ammon and Edom were all in the field together at Engaddi againſt Iehoſaphat: But whether they had then declared themſelues againſt Iehoſaphat, it is not certaine, for in the 2. of Chronicles. 11. verſ. 8. it is written that in the time of Iehoram, the ſonne of Iehoſaphat, Edom rebelled, and therefore it ſeemeth to mee that the Edomites, when they were ſlaine by Moab and Ammon, not finding themſelues ſatisfied in ſuch conditions as they required, offered to turne from them, and to ioyne themſelues with the armie of Iuda. For that they were numbred among the enemies of Ioſaphat, it is plaine in the 2. of Chron. the 20. and as plaine c. 2. v. 8. that they were not declared, nor had made them a King, till Iehoſaphats death. Now in the paſſage of theſe Kings towards Moab, whether it were by the extraordinarie heat of the yere, or whether the Idumeans hauing a purpoſe to rebell, miſled the armie of Iuda and Iſrael, with intent to infeeble them for want of water; true it is, that they ſuffered the ſame, if not a greater thirſt than the armies of Craſſus and M. Antonius did in their Parthian expeditions; and had, in all likelihood vtterly periſhed, had not Eliſha taught them to cut trenches whereinto the water ſprang, by which not onely Iehoſaphat and his armie, but Ioram King of Iſrael an Idolator was relieued: the great mercy and goodneſſe of God hauing euer bin prone to ſaue the euill for the good, whereas he neuer deſtroyed the good for the euill.

The miſerable iſſue of this warre, and how Moab burnt his ſonne, or the ſonne of the King of Edom, for ſacrifice on the rampire of his owne Citie, I haue already written in the life of Ioram among the Kings of Iſrael. Iehoſaphat raigned 25. yeeres and died, he was buried in the valley of Iehoſaphat, and a part of the Pyramis ſet ouer his graue is yet to be ſeene, ſaith Brochard. His acts are written at large by Iehu the ſonne of Hanani. 2. King. 3. 2. Chron 20. Broch. ter. ſanct.

There liued with Iehoſaphat, Ophratenes in Aſſyria, Capetus and Tiberinus Kings of the Albans in Italie; of the latter the riuer Tiber (formerly Albula) tooke name.

In Iehoſaphats time alſo ruled Mecades or Mezades in Athens: Agelas or Ageſilaus in Corinth; and Archilaus of the ſame race, of the Heraclide the ſeuenth in Lacedæmon. Badeſorus ruled the Tyrians; Achab, Ochazias and Ioram the Iſraelites.

CHAP. XX.

Of Iehoram the ſonne of Iehoſaphat and Ahazia.

§. I.

That Iehoram was made King ſundry times.

IEhoram the ſonne of Iehoſaphat King of Iuda began to raigne at thirtie two yeeres of age, and liued vntill he was fortie yeeres old, being eight yeeres a King: but of theſe eight yeeres, which Ioram is ſaid to haue reigned, foure are to be reckoned in the life of his father, who going to the Syrian warre with Ahab, left this Ioram King in his ſtead, as Ahab did his ſonne Ahazia. This appeares by the ſeuerall beginnings, which are giuen in Scripture to the two Iehorams Kings of Iſrael and Iuda, and to Ahazia the eldeſt ſonne of Ahab. For Ahazia is 1 Kin. 22. v. 51

said to haue begun his reigne, in the seuenteenth yeere of Iehoſaphat. Iehoram the brother
2. King.1.17. of Ahazia ſucceeded him in the ſecond yeere of Iehoram the ſonne of Iehoſaphat King of Iuda, that is, in the next yeere after that Iehoram of Iuda was deſigned King by his father;
2. King.3.v.1. and 9. it being (as we finde elſewhere) the eighteenth yeere of Iehoſaphat himſelfe, who went with the Iſraelite againſt Moab. Heereby it appeares that the full power and execution of the royall office was retained ſtill by Iehoſaphat, who gouerned abſolutely by himſelfe, not
2. King.8.16. communicating the rule with his ſonne. But in the fift yeere of Iehoram King of Iſrael, which was the two and twentieth of Iehoſaphat, the olde King tooke vnto him, as partner in the Gouernment, this his eldeſt ſonne, who was at that time 32. yeeres old, his Father being 57. Now foraſmuch as Iehoſaphat reigned 25. yeeres, it is euident that his ſonne
1. Kin.22.42. did not reigne alone till the eight of Ioram King of Iſrael. The like regard is to bee had in accounting the times of other Kings of Iuda & Iſrael, who did not alwaies reigne preciſely ſo long as the bare letter of the text may ſeeme at firſt to affirme: but their yeeres were ſometimes compleat; ſometimes onely current, ſometimes confounded with the yeeres of their ſucceſſors or foregoers, and muſt therefore be found by comparing their times with the yeeres of thoſe others, with whom they did begin and end.

It were perhaps a thing leſſe needfull than curious, to enquire into the reaſons mouing Iehoſaphat either to aſſume vnto him his ſonne as partner in the Kingdome, whileſt hee was able himſelfe to command both in peace and in warre, the like hauing neuer beene done by any of his progenitors, or hauing once (in the 17. of his reigne) vouchſafed vnto him that honour, to reſume it vnto himſelfe, or at leaſtwiſe to deferre the confirmation of it, vntill foure or fiue yeeres were paſſed. Yet foraſmuch as to enter into the examination of theſe paſſages, may be a meane to find ſome light, whereby we may more clearelie diſcouer the cauſes of much extraordinary buſineſſe enſuing, I hold it not amiſſe to make ſuch coniecture, as the circumſtances of the Story briefly handled in the Scriptures may ſeeme to approoue.

We are therefore to conſider, that this King Iehoſaphat was the firſt of Reboboams iſſue that euer entred into any ſtreight league with the Kings of the ten Tribes. All that reigned in Iuda before him, had with much labour and long warre, tired themſelues in vaine, making ſmall profit of the greateſt aduantages that could be wiſhed. Wherefore Iehoſaphat thought it the wiſeſt way, to make a league offenſiue and defenſiue betweene Iſrael and Iuda, whereby each might enioy their owne in quiet.

2. Chro.19.v. 2. and 3. This confederacie made by a religious King, with one that did hate the Lord, could not long proſper, as not iſſuing from the true roote and fountaine of all wiſedome: yet as a piece of ſound policie, doubtleſſe it wanted not faire pretences of much common good thereby likely to ariſe, with mutuall fortification of both thoſe kingdomes, againſt the vncircumciſed nations their ancient enemies. This apparant benefit, being ſo ineſtimable a iewell, that it might not eaſily be loſt, but continue as hereditarie from father to ſonne, it was thought a very good courſe to haue it confirmed by ſome ſure bond of affinitie, and thereupon was Athalia the daughter of Omri, and ſiſter of Ahab King of Iſrael, giuen in marriage to Iehoram, who was ſonne and heire apparent to the King of Iuda. This Lady was of a maſculine ſpirit, and had learned ſo much of Queene Iezabel her brothers wife, that ſhe durſt vndertake, and could throughly performe a great deale more in Ieruſalem, than the other knew how to compaſſe in Samaria. Shee was indeed a fire-brand, ordained by God to conſume a great part of the nobleſt houſes in Iuda, and perhaps of thoſe men or their children, whoſe worldly wiſedome, regardleſſe of Gods pleaſure, had brought her in.

The firſt fruits of this great league, was the Syrian warre at Ramoth Gilead, wherein Iuda and Iſrael did aduenture equally, but the profit of the victorie ſhould haue redounded wholly to Ahab: as godly Princes very ſeldome thriue by matching with Idolators, but rather ſeque the turnes of thoſe falſe friends, who being ill affected to God himſelfe, cannot be well affected to his ſeruants. Before their ſetting forth Ahab deſigned, as King, his ſonne Ahazia; not ſo much perhaps in regard of the vncertaine euents of warre (for none of his predeceſſors had euer done the like vpon the like occaſions) nor as fearing the threatnings of the Prophet Micaia (for hee deſpiſed them) as inuiting Iehoſaphat by his owne example, to take the ſame courſe, wherein he preuailed.

§. II. Pre-

§. II.

Probable coniectures of the motiues inducing the old King Iehosaphat to change his purpose often, in making his sonne Iehoram King.

MAny arguments doe very strongly proue Iehoram to haue been wholly ouer-ruled by his wife; especially for his forsaking the religion of his godly Ancestors, and following the abhominable superstitions of the house of Achab.

That she was a woman of intollerable pride, and abhorring to liue a priuate life, the whole course of her actions witnesseth at large. Much vaine matter she was able to produce, whereby to make her husband thinke that his brethren and kindred were but meane and vnworthy persons in comparison of him, and of his children, which were begotten vpon the daughter and sister of two great Kings, not vpon base women & meere subiects. The Court of Achab, and his famous victories obtained against the Syrian Benhadad, were matter sufficient to make an insolent man thinke highly of himselfe, as being allied so honourably; who could otherwise haue found in his heart well enough, to despise all his brethren, as being the eldest, and heire apparant to the Crowne, whereof alreadie he had, in a manner, the possession.

How soone his vices brake out, or how long he dissembled them and his idolatrous religion, it cannot certainely be knowne. Like enough it is, that some smoke, out of the hidden fire, did very soone make his fathers eyes to water; who thereupon caused the young man to know himselfe better, by making him fall backe into ranke among his yonger brethren. And surely the doings of Iehosaphat about the same time, argue no small distemper of the whole country, through the misgouernment of his vngodly son. For the good King was faine to make his progresse round about the Land, reclaiming the people vnto the seruice of God, and appointing Iudges throughout all the strong Cities of Iuda Citie by Citie. This had beene a needlesse labour, if the religion taught and strongly maintained by Asa, and by himselfe, had not suffered alteration, and the course of Iustice beene peruerted, by the power of such as had borne authoritie. But the necessitie that then was of reformation, appeares by the charge which the King did giue to the Iudges; and by his commission giuen to one of the Priests in spirituall causes, and to the steward of his house in temporall matters, to be generall ouerseers. 2. Chron 19. v. 4. 5. &c.

This was not till after the death of Ahazia the sonne of Achab; but how long after it is vncertaine. For Iehoram the brother of Ahazia began his reigne (as hath beene alreadie noted) in the eighteenth of Iehosaphat, which was then accounted the second of Iehoram, Iehosaphats sonne, though afterward this Iehoram of Iuda had another first and second yeere, euen in his fathers time, before hee reigned alone, as the best Chronologers and expositors of the holy text agree. So hee continued in priuate estate, vntill the two and twentieth of his fathers reigne, at which time, though the occasions inducing his restitution to former dignitie are not set downe, yet we may not thinke, that motiues thereto, appearing substantiall, were wanting. Iehoram of Israel held the same correspondencie with Iehosaphat that his father had done; and made vse of it. He drew the Iudean into the warre of Moab, at which time it might well be, that the young Prince of Iuda was againe ordained King by his father, as in the Syrian expedition he had beene. Or if wee ought rather to thinke, that the preparations for the enterprize against Moab did not occupie so much time, as from the eighteenth of Iehosaphat, in which yeere that Nation rebelled against Israel, vnto his two and twentieth, yet the daily negotiations betweene the two Kings of Iuda and Israel, and the affinitie betweene them contracted in the person of Iehoram, might offer some good occasions thereunto. Neither is it certaine how the behauiour of the yonger sonnes, in their elder brothers disgrace, might cause their Father to put him in possession for feare of tumult after his death; or the deepe dissimulation of Iehoram himselfe might winne the good opinion both of his Father and Brethren; it being a thing vsuall in mischieuous fell natures, to be as abiect and seruile in time of aduersitie, as insolent and bloudy vpon aduantage. This is manifest, that being repossessed of his former estate, he demeaned himselfe in such wise toward his brethren, as caused their Father to enable them, not onely with store of siluer and gold, and of pretious things, (which kind of liberalitie other Kings doubtlesse had vsed vnto their yonger sons) but with the custodie of strong Cities in Iuda, to assure them, if it might haue beene, by vnwonted meanes, against vnwonted perils. 2. Chron. 21. 3.

§. III. The

§. III.

The doings of Iehoram when he reigned alone; and the rebellion of Edom and Libna.

BVt all this prouidence auailed nothing; for an higher prouidence had otherwise determined of the sequele. When once the good olde man, their Father, was dead, the yonger sonnes of Iehosaphat found strong Cities, a weake defence, against the power of him vnto whom the Citizens were obedient. If they came in vpon the summons of a King their brother, then had he them without any more adoe; if they stood vpon their guard, then were they Traitors, and so vnable to hold out against him, who besides his owne power, was able to bring the forces of the Israelitish Kingdome against them; so that the apparent likelihood of their finall ouerthrow, sufficed to make all forsake them in the very beginning. Howsoeuer it was, they were all taken and slaine, and with them for company many great men of the Land; such belike, as eyther had taken their part, when the Tyrant sought their liues, or had beene appointed Rulers of the Countrie, when Iehoram was deposed from his Gouernment; in which Office they, without forbearing to doe iustice, could hardly auoyd the doing of many things derogatorie to their yong Master; which if he would now call treason, saying that hee was then King, who durst say the contrary?

After this Iehoram tooke vpon him, as being now Lord alone, to make innouations in Religion: wherein he was not contented as other Idolatrous Princes, to giue way and safe conduct vnto Superstition and Idolatrie, nor to prouoke and encourage the people to that sinne, whereto it is wonderfull that they were so much addicted, hauing such knowledge of God, and of his detesting that aboue all other sinnes; but hee vsed compulsion, and was (if not the very first) the first that is registred, to haue set vp Irreligion by force.

Whilest he was thus busied at home, in doing what he listed, the Edomites his Tributaries rebelled against him abroad, and hauing hitherto, since Dauids time, beene gouerned by a Viceroy, did now make vnto themselues a King. Against these Iehoram in person made an expedition, taking along with him his Princes, and all his Chariots, with which he obtained victory in the field, compelling the rebels to flie into their places of aduantage, whereof he forced no one, but went away contented with the honour that he had gotten in beating and killing some of those whom hee should haue subdued, and kept his seruants. Now began the prophecie of Isaac to take effect, wherein he foretold, that Esau in processe of time should breake the yoke of Iacob. For after this the Edomites could neuer be reclaimed by any of the Kings of Iuda, but held their owne so well, that when, after many ciuill and forraine warres, the Iewes by sundry Nations had beene brought low; Antipater the Edomite, with Herod his Son, and others of that race following them, became Lords of the Iewes, in the decrepit age of Israel, and reigned as Kings, euen in Ierusalem it selfe.

The freedome of the Edomites, though purchased somewhat dearely, encouraged Libna, a great Citie within Iuda, which in the time of Iosua had a peculiar King, to rebell against Iehoram, and set it selfe at libertie. Libna stood in the confines of Beniamin and of Dan, farre from the assistance of any bordering enemies to Iuda, and therefore so vnlikelie it was to haue maintained it selfe in libertie, that it may seeme strange how it could escape from vtter destruction, or at the least from some terrible vengeance, most likely to haue beene taken, by their powerfull, cruell, and throughly incensed Lord. The Israelite held such good intelligence at that time with Iuda, that hee would not haue accepted the Towne, had it offered it selfe vnto him: neither doe wee reade that it sought how to cast it selfe into a new subiection, but continued a free estate. The rebellion of it against Iehoram, was, Because he had forsaken the Lord God of his Fathers; which I take to haue not onely beene the first and remote cause, but euen the next and immediate reason, mouing the inhabitants to doe as they did: for it was a Towne of the Leuites: who must needs be driuen into great extremities, when a religion contrarie to Gods Law, had not onely some allowance to countenance it by the King, but compulsiue authoritie to force vnto it all that were vnwilling. As for the vse of the Temple at Ierusalem (which, beeing deuout men, they might feare to lose by this rebellion) it was neuer denied to those of the ten ten reuolted Tribes by any of the Religious Kings, who rather inuited the Iſraelites thither, and gaue them kinde entertainment: vnder Idolaters they muſt haue beene without it, whether they liued free or in ſubiection. Yet it ſeemes that priuate reaſons were not wanting, which might moue them rather to doe than ſuffer that which was vnwarrantable. For in the generall viſitation before remembred; wherein Iehoſaphat reformed his Kingdome, the good olde King appointing new Gouernours, and giuing them eſpeciall charge to doe iuſtice without reſpect of perſons, vſed theſe words, The Leuites ſhall be Officers before you; Be of good courage, and doe it, and the Lord ſhall be with the good. By theſe phraſes, it ſeemes, that he encouraged them againſt the more powerfull, than iuſt proceedings of his ſon; whom if the Leuites did (according to the truſt repoſed in them) neglect in diſcharging their dueties, likely it is that he meant to be euen with them, and make them now to feele, as many Princes of the Land had done, his heauy indignation. How it happened that Libna was not heereupon deſtroyed, yea, that it was not (for ought that we can read) ſo much as beſieged or moleſted, may iuſtly ſeeme very ſtrange. And the more ſtrange it is in regard of the mighty Armies which Iehoſaphat was able to raiſe, being ſufficient to haue ouer-whelmed any one Towne, and buried it vnder the earth, which they might well in one moneth haue caſt into it with ſhouels, by ordinary approaches. 2 Chr. 19. 3

But it ſeemes that of thoſe great numbers which his Father could haue leuied, there were not many whom Iehoram could well truſt; and therefore perhaps hee thought it an eaſier loſſe, to let one Towne goe, than to put weapons into their hands, who were more likely to follow the example of Libna, than to puniſh it. So deſperate is the condition of Tyrants, who thinking it a greater happineſſe to be feared, than to bee loued; are faine themſelues to ſtand in feare of thoſe; by whom they might haue beene dreadfull vnto others.

§. IIII.

Of the miſeries falling vpon Iehoram, and of his death.

THeſe afflictions not ſufficing to make any impreſſion of God diſpleaſure in the minde of the wicked Prince; a Prophecie in writing was deliuered vnto him, which threatned both his people, his children, his wiues, and his owne bodie. Hereby likewiſe it appeares that he was a cruell Perſecutor of Gods ſeruants; in as much as the Prophets durſt not reproue him to his face, as they had done many of his predeceſſors, both good and euill Kings; but were faine to denounce Gods iudgements againſt him by letters; keeping themſelues cloſe and farre from him. This Epiſtle is ſaide to haue beene ſent vnto him from Elias the Prophet. But Elias was tranſlated, and Elizeus prophecied in his ſtead before this time, euen in the dayes of Iehoſaphat. Wherefore it may bee that Elias left this prophecie in writing behinde him, or that (as ſome coniecture) the errour of one letter in writing, was the occaſion that wee reade Elias for Elizeus. Indeed any thing may rather be beleeued than the Tradition held by ſome of the Iewiſh Rabbins, that Elias from heauen did ſend this Epiſtle; a tale ſomewhat like to the fable of our Ladies letters, deuiſed by Eraſmus, or of the Verſe that was ſent from heauen to S. Giles. 2 Chron. 21. 12. 2 Kin. c. 2. and c. 3. v. 11.

But whoſoeuer was the Author of this threatning Epiſtle, the accompliſhment of the prophecie was as terrible, as the ſentence. For the Philiſtims and Arabians brake into Iudea, and tooke the Kings houſe, wherein they found all, or many of his children, and wiues; all which they ſlew, or carried away, with great part of his goods. Theſe Philiſtims had not preſumed ſince the time of Dauid, to make any offenſiue warre till now; for they were by him almoſt conſumed, and had loſt the beſt of their Townes, maintaining themſelues in the reſt of their ſmall Territories, by defenſiue armes, to which they were conſtrained at Gibbethon by the Iſraelites. The Arabians were likely to haue beene then as they are now, a naked people, all horſemen, and ill appointed; their Countrie affording no other furniture, than ſuch as might make them fitter to rob and ſpoile in the open fields, than to offend ſtrong Cities ſuch as were thicke ſet in Iuda. True it is that in ages long after following, they conquered all the South parts of the world then knowne, in a very ſhort ſpace of time, deſtroying ſome, and building other ſome very ſtately Cities. But it muſt be conſidered; that this was when they had learned of the Romanes the Art of Warre; and that the Prouisions which they found, together with the Arts which they learned, in one subdued Prouince, did make them able and skilfull in pursuing their conquest, and going on into Regions farre remooued from them. At this day hauing lost in effect all that they had gotten, such of them as liue in Arabia it selfe are good horsemen, but ill appointed; very dangerous passengers, but vnable to deale with good Souldiers, as riding starke naked, and rather trusting in the swiftnesse of their horses, than in any other meanes of resistance, where they are well opposed. And such, or little better, may they seeme to haue beene, that spoyled Iudæa in the time of Ieboram. For their Countrie was alwaies barren and desert, wanting manuall Arts whereby to supply the naturalls with furniture: neither are these bands named as chiefe in that action, but rather adherents of the Philistims. Out of this we may inferre, that one halfe, yea or one quarter of the numbers found in the least muster of Iuda and Beniamin vnder Iehosaphat (wherein were inrolled three hundred and eightie thousand fighting men) had been enough to haue driuen away far greater forces than these enemies are likely to haue brought into the field, had not the people beene vnable to deale with them, for lacke of weapons, which were now kept from them by their Princes iealousie, as in Sauls time by the policie of the Philistims.

It may seeme that the house of the King which these inuaders tooke, was not his Palace in Ierusalem, but rather some other house of his abroad in the Countrie, where his wiues and children at that time lay for their recreation: because we reade not that they did sacke the Citie, or spoyle the Temple, which would haue inuited them as a more commodious bootie, had they got possession thereof. Yet perhaps they tooke Ierusalem it selfe by surprize, the people being disarmed, and the Kings guards too weake to keepe them out; yet had not the courage to hold it, because it was so large and populous; and therefore hauing done what spoyle they could, with-drew themselues with such purchase as they were able safely to conueigh away.

The slaughter commmitted by Iehu on the two and fortie brethren of Ahazia, or (as they are called elsewhere) so many of his brothers sonnes, and the cruell massacre wherein all the Royall seede perished (onely Ioas excepted) vnder the tyrannie of Athalia, following within two yeeres after this inuasion of the Philistims, and Arabians, make it seeme probable, that the sonnes of Ieboram were not all slaine at once, but that rather the first murther beganne in his owne time, and was seconded by many other heauie blowes, wherewith his house was incessantly striken, vntill it was in a manner quite hewed downe.

After these calamities, the hand of God was extended against the bodie of this wicked King, smiting him with a grieuous disease in his bowels, which left him not vntill his guts fell out, and his wretched soule departed from his miserable carcasse. The people of the Land, as they had small cause of comfort in his life, so had they not the good manners to pretend sorrow for his death; wherefore hee was denied a place of buriall among his Ancestors the Kings of Iuda, though his owne sonne succeeded him in the Kingdome, who was guided by the same spirits that had beene his Fathers euill Angels. Athalia had other matters to trouble her head, than the pompous enterring of a dead husband. Shee was thinking how to prouide for the future, to maintaine her owne greatnesse, to retaine her fauourites in their authoritie, and to place about her
2. Chron. 24. 4. Sonne such Counsellours of the house of Ahab, as were fittest for her turne. Wherefore shee thought it vnseasonable to make much a-doe about a thing of nothing, and offend the peoples eyes, with a stately funerall of a man by them detested: but rather chose to let the blame of things passed be layd vpon the dead, than to procure an ill opinion of her selfe and hers, which it now did concerne her to auoid. Such is the qualitie of wicked Instigators, hauing made greedie vse of bad imployments, to charge, not only with his owne vices, but with their faults also, the man whose euill inclinations their sinister counsailes haue made worse, when once he is gone, and can profit them no longer. The death of Ieboram fel out indeed in a busie time; when his friend and cousin the Israelite, who had the same name, was entangled in a difficult warre against the Aramite; and therefore could haue had no better leysure to help Athalia, in setting of things according to her owne minde, than hee had (perhaps through the same hinderance) to helpe her husband, when hee was distressed by the Philistims. Yea rather hee needed and craued the assistance of the men of Iuda, for the taking in of Ramoth Gilead, where they had not sped so well the last time, that they should willingly runne thither againe, vnlesse they were very fairely intreated.

The acts of this wicked man I haue thought good to handle the more particularly (pursuing the examination of all occurrences, as farre as the circumstances remembred in holy Scripture, would guide mee by their directions) to the end that it might more plainely appeare, how the corrupted affections of men, impugning the reuealed will of God, accomplish neuertheless his hidden purpose, and without miraculous meanes, confound themselues in the seeming-wise deuices of their owne folly: as likewise to the end that all men might learne, to submit their iudgements to the ordinance of God, rather than to thinke, that they may safely dispense with his commandements, and follow the prudent conceits which worldly wisedome dictateth vnto them. For in such kinde of vnhappie subtilties, it is manifest that Athalia was able to furnish both her Husband and her Sonne; but the issue of them partly hath appeared already, and partly will appeare, in that which immediately followeth.

§. V.

Of the reigne of Ahazia, and his businesse with the King of Israel.

Chazias, or Ahazia, the sonne of Iehoram and Athalia, began his reigne ouer Iuda in the twelfth yeere of Iehoram the sonne of Ahab King of Israel, and reigned but one yeere. Touching his age, it is a point of much more difficultie than importance to know it; yet hath it bredde much disputation, whereof I see no more probable conclusion, than that of Torniellus, alleaging the Edition of the Septuagint at Rome, Anno Domini 1588. which saith that hee was twentie yeeres olde in the beginning of his Kingdome; and the Annotations thereupon, which cite other Copies, that doe giue him two yeeres more. Like enough he is to haue beene young: for hee was gouerned by his Mother, and her Ministers, who gaue him counsaile by which hee perished. In matter of Religion hee altered none of his Fathers courses. In matter of state, hee likewise vp-held the league made with the house of Ahab. He was much busied in doing little, and that with ill successe. He accompanied his Cousin the Israelite against Ramoth Gilead, which they wan, but not without blowes: for the Aramites fought so well, that the King of Israel was faine to aduenture his owne person, which scaped not vnwounded.

The Towne being won was manned strongly, in expectation of some attempt likely to be made by Hazael king of Aram: which done, Iehoram King of Israel with-drew himselfe to the Citie of Izreel, where with more quiet he might attend the curing of his wounds; and Ahazia returned to Ierusalem. It seemes that he was but newly come home (for he reigned in all scantly one yeere, whereof the former expedition, with the preparations for it, had taken vp a great part,) when he did make a new iourney, as it were for good manners sake, to visit the King of Israel, who lay sore of his wounds. Belike Athalia was brewing some new plots, which his presence would haue hindered, and therefore sought euery occasion to thrust him abroad: for otherwise it was but a vaine piece of worke so to leaue his kingdome, hauing no other businesse than by way of complement to goe see one whom he had seene yesterday. Certaine it is that the Lord had resolued at this time to put in execution that heauie iudgement, which he had laid by the mouth of Elias the Prophet vpon the house of Ahab. And hereunto at this time had he disposed not onely the concurrence of all other things, which in mans eyes might seeme to haue beene accidentall; but the very thoughts and affections of such persons, as intended nothing lesse than the fulfilling of his high pleasure. Of these Athalia doubtlesse was one; whose mischieuous purposes it will shortly be needefull for explanation of some difficulties arising, that we diligently consider and examine.

§. VI.

How Ahazia perished with the house of Ahab: and how that Familie was destroyed by Iehu.

THe whole Armie of Israel, with all the principall Captaines lying in Ramoth Gilead, a Disciple of Elizeus the Prophet came in among the Captaines that were sitting together; who calling out among them Iehu, a principall man, tooke him apart, and anointed him King ouer Israel, rehearsing vnto him the Prophecie of Elias against the house of Ahab, and letting him vnderstand that it was the pleasure of God to make him executioner of that sentence. The fashion of the Messenger was such as bredde in the Captaines a desire to know the errand, which Iehu thought meet to let them know, as doubting whether they had ouer-heard all the talke or no. When hee had acquainted them with the whole matter, they made no delay, but forth-with proclaimed him King. For the Prophecie of Elias was well knowne among them, neither durst any one oppose himselfe against him, that was by God ordained to performe it.

Iehu, who had vpon the sudden this great honour throwne vpon him, was not slow to put himselfe in possession of it, but vsed the first heat of their affections who ioyned with him, in setting on foot the businesse which neerely concerned him, and was not to be ouer-slowed, being no more his owne than Gods.

The first care taken was that no newes of the reuolt might be carried to Izreel, whereby the King might haue had warning either to fight or flee: this being foreseene, he marched swiftly away, to take the Court while it was yet secure. King Iehoram was now so well recouered of his wounds, that he could endure to ride abroad, for which cause it seemes that there was much feasting, and ioy made, especially by Queene Iezabel, who kept her state so well, that the brethren of Ahazia comming thither at this time, did make it as well their errand to salute the Queene, as to visit the King.

Certaine it is, that since the rebellion of Moab against Israel, the house of Ahab did neuer so much flourish as at this time. Seuenty Princes of the bloud Royall there were that liued in Samaria; Iehoram the sonne of Queene Iezabel had wonne Ramoth Gilead, which his Father had attempted in vaine, with losse of his life; and hee wonne it by valiant fight, wherein he receiued wounds, of which the danger was now past, but the honour likely to continue. The amitie was so great between Israel and Iuda, that it might suffice to daunt all their common enemies, leauing no hope of successe, to any rebellious enterprizer: so that now the prophecie of Elias, might be forgotten, or no otherwise remembred, than as an vnlikely tale by them that beheld the maiestical face of the Court, wherein so great a friend as the King of Iuda was entertained, and fortie Princes of his bloud expected.

In the middest of this securitie, whilest these great Estates were (perhaps) either consulting about prosequution of their intents, first against the Aramites, and then against Moab, Edom, and other rebells & enemies: or else were triumphing in ioy of that which was already atchieued, and the Queene Mother dressing her selfe in the bravest manner to come downe amongst them; tidings were brought in, that the watchman had from a Tower discouered a company comming. These newes were not very troublesome: for the Armie that lay in Ramoth Gilead, to be readie against all attempts of the Aramites, was likely enough to be discharged vpon some notice taken that the enemie would not, or could not stirre. Onely the King sent out an Horse-man to know what the matter was, and to bring him word. The messenger comming to Iehu, and asking whether all were well, was retained by him, who intended to giue the King as little warning as might bee. The seeming negligence of this fellow in not returning with an answere, might argue the matter to be of small importance: yet the King to be satisfied, sent out another that should bring him word how all went; and hee was likewise detained by Iehu. These dumbe shows bred some suspicion in Iehoram, whom the watchman certified of all that happened. And now the company drew so neere, that they might, though not perfectly, bee discerned, and notice taken of Iehu himselfe by the furious manner of his marching. Wherefore the King that was loth to discouer any weakenesse, caused his Chariot to bee made ready, and issued forth with Ahazia King of Iuda in his company, company, whose presence added maiestie to his traine, when strength to resist, or expedition to flee had beene more needfull. This could not be done so hastily, but that Iehu was come euen to the Townes end, and there they met each other in the field of Naboth. Iehoram began to salute Iehu with termes of peace, but receiuing a bitter answere, his heart failed him, so that crying out vpon the treason to his fellow King, he turned away to haue fled. But Iehu soone ouertooke him with an arrow, where-with he strooke him dead, and threw his carkasse into that field, which, purchased with the bloud of the right-full owner, was to be watered with the blood of the vniust possessour. Neyther did Ahazia escape so well, but that he was arrested by a wound, which held him till death did seize vpon him.

The Kings Palace was ioyning to the wall, by the gate of the Citie, where Iezabel might soone be aduertised of this calamitie, if she did not with her owne eyes behold it. Now it was high time for her to call to God for mercie, whose iudgements pronounced against her long before, had ouer-taken her, when she least expected it. Further, full of indignation and proud thoughts, made her selfe ready in all haste, and painted her face, hoping with her stately and imperious lookes to daunt the Traitour, or at least to vtter some Apophthegme, that should expresse her braue spirit, and brand him with such a reproach as might make him odious for euer. Little did she think vpon the hungry dogs that were ordained to deboure her, whose paunches the stibium, with which she besmeared her eyes, would more offend, than the scolding language wherewith she armed her tongue, could trouble the eares of him that had her in his power. As Iehu drew neere, she opened her window, and looking out vpon him, began to put him in mind of Zimri, that had not long enioyed the fruits of his treason, and murther of the King his Master. This was in meere humane valuation stoutly spoken, but was indeed a part of miserable folly, as are all things, howsoeuer laudable, if they haue an ill relation to God the Lord of all. Her owne Eunuches that stood by and heard her, were not affected so much as with any compassion of her fortune; much lesse was her enemie daunted with her proud spirit. When Iehu saw that shee did vse the little remainder of her life in seeking to vexe him, hee made her presently to vnderstand her owne estate, by deeds and not by words. He onely called to her seruants to know which of them would be on his side, and soone found them readie to offer their seruice, before the very face of their proud Ladie. Hereupon hee commanded them to cast her downe head-long: which immediately they performed without all regard of her greatnesse and estate, wherein she had a few houres before shined so gloriously in the eyes of men; of men that considered not the iudgements of God that had beene denounced against her.

So perished this accursed woman by the rude hands of her owne seruants, at the commandement of her greatest enemie, that was yesterday her subiect, but now her Lord: and shee perished miserably struggling in vaine with base groomes, who contumeliously did hale and thrust her, whilest her insulting enemie sate on Horse-backe, adding indignitie to her greefe, by scornefull beholding the shamefull manner of her fall, and trampling her bodie vnder foote. Her dead carcasse that was left without the walls was deuoured by dogges, and her very memorie was odious. Thus the vengeance of God rewarded her Idolatrie, murther, and oppression, with slow, but sure paiment, and full interest.

Ahazia King of Iuda fleeing a-pace from Iehu, was ouer-taken by the way where hee lurked; and receiuing his deadly wound in the Kingdome of Samaria, was suffered to get him gone (which he did in all haste) and seeke his buriall in his owne kingdome: and this fauour he obtained for his grand-fathers sake, not for his fathers, nor his owne. He died at Megiddo, and was thence carried to Ierusalem, where hee was enterred with his Ancestors, hauing reigned about one yeere.

CHAP. XXI.

Of Athalia, and whose Sonne he was that succeeded her.

§. I.

Of Athalia her vsurping the Kingdome, and what pretences she might forge.

2. Chron. 22. 9. AFter the death of Ahazia, it is said that his house was not able to retaine the Kingdome: which note, and the proceedings of Athalia vpon the death of her Sonne, haue giuen occasion to diuers opinions concerning the Pedigree of Ioas, who reigned shortly after. For Athalia being thus dispoyled of her Sonne, vnder whose name shee had ruled at her pleasure, did forth-with lay hold vpon all the Princes of the bloud, and slew them, that so she might occupie the Royall Throne her selfe, & reigne as Queene, rather than liue a Subiect. Shee had before-hand put into great place, and made Counsailours vnto her sonne, such as were fittest for her purpose, and ready at all times to execute her will: that shee kept a strong guard about her it is very likely; and as likely it is, that the great execution done by Ieboram, vpon the Princes, and many of the Nobilitie, had made the people tame, and fearefull to stirre, whatsoeuer they saw or heard.

Yet ambition, how violent soeuer it be, is seldome or neuer so shameleſſe as to refuse the commoditie of goodly pretences offering themselues; but rather scrapes together all that will any way serue to colour her proceedings. Wherefore it were not absurd for vs to thinke, that Athalia, when she saw the Princes of the Royall bloud, all of them in a manner, slaine by her husband, and afterwards his owne children destroyed by the Philistims, began euen then to play her owne game, reducing by artificiall practice, into faire likelihoods, those possibilities where-with her husbands bad fortune had presented her. Not without great show of reason, either by her owne mouth, or by some trustie creature of hers, might she giue him to vnderstand, how needful it were to take the best order whilest as yet he might, for feare of the worst that might happen. If the issue of Dauid, which now remained onely in his Familie, should by any accident faile (as wofull experience had alreadie shewed what might after come to passe) the people of Iuda were not vnlikely to choose a King of some new stocke, a popular seditious man peraduenture, one that to countenance his owne vnworthinesse, would not care what aspersions hee laid vpon that Royall house, which was fallen downe. And who could assure him, that some ambitious spirit, fore-seeing what might be gotten thereby, did not alreadie contriue the destruction of him, and all his seede? Wherefore it were the wisest way to designe by his authoritie, not onely his Successour, but also the reuersioner, and so to prouide, that the Crowne might neuer bee subiect to any rifeling, but remaine in the disposition of them that loued him best, if the worst that might be feared comming to passe, his owne posteritie could not retaine it.

Such perswasions being vrged, and earnestly followed, by the importunate sollicitation of her that gouerned his affections, were able to make the iealous Tyrant thinke, that the onely way to frustrate all deuices of such as gaped after a change, was to make her Heire the last and yongest of his house, whom it most concerned, as being the Queene-Mother, to vp-hold the first and eldest.

If Athalia tooke no such course as this in her husbands times, yet might she do it in her Sonnes. For Ahazia (besides that he was wholly ruled by his Mother) was not likely to take much care for the securitie of his halfe-brethren, or their children; as accounting his Fathers other wiues, in respect of his owne-borne-Mother, little better then Concubines, and their children basely begotten. But if this mischieuous woman forgat her selfe so farre in her wicked policie, that shee lost all opportunitie which the weakenesse of her husband and sonne did afford, of procuring vnto her selfe some seeming Title: yet could shee afterwards faine some such matter, as boldly shee might: being sure that none would aske to see her euidence, for feare of being sent to learne the certaintie of her sonne or husband in another World. But I rather thinke that she tooke order der for her affaires before-hand. For though shee had no reason to suspect or feare the suddaine death of her sonne, yet it was the wisest way to prouide betimes against all that might happen, whilest her husbands issue by other women was young and vnable to resist. We plainly finde that the Brethren or Nephewes of Ahaziah, to the number of two and fortie, were sent to the Court of Israel, onely to salute the children of the King, and the children of the Queene. The slender occasion of which long iourney, considered together with the qualitie of these persons (being in effect all the stocke of Iehoram that could be growne to any strength) makes it very suspicious that their entertainement in Izabels house would onely haue beene more formall, but little differing in substance, from that which they found at the hand of Iehu. He that lookes into the courses held both before and after by these two Queenes, will finde cause enough to thinke no lesse. Of such as haue aspired vnto Lordships not belonging to them, and thrust out the right Heires by pretence of Testaments, that had no other validitie than the sword of such as claimed by them could giue, Histories of late, yea of many Ages, afford plentifull examples: and the rule of Salomon is true: Is there any thing whereof one may say, Behold, this is new? It hath beene already in the old time that was before vs. Eccles. 1. 9. That a King might shed his brothers bloud, was proued by Salomon vpon Adonia; that he might aliene the Crown from his naturall Heires, Dauid had giuen proofe; but these had good ground of their doings. They which follow examples that please them, will neglect the reasons of those examples, if they please them not, and rest contented with the practice, as more willingly shewing what they may doe, than acknowledging why Salomon slew his brother that had begun one rebellion, and was entring into another. Iehoram slew all his brethren, which were better than he: Dauid purchased the Kingdome, and might the more freely dispose of it, yet he disposed of it as the Lord appointed; if Iehoram, who had lost much and gotten nothing, thought that he might aliene the remainder at his pleasure, or if Ahazia sought to cut off the succession of his brethren, or of their issue: either of these was to be answered with the words which Iehoiada the Priest vsed afterwards, in declaring the title of Ioash: Behold, the Kings sonne must reigne, as the Lord hath said of the sonnes of Dauid. Wherefore though I hold it very probable, that Athalia did pretend some title, whatsoeuer it might be, to the Crowne of Iuda; yet is it most certaine that she had thereunto no right at all, but onely gotit by treachery, murder, and open violence; and so she held it sixe whole yeeres, and a part of the seauenth, in good seeming securitie. 2 Chr. 21. v. 13

§. II.

How Iehu spent his time in Israel, so that he could not molest Athalia.

IN all this time Iehu did neuer goe about to disturbe her; which in reason he was likely to desire, being an enemy to her whole House. But hee was occupied at the first in establishing himselfe, rooting out the posterity of Ahab, and reforming somewhat in Religion: afterwards in warres against the Aramite, wherein he was so farre ouercharged, that hardly he could retaine his owne, much lesse att empt vpon others. Of the line of Ahab there were seuentie liuing in Samaria, out of which number Iehu by letter aduised the Citizens to set vp some one as King, and to prepare themselues to fight in his defence. Hereby might they gather how confident he was, which they well vnderstood to proceede from greater power about him, than they could gather to resist him. Wherefore they tooke example by the two Kings whom hee had slaine, and being exceedingly afraid of him, they offered him their seruice, wherein they so readily shewed themselues obedient, that in lesse than one dayes warning, they sent him the heads of all those Princes, as they were inioyned by a second letter from him. After this he surprized all the Priests of Baal by a subtiltie, faining a great sacrifice to their god, by which meanes he drew them altogether into one Temple, where hee slew them: and in the same zeale to God vtterly demolished all the monuments of that impietie.

Concerning the Idolatrie deuised by Ieroboam, no King of Israel had euer greater reason than Iehu to destroy it. For he needed not to feare lest the people should be allured vnto the house of Dauid; it was (in appearance) quite rooted vp, and the Crowne of Iuda in the possession of a cruell Tyrannesse: he had receiued his kingdome by the vnexpected grace of God; and further, in regard of his zeale expressed in destroying Baal out of Israel, he was promised, notwithstanding his following the sinne of Ieroboam, that the Kingdome should remaine in his Familie, to the fourth Generation. But all this would not serue; he would needs helpe to piece out Gods prouidence with his owne circumspection; doing therein like a foolish greedie gamester, who by stealing a needefull Card to assure himselfe of winning a stake, forfeits his whole left. Hee had questionlesse displeased many, by that which he did against Baal; and many more he should offend by taking from them the vse of a superstition, so long practized as was that Idolatrie of Iobaam. Yet all these, how many soeuer they were, had neuer once thought vpon making him King, if God, whom, (to retaine them,) hee now forsooke, had not giuen him the Crowne, when more difficulties appeared in the way of getting it, than could at any time after be found in the meanes of holding it.

This ingratitude of Iehu drew terrible vengeance of God vpon Israel, whereof Hazael King of Damascus was the Executioner. The cruelty of this barbarous Prince we 2 Kin. 8. v. 12. may finde in the prophecie of Elizeus, who fore-told it, saying: Their strong Cities shalt thou set on fire, and their young men shalt thou slay with the sword, and shalt dash their Infants against the stones, and rent in peeces their women with child. So did not onely the wickednesse of Ahab cause the ruine of his whole house, but the obstinate Idolatry of the people bring a lamentable misery vpon all the Land. For the furie of Hazaels victorie was not quenched with the destruction of a few Townes, nor wearied with one in-
2 Kin. 10. v. 32. uasion; but he smote them in all the coasts of Israel, and wasted all the Countrie beyond the Riuer of Iordan. Notwithstanding all these calamities, it seemes that the people repented not of their Idolatrie; (For in those dayes the Lord began to loathe Israel,) but rather it is likely, that they bemoaned the noble House of Ahab, vnder which they had beaten those enemies to whom they were now a prey, and had brauely fought for the conquest of Syria, where they had enlarged their border, by winning Ramoth Gilead, and compelled Benhadad to restore the Cities which his Father had won: whereas now they were faine to make wofull shifts, liuing vnder a Lord that had better fortune and courage in murdering his Master that had put him in trust, than in defending his people from their cruell enemies. Thus it commonly fals out, that they who can finde all manner of difficulties in seruing him, to whom nothing is difficult, are, in stead of the ease and pleasure to themselues propounded by contrary courses, ouer-whelmed with the troubles which they sought to auoide, and therein by God whom they first forsooke, forsaken, and left vnto the wretched labours of their owne blinde wisedome, wherein they had reposed all their confidence.

§. III.

Of Athaliahs Gouernment.

THese calamities falling vpon Israel, kept Athalia safe on that side, giuing her leisure to looke to things at home; as hauing little to doe abroad, vnlesse it were so that she held some correspondencie with Hazael, pretending therein to imitate her husbands grand-father King Asa, who had done the like. And some probability that she did so, may be gathered out of that which is recorded of her doings. For wee
2 Chro. 24. v. 7. finde, that this wicked Athalia and her children brake vp the house of God, and all things that were dedicate for the house of the Lord did they bestow vpon Baalim. Such a sacriledge, though it proceeded from a desire to set out her owne Idolatry, with such pompe as might make it the more glorious in the peoples eyes, was not likely to want some faire pretext of necessity of the State so requiring: in which case others before her had made bold with that holy place, and her next successour was faine to doe the like, being thereunto forced by Hazael, who perhaps was delighted with the taste of that which was formerly thence extracted for his sake.

Vnder this impious gouernment of Athalia, the deuotion of the Priests and Leuites was very notable, and serued (no doubt) very much to retaine the people in the religion taught by God himselfe, howsoeuer the Queenes proceedings aduanced the contrary. For the pouerty of that sacred Tribe of Leui must needes haue beene exceeding great at this time, all their lands and possessions in the ten Tribes being vtterly lost, the oblations and other perquisites, by which they liued, being now very low, and small; and the ſtore laid vp in better times vnder godly Kings, being all taken away by ſhamefull robberie. Yet they vp-held in all this miſery the ſeruice of God, and the daily ſacrifice, keeping daily their courſes, and performing obedience to the high Prieſt, no leſſe than in thoſe dayes wherein their entertainment was farre better.

§. IIII.

Of the preſeruation of Ioas.

IEhoiada then occupied the high Prieſthood, an honourable, wiſe, and religious man. To his carefulneſſe it may be aſcribed, that the ſtate of the Church was in ſome ſlender ſort vp-held in thoſe vnhappy times. His wife was Iehoſhabeth, who was daughter of King Iehoram, and ſiſter to Ahazia, a godly Lady and vertuous, whoſe piety makes it ſeeme that Athalia was not her Mother, though her acceſſe to the Court argue the contrary: but her diſcreet carriage might more eaſily procure her welcome to her owne Fathers houſe, than the education vnder ſuch a Mother could haue permitted her to be ſuch as ſhe was. By her care Ioaſh the yong Prince that reigned ſoone after, was conueighed out of the nourſery, when Athalia deſtroyed all the Kings children, and was carried ſecretly into the Temple, where as ſecretly he was brought vp. How it came to paſſe that this yong childe was not hunted out, when his body was miſſing, nor any great reckoning (for ought that we finde) made of his eſcape, I will not ſtand to examine: for it was not good in policie, that the people ſhould heare ſay, that one of the children had auoided that cruell blow; it might haue made them hearken after innouations, and ſo be the leſſe conformable to the preſent gouernment. So Ioaſh was deliuered out of that ſlaughter, he and his Nurſe being gone no man could tell whither, and might be thought peraduenture to be caſt away, as hauing no other guard than a poore woman that gaue him ſucke, who fooliſhly doubting that ſhe her ſelfe ſhould haue beene ſlaine, was fled away with him into ſome deſolate place, where it was like enough that ſhe and he ſhould periſh. In ſuch caſes flatterers, or men deſirous of reward, eaſily coine ſuch tales, and rather ſweare them to be true in their owne knowledge, than they will loſe the thankes due to their ioyfull tidings.

§ V.

Whoſe Sonne Ioas was.

†. I.

Whether Ioas may be thought likely to haue beene the Sonne of Ahazia.

NOw concerning this Ioaſh, whoſe ſonne he was, it is a thing of much difficulty to affirme, and hath cauſed much controuerſie among writers. The places of Scripture, which call him the ſonne of Ahaziah, ſeeme plaine enough. How any figure of the Hebrew language might giue title of Sonne vnto him, in regard that he was his Succeſſor, I neither by my ſelfe can finde, nor can by any helpe of Authors learne how to anſwere the difficulties appearing in the contrary opinions of them, that thinke him to haue beene, or not, the naturall Sonne of Ahazia. For whereas it is ſaid, that the houſe of Ahazia was not able to retaine the Kingdome; ſome doe inferre that this Ioaſh was not properly called his Sonne, but was the next of his kindred, and therefore ſucceeded him, as a ſonne in the inheritance of his Father. And hereunto the murder committed by Athalia, doth very well agree. For ſhe perceiuing that the Kingdome was to fall into their hands, in whom ſhe had no intereſt, might eaſily finde cauſe to feare, that the tyranny exerciſed by her husband at her inſtigation vpon ſo many noble Houſes, would now be reuenged vpon her ſelfe. The ruine of her Idolatrous religion might in this caſe terrifie both her and her Minions; the ſentence of the Law rewarding that offence with death; and the Tragedy of Iezabel teaching her what might happen to a mother Queene. All this had little concerned her, if her owne grand-child had beene heire to the Crowne; for ſhe that had power enough to make her ſelfe Queene, could with more eaſe, and leſſe enuie, haue taken vpon her the office of a Protector, by which authoritie ſhe might haue done her pleaſure, and beene the more both obayed by others,

2 Kings 11. 2. & 2 Chro. 22. v. 11.

2 Chr 22. v. 9.

and secure of her owne estate, as not wanting an Heire. Wherefore it was not needefull, that she should be so vnnaturall, as to destroy the childe of her owne sonne, of whose life she might haue made greater vse, than she could of his death: whereas indeede, the loue of grand-mothers to their Nephewes, is little lesse than that of Mothers to their children.

This argument is very strong. For it may seeme incredible, that all naturall affection should be cast a-side, when as neither necessity vrgeth, nor any commoditie thereby gotten requireth it, yea when all humane policy doth teach one the same, which nature without reason would haue perswaded.

†. II.

That Ioas did not descend from Nathan.

BVt (as it is more easie to finde a difficulty in that which is related, than to shew how it might haue otherwise beene) the pedegree of this Ioash is, by them which thinke him not the sonne of Ahazia, set downe in such sort that it may very iustly be suspected. They say that he descended from Nathan the sonne of Dauid, and not from Salomon, to which purpose they bring a Historie (I know not whence) of two families of the race of Dauid, saying that the line of Salomon held the kingdome with this condition, that if at any time it failed, the familie of Nathan should succeede it. Concerning this Nathan the sonne of Dauid there are that would haue him to be Nathan the Prophet, who, as they thinke, was by Dauid adopted. And of this opinion was Origen, as also S. Augustine sometime was, but afterward he reuoked it, as was meete; for this Nathan is reckoned among the sonnes of Dauid, by Bathshua the daughter of Ammes, and therefore could not be the Prophet. Gregory Nazianzen (as I finde him cited by Peter Martyr) and after him, Erasmus, and Faber Stapulensis, haue likewise held the same of Ioash, deriuing him from Nathan. But Nathan and those other brethren of Salomon by the same mother, are thought, vpon good likelihoods, to haue beene the children of Vria the Hittite: and so are they accounted by sundry of the fathers, and by Lyra, and Abulensis, who follow the Hebrew expositors of that place in the first of Chronicles, The words of Salomon calling himselfe the onely begotten of his mother, doe approue this exposition: for we reade of no more than two sonnes which Bathshua or Bathsheba did beare vnto Dauid, whereof the one begotten in adultery, died an infant, and Salomon onely of her children by the King did liue. So that the rest must needes haue beene the children of Vria, and are thought to haue beene Dauids onely by adoption. Wherefore, if Ioas had not beene the sonne of Ahazia, then must that pedegree haue beene false, wherein S. Matthew deriueth him lineally from Salomon; yea, then had not our blessed Sauiour issued from the loynes of Dauid, according to the flesh, but had onely beene of his line by courtesie of the Nation, and forme of Law, as any other might haue beene. As for the authority of Philo, which hath drawne many late writers into the opinion that Ioash was not of the posterity of Salomon, it is enough to say, that this was Frier Annius his Philo: for no other edition of Philo hath any such matter; but Annius can make Authors to speake what he list.

1 Chro 3. 5.

†. III.

That Ioas may probably be thought to haue beene the sonne of Iehoram.

IN so doubtfull a case, if it seeme lawfull to hold an opinion that no man hath yet thought vpon, me thinkes it were not amisse to lay open at once, and peruse together two places of Scripture, whereof the one telling the wickednesse of Iehoram the sonne of Iehosaphat King of Iuda, for which he and his children perished, rehearseth it as one of Gods mercies towards the house of Dauid, that according to his promise hee would giue him a light, and to his children for euer: the other doth say, that for the offences of the same Iehoram, there was not a sonne left him, saue Iehoahas the yongest of his sonnes. Now, if it were in regard of Gods promise to Dauid, that after those massacres of Iehoram vpon all his brethren, and of the Philistims and Arabians vpon the children of Iehoram, one of the seede of Dauid escaped; why may it not be thought that he was said to haue escaped, in whom the line of Dauid was preserued? for had all the race of Salomon

2 Kin. 8. v. 19.

mon beene rooted vp in theſe wofull Tragedies, and the progenie of Nathan ſucceeded in place thereof; like enough it is that ſome remembrance more particular would haue beene extant, of an euent ſo memorable. That the race of Nathan was not extinguiſhed, it is indeede apparent by the Genealogie of our Lord, as it is recounted by S. Luke: but the preſeruation of the houſe of Dauid, mentioned in the books of Kings and Chronicles, was performed in the perſon of Iehoahas, in whom the Royall branch of Salomon, the naturall, and not onely legall iſſue remaining of Dauid, was kept aliue. Wherefore it may be thought that this Ioaſh, who followed Athalia in the Kingdome, was the yongeſt ſonne of Iehoram, whoſe life Athalia as a ſtepdame, was not likely to purſue. For it were not eaſily vnderſtood, why the preſeruation of Dauids line, by Gods eſpeciall mercy, in regard of his promiſe made, ſhould pertaine rather to that time, when beſides Ahazia himſelfe, there were two and fortie of his brethren, or (as in another place they are called) ſonnes of his brethren remaining aliue, which afterwards were all ſlaine by Iehu; than haue reference to the lamentable deſtruction and little leſſe than extirpation of that progeny, wherein one onely did eſcape. Certainly that inhumane murther which Iehoram committed vpon his brethren, if it were (as appeareth in the Hiſtory) reuenged vpon his owne children; then was not this vengeance of God accompliſhed by the Philiſtims and Arabians, but being onely begun by them, was afterwards proſecuted by Iehu, and finally tooke effect by the hands of that ſame wicked woman, at whoſe inſtigation he had committed ſuch barbarous outrage. And from this execution of Gods heauie iudgement laid vpon Iehoram and all his children, onely Iehoahas his yongeſt ſon was exempted; whom therefore if I ſhould affirme to be the ſame with Ioas, which is called the ſonne of Ahazia, I ſhould not want good probability. Some further appearance of neceſſity there is, which doth argue that it could no otherwiſe haue beene. For it was the yongeſt ſonne of Iehoram in whom the race was preſerued; which could not in any likelihood be Ahazia, ſeeing that he was twenty yeeres old at the leaſt (as is already noted) when he began to reigne, and conſequently, was borne in the eighteenth or twentieth yeere of his Fathers age. Now I know not whether of the two is more vnlikely, either that Iehoram ſhould haue begotten many children before he was eighteene yeeres old, or that hauing (as he had) many wiues and children, hee ſhould vpon the ſodaine, at his eighteenth yeere, become vnfruitfull, and beget no more in twenty yeeres following: each of which muſt haue beene true, if this were true that Ahazia was the ſame Iehoahas, which was his yongeſt ſonne. But this inconuenience is taken away, and thoſe other doubts ariſing from the cauſeleſſe crueltie of Athalia, in ſeeking the life of Ioas, are eaſily cleered, if Ioas and Iehoahas were one. Neither doth his age withſtand this opinion. For he was ſeuen yeeres old when he began to reigne; which if we vnderſtand of yeeres compleat, he might haue beene a yeere old at the death of Iehoram, being begotten ſomewhat after the beginning of his ſickeneſſe. Neither is it more abſurd to ſay that he was the naturall ſonne of Iehoram, though called the ſon of Ahazia, than it were to ſay, as great Authors haue done, this difficultie notwithſtanding, that he was of the poſteritie of Nathan. One thing indeed I know not how to anſwere; which, had it concurred with the reſt, might haue ſerued as the foundation of this opinion. The name of Iehoahas, that ſoundeth much more neere to Ioas, than to Ahazia, in an Engliſh eare, doth in the Hebrew (as I am informed by ſome, skilfull in that language) through the diuerſitie of certaine letters, differ much from that which it moſt reſembleth in our Weſterne manner of writing, and little from the other. Now, although it be ſo that Ahazia himſelfe bee alſo called Azaria, and muſt haue had three names, if hee were the ſame with Iehoahas; in which manner Ioas might alſo haue had ſeuerall names; yet, becauſe I finde no other warrant heereof than a bare poſſibilitie, I will not preſume to build an opinion vpon the weake foundation of mine owne coniecture, but leaue all to the conſideration of ſuch as haue more abilitie to iudge, and leiſure to conſider of this point.

Vpon what reaſons Athalia might ſeeke to deſtroy Ioas, if he were her owne grandchilde.

IF therefore we ſhall follow that which is commonly receiued, and interpret the text according to the letter, it may be ſaid, that Athalia was not onely blinded by the paſſi-

ons

ons of ambition and zeale to her idolatrous worship of Baalim, but pursued the accomplishment of some vnnaturall desires, in seeking the destruction of her grand-childe, and the rest of the bloud Royall. For whether it were so that Athalia (as proud and cruell women are not alwayes chaste) had imitated the liberty of Iezabel her sister in law, whose whoredomes were vpbraided by Iehu to her sonne; or whether she had children by some former husband, before she was married vnto Iehoram (which is not vnlikely in regard of her age, who was daughter of Omri, and sister to Ahab) certaine it is that she had sonnes of her owne, and those old enough to be imployed, as they were, in robbing of the Temple. So it is not greatly to be wondred at, that to settle the Crowne vpon her owne children, she did seeke to cut off, by wicked policie, all other claimes. As for Ioas, if she were his grand-mother, yet she might mistrust the interest which his mother would haue in him, lest when he came to yeeres, it might draw him from her deuotion. And hereof (besides that women doe commonly better loue their daughters husbands, than their sonnes wiues) there is some appearance in the reigne of her sonne: for she made him spend all his time in idle iourneys, to no other apparant end, than that she might rule at home; and he liuing abroad be estranged from his wife, and entertaine some new fancies, wherein Iezabel had cunning enough to be his tutoresse. But when the sword of Iehu had rudely cut in sunder all these fine deuices, then was Athalia faine to goe roundly to worke, and doe as she did, whereby she thought to make all sure. Otherwise, if (as I could rather thinke) she were onely stepdame to Ioas, we neede not seeke into the reasons mouing her to take away his life; her owne hatred was cause enough to dispatch him among the first.

2 King. 9. v. 22

§ VI.

A digression, wherein is maintained the liberty of vsing coniecture in Histories.

THus much concerning the person of Ioas, from whom, as from a new roote, the tree of Dauid was propagated into many branches. In handling of which matter, the more I consider the nature of this Historie, and the diuersitie betweene it and others, the lesse me thinkes I neede to suspect mine owne presumption, as deseruing blame, for curiosity in matter of doubt, or boldnesse in liberty of coniecture. For all Histories doe giue vs information of humane counsailes and euents, as farre forth as the knowledge and faith of the writers can afford; but of Gods will, by which all things are ordered, they speake onely at randome, and many times falsly. This we often finde in prophane writers, who ascribe the ill successe of great vndertakings to the neglect of some impious Rites, whereof indeede God abhorred the performance as vehemently, as they thought him to be highly offended with the omission. Hereat we may the lesse wonder, if we consider the answere made by the Iewes in Ægypt vnto Ieremie the Prophet reprehending their idolatry. For, howsoeuer the written Law of God was knowne vnto the people, and his punishments laid vpon them for contempt thereof, were very terrible, and euen then but newly executed; yet were they so obstinately bent vnto their wils, that they would not by any meanes be drawne to acknowledge the true cause of their affliction. But they told the Prophet roundly, that they would worship the Queene of Heauen, as they and their Fathers, their Kings and their Princes had vsed to doe; For then (said they) had we plenty of victuals, and were well, and felt no euill: adding that all manner of miseries were befallen them, since they left off that seruice of the Queene of Heauen. So blinde is the wisedome of man, in looking into the counsaile of God, which to finde out there is no better nor other guide than his owne written will not peruerted by vaine additions.

Ier. 44. v. 17. & 18.

But this Historie of the Kings of Israel and Iuda hath herein a singular prerogatiue aboue all that haue beene written by the most sufficient of meerely humane authors: it setteth downe expresly the true, and first causes of all that happened; not in imputing the death of Ahab to his ouer-forwardnesse in battaile; the ruine of his familie, to the securitie of Iehoram in Izreel; nor the victories of Hazael, to the great commotions raised in Israel, by the comming of Iehu; but referring all vnto the will of God, I meane, to his reuealed will: from which that his hidden purposes doe not varie, this storie, by many great examples, giues most notable proofe. True it is, that the concurrence of second causes with their effects, is in these bookes nothing largely described; nor perhaps haps exactly in any of those Histories that are in these points most copious. For it was well noted by that worthy Gentleman, Sir Philip Sidnie, that Historians doe borrow of Poets, not onely much of their ornament, but somewhat of their substance. Informations are often false, records not alwayes true, and notorious actions commonly insufficient to discouer the passions which did set them first on foote. Wherefore they are faine (I speake of the best, and in that which is allowed; for to take out of Liuie euery one circumstance of Claudius his iourney against Asdrubal in Italie, fitting all to another businesse, or any practice of that kinde, is neither Historicall, nor Poeticall) to search into the particular humour of Princes, and of those which haue gouerned their affections, or the instruments by which they wrought, from whence they doe collect the most likely motiues, or impediments of euery businesse; and so figuring as neere to the life as they can imagine, the matter in hand, they iudiciously consider the defects in counsaile, or obliquity in proceeding. S. Phi. Sid. in his Apol. for Poetry

Yet all this, for the most part, is not enough to giue assurance, howsoeuer it may giue satisfaction. For the heart of man is vnsearchable: and Princes, howsoeuer their intents be seldome hidden from some of those many eyes which prie both into them, and into such as liue about them; yet sometimes either by their owne close temper, or by some subtill miste, they conceale the trueth from all reports. Yea, many times the affections themselues lye dead, and buried in obliuion, when the preparations which they begat, are conuerted to another vse. The industrie of an Historian, hauing so many things to wearie it, may well be excused, when finding apparant cause enough of things done, it forbeareth to make further search; though it often fall out, where sundry occasions worke to the same end, that one small matter in a weake minde is more effectuall, than many that seemes farre greater. So comes it many times to passe, that great fires, which consume whole houses or Townes, beginne with a few strawes, that are wasted or not seene; when the flame is discouered, hauing fastned vpon some wood-pile, that catcheth all about it. Questionlesse it is, that the warre commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against the Greekes, proceeded from desire of the Persians to inlarge their Empire: howsoeuer the enterprize of the Athenians vpon Sardes, was noised abroad as the ground of that quarrell: yet Herodotus telleth vs, that the wanton desire of Queene Atossa, to haue the Grecian dames her bondwomen, did first moue Darius to prepare for this warre before he had receiued any iniury; and when he did not yet so much desire to get more, as to enioy what was already gotten. Herod. l. 1.

I will not here stand to argue whether Herodotus be more iustly reprehended by some, or defended by others, for alleadging the vaine appetite, and secret speech of the Queene in bed with her husband, as the cause of those great euils following; this I may boldly affirme, (hauing I thinke, in euery estate some sufficient witnesse) that matters of much consequence, founded in all seeming vpon substantiall reasons, haue issued indeede from such pettie trifles, as no Historian would either thinke vpon, or could well search out.

Therefore it was a good answer that Sixtus Quintus the Pope made to a certaine Frier, comming to visit him in his Popedome, as hauing long before in his meaner estate, beene his familiar friend. This poore Frier, being emboldened by the Pope to vse his old liberty of speech, aduentured to tell him, that he very much wondred how it was possible for his Holinesse, whom he rather tooke for a direct honest man, than any cunning polititian, to attaine vnto the Papacie; in compassing of which, all the subtiltie (said he) of the most crafty braines, finde worke enough: and therefore the more I thinke vpon the Art of the Conclaue, and your vnaptnesse thereto, the more I needes must wonder. Pope Sixtus to satisfie the plaine dealing Frier, dealt with him againe as plainly, saying, Hadst thou liued abroad as I haue done, and seene by what folly this world is gouerned, thou wouldest wonder at nothing.

Surely, if this be referred vnto those exorbitant engines, by which the course of affaires is moued, the Pope said true. For the wisest of men are not without their vanities, which requiring and finding mutuall toleration, worke more closely, and earnestly, than right reason either needes or can. But if we lift vp our thoughts to that supreme Gouernour, of whose Empire all that is true, which by the Poet was said of Iupiter:

Qui terram inertem, qui mare temperat
Ventosum, & vrbes, regnaq; tristia
Diuosq;, mortalesq; turmas,
Imperio regit vnus æquo.

Who rules the duller earth, the winde-swolne streames,
The ciuill Cities, and the th'infernall realmes,
Who th'host of heauen, and the mortall band,
Alone doth gouerne by his iust command:

Then shall we finde the quite contrary. In him there is no vncertainety nor change; he foreseeth all things, and all things disposeth to his owne honour; He neither deceiueth nor can be deceiued, but continuing one and the same for euer, doth constantly gouerne all creatures by that Law, which he hath prescribed and will neuer alter. The vanities of men beguile their vaine contriuers, and the prosperity of the wicked, is the way leading to their destruction: yea, this broad and head-long passage to hell, is not so delightfull as it seemes at the first entrance, but hath growing in it, besides the poysons which infect the soule, many cruell thornes deepely wounding the body; all which, if any few escape, they haue onely this miserable aduantage of others, that their descent was the more swift and expedite. But the seruice of God is the path guiding vs to perfect happinesse, & hath in it a true, though not compleat felicity, yeelding such abundance of ioy to the conscience, as doth easily counteruaile all afflictions whatsoeuer; though indeede those brambles that sometimes teare the skinne of such as walke in this blessed way, doe commonly lay hold vpon them at such time as they sit down to take their ease, and make them wish themselues at their iournies end, in the presence of their Lord whom they faithfully serue, in whose presence is the fulnesse of ioy, and at whose right hand are pleasures for euermore. Psal. 16. v. 11.

Wherefore it being the end and scope of all History, to teach by example of times past, such wisedome as may guide our desires and actions, we should not maruaile though the Chronicles of the Kings of Iuda and Israel, being written by men inspired with the Spirit of God, instruct vs chiefly, in that which is most requisite for vs to know, as the meanes to attaine vnto true felicitie, both here, and hereafter, propounding examples which illustrate this infallible rule; The feare of the Lord is the beginning of wisdome. Had the expedition of Xerxes (as it was foretold by Daniel) beene written by some Prophet after the captiuitie: we may well beleeue that the counsaile of God therein, and the executioners of his righteous will, should haue occupied either the whole or the principall roome in that narration. Yet had not the purpose of Darius, the desire of his Wife, and the businesse at Sardes, with other occurrents, beene the lesse true, though they might haue beene omitted, as the lesse materiall: but these things it had beene lawfull for any man to gather out of prophane Histories, or out of circumstances otherwise appearing, wherein he should not haue done iniurie to the Sacred Writings, as long as he had forborne to derogate from the first causes, by ascribing to the second more then was due.

Such, or little different, is the businesse that I haue now in hand: wherein I cannot beleeue that any man of iudgement will taxe me, as either fabulous or presumptuous. For he doth not faine, that rehearseth probabilities as bare coniectures; neither doth he depraue the Text, that seeketh to illustrate and make good in humane reason, those things, which authority alone, without further circumstance, ought to haue confirmed in euery mans beliefe. And this may suffice in defence of the liberty, which I haue vsed in coniectures, and may hereafter vse when occasion shall require, as neither vnlawfull, nor misbeseeming an Historian.

The conspiracie against Athalia.

WHen Athalia had now sixe yeeres and longer worne the Crowne of Iuda, and had found neither any forreine enemie, nor domesticall aduersarie to disturbe her possession, suddenly the period of her glory, and reward of her wickednesse wickedneſſe meeting together, tooke her away without any warning, by a violent and ſhamefull death. For the growth of the yong Prince began to be ſuch, as permitted him no longer to be concealed, and it had beene very vnfitting that his education ſhould be ſimple, to make him ſeeme the childe of ſome poore man (as for his ſafety it was requiſite,) when his capacitie required to haue beene indued with the ſtomacke and qualities meete for a King. All this Iehoiada the Prieſt conſidered, and withall, the great increaſe of impietie, which taking deepe roote in the Court, was likely to ſpread it ſelfe ouer all the Countrie, if care were not vſed to weede it vp very ſpeedily. Wherefore he aſſociated vnto himſelfe fiue of the Captaines, in whoſe fidelity he had beſt aſſurance, and hauing taken an oath of them, and ſhewed them the Kings ſonne, he made a Couenant with them, to aduance him to the Kingdome. Theſe drew in others of the principall men, to countenance the action, procuring at the firſt onely that they ſhould repaire to Ieruſalem, where they were further acquainted with the whole matter. There needed not many perſwaſions to win them to the buſineſſe: the promiſe of the Lord vnto the houſe of Dauid, was enough to aſſure them, that the action was both lawfull, and likely to ſucceede as they deſired.

But in compaſſing their intent ſome difficulties appeared: For it was not to be hoped, that with open force they ſhould bring their purpoſe to good iſſue; neither were the Captaines, and other aſſociats of Iehoiada able by cloſe working, to draw together ſo many truſty and ſeruiceable hands as would ſuffice to manage the buſineſſe. To helpe in this caſe, the Prieſt gaue order to ſuch of the Leuites, as had finiſhed their courſes in waiting on the Diuine ſeruice at the Temple, and were now relieued by others that ſucceeded in their turnes, that they ſhould not depart vntill they knew his further pleaſure. So by admitting the new commers, and not diſcharging the old, he had, without any noiſe, made vp ſuch a number, as would be able to deale with the Queenes ordinary Guard, and that was enough; for if the Tyranneſſe did not preuaile againſt them at the firſt brunt, the fauour of the People was like to ſhew it ſelfe on their ſide, who made head againſt her. Theſe Leuites were placed in the inner Court of the Temple, about the perſon of the King, who as yet was kept cloſe; the followers of the Captaines, and other adherents, were beſtowed in the vtter Courts: As for weapons, the Temple it ſelfe had ſtore enough; King Dauid had left an Armory to the place, which was now employed to defence of his iſſue.

All things being in a readineſſe, and the day come, wherein this high deſigne was to be put in execution; Iehoiada deliuered vnto the Captaines, Armour for them and their adherents; appointed a guard vnto the Kings perſon, produced him openly, and gaue vnto him the Crowne; vſing all ceremonies accuſtomed in ſuch ſolemnities, with great applauſe of the people. Of theſe doings, the Queene was the laſt that heard any word; which is not ſo ſtrange as it may ſeeme: for inſolent natures, by dealing outragiouſly with ſuch as bring them ill tidings, doe commonly loſe the benefit of hearing what is to be feared, whileſt yet it may be preuented, and haue no information of danger, till their owne eyes, amazed with the ſuddenneſſe, behold it in the ſhape of ineuitable miſchiefe.

All Ieruſalem was full of the rumour, and entertained it with very good liking. Some carried home the newes, others ran forth to ſee, and the common ioy was ſo great, that without apprehenſion of perill, vnder the windowes of the Court, were the people running and praiſing the King. Athalia hearing and beholding the extraordinary concourſe, and noiſe of folkes in the ſtreetes, making towards the Temple, with much vnuſuall paſſion in their lookes, did preſently conceiue, that ſomewhat worthy of her care was happened; though, what it might be, ſhe did not apprehend. Howſoeuer it were, ſhe meant to vſe her owne wiſedome in looking into the matter, and ordering all as the occaſion might happen to require. It may be, that ſhe thought it ſome eſpeciall ſolemnity vſed in the Diuine ſeruice, which cauſed this much adoe; and hereof the vnaccuſtomed number of Leuites, and of other deuout men, about the towne, might giue ſome preſumption. 2 Chron. 23. 12

Many things argue that ſhe little thought vpon her owne Tragedie, although Ioſephus would make it ſeeme otherwiſe. For we finde in the Text, She came to the people into the houſe of the Lord (which was neere to her Palace) and that when ſhe looked and ſaw the King ſtand by his pillar, as the manner was with the Princes, or great men of the 2 Chron. 23. 12 & 13. & 2. 1 King. c. 11. v. 13. & 14.

Land by him, and the Trumpetters proclaiming him, she rent her clothes, and cryed, Treason, Treason. Hereby it appeares that she was quietly going, without any mistrust or feare, to take her place; which when she found occupied by another, then she began to afflict her selfe, as one cast away, and cryed out in vaine vpon the Treason, whereby she saw that she must perish. But that she came with a guard of armed men to the Temple, (as Iosephus reporteth) and that her company being beaten backe, she entred alone, and commanded the people to kill the yong Tyrant, I finde no where in Scripture, neither doe I hold it credible. For had she truely knowne how things went, she would surely haue gathered her friends about her, and vsed those forces in defence of her Crowne, by which she gat it, and hitherto had held it. Certainely, if it were granted, that she, like a new Semiramis, did march in the head of her troupe, yet it had beene meere madnesse in her, to enter the place alone, when her assistants were kept out; but if she perceiuing that neither her authority, nor their owne weapons, could preuaile to let in her guard, would neuertheless take vpon her to command the death of the new King, calling a childe of seauen yeeres old a Conspirator, and bidding them to kill him, whom she saw to be armed in his defence, may we not thinke that she was mad in the most extreame degree? Certaine it is that the counsaile of God would haue taken effect, in her destruction, had she vsed the most likely meanes to disappoint it: yet we neede not so cut her throate with any morall impossibilities. It is enough to say, that the godly zeale of Iehoiada found more easie successe, through her indiscretion, than otherwise could haue beene expected; so that at his appointment, she was without more adoe, carried out of the Temple and slaine, yea so, that no bloud, saue her owne, was shed in that quarrell; her small traine that she brought along with her, not daring to stand in her defence.

§. VIII.

The death of Athalia, with a comparison of her and Iezabel.

MOst like it is, that Athalia had many times, with great indignation, bewailed the rashnesse of her Nephew Iehoram the Israelite, who did fooleshly cast himselfe into the very throat of danger, gaping vpon him, onely through his eager desire of quickly knowing what the matter meant: yet, she her selfe, by the like bait, was taken in the like trap, and hauing liued such a life as Iezabel had done, was rewarded with a sutable death. These two Queenes were in many points much alike, each of them was Daughter, Wife, and Mother to a King; each of them ruled her husband; was an Idolatresse, and a Murdresse. The onely difference appearing in their conditions, is, that Iezabel is more noted as incontinent of body, Athalia as ambitious: So that each of them suruiuing her husband about eight yeeres, did spend their time in satisfying her owne affections; the one vsing tyrannie, as the exercise of her haughty minde; the other painting her face, for the ornament of her vnchaste body. In the manner of their death little difference there was, or in those things which may seeme in this world to pertaine vnto the dead when they are gone. Each of them was taken on the suddaine by Conspirators, and each of them exclayming vpon the Treason, receiued sentence from the mouth of one that had liued vnder her subiection; in execution whereof, Iezabel was trampled vnder the feet of her enemies horses; Athalia slaine at her owne horse-gate; the death of Athalia hauing (though not much) the more leisure to vexe her proud heart; that of Iezabel, the more indignity, and shame of body. Touching their buriall, Iezabel was deuoured by Dogges, as the Lord had threatned by the Prophet Elias; what became of Athalia we doe not finde. Like enough it is, that she was buried, as hauing not persecuted and slaine the Lords Prophets, but suffered the Priests to exercise their function; yet of her buriall there is no monument, for she was a Church-robber. The seruice of Baal erected by these two Queenes, was destroyed as soone as they were gone, and their Chaplaines, the Priests of that Religion, slaine. Herein also it came to passe, alike, as touching them both when they were dead; the Kings who slue them, were afterwards afflicted, both of them by the same hand of Hazael the Syrian; in which point Athalia had the greater honour, if the Syrian (who seemes to haue beene her good friend) pretended her reuenge, as any part of his quarrell to Iuda. Concerning children, all belonging to Iezabel perished in few

few dayes after her: whether Athalia left any behinde her, it is vncertaine; she had sons liuing after she was Queene, of whom, or of any other, that they were slaine with her, we doe not finde.

This is a matter not vnworthy of consideration, in regard of much that may depend vpon it, For if the children of Athalia had beene in Ierusalem when their Mother fell, their death would surely haue followed hers as neerely, and beene registred, as well as the death of Mattan the Priest of Baal. That Law by which God forbad that the children should die for the fathers, could not haue saued these vngracious Imps, whom the clause following would haue cut off, which commands, that euery man should die for his owne sinne. Seeing therefore that they had beene professors and aduancers of that vile and Idolatrous worship of Baal, yea had robbed the Temple of the Lord, and enriched the house of Baal with the spoyle of it; likely it is, that they should not haue escaped with life, if Iehoiada the Priest could haue gotten them into his hands. As there was lawfull cause enough requiring their death, so the securitie of the King and his friends, that is, of all the Land, craued as much, and that very earnestly. For these had beene esteemed as heires of their mothers Crowne, and being reckoned as her assistants in that particular businesse of robbing the Temple, may be thought to haue carried a great sway in other matters, as Princes, and fellowes with their Mother in the Kingdome. Therefore it is euident, that either they were now dead, or (perhaps following Hazael in his warres against Iehu) absent from Ierusalem; whereby Iehoiada might, with the more confidence, aduenture to take Armes against their Mother, that was desolate. Deut. 24. 16.

Chap. XXII.

Of Ioas and Amasia, with their Contemporaries; where somewhat of the building of Carthage.

§. I.

Of Ioas his doings, whilest Iehoiada the Priest liued.

BY the death of Athalia, the whole Countrie of Iuda was filled with great ioy and quietnesse; wherein Ioas a childe of seauen yeeres old or there-about; began his reigne, which continued almost fortie yeeres. During his minoritie, hee liued vnder the protection of that honourable man Iehoiada the Priest, who did as faithfully gouerne the Kingdome, as he had before carefully preserued the Kings life, and restored him vnto the Throne of his ancestors. When he came to mans estate, he tooke by appointment of Iehoiada two wiues, and begat Sonnes and Daughters, repairing the family of Dauid, which was almost worne out. The first Act that hee tooke in hand, when he began to rule without a Protector, was the reparation of the Temple. It was a needefull piece of worke, in regard of the decay wherein that holy place was fallen, through the wickednesse of vngodly Tyrants; and requisite it was that he should vp-hold the Temple, whom the Temple had vp-held. This businesse he followed with so earnest a zeale, that not onely the Leuites were more slacke than he, but euen Iehoiada was faine to be quickened by his admonition. Money was gathered for the charges of the worke, partly out of the taxe imposed by Moses, partly out of the liberalitie of the people, who gaue so freely, that the Temple, besides all reparations, was enriched with vessels of gold and siluer, and with all other Veensiles. The sacrifices likewise were offered, as vnder godly Kings they had beene, and the seruice of God was magnificently celebrated. 2 Chro 24. 14

§ II.

The death of Iehoiada, and Apostasie of Ioas.

BVt this endured no longer than the life of Iehoiada the Priest: who hauing liued an hundred and thirtie yeeres, dyed before his Countrie could haue spared him. He was buried among the Kings of Iuda, as he well deserued, hauing preserued the race of them, and restored the true Religion, which the late Princes of that house, by attempting to eradicate, failed but a little, of rooting vp themselues, and all their issue. Yet his honorable Funerall seemes to haue beene giuen to him, at the motion of the people; it being said, They buried him in the Citie of Dauid. As for the King himselfe, who did owe to him no lesse than his Crowne and life, he is not likely to haue beene Author of it, seeing that he was as easily comforted after his death, as if he had thereby beene discharged of some heauie debt.

For after the death of Iehoiada, when the Princes of Iuda began to flatter their King, he soone forgat, not onely the benefits, receiued by this worthie man his old Counsellour, but also the good precepts which he had receiued from him, yea and God himselfe, the Author of all goodnesse. These Princes drew him to the worship of Idols, wherewith Iehoram and Athalia had so infected the Countrie, in fifteene or sixeteene yeeres; that thirty yeeres, or there-about, of the reigne of Ioas, wherein the true Religion was exercised, were not able to cleere it from that mischiefe. The King himselfe, when once he was entred into these courses, ran on head-long, as one that thought it a token of his libertie, to despise the seruice of God; and a manifest proofe of his being now King indeede, that he regarded no longer the sowre admonitions of deuout Priests. Hereby it appeares, that his former zeale was onely counterfaited, wherein like an Actor vpon the stage, he had striuen to expresse much more liuely affection, than they could shew, that were indeede religious.

§. III.

The causes and times of the Syrians inuading Iuda in the dayes of Ioas.

BVt God, from whom he was broken loose, gaue him ouer into the hands of men, that would not easily be shaken off. Hazael King of Aram, hauing taken Gath, a Towne of the Philistims, addressed himselfe towards Ierusalem, whither the little distance of way, and great hope of a rich bootie, did inuite him. He had an Armie heartned by many victories, to hope for more; and for ground of the warre (if his ambition cared for pretences) it was enough, that the Kings of Iuda had assisted the Israëlites, in their enterprises vpon Aram, at Ramoth Gilead. Yet I thinke he did not want some further instigation. For if the Kingdome of Iuda had molested the Aramites, in the time of his predecessour, this was throughly recompensed, by forbearing to succour Israel, and leauing the ten Tribes in their extreame misery, to the fury of Hazael himselfe. Neither is it likely, that Hazael should haue gone about to awake a sleeping Dogge, and stirre vp against himselfe a powerfull enemy, before he had assured the conquest of Israel, that lay betweene Ierusalem and his owne Kingdome, if some opportunity had not performed such easie and good successe, as might rather aduance, than any way disturbe his future proceedings against the ten Tribes. Wherefore I hold it probable, that the sonnes of Athalia, mentioned before, were with him in this action, promising (as men expelled their Countries vsually doe) to draw many partakers of their owne to his side; and not to remaine, as Ioas did, a neutrall in the warre betweene him and Israel, but to ioyne all their forces with his, as they had cause, for the rooting out of Iehu his posteritie, who, like a bloudy Traytor, had vtterly destroyed all the kindred of the Queenes, their mother, euen the whole house of Ahab, to which he was a subiect. If this were so, Hazael had the more apparant reason to inuade the Kingdome of Iuda. Howsoeuer it were, we finde it plainely, that Ioas was afraid of him, and therefore tooke all the hallowed-things, and all the gold that was found in the treasures of the house of the Lord, or in his owne house, with which present he redeemed his peace: the Syrian (questionlesse) thinking it a better bargaine, to get so much readily paid into his hand for nothing, than to hazard the assurance of this, for for the possibilitie of not much more. So Hazael departed with a rich bootie of vnhappie treasure, which, belonging to the liuing God, remained a small while in the possession of this mighty, yet corruptible man, but sent him quickely to the graue. For in the thirtie seuenth yeere of Ioas, which was the fifteenth of Iehoahaz, hee made this purchase; but in the same or very next yeere hee died, leauing all that he had vnto his Sonne Benhadad, with whom these treasures prospered none otherwise, than ill-gotten goods are wont.

This enterprise of Hazael is, by some, confounded with that warre of the Aramites vpon Iuda, mentioned in the second Booke of Chronicles. But the reasons alleaged by them that hold the contrarie opinion, doe forcibly proue, that it was not all one warre. For the former was compounded without bloud-shed or fight; in the later, Ioas tryed the fortune of a battaile, wherein being put to the worst, he lost all his Princes, and hardlie escaped with life: In the one, Hazael himselfe was present; in the other, hee was not named: but contrariwise, the King of Aram then reigning (who may seeme to haue then beene the Sonne of Hazael) is said to haue beene at Damascus. The first Armie came to conquer, and was so great, that it terrified the King of Iuda; The second was a small company of men, which did animate Ioas (in vaine, for God was against him) to deale with them, as hauing a very great Armie. 2. Chro. 24. 24.

Now, concerning the time of this former inuasion, I cannot perceiue that God forsooke him, till hee had first forsaken God. There are indeed some, very learned, who thinke that this expedition of Hazael was in the time of Iehoiada the Priest, because that storie is ioyned vnto the restauration of the Temple. This had beene probable, if the death of Iehoiada had beene afterwards mentioned in that place of the second Booke of Kings; or if the Apostasie of Ioas, or any other matter implying so much, had followed in the relation. For it is not indeed to be doubted, that the Lord of all may dispose of all things, according to his owne will and pleasure, neither was hee more vniust in the afflictions of Iob that righteous man, or the death of Iosias that godly King, than in the plagues which he laid vpon Pharaoh, or his iudgements vpon the house of Ahab. But it appeares plainly, that the rich furniture of the Temple, and the magnificent seruice of God therewithall, which are ioyned together, were vsed in the house of the Lord continually, all the dayes of Iehoiada; soone after whose death, if not immediately vpon it, that is (as some very learnedly collect) in the sixe, or thirty seuenth yeere of this Ioas his reigne, the King falling away from the God of his Fathers, became a foule Idolater. 2. Chro. 24. 14.

And indeed we commonly obserue, that the crosses which it hath pleased God sometimes to lay vpon his seruants, without any cause notorious in the eyes of men, haue alwaies tended vnto the bettering of their good. In which respect, euen the sufferings of the blessed Martyrs (the death of his Saints being precious in the sight of the Lord) are to their great aduantage. But with euill and rebellious men, God keepeth a more euen & strict account; permitting vsually their faults to get the start of their punishment, and either delaying his vengeance (as with the Amorites) till their wickednesse be full: or not working their amendment by his correction, but suffering them to runne on in their wicked courses, to their greater miserie. So hath he dealt with many; and so it appeares that hee dealt with Ioas. For this vnhappie man did not onely continue an obstinate Idolater, but grew so forgetfull of God and all goodnesse, as if hee had strouen to exceed the wickednesse of all that went before him, and to leaue such a villainous patterne vnto others, as few or none of the most barbarous Tyrants should endure to imitate. Psal 115. 15.

§. LIIII.

How Zachatia was murdered by Ioas.

Vndry Prophets hauing laboured in vaine to reclaime the people from their superstition, Zacharia the sonne of Iehoiada the Priest, was stirred vp at length by the Spirit of God, to admonish them of their wickednesse, and make them vnderstand the punishment due vnto it, whereof they stood in danger. This Zacharia was a man so much honoured, and sonne to a man so exceedingly beloued in his lifetime, and reuerenced, that if Ioas had reputed him (as Ahab did Elias) his open enemie, yet ought hein common honestie, to haue cloaked his ill affection, and haue vsed at leaſt ſome part of the reſpect that was due to ſuch a perſon: On the other ſide, the ſingular affection which he and his father had borne vnto the King, and the vnrecountable benefits, which they had done vnto him, from his firſt infancie, were ſuch, as ſhould haue placed Zacharia in the moſt hearty and aſſured loue of Ioas, yea though he had been otherwiſe a man of very ſmall marke, and not very good condition. The truth is, that the meſſage of a Prophet ſent from God, ſhould be heard with reuerence, how ſimple ſoeuer he appeares that brings it. But this King Ioas, hauing already ſcorned the admonitions and proteſtations of ſuch Prophets as firſt were ſent, did now deale with Zacharia, like as the wicked husbandmen in that parable of our Sauiour, dealt with the heyre of the Vineyard; who ſaid, This is the heyre, come let vs kill him that the inheritance may be ours. By killing Zacharia he thought to become an abſolute Commander, ſuppoſing belike that he was no free Prince, as long as one durſt tell him the plaine truth, how great ſoeuer that mans deſeruing were, that did ſo, yea though Gods commandement required it. So they conſpired againſt this holy Prophet, and ſtoned him to death at the Kings appointment; but whether by any forme of open Law, as was practiſed vpon Naboth; or whether ſurpriſing him by any cloſe treacherie, I doe neyther reade, nor can coniecture. The dignitie of his perſon, conſidered together with their treacherous conſpiracie, makes it probable, that they durſt not call him into publique iudgement, though that the manner of his death, being ſuch as was commonly, and by order of Law, inflicted vpon malefactors, may argue the contrarie. Moſt likely it is, that the Kings commaundement, by which hee ſuffered, tooke place in ſtead of Law: which exerciſe of meere power (as hath beene alreadie noted) was nothing ſtrange amongſt the Kings of Iuda.

Luke 20. 14.

§. V.

How Ioas was ſhamefully beaten by the Aramites, and of his death.

THis odious murther, committed by an vnthankefull ſnake vpon the man in whoſe boſome he had beene foſtered, as of it ſelfe alone it ſufficed, to make the wretched Tyrant hatefull to men of his owne time, and his memorie deteſted in all ages; ſo had it the well-deſcribed curſe of the bleſſed Martyr, to accompany it vnto the throne of God, and to call for vengeance from thence, which fell downe ſwiftly, and heauily vpon the head of that vngratefull monſter. It was the laſt yeere of his reigne; the end of his time comming then vpon him, when hee thought himſelfe beginning to liue how he liſted without controulement. When that yeere was expired, the Aramites came into the Countrie, rather as may ſeeme to get pillage, than to performe any great action; for they came with a ſmall companie of men: but God had intended to doe more by them, than they themſelues did hope for.

2. Chro. 24. 24.

That Ioas naturally was a coward, his bloudie malice againſt his beſt friend, is, in my iudgement proofe ſufficient: though otherwiſe his baſe compoſition with Hazael, when he might haue leauied (as his ſonne after him did muſter) three hundred thouſand choſen men for the warre, doth well enough ſhew his temper. Yet now he would needs be valiant, and make his people know, how ſtout of diſpoſition their King was, when hee might haue his owne will. But his timorous heart was not well cloaked. For to encounter with a few bands of Rouers, hee tooke a verie great Armie, ſo that wiſe men might well perceiue, that he knew what he did, making ſhew as if he would fight for his Countrie, and expoſe himſelfe to danger of warre, when as indeed all was meere oſtentation, and no perill to be feared; hee going forth ſo ſtronglie appointed, againſt ſo weake enemies. Thus might wiſe men thinke, and laugh at him in ſecret; conſidering what adoe he made about that, which in all apparent reaſon was (as they ſay) a thing of nothing. But God, before whom the wiſedome of this world is fooliſhneſſe, did laugh not onely at this vaine-glorious King, but at them that thought their King ſecure, by reaſon of the multitude that he drew along with him.

When the Aramites and King Ioas met, whether it were by ſome folly of the Leaders, or by ſome amazement happening among the Souldiers, or by whatſoeuer meanes it pleaſed God to worke, ſo it was, that that great Army of Iuda receiued a notable ouer-throw, and all the Princes were deſtroyed: the Princes of Iuda, at whoſe perſwaſion the King had become a Rebell to the King of Kings. As for Ioas himſelfe (as Abulenſis and others expound expound the storie) he was sorely beaten and hurt by them, being (as they thinke) taken and shamefully tormented, to wring out of him an excessiue ransome.

And surely, all circumstances doe greatly strengthen this conjecture. For the text (in the old translation) saith, they exercised vpon Ioas ignominious iudgements; and that departing from him, they dismissed him in great languor. All which argues, that they had him in their hands, and handled him ill-fauouredly. Now at that time Ioas the sonne of Iehoahaz reigned ouer Israel, and Benhadad the sonne of Hazael ouer the Syrians in Damascus; the one a valiant vnder-taking Prince, raised vp by God to restore the State of his miserable Countrie; the other inferiour euery way to his father, of whose purchases hee lost a great part, for want of skill to keepe it. The difference in condition found betweene these two Princes, promising no other euent than such as afterward followed, might haue giuen to the King of Iuda good cause to be bold, and plucke vp his spirits, which Hazael had beaten downe, if God had not beene against him. But his fearefull heart beeing likely to quake vpon any apprehension of danger, was able to put the Syrian King in hope, that by terrifying him with some shew of Warre at his doores, it were easie to make him craue any tolerable conditions of peace. The vnexpected good successe hereof, already related, and the (perhaps as inexpected) ill successe, which the Aramites found in their following Warres against the King of Israel, sheweth plainely the weakenesse of all earthly might, resisting the power of the Almightie. For by his Ordinance, both the Kingdome of Iuda, after more then fortie yeeres time of gathering strength, was vnable to driue out a small companie of Enemies; and the Kingdome of Israel, hauing so been trodden downe by Hazael, that onely fifty Horsemen, tenne Chariots, and tenne thousand Foot-men were left; preuailed against his Sonne, and recouered all from the victorious Aramites. But examples heereof are euerie-where found, and therefore I will not insist vpon this; though indeed wee should not, if wee be Gods children, thinke it more tedious to heare long and frequent reports of our heauenly Fathers honour, than of the noble actes performed by our fore-father vpon earth.

When the Aramites had what they listed, & saw that they were not able, being so few, to take any possession of the Countrie, they departed out of Iuda loaden with spoyle, which they sent to Damascus, themselues belike falling vpon the ten Tribes, where it is to be thought that they sped not halfe so well. The King of Iuda being in ill case, was killed on his bed when he came home, by the sonnes of an Ammoniteſſe, and of a Moabiteſſe, whom some (because onely their Mothers names, being strangers, are expressed) thinke to haue beene bond-men. Whether it were contempt of his fortune, or feare, lest (as Tyrants vse) he should reuenge his disaster vpon them, imputing it to their fault, or whatsoeuer else it were that animated them to murder their King; the Scripture tels vs plainlie, that, For the bloud of the children of Iehoiada, this befell him. And the same appeares to haue beene vsed as the pretence of their conspiracie, in excuse of the fact when it was done. For Amazia, the sonne aud successor of Ioas, durst not punish them, till his Kingdome was established: but contrariwise, his bodie was judged vnworthie of buriall in the Sepulchers of the Kings: whereby it appeares, that the death of Zacharia caused the treason, wrought against the King, to find more approbation, than was requisite, among the people, though afterwards it was recompensed by his Sonne, vpon the Traytors, with well-deserued death. 2 Chron. 24. 25

Of the Princes liuing in the time of Ioas: of the time when Carthage was built; and of Dido.

HEre liued with Ioas, Mezades and Diognetus in Athens; Eudemus and Aristomedes in Corinth: about which time Agrippa Sylaius, and after him Syluius Alladius, were Kings of the Albans in Italie. Ocrazapes, commonly called Anacyndaraxes, the thirtie seuenth King succeeding vnto Ophratanes, began his reigne ouer the Assyrians, about the eighteenth yeere of Ioas, which lasted fortie two yeeres. In the sixteenth of Ioas, Cephrenes, the fourth from Sesac, succeeded vnto Cheops in the Kingdome of Ægypt, and held it fiftie yeeres.

In this time of Ioas, was likewise the reigne of Pigmalion in Tyre; and the foundation of of Carthage by Dido; the building of which Citie is, by diuers Authors, placed in diuers ages, some reporting it to be 70. yeeres yonger than Rome; others aboue 400. yeeres elder, few or none of them giuing any reason of their assertions, but leauing vs vncertaine whom to follow: Iosephus, who had read the Annals of Tyre, counting one hundred fortie and three yeeres and eight moneths from the building of Salomons Temple, in the twelfth yeere of Hyram King of Tyre, to the founding of Carthage by Dido, in the seuenth of Pigmalion. The particulars of this accompt (which is not rare in Iosephus) are very perplexed, and serue not very well to make cleere the totall summe. But whether it were so that Iosephus did omit, or else that he did mis-write some number of the yeeres, which he reckoneth in Fractions, as they were diuided among the Kings of Tyre, from Hyram to Pigmalion, we may well enough beleeue, that the Tyrian writers, out of whose bookes hee giues vs the whole summe, had good meanes to know the truth, and could rightlie reckon the difference of time, betweene two workes no longer following one the other, than the memorie of three or foure generations might easily reach. This hundred fortie and foure yeeres current, after the building of Salomons Temple, being the eleuenth yeere of Ioas, was a hundred fortie and three yeeres before the birth of Rome, and after the destruction of Troy, two hundred eighty and nine: a time so long after the death of Æneas, that wee might truely conclude all to be fabulous which Virgil hath written of Dido, as Ausonius noteth, who doth honour her Statua with this Epigram:

Auso. Ep. 117.

ILla ego sum Dido vultu quam conspicis hospes,
Assimulata modis pulchra & mirificis.
Talis eram, sed non Maro quam mihi finxit, erat mens,
Vita nec incesti lata cupidinibus, (Nam q. nec Æneas vidit me Troius vnquam
Nec Lybiam aduenit, classibus Iliacis.
Sed furias fugiens, atq. arma procacis Iarbæ,
Seruaui, fateor, morte pudicitiam;
Pectore transfixo, castos quod pertulit enses)
Non furor, aut laeso crudus amore dolor.
Sic cecidisse iuuat: vixi sine vulnere famæ,
Vlta virum, positis mœnibus oppetij.
Inuida cur in me stimulasti Musa Maronem,
Fingeret vt nostra damna pudicitiæ?
Vos magis Historicis lectores credite de me
Quam qui furta Deum concubitusq. canunt.
Falsidici vates: temerant qui carmine verum,
Humanisq. deos assimulant vitijs.

Which in effect is this,

I Am that Dido which thou heere do'st see,
Cunningly framed in beauteous Imag'rie.
Like this I was, but had not such a soule,
As Maro fained, incestuous and foule.
Æneas neuer with his Troian hoast
Beheld my face, or landed on this coast.
But flying proud Iarbas villanie,
Not mou'd by furious loue or iealousie;
I did with weapon chaste, to saue my fame,
Make way for death vntimely, ere it came.
This was my end; but first I built a Towne, Reueng'd my husbands death, liu'd with renowne.
Why did'st thou stirre vp Virgil, enuious Muse,
Falsely my name and honour to abuse?
Readers beleeue Historians; not those Which to the world loues thefts and vice expose.
Poets are lyers, and for verses sake
Will make the gods of humane crimes partake.

From

From the time of Dido vnto the first Punick warre, that Carthage grew and flourished in wealth and conquests, we finde in many histories: but in particular wee finde little of the Carthaginian affaires before that warre, excepting those few things that are recorded of their attempts of the Isle of Sicil. Wee will therefore deferre the relation of matters concerning that mightie Citie, vntill such time as they shall encounter with the State of Rome, by which it was finally destroyed; and prosecute in the meane while the Historie that is now in hand.

§. VII.

The beginning of Amazia his reigne. Of Ioas King of Israel, and Elisha the Prophet.

Amazias, the sonne of Ioash, being twenty fiue yeeres old when his Father died, tooke possession of the Kingdome of Iuda, wherein he laboured so to demeane himselfe, as his new beginning reigne might be least offensiue. The Law of Moses he professed to obserue; which howsoeuer it had beene secretly despised since the time of Iehoram, by many great persons of the Land, yet had it by prouision of good Princes, yea and of bad ones (in their best times) imitating the good, but especially by the care of holy Priests, taken such deepe root in the peoples hearts, that no King might hope to be very plausible, who did not conforme himselfe vnto it. And at that present time, the slaughter, which the Aramites had made of all the Princes, who had withdrawne the late King from the seruice of God, being seconded by the death of the King himselfe, euen whilest that execrable murther, committed by the King vpon Zecharia, was yet fresh in memorie, did serue as a notable example of Gods justice against Idolaters, both to animate the better sort of the people in holding the Religion of their fathers, and to discourage Amazia from following the way, which led to such an euill end. He therefore, hauing learned of his father the arte of dissimulation, did not onely forbeare to punish the Traytors that had slaine King Ioas, but gaue way to the time, and suffered the dead body to be interred, as that of Iehoram formerly had beene, in the City of Dauid, yet not among the Sepulchers of the Kings of Iuda. Neuertheless, after this, when (belike) the noyse of the people hauing wearied it selfe into silence, it was found that the Conspirators (howsoeuer their deed done, was applauded as the handie-worke of God) had neither any mighty partakers in their fact, nor strong maintainers of their persons, but rested secure, as hauing done well, seeing it was not ill taken: the King, who perceiued his gouernment well established, called them into question, at such a time, as the heate of mens affections being well allayed, it was easie to distinguish between their treasons and Gods judgements, which, by their treasons had taken plausible effect. So they were put to death without any tumult, and their children (as the Law did require) were suffered to liue; which could not but giue contentment to the people, seeing that their King did the office of a iust Prince, rather than of a reuenging sonne. This being done, and his owne life better secured, by such exemplary justice, against the like attempts; Amazia carried himselfe outwardly as a Prince well affected to Religion, and so continued in rest, about twelue or thirteene yeeres.

As Amazia gathered strength in Iuda by the commoditie of a long peace, so Ioas the Israelite grew as fast in power, by following the warre hotly against the Aramites. Hee was a valiant and fortunate Prince, yet an Idolater, as his Predecessors had beene; worshipping the Calues of Ieroboam. For this sinne had God so plagued the house of Iehu, that the tenne Tribes wanted little of being vtterly consumed, by Hazael and Benhadad, in the time of Iehu and his sonne Iehoahaz. But as Gods benefits to Iehu, sufficed not to with-draw him from this politique Idolatrie, so were the miseries, rewarding that impietie, vnable to reclaime Iehoahaz from the same impious course: yet the mercy of God beholding the trouble of Israel, did condescend vnto the prayers of this vngodlie Prince, euen then when hee and his miserable subiects, were obstinate in following their owne abhominable waies. Therefore in temporall matters the tenne Tribes recouered apace, but the fauour of God, which had beene infinitely more worth, I doe not finde, nor beleeue, that they sought; that they had it not, I finde in the words of the Prophet, saying plainely to Amazia, The Lord is not with Israel, neither with all the house of Ephraim. 2. Chron. 25. 7.

Whether

Whether it were so, that the great Prophet Elisha, who liued in those times, did foretell the prosperitie of the Israelites vnder the Reigne of Ioas; or whether Iehoahaz, wearied and broken with long aduersitie, thought it the wisest way, to discharge himselfe in part of the heauie cares attending those vnhappy Syrian Warres, by laying the burthen vpon his hopefull sonne; wee finde that in the thirtie-seuenth yeere of Ioas, King of Iuda, Ioas the sonne of Iehoahaz began to reigne ouer Israel in Samaria, which was in the 15. yeere of his fathers reigne, and some two or three yeers before his death.

2. Kings 13. 10.

It appeares that this young Prince, euen from the beginning of his Rule, did so well husband that poore stocke that he receiued from his Father, often Chariots, fiftie Horsemen, and ten thousand Foot, that he might seeme likely to proue a thriuer. Amongst other circumstances, the words which he spake to Elisha the Prophet, argue no lesse. For Ioas visiting the Prophet, who lay sicke, spake vnto him thus; O my father, my father, the Chariot of Israel, and the horse-men of the same: by which manner of speech he did acknowledge, that the prayers of this holy man had stood his Kingdome in more stead, than all the Horses and Chariots could doe.

2. Kin. 13. 14.

This Prophet who succeeded vnto Elias, about the first yeere of Ioram the sonne of Ahab King of Israel, died (as some haue probably collected) about the third or fourth yeere of this Ioas, the Nephew of Iehu. To shew how the spirit of Elias was doubled, or did rest vpon him; it exceedeth my facultie. This is recorded of him, that hee did not onely raise a dead childe vnto life, as Elias had done, but when hee himselfe was dead, it pleased God that his dead bones should restore life vnto a carcasse, which touched them in the graue. In fine, hee bestowed, as a legacie, three victories vpon King Ioas, who thereby did set Israel in a faire way of recouering all that the Aramites had vsurped, and weakening the Kings of Damasco in such sort, that they were neuer after terrible to Samaria.

§. VIII.

Of Amazia his warre against Edom; His Apostasie; and ouerthrow by Ioas.

THe happie successe which Ioas had found in his warre against the Aramites, was such as might kindle in Amazia a desire of vndertaking some expedition, wherein himselfe might purchase the like honour. His kingdome could furnish three hundred thousand seruiceable men for the Warres; and his treasures were sufficient for the payment of these, and the hire of many more. Cause of warre hee had very iust against the Edomites, who hauing rebelled in the time of his grand-father Iehoram, had about fifty yeeres beene vnreclaimed, partly by reason of the troubles happening in Iuda, partly through the sloth and timerousnesse of his father Ioas. Yet, forasmuch as the men of Iuda had in many yeeres beene without all exercise of Warre (excepting that vnhappie fight wherein they were beaten by a few bands of the Aramites) he held it a point of wisedome to increase his forces, with souldiers waged out of Israel, whence he hired for an hundred talents of siluer, an hundred thousand valiant men, as the Scripture telleth vs, though Iosephus diminish the number, saying that they were but twentie thousand.

2. Chron. 25. 6. Ios. Antiq. Iud. lib. 9. c. 10.

This great Armie, which with so much cost Amazia had hired out of Israel, hee was faine to dismisse, before he had imployed it, being threatned by a Prophet with ill successe, if he strengthened himselfe with the helpe of those men, whom God (though in mercy hee gaue them victorie against the cruell Aramites) did not loue, because they were Idolaters. The Israelites therefore departed in great anger, taking in ill part this dismission, as an high disgrace; which to reuenge, they fell vpon a piece of Iuda in their returne, and shewed their malice in the slaughter of three thousand men; and some spoyle, which they carried away. But Amazia with his owne forces, knowing that God would bee assistant to their journey, entered couragiously into the Edomites Countrie; ouer whom obtaining victorie, he slew ten thousand, and tooke other ten thousand prisoners, all which hee threw from an high rocke, holding them, it seemes, rather as Traytors, than as iust enemies. This victorie did not seeme to reduce Edom vnder the subiection of the Crowne of Iuda, which might bee the cause of that seueritie, which was vsed to the prisoners; the Edomites that had escaped, refusing to buy the liues of their friends and kinsmen at so deare a rate, as the losse of their owne libertie. Some townes in mount

Seir,

Seir, Amazia tooke, as appeares by his carrying away the Idols thence; but it is like they were the places most indefensible, in that he left no garrisons there, whereby hee might another yeere the better haue pursued the conquest of the whole Countrie. Howsoeuer it were, he got both honour by the iourney, and gaines enough, had he not lost himselfe.

Among other spoyles of the Edomites, were carried away their gods, which being vanquished and taken prisoners, did deserue well to be led in triumph. But they contrariwise I know not by what strange witchcraft, so besotted this vnworthy King Amazia, that hee set them vp to be his gods, and worshipped them, and burned incense vnto them. 2 Chron. 25. 14

For this when hee was rebuked by a Prophet sent from God, hee gaue a churlish and threatning answere; asking the Prophet, Who made him a Counseller, and bidding him hold his peace for feare of the worst. If either the costly stuffe, whereof these Idols were made, or the curious workemanship and beautie, with which they were adorned by Artificers, had rauished the Kings fancie; me thinkes, hee should haue rather turned them to matter of profit, or kept them as house-hold ornaments and things of pleasure, than thereby haue suffered himselfe to be blinded, with such vnreasonable deuotion towards them. If the superstitious account, wherein the Edomites had held them, were able to worke much vpon his imagination; much more should the bad seruice which they had done to their old Clients, haue moued him thereupon to laugh, both at the Edomites, and them. Wherefore it seemes to me, that the same affections carried him from God, vnto the seruice of Idols, which afterwards mooued him to talke so roughly to the Prophet reprehending him. He had already obeyed the warning of God by a Prophet, and sent away such auxiliarie forces as he had gathered out of Israel; which done, it is said, that he was encouraged, and led forth his people, thinking belike, that God would now rather assist him by miracle, than let him faile of obtaining all his hearts desire. But with better reason hee should haue limited his desires by the will of God, whose pleasure it was, that Esau hauing broken the yoke of Iacob from hic necke, accordingly as Isaac had foretold, should no more become his seruant. If therefore Amazia did hope to reconquer all the Countrie of Edom, hee failed of his expectation; yet so, that he brought home both profit and honour, which might haue well contented him. 2 Chron. 25. 15

But there is a foolish and a wretched pride, wherewith men being transported, can ill endure to ascribe vnto God the honour of those actions, in which it hath pleased him to vse their owne industrie, courage, or fore-sight. Therefore it is commonly seene, that they, who entring into battaile, are carefull to pray for aide from heauen, with due acknowledgement of his power, who is the giuer of victorie; when the field is wonne, doe vaunt of their owne exploits: one telling how hee got such a ground of aduantage; another, how he gaue checke to such a battalion; a third, how he seized on the enemies Canon; euery one striuing to magnifie himselfe, whilest all forget God, as one that had not beene present in the action. To ascribe to fortune the effects of another mans vertue, is, I confesse, an argument of malice. Yet this is true, that as hee which findeth better successe, than he did, or in reason might expect, is deepely bound to acknowledge God the Author of his happinesse; so he whose meere wisedome and labour hath brought things to a prosperous issue, is doubly bound to shew himselfe thankefull, both for the victory, and for those vertues by which the victorie was gotten. And indeed so farre from weakenesse is the nature of such thankesgiuing, that it may well be called the height of magnanimity; no vertue being so truly heroicall, as that by which the spirit of man aduanceth it selfe with confidence of acceptation, vnto the loue of God. In which sense it is a braue speech that Euander in Virgil, vseth to Aneas, none but a Christian being capable of the admonition:

Aude hospes contemnere opes, & te quoque dignum
Finge Deo.

With this Philosophie Amazia (as appears by his cariage) troubled not his head: he had shewed himselfe a better man of warre than any King of Iuda, since the time of Iehosaphat, and could be well contented, that his people should thinke him little inferior to Dauid: of which honour he saw no reason why the Prophets should rob him, who had made him lose an hundred talents, and done him no pleasure; hee hauing preuailed by plaine force and good conduct, without any miracle at all. That hee was distempered with such vaine thoughts as these (besides the witnesse of his impietie following) Iosephus doth testifie; Ios. Ant. l. 9. c. 10.

testifie; saying, That he despised God, and that being puft vp with his good successe, of which neuertheless he would not acknowledge God to be the Author, he commanded Ioas King of Israel to become his subject, and to let the tenne Tribes acknowledge him their Soueraigne, as they had done his Ancestors King Dauid and Salomon. Some thinke that his quarrell to Ioas was rather grounded vpon the iniurie done to him by the Israelites, whom hee dismissed in the journey against Mount Seir. And likely it is, that the sense of a late wrong had more power to stirre him vp, than the remembrance of an olde title, forgotten long since, and by himselfe neglected thirteene or foureteene yeeres. Neuertheless it might so be, that when he was thus prouoked, hee thought it not enough to requite new wrongs, but would also call old matters into question; that so the Kings of Israel might, at the least, learne to keepe their subjects from offending Iuda, for feare of endangering their owne Crownes. Had Amazia desired onely recompence for the injurie done to him, it is not improbable that hee should haue had some reasonable answere from Ioas, who was not desirous to fight with him. But the answere which Ioas returned, likening himselfe to a Cedar, and Amazia in respect of him to no better than a thistle, shewes that the challenge was made in insolent tearmes, stuft perhaps with such proud comparison of Nobilitie, as might bee made (according to that which Iosephus had written) betweene a King of ancient race, and one of lesse nobilitie than vertue.

Sophocles in Aiace Lor. It is by Sophocles reported of Aiax, that when going to the warre of Troy, his father did bid him to be valiant, and get victorie by Gods assistance, he made answere, That by Gods assistance, a coward could get victorie, but hee would get it alone without such helpe: after which proud speech, though he did many valiant acts, he had small thanks, and finally killing himselfe in a madnesse, whereinto hee fell vpon disgrace receiued, was hardly allowed the honour of buriall. That Amazia did vtter such words, I doe not finde: but hauing once entertained the thoughts, which are parents of such words, hee was rewarded with successe according. The verie first counsaile wherein this warre was concluded, serues to prooue that hee was a wise Prince indeed at Ierusalem, among his Parasites; but a foole when he had to deale with his equals abroad. For it was not all one, to fight with the Edomites, a weake people, trusting more in the site of their Countrey, than the valour of their Souldiers; and to encounter with Ioas, who from so poore beginnings had raysed himselfe to such strength, that hee was able to lend his friend a hundred thousand men, and had all his Nation exercised, and trained vp, in a long victorious warre. But as Amazia discouered much want of judgemen, in vndertaking such a match; so in prosecuting the businesse, when it was set on foot, hee behaued himselfe as a man of little experience, who hauing once onely tried his fortune, and found it to bee good, thought that in Warre there was nothing else to doe, than send a defiance, fight, and winne. Ioas on the contrarie side, hauing beene accustomed to deale with a stronger enemy than the King of Iuda, vsed that celeritie, which peraduenture had often stood him in good stead against the Aramite. Hee did not sit waiting till the enemies brake in and wasted his Countrie, but presented himselfe with an Armie in Iuda, readie to bid battaile to Amazia, and saue him the labour of a long iournie. This could not but greatly discourage those of Iuda; who (besides the impression of feare which an inuasion beates into people, not inured to the like) hauing deuoured, in their greedie hopes, the spoyle of Israel, fully perswading themselues to get as much, and at as easie rate as in the iournie of Edom; were so farre disappointed of their expectation, that well they might suspect all new assurance of good lucke, when the olde had thus beguiled them. All this notwithstanding, their King that had stomack enough to challenge the Patrimonie of Salomon, thought like another Dauid to winne it by the sword. The issue of which foole-hardinesse might easily haue beene foreseene in humane reason; comparing together, either the two Kings, or the qualitie of their Armies, or the first and ominous beginning of the Warre. But meere humane wisedome, howsoeuer it might foresee much, could not haue prognosticated all the mischiefe that fell vpon Amazia. For as soone as the two Armies came in sight, God, whose helpe this wretched man had so despised, did (as Iosephus reports it) strike such terrour and amazement into the men of Iuda, that without one blow giuen, they fled all away, leauing their King to shift for himselfe; which hee did so ill, that his enemie had soone caught him, and made him change his glorious humour into most abiect basenesse. That the Armie which fled, sustained any other losse than of honour, I neither finde in the Scriptures nor in Iosephus; it being likely that the soone beginning of their flight, which made it the more shamefull, made it also the more safe. But of the mischiefe that followed this ouerthrow, it was Gods will that Amazia himselfe should sustaine the whole disgrace. For Ioas carried him directly to Ierusalem, where he bad him procure that the gates might be opened to let him in and his Armie; threatning him otherwise with present death. So much amazed was the miserable caytiue, with these dreadfull words, that he durst do no other, than perswade the Citizens, to yeeld themselues to the mercie of the Conqueror. The Towne, which afterwards being in weaker state, held out two yeeres, against Nebuchadnezzar, was vtterly dismayed, when the King, that should haue giuen his life to saue it, vsed all his force of command and intreaty to betray it. So the gates of Ierusalem were opened to Ioas, with which honour (greater than any King of Israel had euer obtained) he could not rest contented, but, the more to despite Amazia and his people, hee cause 400. cubits of the wall to be throwne down, and entred the Citie in his Chariot through that breach, carrying the King before him, as in triumph. This done, he sackt the Temple, and the Kings Palace, and so, taking hostages of Amazia, he dismissed the poore creature that was glad of his life, and returned to Samaria.

A discourse of the reasons hindering Ioas from vniting Iuda to the Crowne of Israel, when he had wonne Ierusalem, and held Amazia prisoner. The end of Ioas his Reigne.

WEe may iustly maruell how it came to passe, that Ioas, being thus in possession of Ierusalem, hauing the King in his hands, his enemies forces broken, & his owne entire, could be so content to depart quietly, with a little spoyle, when he might haue seized vpon the whole Kingdome. The reigne of Athalia had giuen him cause to hope, that the issue of Dauid might be dispossessed of that crowne; his owne Nobilitie, being the sonne and grand-childe of Kings, together with the famous acts that hee had done, were enough to make the people of Iuda thinke highly of him; who might also haue preferred his forme of gouernment, before that of their owne Kings, especially at such a time, when a long succession of wicked Princes had smothered the thanks, which were due to the memorie of a few good ones. The commodity that would haue ensued, vpon the vnion of all the twelue Tribes, vnder one Prince, is so apparant, that I need not to insist on it. That any message from God forbad the Israelite (as afterwards in the victorie which Peka the sonne of Romelia got vpon Ahaz) to turne his present aduantage, to the best vse, wee doe not reade. All this makes it the more difficult to resolue the question, why a Prince so well exercised, as Ioas had beene, in recouering his owne, and winning from his enemy, should forsake the possession of Ierusalem, and wilfully neglect the possibilities, or rather cast away the full assurance of so faire a conquest, as the kingdome of Iuda.

But concerning that point, which, of all others, had beene most materiall, I meane the desire of the vanquished people to accept the Israelite for their King, it is plainely seene, that entring Ierusalem in triumphant manner, Ioas was vnable to concoct his owne prosperitie. For the opening of the gates had beene enough to haue let him not onely into the Citie, but into the Royall Throne, and the peoples hearts, whom by faire intreatie (especially hauing sure meanes of compulsion) he might haue made his owne, when they saw themselues betrayed, and basely giuen away by him whose they had beene before. The faire marke which this opportunity presented, hee did not ayme at, because his ambition was otherwise and more meanely busied, in leuelling at the glory of a triumphant entrie through a breach. Yet this errour might afterwards haue been corrected well enough, if entring as an enemie, and shewing what he could doe, by spending his anger vpon the walls, he had within the Citie done offices of a friend, and laboured to shew good will to the inhabitants. But when his pride had done, his couetousnesse beganne, and sought to please it selfe, with that which is commonly most readie to the spoyler, yet should be most forborne. The Treasure wherewith Sesac, Hazael, and the Philistims, men ignorant of the true God and his Religion, had quenched their greedy thirst, ought not to haue tempted the appetite of Ioas, who though an Idolatour, yet acknowledged also and worshipped the eternall God, whose Temple was at Ierusalem. Therefore when the people saw him take his way directly to seise that holy place, and lay his rauenous hands vpon the consecrated vessels, calling the family of Obed Edom (whose children had hereditarie charge of the treasurie) to a strict account, as if they had beene Officers of his owne Exchequer; they considered him rather as an execrable Church-robber, than as a Noble Prince, an Israelite and their brother, though of another Tribe. Thus following that course, which the most vertuous King of our age (taxing it with the same phrase) hath wisely auoyded; by stealing a few Apples, he lost the inheritance of the whole Orchard. The people detested him, and after the respite of a few dayes, might by comparing themselues one to one, perceiue his Souldiers to be no better than men of their owne mould, and inferiour in number to the inhabitants of so great a Citie. It is not so easie to hold by force a mighty towne entered by capitulation, as to enter the gates opened by vnaduised feare. For when the Citizens, not being disarmed, recouer their spirits, and begin to vnderstand their first errour; they will thinke vpon euery aduantage, of place, of prouisions, of multitude, yea of women armed with tile-stones; and rather choose by desperate resolution, to correct the euils growne out of their former cowardice, than suffer those mischiefes to poyson the body, which in such halfe-conquests, are easily tasted in the mouth. A more liuely example hereof cannot be desired, than the Citie of Florence, which through the weak eneste of Peter de Medices, gouerning therein as a Prince, was reduced into such hard tearmes, that it opened the gates vnto the French King Charles the Eighth, who not plainely professing himselfe either friend or foe to the Estate, entred the Towne, with his Armie, in triumphant manner, himselfe and his horse armed, with his lance vpon his thigh. Many insolencies were therein committed by the French, and much argument of quarrell ministred, betweene them and the Townes-men: so farre forth that the Florentines, to preserue their liberty, were driuen to prepare for fight. To conclude the matter, Charles propounds intollerable conditions, demanding huge summes of ready money, and the absolute Signorie of the State, as conquered by him, who entred the Citie in Armes. But Peter Caponi, a principall Citizen, catching these Articles from the Kings Secretarie, and tearing them before his face, bad him sound his Trumpets, and they would ring their Bels: which peremptorie words made the French bethinke themselues, and come readily to this agreement, that for fortie thousand pounds, and not halfe of that money to be paid in hand, Charles should not onely depart in peace, but restore whatsoeuer he had of their Dominion, and continue their assured friend. So dangerous a matter did it seeme for that braue Armie, which in few moneths after wanne the Kingdome of Naples, to fight in the streets, against the armed multitude of that populous Citie. It is true, that Charles had other businesse (and so perhaps had Ioas, as shall anon be shewed) that called him away: but it was the apprehension of imminent danger that made him come to reason. In such cases the firing of houses, vsually drawes euery Citizen to saue his owne, leauing victory to the Souldier: yet where the people are prepared and resolued, women can quench, as fast as the enemy, hauing other things to looke vnto, can set on fire. And indeede that Commander is more giuen to anger than regardfull of profit, who vpon the vncertaine hope of destroying a Towne, forsakes the assurance of a good composition. Diuersity of circumstance may alter the case: it is enough to say, that it might be in Ierusalem, as we know it was in Florence.

1 Chron. 26. 15.

How strongly soeuer Ioas might hold himselfe within Ierusalem, he could not easily depart from thence, with his booty safe, if the Army of Iuda, which had beene more terrified than weakned in the late encounter, should re-enforce it selfe, and giue him a check vpon the way. Wherefore it was wisely done of him, to take hostages for his better security, his Army being vpon returne, and better loden than when it came forth; for which causes it was the more vnapt to fight.

Besides these impediments, within the Citie and without, seruing to coole the ambition of Ioas, and keepe it downe from aspiring to the Crowne of Iuda; it appeares that somewhat was newly fallen out, which had reference to the anger of Elisha the Prophet; who when this Ioas had smitten the ground with his arrowes thrice, told him that he should no oftner smite the Aramites. The three victories which Israel had against Aram, are by some, and with great probability, referred vnto the fifth, sixth and seauenth yeeres of Ioas: after which time, if any loſſes enſuing had blemiſhed the former good ſucceſſe, ill might the King of Iſrael haue likened himſelfe to a ſtately Cedar, and worſe could he haue either lent the Iudæan one hundred thouſand men, or meet him in battell, who was able to bring into the field three hundred thouſand of his owne. Seeing therefore it is made plaine by the words of Eliſha, that after three victories, Ioas ſhould finde ſome change of fortune, and ſuffer loſſe; we muſt needs conclude, That the Aramite preuailed vpon him this yeere, it being the laſt of his Reigne. That this was ſo, and that the Syrians, taking aduantage of Ioas his abſence, gaue ſuch a blow to Iſrael, as the King at his returne was not able to remedie, but rather fell himſelfe into new misfortunes, which increaſed the calamitie, wee may euidently perceiue in that which is ſpoken of Ieroboam his ſonne. For it is ſaid, That the Lord ſaw the exceeding bitter afflictions of Iſrael, and that hauing not decreed to put out the name of Iſrael from vnder the heauen, he preſerued them by the hand of Ieroboam the ſonne of Ioas. This is enough to prooue, that the victorious Reigne of Ioas was concluded with a ſad cataſtrophe; the riches of the Temple haſtning his miſerie and death, as they had done with Seſac, Athalia, and Hazael, and as afterwards they wrought with Antiochus, Craſſus, and other ſacrilegious Potentates.

Thus eyther through indignation conceiued againſt him, by the people of Ieruſalem, and courage which they tooke to ſet vpon him within the Walls: or though preparation of the Armie that lay abroad in the Countrey, to bid him battell in open field, and recouer by a new charge the honour which was loſt at the former encounter; or through the miſeries daily brought vpon his owne Countrey, by the Syrian in his abſence, if not by all of theſe; Ioas was driuen to lay aſide all thought of winning the Kingdome of Iuda; and taking hoſtages for his quiet paſſage, made all haſte homewards, where he found a ſad wel-come, and being vtterly forſaken of his wonted proſperitie, forſooke alſo his life in few moneths after, leauing his Kingdome to Ieroboam the ſecond, his fortunate and valiant ſonne.

The end of Amazia his Reigne and Life.

ANy man is able to gheſſe how Amazia looked, when the enemy had left him. Hee that had vaunted ſo much of his owne great proweſſe and skill in Armes, threatning to worke wonders, and ſet vp a-new the glorious Empire of Dauid, was now vncaſed of his Lyons hide, and appeared nothing ſo terrible a beaſt as hee had beene painted. Much argument of ſcoffing at him he had miniſtred vnto ſuch, as held him in diſlike; which at this time, doubtleſſe, were very many: for the ſhame that falls vpon an inſolent man, ſeldome failes of meeting with abundance of reproach. As for Amazia (beſides that the multitude are alwaies prone to lay the blame vpon their Gouernours, euen of thoſe calamities which happened by their owne default) there was no childe in all Ieruſalem, but knew him to be the root of all this miſchiefe. He had not onelie challenged a good man of Warre, being himſelfe a Daſtard; but when he was beaten and taken by him, had baſely pleaded for the common enemy, to haue him let into the Citie, that with his owne eyes he might ſee what ſpoyle there was, and not make a bad bargaine by heare-ſay. The father of this Amazia, was a beaſtly man; yet when the Aramites tooke him and tormented him, he did not offer to buy his owne life at ſo deare a rate, as the Citie and Temple of Ieruſalem. Had he offered, ſhould they haue made his promiſe good? ſurely the haſt which they had made in condeſcending to this hard match, was very vnfortunate: for by keeping out the Iſraelite (which was eaſie enough) any little while, they ſhould ſoone haue beene rid of him, ſeeing that the Aramites would haue made him runne home, with greater ſpeed than he came forth. Then alſo, when hauing truſſed vp his baggage, he was ready to be gone, a little courage would haue ſerued to perſwade him to leaue his load behind; had not their good King deliuered vp hoſtages, to ſecure his returne, as loath to defraud him of the recompence due to his paines taken.

Such exprobrations could not but vexe the heart of this vnhappie King: it had beene well for him, if they had made him acknowledge his fault vnto God, that had puniſhed him by all this diſhonour. But wee finde no mention of his amendment. Rather it appeares, that hee continued an Idolator to the very laſt. For it is ſaid of him, that after his turning away from the Lord, they wrought treaſon againſt him in Ieruſalem; a manifeſt 2. Chro. 25. 27.

proofe that hee was not reclaimed, vnto his liues end. And certainely, they which tell a man in his aduerſitie of his faults paſſed, ſhall ſooner be thought to vpbraid him with his fortune, than to ſeeke his reformation. Wherefore it is no maruell, that Prieſts and Prophets were leſſe welcome to him, than euer they had beene. On the other ſide, flatterers, and ſuch as were deſirous to put a heart into him, whereof themſelues might alwayes be maſters, wanted not plauſible matter to reuiue him. For hee was not firſt, nor ſecond, of the Kings of Iuda, that had beene ouercome in battell. Dauid himſelfe had abandoned the Citie, leauing it, before the Enemie was in ſight, vnto Abſalom his rebellious ſonne. Many beſides him had receiued loſſes, wherein the Temple bare a part. If Ioas might ſo eaſily haue beene kept out; why did their Anceſtors let Seſac in? Aſa was reputed a vertuous Prince, yet with his owne hands he emptied the Temple, and was not blamed, but held excuſeable by neceſſitie of the State. Belike theſe traducers would commend no actions but of dead Princes: if ſo, hee ſhould rather liue to puniſh them, than to dye to pleaſe them. Though wherein had hee giuen them any cauſe of diſpleaſure? It was hee indeed that commanded to ſet open the gates to Ioas; but it was the people that did it. Good ſeruants ought not to haue obeyed their Maſters Commandements, to his diſaduantage, when they ſaw him not maſter of his owne Perſon. As his captiuitie did acquite him from blame, of all things that hee did or ſuffered in that condition; ſo was that misfortune it ſelfe, in true eſtimation, as highly to his honour, as deepely to his loſſe. For had he beene as haſty to flye, as others were; hee might haue eſcaped, as well as others did. But ſeeking to teach the baſe Multitude courage, by his Royall example, hee was ſhamefully betrayed by thoſe in whom he truſted. Vnworthy creatures that could readily obey him, when ſpeaking another mans words, being priſoner, hee commanded them to yeeld; hauing neglected his charge, when leading them in the field, he bade them ſtand to it and fight like men. The beſt was that they muſt needs acknowledge his miſchance, as the occaſion whereby many thouſand liues were ſaued; the Enemie hauing wiſely preferred the ſurpriſe of a Lion that was Captaine, before the chaſe and ſlaughter of an Army of Stags that followed him.

Theſe or the like words comforting Amazia, were able to perſwade him, that it was euen ſo indeed. And ſuch excuſes might haue ſerued well enough to pleaſe the people, if the King had firſt ſtudied how to pleaſe God. But hee that was vnwilling to aſcribe vnto God the good ſucceſſe foretold by a Prophet; could eaſily finde how to impute this late diſaſter, vnto fortune, and the fault of others. Now concerning fortune, it ſeemes that hee meant to keepe himſelfe ſafe from her, by ſitting ſtill; for in fifteene yeeres following (ſo long he out-liued his honour) we finde not that he ſtirred. As for his ſubiects, though nothing henceforth be recorded of his gouernment, yet wee may ſee by his end, that the middle time was ill ſpent among them, increaſing their hatred, to his owne ruine. He that ſuſpecteth his owne worth, or other mens opinions, thinking the leſſe regard is had of his perſon, than he beleeueth to be due to his place, will commonly ſpend all the force of his authoritie, in purchaſing the name of a ſeuere man. For the affected ſowreneſſe of a vaine fellow, doth many times reſemble the grauitie of one that is wiſe: and the feare wherein they liue, which are ſubiect vnto oppreſſion, carries a ſhew of reuerence, to him that does the wrong; at leaſt it ſerues to dazle the eyes of vnderlings, keeping them from prying into the weakeneſſe of ſuch as haue iuriſdiction ouer them. Thus the time, wherein, by well vſing it, men might attaine to be ſuch as they ought, they do vſually miſ-ſpend, in ſeeking to appeare ſuch as they are not. This is a vain & deceiueable courſe; procuring in ſtead of the reſpect that was hoped for, more indignation than was feared. Which is a thing of dangerous conſequence; eſpecially when an vnable ſpirit, being ouer-perted with ſo high authoritie, is too paſſionate in the execution of ſuch an Office, as cannot be checked but by violence. If therefore Amazia thought by extreame rigour to hold vp his reputation, what did hee elſe than ſtriue to make the people thinke he hated them, when of themſelues they were apt enough to beleeue that he did not loue them? The beſt was that he had, by reuenging his fathers death prouided well enough for his owne ſecuritie: but who ſhould take vengeance (or vpon whom?) of ſuch a murther, wherein euery one had a part? Surely God himſelfe, who had not giuen commandement or leaue vnto the people, to take his office out of his hand, in ſhedding the bloud of his Annointed. Yet as Amazia, careleſſe of God, was carried headlong by his owne affections; ſo his ſubiects, following the ſame ill example, without requiring what belonged vnto their duties, roſe vp againſt him, with ſuch headlong furie, that being vnable to defend himſelfe in Ieruſalem, he was driuen to forſake the Citie, and flye to Lachis, for ſafegard of his life. But ſo extreame was the hatred conceiued againſt him, and ſo generall, that neither his abſence could allay the rage of it in the Capitall Citie, nor his preſence in the Countrey abroad procure friends, to defend his life. Queſtionleſſe, he choſe the Towne of Lachis for his refuge, as a place of all other beſt affected to him; yet found he there none other fauour, than that the people did not kill him with their owne hands: for when the Conſpiratours (who troubled not themſelues about raiſing an Armie for the matter) ſent purſuers after him, he was abandoned to death. Lachis was the vtmoſt Citie of his Dominion Weſtward, ſtanding ſomewhat without the border of Iuda; ſo that he might haue made an eaſie eſcape (if he durſt aduenture) into the Territorie of the Philiſtims, or the Kingdome of Iſrael. Therefore it may ſeeme that he was detained there, where certaine it is that he found no kinde of fauour: for had not the people of this Towne, added their owne treaſon to the generall inſurrection; the murtherers could not at ſo good leiſure as they did, haue carried away his body to Ieruſalem, where they gaue him buriall with his fathers.

§. XI.

Of the Interregnum, or vacancie, that was in the Kingdome of Iuda, after the death of Amazia.

IT hath already beene ſhewed, that the reignes of the Kings of Iuda and Iſrael were ſometimes to be meaſured by compleat yeeres, otherwhiles, by yeeres current: and that the time of one King is now and then confounded with the laſt yeeres of his fathers Reigne, or the foremoſt of his ſonnes. But we are now arriued at a meere vacation, wherein the Crowne of Iuda lay void eleauen whole yeeres: a thing not plainly ſet downe in Scriptures, nor yet remembred by Ioſephus, and therefore hard to be beleeued, were it not proued by neceſſary conſequence.

Twice we finde it written, that Amazia, King of Iuda, liued after the death of Ioas King of Iſrael fifteene yeeres; whereupon it followes, that the death of Amazia, was about the end of fifteene yeeres compleate, which Ieroboam the ſecond (who in the fifteenth yeere of Amazia was made King ouer Iſrael) had reigned in Samaria. But the ſucceſſion of Vzzia, who is alſo called Azaria, vnto his father in the Kingdome of Iuda, was eleauen yeeres later than the ſixteenth of Ieroboam: for it is expreſſed, that Azaria began to reigne in the ſeauen and twentieth yeere of Ieroboam; the ſixteenth yeere of his life, being ioyned with the firſt of two and fiftie that he reigned. So the Interregnum of eleauen yeeres cannot be diuided, without ſome hard meanes vſed, of interpreting the Text otherwiſe than the letter ſounds.

2 Chron. 25. 2. & 2 Kin. 14. 17

2 Kin. 14. 23.

2 King. 15. 1.

Yet ſome coniectures there are made, which tend to keepe all euen, without acknowledging any voide time. For it is thought that in the place laſt of all cited, by the ſeauen and twentieth yeere of Ieroboam, we ſhould perhaps vnderſtand the ſeauen and twentieth yeere of his life; or elſe (becauſe the like words are no where elſe interpreted in the like ſenſe) that Azaria was eleauen yeeres vnder age, that is, fiue yeeres old, when his father died, and ſo his ſixteenth yeere might concurre with the ſeauen and twentieth of Ieroboam; or that the Text it ſelfe may haue ſuffered ſome wrong, by miſwriting twenty ſeauen for ſeauenteene yeeres; and ſo, by making the ſeauenteenth yeere of Ieroboam to be newly begun, all may be ſalued. Theſe are the coniectures of that worthy man Gerard Mercator: concerning the firſt of which, it may ſuffice, that the Author himſelfe doth eaſily let it paſſe, as improbable; the laſt is followed by none that I know, neither is it fit, that vpon euery doubt, we ſhould call the text in queſtion, which could not be ſatisfied in all coppies, if perhaps it were in one: as for the ſecond, it may be held with ſome qualification, that Azaria began his Reigne being fiue yeeres old; but then muſt we adde thoſe eleauen yeeres which paſſed in his minority; to the two and fiftie that followed his ſixteenth yeere, which is all one, in a manner, with allowing an interregnum.

But why ſhould we be ſo carefull to auoide an interregnum in Iuda, ſeeing that the like neceſſity neceſſity hath inforced all good Writers, to acknowledge the like vacancy, twice happening within few yeeres, in the Kingdome of Iſrael? The ſpace of time betweene Ieroboams death, and the beginning of Zachariahs Reigne, and ſuch another gap found between the death of Peka, and the beginning of Hoſea, haue made it eaſily to be admitted into Samaria, which the conſideration of things as they ſtood in Iuda, when Aamazia was ſlaine, doth make more probable to haue happened there, yea although the neceſſity of computation were not ſo apparant.

For the publike furie, hauing ſo farre extended it ſelfe, as vnto the deſtruction of the Kings owne perſon, was not like to be appeaſed without order taken for obtaining ſome redreſſe of thoſe matters, which had cauſed it at the firſt to breake forth into ſuch extremity. We neede not therefore wonder how it came to paſſe, that they which already had throwne themſelues into ſuch an horrible treaſon, ſhould afterwards dare to withhold the Crowne from a Prince of that age, which being inueſted in all ornaments of Regality, is neuertheleſſe expoſed to many iniuries, proceeding from head-ſtrong and forgetfull ſubiects.

As for their coniecture, who make Azaria to haue beene King but one and forty yeeres, after he came out of his non-age; I dare not allow it, becauſe it agrees too harſhly with the Text. The beſt opinion were that, which giues vnto Ieroboam eleauen yeeres of Reigne with his Father, before he began to reigne ſingle in the fifteenth of Amazia; did it not ſwallow vp almoſt the whole Reigne of Ioas, and extending the yeeres of thoſe which reigned in Iſrael (by making ſuch of them compleat, as were onely current) and take at the ſhorteſt the Reignes of Princes ruling in other Nations. But I will not ſtand to diſpute further of this: euery man may follow his owne opinion, and ſee mine more plainely in the Chronologicall Table, drawne for theſe purpoſes.

§. XII.

Of Princes Contemporarie with Amazia, and more particularly of Sardanapalus.

THe Princes liuing with Amazia, and in the eleauen yeeres that followed his death, were Ioas and Ieroboam in Iſrael; Cephrenes and Mycerinus in Ægypt; Syluius Alladius, and Syluius Auentinus in Alba; Agamemnon in Corinth; Diognetus Pheredus, and Ariphron in Athens; in Lacedæmon Theleſtus, in whoſe time the Spartans wan from the Achaians, Gerauthæ, Amyclæ, and ſome other Townes.

But more notable than all theſe, was Aſſyrian Sardanapalus, who in the one and twentieth yeere of Amazia, ſucceeding his father Ocrazapes or Anacyndaraxes, reigned twenty yeeres, and was ſlaine the laſt of the eleuen void yeeres which fore-went the Reigne of Azaria. In him ended (as moſt agree) the line of Ninus, which had held that Empire one thouſand, two hundred and fortie yeeres. A moſt luxurious and effeminate Palliard he was, paſſing away his time among ſtrumpets, whom he imitated both in apparell and behauiour.

In theſe voluptuous courſes he liued an vnhappy life, knowing himſelfe to be ſo vile, that he durſt not let any man haue a ſight of him; yet ſeene he was at length, and the ſight of him was ſo odious, that it procured his ruine. For Arbaces, who gouerned Media vnder him, finding meanes to behold the perſon of his King, was ſo incenſed with that beaſtly ſpectacle, of a man diſguiſed in womans attire, and ſtriuing to counterfeit an harlot, that he thought it a great ſhame to liue vnder the command of ſo vnworthy a creature. Purpoſing therefore to free himſelfe and others from ſo baſe ſubiection, he was much encouraged by the prediction of Beleſis or Beloſus a Chaldæan, who told him plainly, that the Kingdome of Sardanapalus ſhould fall into his hands. Arbaces well pleaſed with the prophecie, did promiſe vnto Beloſus himſelfe the gouernment of Babylon; and ſo concluding how to handle the buſineſſe, one of them ſtirred vp the Medes, and allured the Perſians into the quarrell, the other perſwaded the Babylonians and Arabians to venture themſelues in the ſame cauſe. Theſe foure Nations armed fortie thouſand men againſt Sardanapalus, who in this danger was not wanting to himſelfe, but gathering ſuch forces as he could, out of other Nations, encountred the rebels, as one that would by deedes refute the tales that they had told of him. Neither did his carriage in the beginning of that warre, anſwere to the manner of his retiredneſſe. For in three battailes battailes he carried away the better, driuing Arbaces and his followers into such fearefull teames, that had not Belosus promised them constantly some vnexpected succours, they would forthwith haue broken vp their Campe. About the same time, an Armie out of Bactria was comming to assist the King; but Arbaces encountring it vpon the way, perswaded so strongly by promise of liberty, that those forces ioyned themselues with his. The sodaine departure of the enemy seeming to be a flight, caused Sardanapalus to feast his Armie, triumphing before victory. But the Rebels being strengthened with this new supply, came vpon him by night, and forced his Campe, which through ouer-great security was vnprepared for resistance.

This ouerthrow did so weaken the Kings heart, that leauing his wiues brother Salamenus to keepe the field, he withdrew himselfe into the Citie of Niniue; which, till new aides that he sent for should come, he thought easily to defend; it hauing beene prophecied, that Niniue should neuer be taken, till the Riuer were enemy to the Towne. Of the greatnesse and strength of Niniue, enough hath beene spoken in our discourse of Ninus. It was so well victualled, that Arbaces (hauing in two battailes ouerthrowne the Kings Armie, and slaine Salamenus) was faine to lye two whole yeeres before it, in hope to winne it by famine; whereof yet he saw no appearance. It seemes that he wanted Engines and skill to force those wals, which were a hundred foote high, and thicke enough for three Charriots in front to passe vpon the rampire. But that which he could not doe in two yeeres, the Riuer of Tygris did in the third: for being high swolne with raines, it not onely drowned a part of the Citie through which it ran, but threw downe twentie furlongs of the wall, and made a faire breach for Arbaces to enter.

Sardanapalus, either terrified with the accomplishment of the old Oracle, or seeing no meanes of resistance left, shutting vp himselfe into his Palace, with his wiues, Eunuches and all his treasures, did set the house on fire, wherewith he and they were together consumed. Strabo speakes of a monument of his, that was in Anchiale a Citie of Cilicia, whereon was found an inscription, shewing that he built that Citie and Tharsus vpon one day: but the addition hereto, bidding men eate and drinke, and make merry, encouraging others, with verses well knowne, to a voluptuous life, by his owne example, testified that his nature was more prone to sensuality, than to any vertue beseeming a Prince. Strabo l. 9.

There are some that faintly report otherwise of his end; saying that Arbaces, when he first found him among his Concubines, was so enraged, that suddenly he slew him with a dagger. But the more generall consent of Writers agrees with this relation of Diodorus Siculus, who citeth Ctesias a Greeke Writer, that liued in the Court of Persia, where the truth might best be knowne. Diod. Sic. l. 2. c. 7.

Concerning the Princes which reigned in Assyria; from the time of Semiramis, vnto Sardanapalus, though I beleeue that they were sometimes (yet not, as Orosius hath it, incessantly) busied, in offensiue or else defensiue armes; yet for the most part of them I doe better trust Diodorus Siculus, who saith that their names were ouerpassed by Ctesias, because they did nothing worthy of memory. Whatsoeuer they did; that which Theophilus Antiochenus hath said of them is very true; Silence and oblivion hath oppressed them. Diod. l. 2. c. 6. Theophilus Antiochenus l. 2.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of Vzzia.

§. I.

The proſperitie of Vzzia, and of Ieroboam the ſecond, who reigned with him in Iſrael. Of the Anarchie that was in the ten Tribes after the death of Ieroboam. Of Zacharia, Sallum, Menahem and Pekahia.

VZzia, who is alſo called Azaria, the ſonne of Iotham, was made King of Iuda, when he was ſixteene yeeres old, in the ſeauen and twentieth yeere of Ieroboam the ſonne of Ioas King of Iſrael. He ſerued the God of his father Dauid, and had therefore good ſucceſſe in all his enterpriſes. He built Eloth, a Towne that ſtood neere to the Red Sea, and reſtored it to Iuda. He ouercame the Philiſtims, of whoſe Townes he diſmantled ſome, and built others in ſundry parts of their Territories. Alſo he got the maſtrie ouer ſome parts of Arabia, and brought the Ammonites to pay him tribute. Such were the fruits of his proſperous warres, wherein (as Ioſephus rehearſeth his acts) he began with the Philiſtims, and then proceeded vnto the Arabians and Ammonites. His Armie conſiſted of three hundred and ſeauen thouſand men of warre, ouer which were appointed two thouſand and ſixe hundred Captaines. For all this multi-
2 Chro. 26 14. tude the King prepared ſhields, and ſpeares, and helmets, and other Armes requiſite; following therein happily a courſe quite oppoſite vnto that which ſome of his late predeceſſours had held, who thought it better policie to vſe the ſeruice of 2 Chron. 21. 9. the Nobilitie, than of the multitude; carrying forth to warre the Princes and all the Charriots.

As the victories of Vzzia were farre more important, than the atchieuements of all that had reigned in Iuda, ſince the time of Dauid; ſo were his riches and magnificent workes, equall, if not ſuperiour to any of theirs that had beene Kings betweene him and Salomon. For beſides that great conqueſts are wont to repay the charges of Warre with triple intereſt, he had the skill to vſe, as well as the happineſſe to get. He turned his Lands to the beſt vſe, keeping Ploughmen and Dreſſers of Vines, in grounds conuenient for ſuch husbandry. In other places he had Cattell feeding, whereof he might well keepe great ſtore, hauing won ſo much from the Ammonites and Arabians, that had aboundance of waſte ground ſeruing for paſturage. For defence of his Cattell and Heardſmen, he built Towres in the wilderneſſe. He alſo digged many Ciſternes or Ponds. Ioſephus cals them Water-courſes; but in ſuch dry grounds, it was enough that he found water, by digging in the moſt likely places. If by theſe Towres he ſo commanded the water, that none could without his conſent, releeue themſelues therewith; queſtionleſſe he tooke the onely courſe, by which he might ſecurely hold the Lordſhip ouer all the Wilderneſſe; it being hardly paſſable, by reaſon of the extreame drought, when the few Springs therein found, are left free to the vſe of Trauailers.

Beſides all this coſt, and the building both of Eloth by the Red Sea, and of ſundry Townes among the Philiſtims; he repaired the wall of Ieruſalem, which Ioas had broken downe, and fortified it with Towres, whereof ſome were an hundred and fifty Cubits high.

The State of Iſrael did neuer ſo flouriſh, as at this time, ſince the diuiſion of the twelue Tribes into two Kingdomes. For as Vzzia preuailed in the South, ſo (if not more) Ieroboam the ſonne of Ioas, King of the ten Tribes, enlarged his border on the North; where obtaining many victories a gainſt the Syrians, he wan the Royall Citie of Damaſ-
2 Reg. 14. 25. 28. cus, and he wan Hamath, with all the Countrie there about from the entring of Hamath, vnto the Sea of the Wilderneſſe, that is, (as the moſt expound it) vnto the vaſt deſerts of Arabia, the end whereof was vndiſcouered. So the bounds of Iſrael in thoſe parts, were in time of this Ieroboam, the ſame (or not much narrower) which they had beene in the Reigne of Dauid.

But

But it was not for the pietie of Ieroboam, that he thriued ſo well, for he was an Idolater: it was onely the compaſſion which the Lord had on Iſrael, ſeeing the exceeding bitter affliction, wherevnto the Aramites had brought his people, which cauſed him to alter the ſucceſſe of warre, and to throw the victorious Aramites vnder the feete of thoſe whom they had ſo cruelly oppreſſed. The line of Iehu, to which God had promiſed the Kingdome of Iſrael vnto the fourth generation, was now not farre from the end; and now againe it was inuited vnto repentance, by new benefits, as it had beene at the beginning. But the ſinne of Ieroboam the ſonne of Nebat, was held ſo precious, that neither the Kingdome it ſelfe, giuen to him by God, was able to draw Iehu from that politike Idolatry; nor the miſery falling vpon him and his poſteritie, to bring them to a better courſe of Religion; nor yet, at the laſt, this great proſperity of Ieroboam the ſonne of Ioas, to make him render the honour that was due, to the onely giuer of victorie. Wherefore the promiſe of God, made vnto Iehu, that his ſons, vnto the fourth generation, ſhould ſit on the throne of Iſrael, was not enlarged; but, being almoſt expired, gaue warning of the approaching end, by an accident (ſo ſtrange, that we, who finde no particulars recorded, can hardly gheſſe at the occaſions) foregoing the laſt accompliſhment. 2 Reg. 10. 13.

When Ieroboam the Sonne of Ioas, after a victorious reigne of one and forty yeeres, had ended his life; it ſeemes in all reaſon that Zacharia his ſonne, ſhould forthwith haue beene admitted, to reigne in his ſtead; the Nobilitie of that race hauing gotten ſuch a luſtre, by the immediate ſucceſſion of foure Kings, that any Competitor, had the crowne paſſed by election, muſt needes haue appeared baſe; and the vertue of the laſt King, hauing beene ſo great, as might well ſerue to lay the foundation of a new houſe, much more to eſtabliſh the already confirmed right of a family ſo rooted in poſſeſſion. All this notwithſtanding, two or three and twentie yeeres did paſſe, before Zacharia the ſonne of Ieroboam was, by vniforme conſent, receiued as King. The true originall cauſes hereof were to be found at Dan and Bethel, where the golden Calues did ſtand: yet ſecond inſtruments of this diſturbance, are likely not to haue beene wanting, vpon which, the wiſdome of man was ready to caſt an eye. Probable it is, that the Captaines of the Army (who afterwards ſlew one another, ſo faſt, that in foureteen yeers there reigned fiue Kings) did now by head-ſtrong violence, rent the Kingdome aſunder, holding each what he could, and either deſpiſing or hating ſome qualities in Zacharia; vntill, after many yeeres, wearied with diſſention, and the principall of them perhaps, being taken out of the way by death, for want of any other eminent man, they conſented to yeelde all quietly to the ſon of Ieroboam. That this Anarchie laſted almoſt three and twenty yeeres, we finde by the difference of time, betweene the fifteenth yeere of Vzzia, which was the laſt of Ieroboam his one and fortieth (his ſeauen and twentieth concurring with the firſt of Vzzia) and the eight and thirtieth of the ſame Vzzia, in the laſt ſixe moneths whereof Zacharia reigned in Samaria. There are ſome indeede that by ſuppoſing Ieroboam to haue reigned with his father eleauen yeeres, doe cut off the interregnum in Iuda (before mentioned) and by the ſame reaſon, abridge this Anarchie, that was before the Reigne of Zacharia in Iſrael. Yet they leaue it twelue yeeres long: which is time ſufficient to proue, that the Kingdome of the ten Tribes was no leſſe diſtempered, than as is already noted. But I chooſe rather to follow the more common opinion; as concurring more exactly with the times of other Princes reigning abroad in the Word, than this doubtfull coniecture, that giues to Ieroboam two and fiftie yeeres, by adding three quarters of his fathers Reigne vnto his owne, which was it ſelfe indeede ſo long, that he may well ſeeme to haue begun it very yong: for I doe not thinke, that God bleſſed this Idolater, both with a longer reigne, and with a longer life, than he did his ſeruant Dauid.

Thus much being ſpoken of the time, wherein the throane of Iſrael was voide, before the reigne of Zacharia; little may ſuffice to be ſaid of his Reigne it ſelfe, which laſted but a little while. Sixe moneths onely was he King; in which time he declared himſelfe a worſhipper of the golden Calues; which was enough to iuſtifie the iudgement of God, whereby he was ſlaine. He was the laſt of Iehu's houſe, being (incluſiuely) the firſt of that line; which may haue beene ſome cauſe of the troubles impeaching his orderly ſucceſſion: the prophecie hauing determined that race in the fourth generation. But (beſides that Gods promiſe was extended vnto the vtmoſt) there was no warrant giuen to Sallum or to any other, for the death of Zacharia, as had beene giuen to Iehu, for the ſlaughter of Iehoram, and for the eradication of Ahabs houſe.

Zacharia

Zacharia hauing beene sixe moneths a King, was then slaine by Sallum, who reigned
2 King.15.13 after him, the space of a moneth in Samaria. What this Sallum was, I doe not finde; saue onely that he was a Traytour, and the sonne of one Iabesh, whereby his father got no honour. It seemes that he was one of those, who in time of faction had laboured for himselfe; and now, when all other Competitors were sitten downe, thought easily to preuaile against that King, in whose person the race of Iehu was to faile. Manifest it is, that Sallum had a strong party: for Tiphsah or Thapsa, and the coast thereof euen from Tirzah, where Menahem, his enemy and supplanter then lay, refused to admit, as King in his stead, the man that murdered him. Yet at the end of one moneth, Sallum receiued the reward of his treason, and was slaine by Menahem who reigned in his place.

Menahem the sonne of Gadi, reigned after Sallum ten yeeres. In opposition to Sallum, his hatred was deadly, and inhumane: for he not onely destroyed Tiphsah, and all that were therein, or thereabouts, but he ript vp all their women with childe, because they did not open their gates and let him in. Had this cruelty beene vsed in reuenge of Zacharias death, it is like that he would haue beene as earnest, in procuring vnto him his Fathers Crowne when it was first due. But in performing that office, there was vsed such long deliberation, that we may plainly discouer Ambition, Disdaine, and other priuate passions, to haue beene the causes of this beastly outrage.

In the time of Menahem, and (as it seemes) in the beginning of his Reigne; Pul, King of Assyria, came against the Land of Israel; whom this new King appeased, with a thousand talents of siluer, leauied vpon all the substantiall men in his Countrey. With this money the Israelite purchased, not onely the peace of his Kingdome, but his owne establishment therein: some factious man (belike) hauing either inuited Pul thither, or (if he came vncalled) sought to vse his helpe, in deposing this ill beloued King. Iosephus reports of this Menahem, that his Reigne was no milder than his entrance. But after Ios.ant.l.9.c.11 tenne yeeres, his tyrannie ended with his life: and Pekahia, his Sonne, occupied his roome.

Of this Pekahia the storie is short: for he reigned onely two yeeres; at the end whereof, he was slaine by Peka, the Sonne of Remalia, whose treason was rewarded with the Crowne of Israel, as, in time comming, another mans Treason against himselfe shall be. There needes no more to be said of Menahem, and his Sonne, saue that they were, both Ios.ibid. of them, Idolaters; and the Sonne (as we finde in Iosephus) like to his Father in cruelty. Concerning Pul the Assyrian King, who first opened vnto those Northerne Nations the way into Palæstina; it will shortly follow in order of the Storie, to deliuer our opinion: whether he were that Belosus (called also Beleses, and by some, Phul Belochus) who ioyned with Arbaces the Median, against Sardanapalus, or whether he were some other man. At the present it is more fit that we relate the end of Vzzia's life, who out-liued the happinesse wherein we left him.

§. II.

The end of Vzzia his Reigne and life.

AS the zeale of Iehoiada, that godly Priest, was the meane, to preserue the linage of Dauid, in the person of Ioas; so it appeares, that the care of holy men was not wanting to Vzzia, to bring him vp, and aduance him to the Crowne of Iuda, when the hatred borne to his Father Amazia, had endangered his succession. For it is said of Vzzia, That he sought God in the dayes of Zecharia (which vnderstood the visions
2 Chron.26.5. of God) and when as he sought the Lord, God made him prosper.
Vers.16. But, when he was strong, his heart was lifted vp to his destruction: for he transgressed against the Lord his God, and went into the Temple of the Lord to burne incense, vpon the Altar of incense. Thus he thought to enlarge his owne authority, by medling in the Priests office, whose power had in euery extremity beene so helpefull to the Kings of Iuda, that meere gratitude, and ciuill policie, should haue held backe Vzzia from incroching thereupon; yea, though the Law of God had beene silent in this case, and not forbidding it. Howsoeuer the King forgot his dutie, the Priests remembred theirs, and God forgat not to assist them. Azaria the high Priest interrupted the Kings purpose, and gaue him to vnderstand, how little to his honour it would proue, that he tooke vpon him the office of the sonnes of Aaron. There were with Azaria fourescore other Priests, valiant men, but their their valour was shewed onely in assisting the high Priest, when (according to his dutie) he reprehended the Kings presumption. This was enough, the rest God himselfe performed. We finde in Iosephus, that the King had apparelled himselfe in Priestly habit, and that he threatned Azarias and his Companions, to punish them with death, vnlesse they would be quiet. Iosephus, indeede, inlargeth the Storie, by inserting a great Earthquake, which did teare downe halfe an Hill, that rowled foure furlongs, till it rested against another Hill, stopping vp the high wayes, and spoyling the Kings Garden in the passage. With this Earth-quake, he saith, that the roofe of the Temple did cleaue, and that a Sunne-beame did light vpon the Kings face, which was presently infected with leprosie. All this may haue beene true; and some there are who thinke that this Earth-quake is the same, which is mentioned by the Prophet Amos; wherein they doe much misse-reckon the times. For the Earth-quake spoken of by Amos, was in the dayes of Ieroboam King of Israel, who dyed seauen and thirtie yeeres before Vzzia; so that Iotham the Sonne of Vzzia, which supplied his Fathers place in gouernment of the Land, should, by this accompt, haue beene then vnborne: for he was but fiue and twenty yeeres old, when he began to reigne as King. Therefore, thus farre onely we haue assurance; that while Vzzia was wroth with the Priests, the leprosie rose vp in his forehead, before the Priests. Hereupon he was caused, in all haste, to depart the place, and to liue in a house by himselfe, vntill he dyed; the rule ouer the Kings house, and ouer all the Land, being committed to Iotham, his Sonne, and Successor. Iotham tooke not vpon himselfe the stile of a King, till his Father was dead; whom they buried in the same field wherein his Ancestors lay interred, yet in a Monument a-part from the rest, because he was a Leper.

2 Chro. 26. 20.

§. III.

Of the Prophets which liued in the time of Vzzia; and of Princes then ruling in Ægypt, and in some other Countries.

IN the time of Vzzia were the first of the lesser Prophets, Hosea, Ioel, Amos, Obadia, and Ionas. It is not indeede set downe, when Ioel, or Obadia, did propheeie: but if the Prophets, whose times are not expressed, ought to be ranged (according to Saint Hieromes rule) with the next before them; then must these two be iudged contemporarie with Hosea and Amos, who liued vnder King Vzzia. To enquire which of these fiue was the most ancient, it may perhaps be thought, at least a superfluous labour; yet if the age wherein Homer liued, hath so painefully beene sought, without reprehension; how can he be taxed, which offers to search out the antiquitie of these holy Prophets? It seemes to me, that the first of these, in order of time, was the Prophet Ionas; who foretold the great victories of Ieroboam King of Israel; and therefore is like to haue propheeied in the dayes of Ioas, whileſt the affliction of Israel was exceeding bitter; the Text it selfe intimating no lesse: by which consequence, he was elder than the other Prophets, whose workes are now extant. But his prophecies that concerned the Kingdome of Israel, are now lost. That which remaineth of him, seemes, not without reason, vnto some very learned, to haue belonged vnto the time of Sardanapalus, in whose dayes Ninive was first of all destroyed. This Prophet rather taught Christ by his sufferings, than by his writings now extant: in all the rest are found expresse promises of the Messias.

2 Chron. c. 14. v. 25. 26.

In the reigne of Vzzia likewise it was, that Esai, the first of the foure great Prophets, began to see his visions. This difference of great and lesser Prophets, is taken from the Volumes which they haue left written (as S. Augustine giues reason of the distinction) because the greater haue written larger Bookes. The Prophet Esai was great indeede, not onely in regard of his much writing, or of his Nobility, (for their opinion is reiected, who thinke him to haue beene the sonne of Amos the Prophet) and the high account wherein he liued; but for the excellency, both of his stile and argument, wherein he so plainly foretelleth the Birth, Miracles, Passion, and whole Historie of our Sauiour, with the calling of the Gentiles, that he might as well be called an Euangelist, as a Prophet; hauing written in such wise, That (as Hierome saith) one would thinke he did not foretell of things to come, but compile an Historie of matters already past.

Aug. de Ciui. Dei. l. 18. c. 29.

Hier. in præf. super Esaiam.

Bocchoris was King of Ægypt, and the ninth yeere of his Reigne, by our computation whereof in due place we will giue reason) was current, when Vzzia tooke possession of the Kingdome of Iuda.

After the death of Boccheris, Asychis followed in the Kingdome of Ægypt, vnto him succeeded Anysis; and these two occupied that Crowne sixe yeeres. Then Sabacus, an Æthiopian, became King of Ægypt, and held it fiftie yeeres, whereof the ten first ran along with the last of Vzzia his Reigne and life. Of these and other Ægyptian Kings, more shall be spoken, when their affaires shall come to be intermedled with the businesse of Iuda.

In Athens, the two last yeeres of Ariphron his twenty, the seauen and twentieth of Thespeius, the twentieth of Agamnestor, and three the first of Æschylus his three and twenty, made euen with the two and fiftie of Vzzia: as likewise did in Alba the last seauen of Siluius Auentinus his seauen and thirty, together with the three and twenty of Siluius Procas, and two and twenty the first of Sylnius Amulius. In Media Arbaces began his new Kingdome, in the first of Vzzia, wherein, after eight and twenty yeeres, his Sonne Sosarmus succeeded him, and reigned thirty yeeres. Of this Arbaces, and the diuision of the Assyrian Empire, betweene him and others, when they had oppressed Sardanapalus, I hold it conuenient to vse more particular discourse, that we may not wander in too great vncertainty in the Story of the Assyrian Kings, who haue already found the way into Palastina, and are not likely to forget it.

§. IIII.

Of the Assyrian Kings, descending from Phul: and whether Phul and Belosus were one person, or heads of sundry Families, that reigned a-part in Niniue and Babylon.

BY that which hath formerly beene shewed of Sardanapalus his death, it is apparant, that the chiefe therein was Arbaces the Median; to whom the rest of the Confederates did not onely submit themselues in that Warre, but were contented afterwards to be iudged by him; receiuing by his authority sentence of death, or pardon of their forfeited liues. The first example of this his power, was shewne vpon Belosus the Babylonian, by whose especiall aduice and helpe, Arbaces himselfe was become so great, Yet was not this power of Arbaces exercised in so tyrannicall a manner, as might giue offence in that great alteration of things, either to the Princes that had assisted him, or to the generality of the people. For in the condemnation of Belosus, he vsed the counsaile of his other Captaines, and then pardoned him of his owne grace; allowing him to hold, not onely the Citie and Prouince of Babylon, but also those treasures, for embezeling whereof his life had beene endangered.

In like manner, he gaue rewards to the rest of his partakers, and made them Rulers of Prouinces; retaining (as it appeares) onely the Soueraigntie to himselfe, which to vse immoderately he did naturally abhorre. He is said, indeede, to haue excited the Medes against Sardanapalus, by propounding vnto them hope of transferring the Empire to their Nation. And to make good this his promise, he destroyed the Citie of Niniue, permitting the Citizens neuertheless to take and carry away euery one his owne goods. The other Nations that ioyned with him, as the Persians and Bactrians, he drew to his side, by the allurement of liberty; which he himselfe so greatly loued, that by slacking too much the reines of his owne Soueraignty, he did more harme to the generall estate of Media, than the pleasure of the freedome, which it enioyed, could recompence. For both the Territory of that Countrey was pared narrower by Salmanassar (or perhaps by some of his Progenitors) whom we finde, in the Scriptures, to haue held some Townes of the Medes; and the ciuill administration was so disorderly, that the people themselues were glad to see that reformation, which Deioces, the fift of Arbaces his Line, did make in that gouernement, by reducing them into stricter tearmes of obedience.

How the force of the Assyrians grew to be such, as might in fourescore yeeres, if not sooner, both extend it selfe vnto the conquest of Israel, & teare away some part of Media, it is a question hardly to be answered, not only in regard of the destruction of Niniue, and subuersion of the Assyrian Kingdome, whereof the Medes, vnder Arbaces, had the honor, who may seeme at that time to haue kept the Assyrians vnder their subiection, when the rest of the Prouinces were set at liberty; but in consideration of the Kings themselues, who who reigning afterwards in Babylon and Niniue, are confounded by ſome, and diſtinguiſhed by others; whereby their Hiſtorie is made vncertaine.

I will firſt therefore deliuer the opinion generally receiued, and the grounds whereupon it ſtands: then, producing the obiections made againſt it; I will compare together the determination of that worthy man Ioſeph Scaliger, with thoſe learned that ſubſcribe thereunto, and the iudgement of others that were more ancient Writers, or haue followed the Ancients in this doubtfull caſe. Neither ſhall it be needfull to ſet downe a-part the ſeuerall authorities and arguments of ſundry men adding ſomewhat of weight or of clearneſſe one to another: it will be enough to relate the whole ſubſtance of each diſcourſe: which I will doe as briefly as I can, and without feare to be taxed of partiality, as being no more addicted to the one opinion than to the other, by any fancy of mine owne, but meerely led by thoſe reaſons which vpon examination of each part, ſeemed to me moſt forceable, though to others they may perhaps appeare weake.

That which, vntill of late, hath paſſed as currant, is this; That Beloſus was the ſame King, who, firſt of the Aſſyrians, entred Paleſtina with an Armie; being called Pul, or Phul, in the Scriptures, and by Annius his Authors with ſuch as follow them, Phul Belochus. Of this man it is ſaid, that he was a skilfull Aſtrologer, ſubtile, and ambitious; that he got Babylon by compoſition made with Arbaces; and that not therewith content, he got into his hand part of Aſſyria: finally, that he reigned eight and forty yeeres, and then dying, left the Kingdome to Teglat-phalaſar his Sonne, in whoſe Poſterity it continued ſome few deſcents, till the houſe of Merodach preuailed. The truth of this, if Annius his Meaſthenes were ſufficient proofe, could not be gainſaid: for that Author (ſuch as he is) is peremptorie herein. But, howſoeuer Annius his Authors deſerue to be ſuſpected, it ſtands with no reaſon, that we ſhould conclude all to be falſe which they affirme. They, who maintaine this Tradition, iuſtifie it by diuers good Allegations, as a matter confirmed by circumſtances found in all Authors, and repugnant vnto no Hiſtorie at all. For it is manifeſt by the relation of Diodorus (which is indeede the foundation whereupon all haue built) that Arbaces and Beloſus were Partners in the action againſt Sardanapalus; and that the Bactrians, who ioyned with them, were thought well rewarded with libertie, as likewiſe other Captaines were with gouernements: but that any third Perſon was ſo eminent, as to haue Aſſyria it ſelfe, the chiefe Countrey of the Empire, beſtowed vpon him, it is a thing whereof not the leaſt appearance is found in any Hiſtory. And certainely it ſtood with little reaſon, that the Aſſyrians ſhould be committed vnto a peculiar King, at ſuch time as it was not thought meete to truſt them in their owne wals and houſes. Rather it is apparent, that the deſtruction of Niniue by Arbaces, and the tranſplantation of the Citizens, was held a needfull policie becauſe thereby the people of that Nation might be kept downe from aſpiring to recouer the Soueraigntie, which elſe they would haue thought to belong, as of right, vnto the Seat of the Empire.

Vpon ſuch conſiderations did the Romanes, in ages long after following, deſtroy Carthage, and diſſolue the Corporation, or Body politike, of the Citizens of Capua; becauſe thoſe two Townes were capable of the Empire: a matter eſteemed ouerdangerous euen to Rome it ſelfe, that was Miſtreſſe of them both. This being ſo, how can it be thought that the Aſſyrians in three or foure yeeres had erected their Kingdome a-new, vnder one Pul? or what muſt this Pul haue beene (of whoſe deſeruings, or entermedling, or indeed of whoſe very name, we finde no mention in the Warre againſt Sardanapalus) to whom the principall parts of the Empire fell, either by generall conſent in diuiſion of the Prouinces, or by his owne power and purchaſe very ſoone after? Surely he was none other than Beloſus; whoſe neere Neighbourhood gaue him opportunity (as he was wiſe enough to play his owne game) both to get Aſſyria to himſelfe, and to empeach any other man, that ſhould haue attempted to ſeize vpon it. The Prouince of Babylon, which Beloſus held, being (as Herodotus reports) in riches, and power, as good as the third part of the Perſian Empire, was able to furniſh him with all that was requiſite for ſuch a buſineſſe: if that were not enough, he had gotten into his owne hands all the gold and ſiluer that had been in the Palace of Niniue. And queſtionleſſe to reſtore ſuch a Citie as Niniue, was an enterpriſe fit for none to take in hand, except he had ſuch meanes as Beloſus had; which Pul, if he were not Beloſus, is likely to haue wanted.

Beſides all this, had Pul been a diſtinct perſon from Beloſus, and Lord of Aſſyria, which lay beyond the Countries of Babylon and Meſopotamia, it would not haue beene an eaſie matter for him, to paſſe quite through another mans Kingdome with an Armie, ſeeking bootie afarre off in Iſrael: the onely action by which the name of Phul is knowne. But if we grant, that he, whom the Scriptures call Pul or Phul, was the ſame whom prophane writers haue called Beloſus, Beleſes, and Beleſtis, (in like manner as Ioſephus acknowledgeth, that he, whom the Scriptures called neuer otherwiſe than Darius the Mede, was the ſonne of Aſtyages, and called of the Greekes by another name, that is, Cyaxares) then is this ſcruple vtterly remoued. For Babylon and Meſopotamia did border vpon Syria and Paleſtina: ſo that Beloſus, hauing ſetled his affaires in Aſſyria towards the Eaſt and North, might with good leiſure encroach vpon the Countries that lay on the other ſide of his Kingdome, to the South and Weſt. He that lookes into all particulars, may finde euery one circumſtance concurring, to proue that Phul who inuaded Iſrael, was none other than Beloſus. For the Prince of the Arabians, who ioyned with Arbaces, and brought no ſmall part of the forces wherewith Sardanapalus was ouerthrowne, did enter into that action, meerely for the loue of Beloſus. The friendſhip of theſe Arabians was a thing of maine importance, to thoſe that were to paſſe ouer Euphrates with an Armie into Syria. Wherefore Beloſus, that held good correſpondence with them; and whoſe moſt fruitfull Prouince, adioyning to their barraine quarters, might yeerely doe them ineſtimable pleaſures; was not onely likely to haue quiet paſſage through their borders, but their vtmoſt aſſiſtance: yea, it ſtands with good reaſon, that they, who loued not Iſrael, ſhould for their owne behoofe haue giuen him intelligence, of the deſtruction and ciuill broyles among the ten Tribes; whereby, as this Pul got a thouſand talents, ſo it ſeemes that the Syrians and Arabians, that had felt an heauie neighbour of Ieroboam, recouered their owne, ſetting vp a new King in Damaſco, and clearing the coaſt of Arabia, (from the Sea of the Wilderneſſe to Hamath) of the Hebrew Garriſons. Neither was it any new acquaintance, that made the Nations diuided by Euphrates hold together in ſo good tearmes of friendſhip: it was ancient conſanguinity; the memorie whereof was auaileable to the Syrians, in the time of Dauid, when the Aramites beyond the Riuer came ouer willingly, to the ſuccour of Hadadezer, and the Aramites about Damaſco. So Beloſus had good reaſon to looke into thoſe parts; what a King reigning ſo farre off as Ninive, ſhould haue to doe in Syria, if the other end of his Kingdome had not reached to Euphrates, it were hard to ſhew.

Ioſep ant. l. 10. cap. 12.

But concerning this laſt argument of the buſineſſe which might allure the Chaldæans into Paleſtina, it may be doubted, leſt it ſhould ſeeme to haue ill coherence with that which hath beene ſaid of the long Anarchie that was in the ten Tribes. For if the Crowne of Iſrael were worne by no man in three and twenty yeeres, then is it likely that Beloſus was either vnwilling to ſtirre, or vnable to take the aduantage when it was faireſt, and firſt diſcouered. This might haue compelled thoſe, who alone were not ſtrong enough, to ſeeke after helpe from ſome Prince that lay further off; and ſo the opinion of thoſe that diſtinguiſh Phul from Beloſus, would be ſomewhat confirmed. On the other ſide, if we ſay, that Beloſus did paſſe the Riuer of Euphrates, as ſoone as he found liklihood of making a proſperous iourney, then may it ſeeme that the inter-regnum in Iſrael was not ſo long as we haue made it: for three and twenty yeeres leiſure would haue afforded better opportunity, which ought not to haue beene loſt.

For anſwer hereunto, we are to conſider, what Oroſius and Euſebius haue written concerning the Chaldees: the one, that after the departure of Arbaces into Media, they laid hold on a part of the Empire: the other, that they preuailed and grew mighty, betweene the times of Arbaces and Deioces the Medes. Now, though it be held an errour of Oroſius, where he ſuppoſeth that the occupying of Babylonia by the Chaldæans, was in manner of a rebellion from the Medes; yet herein he and Euſebius doe concurre, that the authority of Arbaces did reſtraine the ambition, which by his abſence grew bold, and by his death, regardfull onely of it ſelfe. Now, though ſome haue coniectured that all Aſſyria was giuen to Beloſus (as an ouerplus, beſides the Prouince of Babylon which was his by plaine bargaine made aforehand) in regard of his high deſeruings; yet the opinion more commonly receiued, is, that he did onely encroach vpon that Prouince by little and little, whileſt Arbaces liued, and afterwards dealing more openly, got it all himſelfe. Seeing therefore, that there paſſed but twelue yeeres betweene the death of Arbaces, and the beginning of Menahem his Reigne; manifeſt it is, that the conqueſt of of Assyria, and setling of that Countrey, was worke enough to hold Belosus occupyed, besides the restauration of Niniue, which alone was able to take vp all the time remaining of his Reigne, if perhaps he liued to see it finished in his owne dayes. So that this argument may rather serue to proue that Phul and Belosus were one person, forasmuch as the iourney of Phul against Israel was not made vntill Belosus could finde leisure; and the time of aduantage which Belosus did let slip, argued his businesse in some other quarter, namely in that Prouince of which Phul is called King. Briefely, it may be said, that he who conquered Assyria, and performed somewhat vpon a Countrey so farre distant as Palestina, was likely to haue beene, at least, named in some Historie, or, if not himselfe, yet his Countrey to haue beene spoken of for those victories: but we neither heare of Phul, in any prophane Author, neither doth any Writer, sacred or prophane, once mention the victories or acts whatsoeuer of the Assyrians done in those times, whereas of Belosus, and the power of the Chaldeans, we finde good Record.

Surely, that great slaughter of so many thousand Assyrians, in the quarrell of Sardanapalus, together with other calamities of that long and vnfortunate warre, which ouerwhelmed the whole Countrey, not ending but with the ruine and vtter desolation of Niniue, must needes haue so weakened the state of Assyria, that it could not in thirty yeeres space be able to inuade Palestina, which the ancient Kings, reigning in Niniue, had, in all their greatnesse, forborne to attempt. Yet these afflictions, disabling that Countrey, did helpe to enable Belosus to subdue it; who hauing once extended his Dominion to the borders of Media, and being (especially if he had compounded with the Medes) by the interposition of that Country, secure of the Scythians, and other warlike Nations on that side, might very well turne Southward, and try his fortune in those Kingdomes, whereinto ciuill dissention of the inhabitants, and the bordering enuie of the Arabians and Aramites about Damascus, friends and Cousins to the Chaldeans and Mesopotamians, did inuite him. For these, and the other before alleadged reasons, it may be concluded, That what is said of Pul in the Scriptures, ought to be vnderstood of Belosus; euen as by the names of Nebuchadnezzar, Darius the Mede, Artashasht, and Ahashuerosh, with the like, are thought, or knowne, to be meant the same, whom prophane Historians, by names better knowne in their owne Countries, haue called Nabopollassar, Cyaxares, and Artaxerxes: especially considering, that hereby we shall neither contradict any thing that hath beene written of old, nor neede to trouble our selues and others with framing new coniectures. This in effect is that, which they alleadge in maintenance of the opinion commonly receiued.

Now this being once granted; other things, of more importance, will of themselues easily follow. For it is a matter of no great consequence to know the truth of this point (considering it apart from that which depends thereon) Whether Pul were Belosus, or some other man: the whole race of these Assyrian and Babylonian Kings, wherein are found those famous Princes, Nabonassar, Merodacempadus, and Nabopollassar (famous for the Astronomicall obseruations recorded from their times) is the maine ground of this contention. If therefore Belosus or Belesis were that Phul which inuaded Israel; if he and his posterity reigned both in Niniue and in Babylon; if he were father of Teglat-Phul-Asar, from whom Salmanasar, Senacherib, and Asarhaddon descended; then it is manifest, that we must seeke Nabonassar, the Babylonian King, among these Princes; yea, and conclude him to be none other than Salmanasar, who is knowne to haue reigned in those yeeres, which Ptolomey the mathematitian hath assigned vnto Nabonassar. As for Merodach, who supplanted Asar-haddon, manifest it is, that he and his successors were of another house. This is the scope and end of all his disputation.

But they that maintaine the contrary part, will not be satisfied with such coniectures. They lay hold vpon the conclusion, and by shaking that into pieces, hope to ouerthrow all the premisses, vpon which it is inferred. For (say they) if Nabonassar, that reigned in Babylon, could not be Salmanasar, or any of those other Assyrian Kings, then is it manifest, that the races were distinct, and that Phul and Belosus were seuerall Kings. This consequence is so plaine, that it needes no confirmation. To proue that Nabonassar was a distinct person from Salmanasar, are brought such arguments as would stagger the resolution of him that had wonne to hold the contrary. For first, Nabonassar was King of Babylon, and not of Assyria. This is proued by his name, which is meerely Chaldean; whereas Salman, the first part of Salmanasser name, is proper to the Assyrians.

It is likewise proued by the Astronomicall obseruations, which proceeding from the Babylonians, not from the Assyrians, doe shew, that Nabonassar, from whom Ptolomie drawes that Epocha, or account of times, was a Babylonian, and no Assyrian. Thirdly, and more strongly, it is confirmed by the successor of Nabonassar, which was Mardocempadus, called in his owne language Mero-dac-ken-pad, but more briefely in Esay his propheſie, Merodach, by the former part of his name; or Merodach Baladan, the sonne of Baladan. Now if Merodach, the sonne of Baladan, King of Babel, were the sonne of Nabonassar, then was Nabonassar none other than Baladan King of Babel, and not Salmanassar King of Assyria.

What can be plainer? As for the cadence of these two names, Nabonassar and Salmanassar; which in Greeke or Latine writing hath no difference, we are taught by Scaliger, that in the Hebrew letters there is found no affinitie therein. So concerning the places of Babylonia, whereinto Salmanassar carried captiue some part of the ten Tribes; it may well be granted, that in the Prouince of Babylon, Salmanassar had gotten somewhat, yet will it not follow that he was King of Babylon it selfe. To conclude, Merodach began his reign ouer Babylon in the sixt yeere of Hezekia, at which time Salmanassar tooke Samaria; therefore, if Salmanassar were King of Babylon, then must we say that he and Merodach, yea and Nabonassar, were all one man. These are the arguments of that noble and learned Writer Ioseph Scaliger; who not contented to follow the common opinion, founded vpon likelihood of coniectures, hath drawne his proofes from matter of more necessary inference.

Touching all that was said before of Phul Belosus, for the prouing that Phul and Belosus were not sundry Kings; Ioseph Scaliger pitties their ignorance, that haue spent their labour to so little purpose. Honest and painefull men he confesseth that they were, who by their diligence might haue won the good liking of their Readers, had they not, by mentioning Annius his Authors, giuen such offence, that men refused thereupon to reade their Bookes and Chronologies. A short answere.

For mine owne part, howsoeuer I beleeue nothing that Annius his Berosus, Metasthenes, and others of that stampe affirme, in respect of their bare authority; yet am I not so squeamish, but that I can well enough digest a good Booke, though I finde the names of one or two of these good fellowes alleaged in it: I haue (somewhat peraduenture too often) already spoken my minde of Annius his Authors: neuertheless, I may say here againe, that where other Histories are silent, or speake not enough, there may we without shame borrow of these, as much as agrees with that little which elsewhere we finde, and seruеth to explaine or inlarge it without improbabilities.

Neither indeede are those honest and painfull men (as Scaliger tearmes them, meaning, if I mistake him not; good silly fellowes) who set downe the Assyrian Kings from Pul forwards, as Lords also of Babylon, taking Pul for Belosus, and Salmanassar for Nabonassar, such Writers as a man should be ashamed or vnwilling to reade. For (to omit a multitude of others, that herein follow Annius, though disliking him in generall) Gerard Mercator is not so slight a Chronologer, that he should be laughed out of doores, with the name of an honest meaning fellow.

But I will not make comparisons betweene Scaliger and Mercator, they were both of them men notably learned: let vs examine the arguments of Scaliger, and see whether they be of such force, as cannot either be resisted or auoided. It will easily be granted, that Nabonassar was King of Babylon; that he was not King of Assyria, some men doubt whether Scaligers reasons be enough to proue. For though Nabonassar be a Chaldean name, and Salmanassar an Assyrian; yet what hinders vs from beleeuing, that one man in two languages might be called by two seuerall names? That Astronomie flourished among the Chaldees, is not enough to proue Nabonassar either an Astrologer, or a Chaldean. So it is, that Scaliger himselfe cals them, Prophetas nescio quos, qui Nabonassarum Astronomum fuisse in somnis viderunt; Prophets I know not who, that in their sleepe haue dreampt of Nabonassar, that he was an Astrologer.

Scal. Canon. l. 3

Whether Nabonassar were an Astrologer or no, I cannot tell; it is hard to maintaine the negatiue. But as his being Lord ouer the Chaldaans, doth not proue him to haue beene learned in their sciences; so doth it not proue him, not to haue beene also King of Assyria. The Emperour Charles the fift, who was borne in Gant, and Philip his Sonne, King of Spaine, and Lords of the Netherlands, had men farre more learned in all

Sciences, and particularly in the Mathematicks, among their Subjects of the Low Countries, than were any that I read of then liuing in Spaine, if Spaine at that time had any; yet I thinke, Posteritie will not vse this as an argument, to proue that Spaine was none of theirs. It may well be, that Salmanassar or Nabonassar, did vse the Assyrian Souldiers, and Babylonian Schollers: but it seemes, that hee and his posteritie, by giuing themselues wholly to the more warlike Nation, lost the richer, out of which they first issued; as likewise King Philip lost partly, and partly did put to a dangerous hazard all the Netherlands, by such a course. As for the two vn-answerable arguments, (as Scaliger termes them, being me-thinkes none other than answeres to somewhat that is or might be alleaged on the contrary side) one of them which is drawne from the vnlike sound and writing of those names, Salmanassar and Nabonassar in the Hebrew, I hold a point about which no man will dispute; for it is not likenesse of sound, but agreement of time, and many circumstances else, that must take away the distinction of persons: the other likewise may be granted; which is, that Salmanassar might be Lord of some places in the Prouince of Babylon, yet not King of Babylon it selfe: this indeed might be so, and it might be otherwise. Hitherto there is nothing saue conjecture. But in that which is alleaged out of the Prophet Esai, concerning Merodach the sonne of Baladan; and in that which is said of this Merodach, or Mardokempadus, his being the Successor of Nabonassar, and his beginning to reigne in the sixt yeere of Hezekia, I finde matter of more difficultie, than can be answered in haste. I will therefore deferre the handling of these objections vntill I meet with their subiect in his proper place; which will be when wee come to the time of Hezekia, wherein Merodach liued and was King. Yet that I may not leaue too great a scruple in the minde of the Reader, thus farre will I heere satisfie him; that how strong soeuer this argument may seeme, Scaliger himselfe did liue to retract it, ingenuously confessing, that in thinking Merodach to be the sonne of Nabonassar, hee had beene deceiued.

Now therefore let vs consider, in what sort they haue fashioned their Storie, who taking Pul to bee a distinct person from Belosus or Belestis, haue in like sort, as was necessarie, distinguished their off-spring, making that of Pul to faile in Asarhaddon, which left all to Merodach the Babylonian. And heere I must first confesse mine want of Bookes, if perhaps there be many, that haue gone about to reduce this narration into some such order, as might present vnto vs the bodie of this Historie, in one view. Diuers, indeed, there are, whom I haue seene, that since Ioseph Scaliger deliuered his opinion, haue written in fauour of some one or other point thereof: but Sethus Caluisius himselfe, who hath abridged Scaligers learned Worke, De emendatione Temporum, hath not beene carefull to giue vs notice, how long Belosus, Baladan, Pul, or Tiglat Pulassar, did reigne, (perhaps because he found it not expressed in Scaliger) but is content to set downe Baladan, for the same person with Nabonassar, which Scaliger himselfe reuoked. In this case therefore I must lay downe the plot of these diuided Kingdomes, in such sort as I finde it contriued by Augustinus Torniellus; who onely of all that I haue seene, sets downe the succession, continuance, and acts, of those that reigned in Assyria after Sardanapalus, distinguishing them from Belosus, and his Posteritie, of whom hee hath the like remembrance. This Torniellus is a Regular Clarke of the congregation of S. Paul, whose Annales were printed the last yeere; he appeares to me a man of curious industrie, sound iudgement, and free Spirit; yet many times (and I take it, wilfully) forgetfull of thanking, or mentioning those Protestant Writers, by whose Bookes hee hath receiued good information, and enriched his workes by inserting somewhat of theirs. But in this businesse hee hath openly professed to follow Scaliger, whose helpe, without wrong or dishonour to himselfe, he hath both vsed and acknowledged. For mine owne part, I will not spare to doe right vnto Torniellus; but confesse my selfe to haue receiued benefit by his writing; and wish that his Annales had sooner come to light; for that as he hath much confirmed mee in some things, so would he haue instructed and emboldned me, to write more fully and lesse timorously in other things, which now I haue not leisure to reuise. Particularly in that coniecture (which I had faintly deliuered, and yet feared lest it had ouer-hastily passed out of my hand, and beene exposed to other mens constructions) of the foure Kings that inuaded the Vallie of Siddim, and were slaine by Abraham, I find him aduenturing, C. 1. §. 13 as I haue done, to say, that they may probably be thought to haue beene some petrie Lords; the contrary opinion of all Writers notwithstanding. But now let vs consider how how he hath ordered these last Assyrian and Babylonian Kings. After the destruction of Sardanapalus, Arbaces being the most mightie, sought to get all to himselfe, but was opposed by Belosus; in which contention, one Phul, a powerfull man in Assyria, sided with Belosus, and they two preuailed so farre, that finally Arbaces was content to share the Empire with them, making such a diuision thereof, as was long after made of the Roman Empire, betweene Octauian, Anthonie, and Lepidus.

Another conjecture is (for Torniellus offers not this, or the rest, as matter of certainetie) that Arbaces made himselfe Soueraigne Lord of all, and placed the seate of his Empire in Media, appointing Belosus his Lieutenant in Babylonia, and Phul in Assyria. But in short space, that is, in foure yeeres, it came to passe, by the just judgement of God, that Phul and Belosus rebelled against Arbaces, like as Arbaces had done against Sardanapalus; and in stead of being his Viceroyes, made themselues absolute Kings. And to this later opinion Torniellus himselfe leanes, holding it much the more probable, as being more agreeable to that which is found in prophane Histories. Why he did make and publish the former supposition, resoluing to hold the later, I shall anon, without any wrong to him, make bold to guesse. Hauing thus deuised, how Phul and Belosus might, at the first, attaine to be Kings, he orders their time, and their successors, in this manner.

Foure yeeres after Arbaces, Phul begins to reigne, and continues eight and forty yeeres. Theglatphalasar (whose name, and the names of other Princes, I write diuersly, according as the Authors whom I haue in hand are pleased to diuersifie them) succeeding vnto Phul, reigned three and twentie. Salmanassar followed him, and reigned tenne. After him Senacherib reigned seuen: and when he was slaine, Asarhaddon his sonne ten yeeres; in whom that Line failed.

The same time that Phul tooke vpon him as King of Assyria, or not long after, (why not rather afore? for so it had beene more likely) Belosus vsurped the Kingdome of Babylon, and held it threescore and eight yeeres; at the least threescore and eight yeeres did passe, before Nabonassar followed him in the possession.

To Nabonassar, whom (with Scaliger) he thinkes to be Baladan, are assigned sixe and twentie yeeres: then two and fiftie to Merodach, or Mardocempadus: foure and twentie to Ben Merodach: and lastly, one and twentie to Nabolassar, the father of Nabuchodonosor, who is like to offer matter of further disputation.

Concerning the originall of these Assyrian and Babylonian Kingdomes, I may truely say, That the conjectures of other men, who giue all to Belosus, and confound him with Phul, appeare to me more neerely resembling the truth. Neither doe I thinke, that Torniellus would haue conceiued two different wayes, by which Phul might haue gotten Assyria (for how Belosus came to get Babylon, it is plaine enough) if either of them alone could haue contented him. He adhæres to the later of the two, as better agreeing with Diodore, and other Historians. But he perceiued, that to make Phul on the suddain King of Assyria; or to giue him so noble a Prouince, as would, of it selfe, inuite him to accept the name and power of a King, was a thing most vnlikely to haue happened, vnlesse his deserts (whereof wee finde no mention) had beene proportionable to so high a reward. And for this cause (as I take it) hath he deuised the meanes, whereby Phul might be made capable of so great a share in the Empire. If this were a true or probable supposition, then would a new doubt arise, Why this Phul, being one of the three that diuided all betweene them, was vtterly forgotten by all Historians? yea, why this Diuision it selfe, and the ciuill Warres that caused it, were neuer heard of? Questionlesse, the interuerting of some Treasures by Belosus, with his Iudgement, Condemnation, and Pardon following, were matters of farre lesse note. Therefore I doe not see, how one of the two inconueniences can this way be auoyded; but that eyther we must confesse, the Dominion giuen to Phul to haue beene exceeding his merits, or else his merits, and name withall, to haue beene strangely forgotten: either of which is enough to make vs thinke, that rather the conjecture, inferring such a sequele, is wide of the truth. As for the rebellion of Phul and Belosus against Arbaces, it was almost impossible for the Assyrians to recouer such strength in foure yeeres, as might serue to hold out in rebellion: for Belosus, it was needlesse to rebell, considering, that Arbaces did not seeke to molest him, but rather permitted (as being an ouer-great fauourer of libertie) euen the Medes, that were vnder his owne Gouernment to doe what they listed.

But it is now fit that wee peruſe the Catalogue of theſe Kings: not paſſing through them all (for ſome will require a large diſcourſe in their owne times) but ſpeaking of their order and time in generall. If it be ſo vnlawfull to thinke, that ſome of Annius his tales (let them all be counted his tales, which are not found in other Authors as well as in his) may be true, eſpecially ſuch, as contradict no acknowledged truth, or apparant likelihood; why then is it ſaid, that Phul did reigne in Aſſyria eight and fortie yeeres? For this hath no other ground than Annius. It is true, that painefull and judicious Writers haue found this number of yeeres, to agree fitly with the courſe of things in Hiſtory: yet all of them tooke it from Annius. Let it therefore be the puniſhment of Annius his forgerie (as queſtionleſſe he is often guilty of this crime) that when he tells truth, or probabilitie, he be not beleeued for his owne ſake; though for our owne ſakes we make vſe of his boldneſſe, taking his words for good, whereas (nothing elſe being offered) we are vnwilling our ſelues to be Authors of new, though not vnprobable conjectures. Heerein we ſhall haue this commoditie, that we may without bluſhing alter a little, to helpe our owne opinions, and lay the blame vpon Annius, againſt whom wee ſhall be ſure to finde friends that will take our part.

The reignes of Theglathalaſar and Salmanaſſar did reach, by Annius his meaſure, to the length of fiue and twenty yeeres the one, and ſeuenteene the other; Torniellus hath cut off two from the former, and ſeuen from the later of them, to fit (as I thinke) his owne computation; vſing the liberty whereof I ſpake laſt: for that any Author, ſaue our good Metaſthenes, or thoſe that borrowed of him, hath gone about to tell how long each of theſe did reigne, it is more then I haue yet found. To Senacherib and Aſarhaddon, Torniellus giues the ſame length of reigne, which is found in Metaſthenes. I thinke there are not many, that will arrogate ſo much vnto themſelues, as may very well be allowed vnto a man ſo iudicious as is Torniellus: and yet I could wiſh that hee had forborne to condemne the followers of Annius, in this buſineſſe, wherein hee himſelfe hath choſen, in part, rather to become one of them, than to ſay, as elſe he muſt haue done, almoſt nothing.

The like liberty we finde that he hath vſed in meaſuring the reignes of the Chaldæans; filling vp all the ſpace betweene the end of Sardanapalus, and the beginning of Nabonaſſar, with the threeſcore and eight yeeres of Beloſus. In this reſpect it was, perhaps, that he thought Beloſus might haue begun his reigne ſomwhat later than Phul: for threeſcore and eight yeeres would ſeeme a long time for him to hold a Kingdome, that was no yong man when he tooke poſſeſſion of it. But how is any whit of his age abated by ſhortning his reigne, ſeeing his life reacheth to the end of ſuch a time, as were alone, without adding the time wherein he was a priuate man, enough for a long liuer? Indeed, eight and forty yeeres had been ſomwhat of the moſt, conſidering that hee ſeemes by the ſtorie to haue beene little leſſe, at ſuch time as he ioyned with Arbaces; and therefore the addition of twenty yeres, did well deſerue that note (which Torniellus aduiſedly giues) that if his reigne extended not ſo farre, then the reigne of ſuch as came after him, occupied the middle time, vnto Nabonaſſar.

I neither doe reprehend the boldneſſe of Torniellus, in conjecturing, nor the modeſtie of Scaliger and Sethus Caluiſius, in forbearing to ſet downe as warrantable, ſuch things as depend onely vpon likelihood. For things, whereof the perfect knowledg is taken away from vs by Antiquitie, muſt be deſcribed in Hiſtory, as Geographers in their Maps deſcribe thoſe Countries, whereof as yet there is made no true diſcouerie, that is, eyther by leauing ſome part blanke, or by inſerting the Land of Pigmies, Rockes of loade-ſtone, with Head-lands, Bayes, great Riuers, and other particularities, agreeable to common report, though many times controlled by following experience, and found contrarie to truth. Yet indeed the ignorance growing from diſtance of place, allowes not ſuch liberrie to a Deſcriber, as that which ariſeth from the remedileſſe oblition of conſuming time. For it is true that the Poet ſaith;

—— Neq; feruidis
Pars incluſa caloribus
Mundi, nec Boreæ finitimum latus,
Duratæq; ſole Niues,
Mercatorem abigunt: horrida callidi
Vincunt æquora Nautæ.

Nor

Nor Southerne heate, nor Northerne ſnow
That freezing to the ground doth grow,
The ſubject Regions can fence,
And keepe the greedie Merchant thence.
The ſubtile Shipmen way will finde,
Storme neuer ſo the Seas with winde.

Therefore the fictions (or let them be called conjectures) painted in Maps, doe ſerue onely to miſ-lead ſuch diſcouerers as raſhly beleeue them; drawing vpon the publiſhers, eyther ſome angry curſes, or well deſerued ſcorne; but to keepe their owne credit, they cannot ſerue alwaies. To which purpoſe I remember a pretie jeſt of Don Pedro de Sarmiento, a worthy Spaniſh Gentleman, who had beene employed by his King in planting a Colonie vpon the Streights of Magellan: for when I aked him, being then my Priſoner, ſome queſtion about an Iſland in thoſe Streights, which me thought, might haue done eyther benefit or diſpleaſure to his enterpriſe, he told me merrily, that it was to be called the Painters wiues Iſland; ſaying, That whileſt the fellow drew that Map, his wife ſitting by, deſired to put in one Countrey for her; that ſhe, in imagination, might haue an Iſland of her owne. But in filling vp the blankes of old Hiſtories, wee need not be ſo ſcrupulous. For it is not to be feared, that time ſhould runne backward, and by reſtoring the things themſelues to knowledge, make our conjectures appeare ridiculous: What if ſome good Copie of an ancient Author could be found, ſhewing (if we haue it not alreadie) the perfect truth of theſe vncertainties? would it bee more ſhame to haue beleeued in the meane while, Annius or Torniellus, than to haue beleeued nothing? Heere I will not ſay, that the credit, which wee giue to Annius, may chance otherwhiles to be giuen to one of thoſe Authors whoſe naines he pretendeth. Let it ſuffice, that in regard of authority, I had rather truſt Scaliger or Torniellus, than Annius; yet him than them, if his aſſertion be more probable, and more agreeable to approued Hiſtories than their conjecture, as in this point it ſeemes to me; it hauing moreouer gotten ſome credit, by the approbation of many, and thoſe not meanly learned.

To end this tedious diſputation; I hold it a ſure courſe in examination of ſuch opinions, as haue once gotten the credit of being generall, ſo to deale as Pacuuius in Capua did with the multitude, finding them deſirous to put all the Senatours of the Citie to death. He lockt the Senatours vp within the State-houſe, and offered their liues to the Peoples mercie; obtaining thus much, that none of them ſhould periſh, vntill the Commonalty had both pronounced him worthy of death, and elected a better in his place. The condemnation was haſtie; for as faſt as euery name was read, all the town cryed, Let him die: but the execution required more leiſure; for in ſubſtituting of another, ſome notorious vice of the Perſon, or baſeneſſe of his condition, or inſufficiencie of his qualitie, made each new one that was offered, to be rejected: ſo that finding the worſe and leſſe choiſe, the further and the more that they ſought, it was finally agreed, that the olde ſhould be kept for lacke of better.

§ V.

Of the Olympiads, and the time when they began.

AFter this diuiſion of the Aſſyrian Empire, followes the inſtauration of the Olympian games, by Iphitus, in the reigne of the ſame King Vzzia, and in his one and fiftieth yeere. It is, I know, the generall opinion, that theſe games were eſtabliſhed by Iphitus, in the firſt of Iotham: yet is not that opinion ſo generall, but that Authors, waightie enough, haue giuen to them a more early beginning. The truth is, that in fitting thoſe things vnto the ſacred Hiſtorie, which are found in prophane Authors, wee ſhould not be too carefull of drawing the Hebrewes to thoſe workes of time, which had no reference to their affaires; it is enough, that ſetting in due order theſe beginnings of accompts, we ioyne them to matters of Iſrael and Iuda, where occaſion requires.

Theſe Olympian games and exerciſes of actiuitie, were firſt inſtituted by Hercules, who meaſured the length of the race by his owne foot; by which Pythagoras found out the ſtature and likely ſtrength of Hercules his bodie. They tooke name, not from the Mountaine Olympus, but from the Citie Olympia, otherwiſe Piſa, neere vnto Elis; where alſo

Iupiters

Iupiters Temple in Elis, famous among the Græcians, and reputed among the wonders of the World, was knowne by the name of the Temple of Iupiter Olympius. Theſe games were exerciſed from euery fourth yeare compleat, in the plaines of Elis, a Citie of Peloponneſus, neere the riuer Alpheus.

After the death of Hercules, theſe meetings were diſcontinued for many yeeres, till Iphitus by aduice from the Oracle of Apollo, re-eſtabliſhed them, Lycurgus the Law-giuer then liuing: from which time they were continued by the Græcians, till the reigne of Theodoſius the Emperor, according to Cedrenus: others thinke that they were diſſolued vnder Conſtantine the Great. Aul. Gell. l. 1. c. ex Plut. Plut. out of Hermippus.

From this inſtitution, Varro accompted the Græcian times, and their ſtories, to be certaine: but reckoned all before either doubtfull, or fabulous: and yet Plinie giues little credit to all that is written of Greece, till the reigne of Cyrus, who began in the fiue and fiftieth Olympiad, as Euſebius out of Diodore, Caſtor, Polybius, and others hath gathered, in whoſe time the ſeuen wiſe Græcians flouriſhed. For Solon had ſpeech with Cræſus, and Cræſus was ouerthrowne and taken by Cyrus. Plin. l. 36. c. 4.

Many patient and piercing braines haue laboured to finde out the certaine beginning of theſe Olympiads, namely, to ſet them in the true yeere of the World, and the reigne of ſuch and ſuch Kings: but ſeeing they all differ in the firſt accompt, that is, of the Worlds yeare, they can hardly iumpe in particulars thereon depending.

Cyril againſt Iulian, and Didymus, begin the Olympiads the nine and fortieth of Oſias, or Azariah.

Euſebius, who is contrarie to himſelfe in this reckoning, accounts with thoſe that finde the very firſt Olympiad in the beginning of the foure hundreth and ſixth yeere after Troy, yet yee telleth vs, that it was in the fiftieth yeere of Vzzia, which is (as I finde it) two yeeres later. Euſeb. de Prep. Euang. l. 10. c. 3

Eratoſthenes placeth the firſt Olympiad foure hundred and ſeuen yeeres after Troy, reckoning the yeeres that paſſed betweene; to whom Dionyſius Halicarnaſſæus, Diodorus Siculus, Solinus, and many others adhere. Eratoſth. apud Clem. Alex. Strom l. 1.

The diſtance betweene the deſtruction of Troy, and the firſt Olympiad, is thus collected by Eratoſthenes. From the taking of Troy, to the deſcent of Hercules his Poſteritie into Peloponneſus, were foureſcore yeeres; thence to the Ionian expedition, threeſcore yeares; from that expedition to the time of Lycurgus his gouernement in Sparta, one hundred fiftie nine; and thence to the firſt Olympiad, one hundred and eight yeeres. In this account the firſt yeare of the firſt Olympiad is not included.

But vaine labour it were, to ſeeke the beginning of the Olympiads, by numbering the yeares from the taking of Troy, which is of a date farre more vncertaine. Let it ſuffice, that by knowing the inſtauration of theſe games, to haue been in the foure hundreth and eight yeere current after Troy, wee may reckon backe to the taking of that Citie, ſetting that, and other accidents, which haue reference thereto, in their proper times. The certaintie of things following the Olympiads, muſt needs teach vs how to finde when they beganne.

To this good vſe, we haue the enſuing yeeres, vnto the death of Alexander the Great, thus diuided by the ſame Eratoſthenes. From the beginning of the Olympiads, to the paſſage of Xerxes into Greece, two hundreth foureſcore and ſeuenteene yeeres; from thence to the beginning of the Peloponneſian Warre, eight and fortie yeares; forwards to the victorie of Lyſander, ſeuen and twentie; to the battaile of Leuctra, thirtie foure; to the death of Philip King of Macedon, fiue and thirtie; and finally to the death of Alexander, twelue. The whole ſumme ariſeth to 453. yeares; which number he otherwiſe alſo collecteth, and it is allowed by the moſt.

Now for placing the inſtitution of the Olympiads in the one & fiftieth yeere of Vzziah, we haue arguments grounded vpon that which is certaine, concerning the beginning of Cyrus his reigne, and the death of Alexander; as alſo vpon the Aſtronomicall calculation of ſundrie Eclipſes of the Sunne, as of that which happened, when Xerxes ſet out of Sardis with his Armie to inuade Greece; and of diuers other.

Touching Cyrus, it is generally agreed that his reigne as King, before he was Lord of the great Monarchie, began the firſt yeere of the fiue and fiftieth Olympiad, and that hee reigned thirty yeeres; they who giue him but twentie nine yeeres of reigne (following Herodotus rather than Tully, Iuſtine, Euſebius, and others) begin a yeere later, which comes all Tul. de Diu. l. 1 Iuſt. l. 1. Euſeb. de Prep. Euang. l. 10. c. 3. & de Dem. Euang. l. 8. c. 2.

all to one reckoning. So is the death of Alexander set by all good Writers, in the first yere of the hundreth and fourteenth Olympiad. This later note of Alexanders death, serueth well to leade vs backe to the beginning of Cyrus; as many the like obseruations doe. For if wee reckon vpwards from the time of Alexander, wee shall finde all to agree with the yeeres of the Olympiads, wherein Cyrus began his reigne, either as King, or (taking the word Monarch, to signifie a Lord of many Kingdomes) as a great Monarch. From the beginning of Cyrus, in the first yere of the fiue and fiftieth Olympiad, vnto the end of the Persian Empire, which was in the third of the hundreth and twelfth Olympiad, wee finde two hundred and thirty yeeres compleat: from the beginning of Cyrus his Monarchie, which lasted but seuen yeeres, we finde compleat two hundred and seuen yeeres, which was the continuance of the Persian Empire.

Now therefore seeing that the first yeere of Cyrus his Monarchie (which was the last of the sixtieth Olympiad, and the two hundreth and fortieth yeere from the institution of those games by Iphitus) followed the last of the seuentie yeres, of the captiuitie of Iuda, and desolation of the Land of Israel; manifest it is, that we must reckon backe those seuentie yeeres, and one hundred threescore and ten yeeres more, the last which passed vnder the Kings of Iuda, to finde the first of these Olympiads; which by this accompt is the one and fiftieth of Vzziah, as we haue already noted.

The Eclipses whereof wee made mention, serue well to the same purpose. For examples sake, that which was seene when Xerxes mustered his Armie at Sardis, in the two hundreth threescore, and seuenth yeere of Nabonassar, being the last of the threescore and fourteenth Olympiad; leades vs backe vnto the beginning of Xerxes, and from him to Cyrus, whence we haue a faire way through the threescore and ten yeeres, vnto the destruction of Ierusalem; and so vpwards through the reignes of the last Kings of Iuda, to the one and fiftieth yeere of Vzzia.

Thus much may suffice, concerning the time wherein these Olympiads beganne.

To tell the great solemnitie of them, and with what exceeding great concourse of all Greece they were celebrated, I hold it a superfluous labour. It is enough to say that all bodily exercises, or the most of them, were therein practised; as Running, Wrastling, Fighting, and the like. Neither did they onely contend for the Mastrie in those feates, whereof there was good vse, but in running of Chariots, fighting with Whorle-bats, and other the like ancient kindes of exercises, that serued onely for ostentation. Thither also repaired Orators, Poets, Musicians, and all that thought themselues excellent in any laudable qualitie, to make triall of their skill. Yea the very Cryers which proclaimed the victories, contended which of them should get the honour, of hauing plaid the best part.

The Eleans were Presidents of those Games; whose Iustice, in pronouncing without partialitie, who did best, is highly commended. As for the rewards giuen to the Victors, they were none other than Garlands of Palme, or Oliue, without any other commoditie following, than the reputation. Indeed there needed no more. For that was held so much, that when Diagoras had seene his three sonnes crowned for their seuerall victories in those games, one came running to him with this gratulation: Morere, Diagoras, non enim in cœlum ascensurus es; that is; Die Diagoras, For thou shalt not clime vp to heauen: as if there could be no greater happinesse on earth, than what alreadie had befallen him. In the like sense Horace speakes of these Victors, calling them,

Quos Elaa domum reducit
Palma cœlestes.

Such as like heauenly wights doe come
With an Elæan Garland home.

Neither was it onely the voice of the People, or songs of Poets, that so highly extolled them, which had wonne these Olympian prizes; but euen graue Historians thought it a matter worthie of their noting. Such was (as Tullie counts it) the vanitie of the Greekes, that they esteemed it almost as great an honour, to haue wonne the victorie at Running or Wrastling in those games, as to haue triumphed in Rome for some famous victorie, or conquest of a Prouince.

Tull. in Orat. pro Flacco.

That these Olympian games were celebrated at the full of the Moone, and vpon the fifteenth fifteenth day of the Moneth Hecatombaeon, which doth answere to our June; and what meanes they vsed to make the Moneth begin with the new Moone, that the fifteenth day might be the full; I haue shewed in another place. Wherefore I may now returne vnto the Kings of Iuda, & leaue the merrie Greekes at their games, whom I shall meet in more serious employments, when the Persian quarrells draw the bodie of this Historie into the coasts of Ionia and Hellespont.

§ VI.
Of Iotham and his Contemporaries.

Iotham the sonne of Vzziah, when hee was fiue and twenty yeeres old, and in the second of Pekah King of Israel, was anointed King in Ierusalem, his Father yet liuing. He built an exceeding high Gate to the Temple, of threescore cubits vpright, and therefore called Ophel: besides diuers Cities in the Hills of Iuda, and in the Forrests, Towers, and Palaces: he inforced the Ammonites to pay him Tribute, to wit, of Siluer an hundreth talents, and of Wheat and Barly two thousand measures: he reigned sixe and twentie yeeres: of whom Iosephus giues this testimonie: Eiusmodi verò Princeps hic fuit, vt nullum in eo virtutis genus desideres: vt qui Deum adeo piè coluerit, hominibus suis adeo iustè præfuerit, vrbem ipsam tantæ sibi curæ esse passus sit, & tantopere auxerit, vt vniuersum regnum hostibus quidem minimè contemnendum, domesticis autem eius incolis atque ciuibus fælix, fanstum & fortunatum sua virtute effecerit; This was such a Prince, as a man could finde no kinde of vertue wanting in him: hee worshipped God so religiously, he gouerned his men so righteously, he was so prouident for the Citie, and did so greatly amplifie it, that by his vertue and prowesse he made his whole Kingdome not contemptible to his enemies, but to his Seruants, Inhabitants and Citizens, prosperous and happie. 2 King. 15. 33

This is all that I finde of Iotham: his reigne was not long, but as happie in all things, as he himselfe was deuout and vertuous.

Auchomenes about this time succeeded Phelesteus in Corinth: after whom, the Corinthians erected Magistrates, which gouerned from yeere to yeere. And yet Pausanias in his second Booke, with Strabo and Plutarch, in many places are of opinion, That Corinth was gouerned by Kings of the race of the Bacidæ, to the time of Cypselus, who droue them out.

Teglathphalassar, or Tiglathpeleser, the sonne of Phul, the second of the Babylonians and Assyrians that was of this new race, about this time inuaded Israel, while Pekah (who murthered his Master Pekaiah) was King thereof. In which Expedition he tooke most of the Cities of Nephtali and Galile, with those of Gilead, ouer Iordan, and carried the inhabitants captiue. This Tiglath reigned fiue and twentie yeeres, according to Metasthenes. But Krentzhemius findes, that with his sonne Salmanassar he reigned yet two yeeres longer: which yeeres I would not ascribe to the sonne, because the Aera of Nabonassar begins with his single reigne, but reckon them to Tiglath Phulassar himselfe, who therewith reigned 27. yeeres. 2 King. 15.

Æschylus, the sonne of Agamnestor, about the same time, the twelfth Archon in Athens, ruled 25. yeers. Alcamenes gouerned Sparta: after whom, the Estate changed, according to Eusebius: but therein surely Eusebius is mistaken. For Diodore, Plutarch, Pausanias, and others witnesse the contrary. Pausanias affirmeth, That Polydorus, a Prince of eminent vertues, succeeded his father, and reigned 60. yeres, and out-liued the Messeniack warre: which was ended by Theopompus, the sonne of Nicander, his royall companion. Paus. l. 3.

At this time liued Nahum the Prophet, who foretold the destruction of the Assyrian Empire, and of the Citie of Ninive; which succeeded (saith Iosephus) a hundred & fifteen yeeres after. The Cities of Cyrene and of Aradus were built at this time, while in Media, Sosarmus and Medidus reigned, being the second and third Kings of those parts.

Of Achaz and his Contemporaries.

Has, or Achaz, succeeded vnto Iotham in the seuenteenth yeere of Peka, the son of Remalia: the same being also the last yeere of his fathers reigne, who began in the second of the same Peka, and reigned 16, but not compleat yeeres. This Ahaz was an Idolater, exceeding all his predeceſſors. He made molten Images for Baalim, and burnt his ſonne for ſacrifice before the Idoll Moloch, or Saturne, which was repreſented by a man-like brazen bodie, bearing the head of a Calfe, ſet vp not farre from Ieruſalem, in a Valley ſhaddowed with Woods, called Gehinnom, or Tophet, from whence the word Gehenna is vſed for Hell. The children offered, were incloſed within the carkaſſe of this Idoll, and as the fire encreaſed, ſo the ſacrificers, with a noyſe of Cymbals and other Inſtruments, filled the ayre, to the end the pittifull cries of the children might not be heard: which vnnaturall, cruell, and diuelliſh Oblation, Ieremie the Prophet vehemently reprehendeth, and of which Saint Hierome vpon the tenth of Matthew hath written at large. By the prohibition in Leuiticus the eighteenth, it appeareth that this horrible ſinne was ancient: in the twelfth of Deuteronomie, it is called an abhomination which God hateth. That it was alſo practiſed elſewhere, and by many Nations remote from Iudæa, diuers Authors witneſſe; as Virgil in the ſecond of Æneids, —— Sanguine placaſtis, &c. and Silius, —— Poſcere cæde Deos. Saturne is ſaid to haue brought this cuſtome into Italie, beſides the caſting of many ſoules into the Riuer of Tyber, inſtead of which, Hercules commanded, that the waxen Images of men ſhould be throwne in and drowned. The Deuill alſo taught the Carthaginians this kinde of butcherie, inſo-much, that when their Citie was beſieged, and in diſtreſſe, the Prieſt made them beleeue, that becauſe they had ſpared their owne children, and had bought and brought vp others to be offered, that therefore Saturne had ſtirred vp, and ſtrengthened their Enemies againſt them: whereupon they preſently cauſed two hundred of the nobleſt youths of their Citie to be ſlaine, and offered to Saturne or Satan, to appeaſe him: who beſides theſe forenamed Nations had inſtructed the Rhodians, the people of Crete, and Chios, of Meſſena, of Galatia, with the Maſſagets, and others, in theſe his ſeruices. Further, as if he were not content to deſtroy the ſoules of many Nations in Europe, Aſia, and Africa, (as Acoſta writeth) the Mexicans and other people of America, were brought by the Deuill vnder this fearefull ſeruitude, in which he alſo holdeth the Floridans and Virginians at this day.

For the wickedneſſe of this King Ahaz, God ſtirred vp Rezin of Damaſcus, and Pekah the Sonne of Remaliah, King of Iſrael againſt him, who inuaded Iudæa, and beſieged Ieruſalem, but entred it not.

The King of Syria, Rezin, poſſeſt himſelfe of Elah by the Red Sea, and caſt the Iewes out of it; and Pekah ſlaughtered in one day an hundred and twenty thouſand Iudæans, of the ableſt of the Kingdome, at which time Maaſeiah, the Sonne of Achaz was alſo ſlaine by Zichri, with Azrikam the Gouernour of his houſe: and Elcanath the ſecond perſon vnto the King. Beſides all this, two hundred thouſand priſoners of women and children, the Iſraelites led away to Samaria: but by the counſell of the Prophet Oded, they were returned and deliuered backe againe.

2. Chron. 28. 6.

As Iſrael and Aram vexed Iuda on the North; ſo the Edomites and the Philiſtims, who euermore attended the ruine of Iudæa, entred vpon them from the South; and took Bethſemes, Aialon, Gaderoth, Socho, Timnah, and Gemzo, ſlew many people, and carried away many priſoners. Whereupon when Achaz ſaw himſelfe enuironed on all ſides, and that his Idols and dead gods gaue him no comfort, he ſent to the Aſſyrian Tiglatphileſer, to deſire ſome aide from him againſt the Iſraelites and Aramites, preſenting him with the ſiluer and gold both of the Temple, and Kings Houſe.

2. Chron. 28.
2. Kings 16.

Tiglatphileſer wanted not a good example to follow, in making profit of the troubles that roſe in Palæſtina. His Father hauing lately made himſelfe from a Prouinciall Lieutenant, King of Babylon and Aſſyria, had a little before led him the way into Iudæa, inuited by Menahem, King of Iſrael. Wherefore now the Sonne willingly harkened to Achaz, and embraced the aduantage. As for Belochus himſelfe, he was content to aſſigne ſome other time for going through with this enterprize: becauſe (as I haue ſaid before) he was not firmely ſetled at home, and the Syrian Kings lay directly in his way, who were yet ſtrong both in men and fame. But Tiglath, hauing now, with the treaſures of Ieruſalem, prepared his Armie, firſt inuaded the Territorie of Damaſcus, wanne the Citie, and killed Rezin, the laſt of the race of the Adads, who began with Dauid, & ended with this Achaz. At Damaſcus Achaz met Tiglath, and taking thence a patterne of the Altar, ſent it to Vriah the Prieſt, commanding the like to be made at Ieruſalem, whereon at his returne hee burnt Sacrifice to the Gods of the Syrians. In the meane while Tiglath poſſeſt all Baſan, and the reſt beyond Iordan, which belonged to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Manaſſe. And then paſſing the Riuer, he maſtered the Cities of Galilee, inuaded Ephraim, and the Kingdome of Iſrael, and made them his Vaſſalls. And notwithſtanding that he was inuited and waged by Achaz, yet after the ſpoile of Iſrael, he poſſeſt himſelfe of the greater part of Iuda, and as it ſeemeth, inforced Achaz to pay him Tribute. For in the ſecond of Kings, the eighteenth, it is written of Ezechia, that he reuolted from Aſſur, or rebelled againſt him, and therefore was inuaded by Senacherib. After Ahaz had beheld and borne theſe miſeries, in the end of the ſixteenth yeere of his reigne he died: but was not buried in the Sepulchers of the Kings of Iuda.

With Ahaz liued Medidus, the third Prince in Media, who gouerned 40. yeeres, ſaith Euſebius: Diodorus and Cteſias finde Anticarmus in ſtead of this Medidus, to haue beene Soſarmus his Succeſſour, to whom they giue 50. yeeres. Euſeb. in Chron.

Tiglath Phileſer held the Kingdome of Aſſyria, all the reigne of Ahaz: yet ſo, that Salmanaſſar his Sonne may ſeeme to haue reigned with him ſome part of the time. For wee finde that Ahaz did ſend vnto the Kings of Aſſhur to helpe him. The Geneua note ſaies, that theſe Kings of Aſſur, were Tiglath Pileſer, and thoſe Kings that were vnder his Dominion. But that he or his Father had hitherto made ſuch conqueſts, as might giue him the Lordſhip ouer other Kings, I doe neither finde any Hiſtorie, nor circumſtance that proueth. Wherefore I thinke that theſe Kings of Aſſur, were Tiglath, and Salmanaſſar his Sonne, who reigned with his Father, as hath beene ſaid before: though how long hee reigned with his Father, it had beene hard to define. 2. King 28. 16.

At this time began the Ephori in Lacedæmon, a hundred and thirty yeeres after Lycurgus according to Plutarch. Euſebius makes their beginning farre later, namely, in the fifteenth Olympiad. Of theſe Ephori, Elalus was the firſt; Theopompus and Polydorus, being then joynt Kings. Theſe Ephori, choſen euery yeere, were controllers, as well of their Senators as of their Kings, nothing being done without their aduice and conſent. For (ſaith Cicero) they were oppoſed againſt their Kings, as the Roman Tribunes againſt the Conſuls. In the time of Ahaz died Æſchylus, who had ruled in Athens euer ſince the fiftieth yeere of Vzzia. Alcamenon the thirteenth of the Medontida, or Gouernours of the Athenians (ſo called of Medon who followed Codrus) ſucceeded his Father Æſchylus, and was the laſt of their Gouernors: he ruled onely two yeeres. For the Athenians changed firſt from Kings (after Codrus) to Gouernors for life; which ending in this Alcamenon, they erected a Magiſtrate, whom they termed an Archon, who was a kinde of Burghomaſter, or Gouernor of their City for ten yeeres. Plut. in vita Solo.

This alteration Pauſanias in his fourth Booke begins, in the firſt yeere of the eight Olympiad. Euſebius and Halicarnaſſæus in the firſt of the ſeuenth Olympiad: at which time indeed, Carops the firſt of theſe, began his ten yeeres rule.

The Kingdome of the Latines gouerned about three hundred yeere by the Syluij, of the race of Æneas, tooke end in the ſame Ahaz time: the foundation of Rome, being laied by Romulus and Remus in the eight yeere of the ſame King. Codoman builds it the eleuenth of Achaz, Bucholzer in the eighth, as I thinke hee ſhould; others ſomewhat later, and in the reigne of Ezechias. Cicero, Eutropius, Oroſius, and others, ſquare the time of the foundation to the third yeere of the ſixth Olympiad. But Halicarnaſſeus, Solinus Antiochenus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Euſebius, to the firſt yeere of the ſeuenth: who ſeeme not onely to me, but to many very learned Chronologers, to haue kept herein the beſt accompt.

CHAP. XXIIII.

Of the Antiquities of Italie, and foundation of Rome in the time of Ahas.

§. I.

Of the old Inhabitants, and of the name of Italie.

AND here to speake of the more ancient times of Italie, and what Nations possest it before the arriuall of Æneas, the place may seeme to inuite vs: the rather becausse much fabulous matter hath beene mixed with the truth of those elder plantations. Italie before the fall of Troy, was known to the Greekes by diuers names: as first Hesperia, then Ausonia, the one name arising of the seate, the other of the Ausones, a people inhabiting part of it: one ancient name of it was also Oenotria, which it had of the Oenotri: whom Halicarnasseus thinkes to haue beene the first, that brought a Colonie of Arcadians into that Land. Afterward it was called Italie of Italus: concerning which changes of names, Virgil speakes thus:

Halicarn. l. 1.

Est locus, Hesperiam Graij cognomine dicunt:
Terra antiqua, potens armis, atque vbere gleba:
Oenotrij coluëre viri, nunc fama, minores
Italiam dixisse, ducis de nomine, gentem.

There is a Land which Greekes Hesperia name,
Ancient, and strong, of much fertilitie:
Oenotrians held it, but we heare by fame,
That by late ages of Posteritie,
'Tis from a Captaines name called Italie.

Who this Captaine or King may haue beene, it is very vncertaine. For Virgil speakes no more of him, and the opinions of others are many and repugnant. But like enough it is, that the name which hath continued so long vpon the whole Countrie, and worne out all other denominations, was not at the first accepted without good cause. Therefore to finde out the originall of this name, and the first planters of this noble Countrie, Reineccius hath made a very painfull search, and not improbable coniecture. And first of all he grounds vpon that of Halicarnasseus, who speakes of a Colonie which the Eleans did leade into Italie, before the name of Italie was giuen to it: Secondly, vpon that of Iustine, who saith, that Brundusium was a Colonie of the Ætolians: Thirdly, vpon that of Strabo, who affirmes the same of Temesa or Tempsa, a Citie of the Brutij in Italie: Lastly, vpon the authoritie of Plinie, who shewes that the Italians did inhabite onely one Region of the Land, whence afterward the name was deriued ouer all. Concerning that which is said of the Eleans and Ætolians, who (as hee shewes) had one originall; from them he brings the name of Italie. For the word Italia, differs in nothing from Aitolia, saue that the first Letter is cast away, which in the Greeke words is common; and the letter (o) is changed into (a) which change is found in the name of Æthalia an Island neere Italie, peopled by the Ætholians: and the like changes are very familiar in the Æolic Dialect; of which Dialect (being almost proper to the Ætolians) the accent & pronunciation, together with many words little altered, were retained by the Latines, as Dionysius Halicarnasseus, Quintilian, and Priscian the Grammarian teach.

Heereunto appertaines that of Iulian the Apostata, who called the Greekes, cousins of the Latines. Also the common Originall of the Greekes and Latines from Iauan; and the Fable of Ianus, whose Image had two faces, looking East and West, as Greece and Italie lay, and was stamped on Coynes, with a Shippe on the other side; all which is, by interpretation, referred to Iauan, father of the Greekes and Latines: who sayling ouer the Ionian Sea, that lies betweene Ætolia and the Westerne parts of Greece and Italie, planted Colonies in both. Now whereas Reyneccius thinkes, that the names of Atlas and Italus belonged both to one man, and thereto applyes that of Beroſus, who called Cethim, Italus; though it may ſeeme ſtrengthened by the marriage of Dardanus, whileſt he abode in Italie with Electra, the daughter of Atlas, yet is it by arguments (in my valuation) greater and ſtronger, eaſily diſproued. For they who make mention of Atlas, place him before the time of Moſes: and if Atlas were Cethim, or Kittim, then was he the ſonne of Iauan, and nephew of Iapheth, the eldeſt ſonne of Noah: which antiquity farre exceedes the name of Italie, that began after the departure of Hercules out of the Countrey, not long before the Warre of Troy.

Likewiſe Virgil, who ſpeakes of Atlas, and of Dardanus his marriage with Electra, hath nothing of his meeting with her in Italie; but calleth Electra & her ſiſter Maia (poetically) daughters of the Mountaine Atlas in Africa, naming Italus among the Kings of the Aborigenes; which he would not haue done, had Atlas and Italus been one perſon.

As for the authoritie of Beroſus in this caſe, we need the leſſe to regard it, for that Reyneccius himſelfe, whoſe conjectures are more to be valued than the dreames wherewith Annius hath filled Beroſus, holds it but a figment.

That the name of Italie began long after Atlas, it appeares by the Verſes of Virgil laſt rehearſed, wherein hee would not haue ſaid, —— Nunc fama minores Italiam dixiſſe ducis de nomine gentem, had that name beene heard of ere Dardanus left the Countrey. But ſeeing that, when Hercules, who died a few yeeres before the Warre of Troy, had left in Italie a Colonie of the Eleans (who in a manner were one and the ſame Nation with the Ætolians, as Strabo, Herodotus, and Pauſanias teach) then the name of Italie began: and ſeeing Virgil makes mention of Italus among the Italian Kings, it were no great boldneſſe to ſay, that Italus was Commander of theſe Eleans. For though I remember not that I haue read of any ſuch Greeke as was named Italus; yet the name of Ætolus, written in Greeke Aitolus, was very famous among the Ætolians, and among the Eleans, he being ſonne of a King of Elis, and founder of the Ætolian Kingdome. Neyther is it more hard to deriue the name of Italus from Ætolus, then Italia from Ætolia. So may Virgils authoritie ſtand well with the collections of Reyneccius; the name of Italie being taken both from a Captaine, and from the Nation, of which hee and his people were.

§. II.

Of the Aborigines, and other Inhabitants of Latium, and of the reaſon of the names of Latini and Latium.

IN Italie the Latines and Hetrurians were moſt famous; the Hetrurians hauing held the greateſt part of it vnder their ſubiection; and the Latines by the vertue and felicity of the Romans, who were a branch of them, ſubduing all Italie, and in few ages whatſoeuer Nation was knowne in Europe: together with all the Weſterne parts of Aſia, and North of Africk.

The Region called Latium, was firſt inhabited by the Aborigines, whom Halicarnaſſæus, Varro, and Reyneccius (following them) thinke to haue been Arcadians: and this name of Aborigines (to omit other ſignifications that are ſtrained) imports as much as originall, or natiue of the place, which they poſſeſſed: which title the Arcadians are known in vaunting manner to haue alwaies vſurped, fetching their antiquitie from beyond the Moone; becauſe indeed, neither were the inhabitants of Peloponneſus inforced to forſake their ſeates ſo oft as other Greekes were, who did dwell without that halfe Iſland, neyther had the Arcadians ſo vnſure a dwelling as the reſt of the Peloponneſians, becauſe their Country was leſſe fruitfull in land, mountainous, and hard of acceſſe, & they themſelues (as in ſuch places commonly are found) very warlike men. Some of theſe therefore hauing occupied a great part of Latium, & held it long, did according to the Arcadian manner, ſtile themſelues Aborigines, in that language, which either their new Seate, or their Neighbours thereby had taught them. How it might be that the Arcadians, who dwelt ſomwhat far from Sea, & are alwaies noted as vnapt men to proue good Mariners, ſhould haue beene Authors of new diſcoueries, were a queſtion not eaſie to be anſwered, were it not ſo, that both fruitfulneſſe of children, in which thoſe ages abounded, inforced the ſuperfluous companie to ſeeke another ſeat, and that ſome expeditions of the Arcadians, as eſpecially that of Euander, into the ſame parts of Italie, are generally acknowledged.

After the Aborigines, were the Pelaſgi, an ancient Nation, who ſometimes gaue name to all Greece: but their antiquities are long ſince dead, for lacke of good records. Neither was their glorie ſuch in Italie, as could long ſuſtaine the name of their owne Tribe; for they were in ſhort ſpace accounted one people with the former inhabitants. The Sicani, Auſones, Arunci, Rutili, and other people, did in ages following diſturbe the peace of Latium, which by Saturne was brought to ſome ciuilitie; and he therefore canonized as a god.

This Saturne S. Auguſtine calleth Sterces or Sterculius, others terme him Stercutius, and ſay, that he taught the people to dung their grounds. That Latium tooke his name of Saturne, becauſe he did latere, that is, lie hidden there, when he fled from Iupiter, it is queſtionleſſe a fable. For as in Heatheniſh ſuperſtition, it was great vanitie to thinke that any thing could be hidden from God, or that there were many gods of whom one fledde from another; ſo in the truth of Hiſtorie, it is well knowne, that no King reigning in thoſe parts was ſo mighty, that it ſhould bee hard to finde one Countrie or another, wherein a man might be ſafe from his purſuit. And yet, as moſt fables and poeticall fictions were occaſioned by ſome ancient truth, which eyther by ambiguity of ſpeech, or ſome alluſion, they did maimedly and darkely expreſſe (for ſo they fained a paſſage ouer a Riuer in Hell, becauſe death is a paſſage to another life; and becauſe this paſſage is hatefull, lamentable, and painfull, therefore they named the Riuer Styx of Hate, Cocytus of Lamentation, and Acheron of Paine: ſo alſo becauſe men are ſtonie-hearted, and becauſe the Greeke λαοὶ people, and λαὶ ſtones, are neere in ſound, therefore they fained in the time of Deucalion ſtones conuerted into men, as at other times men into ſtones:) in like manner it may be, that the originall of Saturnes hiding himſelfe, was ſome alluſion to that olde opinion of the wiſeſt of the Heathen, that the true God was ignotus Deus, as it is noted in the Acts; whence alſo Eſay of the true God ſaies, tu Deus abdens te. For it can not be in vaine, that the word Saturnus ſhould alſo haue this very ſignification, if it be deriued (as ſome thinke) from the Hebrew Satar, which is to hide: Howbeit I denie not, but that the originall of this word, Latium, ought rather to be ſought elſewhere.

See lib. 1. cap. 6. §. 1. & ſeq.

Eſay 45. 15.

Reyneccius doth coniecture that the Cateans, who deſcended of Cethim, the Sonne of Iauan, were the men who gaue the name to Latium. For theſe Ceteans are remembred by Homer as aiders of the Troians in their Warre. Strabo interpreting the place of Homer, calls them ſubjects to the Crowne of Troy. Heereupon Reyneccius gathers, that their abode was in Aſia: viz. in agro Elaitico; in the Elaitian Territorie, which agreeth with Strabo. Of a City which the Æolians held in Aſia, called Elæa, or Elaia, Pauſanias makes mention: Stephanus calls it Cidamis, or (according to the Greeke writing) Cidamis, which name laſt rehearſed hath a very neere ſound to Cethim, Citim, or Cithim; the Greeke Letter (D) hauing (as many teach) a pronunciation very like to (TH) differing onely in the ſtrength or weakeneſſe of vtterance, which is found betweene many Engliſh words written with the ſame letters. Wherefore that theſe Ceteans beeing deſcended of Cethim, Cittim, or Kittim, the Sonne of Iauan, who was Progenitor of the Greekes, might very well take a denomination from the Citie, and Region, which they inhabited, and from thence be called Elaites, or Elaites, it is very likely, conſidering that among the Arcadians, Phocians, Ætolians, and Eleans, who all were of the Æolique Tribe, are found the names of the Mountaine Elæus, the Hauen Eleas, the people Elaita, the Cities Eleus, Elaia, and Elateia; of which laſt it were ſomewhat harſh in the Latine tongue to call the Inhabitants by any other name then Elatini, from whence Latini may come. Now whereas both the Cetæi and Arcadians, had their originall from Cethim, it is nothing vnlikely, that agreeing in language and ſimilitude of names, they might neuertheleſſe differ in ſound anh pronunciation of one and the ſame word. So that as he is by many called Sabinus, to whom ſome (deriuing the Sabines from him) giue the name of Sabus: in the like manner might he whom the Arcadians would call Elatus (of which name they had a Prince that founded the Citie Elateia) bee named of the Ceteans Latinus. Reyneccius purſuing this likelihood, thinkes, that when Eurypilus, Lord of the Ceteans, (being the Sonne of Telephus, whom Hercules begat vpon Auge, the daughter of Aleus King of Arcadia) was ſlaine by Achilles in the Troian Warre: then did Telephus, brother to Eurippus, conduct the Ceteans; who (fearing what euill might befall themſelues by the Greekes, if the affaires of Troy ſhould goe ill) paſſed into that part of Italie, whereas the Arcadians were planted by Oenotrus. And Reyneccius farther thinkes, that Telephus being the more gracious among among the Oenotrian Arcadians, by the memory of his Grand-mother Auge, an Arcadian Lady, was well contented to take an Arcadian name, and to be called Elatus, which in the dialect and pronunciation either of the Ceteans, or of the Oenotrians, was first Elatinus, and then Latinus. That this name of Elatus may haue beene taken or imposed by the Arcadians, it is the more easie to be thought, for that there were then two Families, the one of Aphidas, the other of Elatus, who were Sons of Arcas King of Arcadia, which gaue name to the Countrie: and betweene these two Families the succession in that Kingdome did passe, almost enterchangeably for many ages, till at the end of the Troian warre it fell into the hand of Hippotheus of the race of Elatus, in whose Posteritie it continued vntill the last. Againe, the name of Latinus, hauing a deriuatiue sound, agrees the better with the supposition of such an accident. This is the coniecture of Reyneccius, which if he made ouer-boldly, yet others may follow it with the lesse reproofe, considering that it is not easie to finde either an apparent truth, or faire probability among these disagreeing Authors, which haue written the originals of Latium.

§. III.

Of the ancient Kings of the Latines vntill Æneas his comming.

THe Kings which reigned in Latium before the arriuall of Æneas, were Saturnus, Picus, Faunus and Latinus. Of Saturne there is nothing remembred, saue what is mentioned already, and many fables of the Greekes, which whether they be appliable to this man, it is for him to iudge, who shall be able to determine, whether this were the Saturne of the Greekes, called by them Κρόνος, or some other, stiled Saturne by the Aborigines. For the age wherein he liued, may very well admit him to haue beene the same: but the names of * Sterces, and Stercutius (for it may be, this name was not borrowed from the skill which he taught the people, but rather the soyle which they laid on their grounds, had that appellation from him) doe rather make him seeme some other man.

Of Picus it is said, that he was a good Horse-man. The fable of his being changed into a Bird, which we call a Pie, may well seeme (as it is interpreted) to haue growne from the skill which he had in sooth-saying, or diuination, by the flight and chattering of Fowles. Faunus, the Sonne of Picus, reigned after his Father. He gaue to Euander the Arcadian (who hauing slaine by mischance his Father Echemus King of Arcadia, fled into Italie) the waste grounds on which Rome was afterward built.

Fauna, called Fatua, the sister of Faunus, who was also his Wife, as all Historians agree; she was held a Prophetesse, and highly commended for her chastitie, which praise in her must needs haue been much blemished by her marriage, it selfe being meerly incestuous.

It is not mentioned that Faunus had by his sister any childe, neither doe we reade of any other Wife which he had, saue onely that Virgil giues vnto him Latinus as his Sonne, by a Nymph, called Marica.

But who this Marica was it is not found, saue onely that her aboad was about the Riuer Liris neere Minturnæ.

Of the name Latinus, there are by Pomponius Sabinus recounted foure: one, the Sonne of Faunus, another of Hercules, a third of Vlysses by Circe, the fourth of Telemachus. Suidas takes notice onely of the second, of whom he saith, that his name was Telephus, and the people anciently named the Ceti, were from his surname called Latini. This agrees in effect with the opinion of Reyneccius, the difference consisting almost in this onely, that Suidas calls Telephus, the sonne of Hercules, whereas Reyneccius makes him his Nephew, by a sonne of the same name. This Latinus hauing obtained the succession in that Kingdome after Faunus, did promise his onely Daughter and Heire Lauinia, to Turnus the son of Venilia, who was sister to Amata Latinus his Wife.

But when Æneas arriued in those parts with fifteene ships, or perhaps fewer, wherein might be imbarked according to the rate which Thucydides allowes to the Vessels then vsed, about one thousand and two hundred men: then Latinus finding that it would stand best with his assurance, to make alliance with the Troian, and moued with the great reputation of Æneas, which himselfe had heard of in the Warre of Troy, gaue his Daughter to him, breaking off the former appointment with Turnus, who incensed here-

* Ezekiel often cals the Idols of the heathen dees stercoreos: and hence it may be that in the Euangelist we reade of Belzebub, Belzebul, which is interpreted Dominus Stercoreus: and it may be that after that Saturne became the name of an Idol, it pleased God that in a like sense this name Stercutius should sticke vnto him. Aenéid. 7.

Suidas in the word Latini.

herewith, fought to auenge himselfe by warre: which was soone ended with his owne death.

Of Amata the Wife of Latinus, it is very certaine, that were she an Italian, she could not haue borne a Daughter mariageable at the arriuall of Æneas; vnlesse we should wholly follow Suidas, and rather giue the conduct of the Cetei into Italie, to Telephus the Father, than to his Sonne, who serued in the last yeere of the Troian Warre. But Reynecius holds her an Asiatique, and thinkes withall, that Lauinia was borne before Telephus came into Italie. That this name Amata, by which Virgil and Halicarnassæus call her, was not proper, but rather a surname, it may seeme by Varro; who calleth her Palatia: which name very well might be deriued from the Greeke name Pallas. Amata, which signifieth beloued, or deare, was the name by which the High Priest called euery Virgin, whom he tooke to serue as a Nunne of Vesta; wherefore it is the more easie to be thought a surname, howsoeuer Virgil discourse of her and Venilia her sister.

Lauinia, the daughter of Latinus, being giuen in marriage to Æneas, the Kingdome of Latium, or the greatest part of that Countrie, was established in that race: wherein it continued vntill it was ouer-growne by the might and greatnesse of the Romans.

§. IIII.

Of Æneas, and of the Kings and Gouernors of Alba.

ÆNeas himselfe being of the royall bloud of Troy, had the command of the Dardanians: he was a valiant man, very rich, and highly honoured among the Troians. By his wife Creusa, the daughter of Priamus, he had a sonne called Ascanius; whose surname was Iulus, hauing before the ruine of Troy (as Virgil notes) beene surnamed Ilus. But when Æneas was dead, his wife Lauinia, the daughter of Latinus, being great with child by him, and fearing the power of this Ascanius, fled into the Woods, where she was deliuered of a sonne, called thereupon Syluius, and surnamed Posthumus, because he was borne after his fathers Funerall. This flight of Lauinia was so euill taken by the people, that Ascanius procured her returne, entreated her honourably, and vsing her as a Queene, did foster her yong sonne, his halfe-brother Syluius. Yet afterwards, whether to auoid all occasions of disagreement, or delighted with the situation of the place; Ascanius leauing to his mother in law the Citie Lauinium, which Æneas had built and called after his new wiues name, founded the Citie Alba Longa, and therein reigned. The time of his reigne was, according to some, eight and twenty yeeres: Virgil giues him thirtie; others fiue and thirty, and eight and thirty. After his deceasse, there arose contention betweene Syluius, the sonne of Æneas, and Iulus the sonne of Ascanius, about the Kingdome: but the people inclining to the sonne of Lauinia, Iulus was contented to hold the Priesthood, which he and his race enioyed, leauing the Kingdome to Syluius Posthumus, whose posterity were afterwards called Syluij.

The reigne of the Alba Kings, with the continuance of each mans reigne, I finde thus set downe:

1	Syluius Posthumus.	29
2	Syluius Æneas.	31
3	Syluius Latinus.	50
4	Syluius Alba.	39

Romulus. Remus.

The

The moſt of theſe Kings liued in peace, and did little or nothing worthy of remembrance.

Latinus founded many Townes in the borders of Latium: who ſtanding much vpon the honour of their originall, grew thereby to be called Priſci Latini. Of Tiberinus ſome thinke that the Riuer Tiber had name, being formerly called Albula: but Virgil giues it that denomination of another called Tibris, before the comming of Æneas into Italie. The Mountaine Auentinus had name (as many write) from Auentinus King of the Albanes: who was buried therein: but Virgil hath it otherwiſe. Iulius, the brother of Auentinus, is named by Euſebius as father of another Iulius, and grandfather of Iulius Proculus; who leauing Alba, dwelt with Romulus in Rome. Numitor, the elder ſonne of Procas, was depriued of his Kingdome by his brother Amulius; by whom alſo his ſonne Ægeſthus was ſlaine, and Ilia his daughter made a Nunne of Veſta, that thereby the iſſue of Numitor might be cut off. But ſhe conceiued two ſonnes, either by her Vncle Amulius, as ſome thinke; or by Mars, as the Poets faine; or perhaps by ſome man of warre. Both the children, their Vncle commanded to be drowned, and the mother buried quicke, according to the Law; which ſo ordained, when the Veſtall Virgins brake their chaſtitie. Whether it was ſo, that the mother was pardoned at the entreatie of Antho, the daughter of Amulius, or puniſhed as the Law required (for Authors herein doe varie) it is agreed by all, that the two children were preſerued, who afterward reuenged the cruelty of their Vncle, with the ſlaughter of him and all his, and reſtored Numitor their grandfather to the Kingdome: wherein how long he reigned, I finde not, neither is it greatly materiall to know; for as much as the Eſtates of Alba and of Latium were preſently eclipſed by the ſwift increaſe of Rome; vpon which the computation of Time following (as farre as concernes the things of Italie) is dependant. After the death of Numitor, the Kingdome of Alba ceaſed; for Numitor left no male iſſue. Romulus choſe rather to liue in Rome; and of the Line of Syluius none elſe remained. So the Albanes were gouerned by Magiſtrates; of whom onely two Dictators are mentioned, namely Caius Cluilius, who in the dayes of Tullus Hoſtilius, King of the Romanes, making Warre vpon Rome, dyed in the Campe; and Metius Suffetius, the ſucceſſor of Cluilius, who ſurrendred the Eſtate of Alba vnto the Romanes, hauing committed the hazard of both Signories to the ſucceſſe of three men of each ſide, who decided the quarrell by Combat: in which, the three brethren Horatij, the Champions of the Romanes, preuailed againſt the Curiatij, Champions of the Albanes. After this Combat, when Metius (following Tullus Hoſtilius with the Albane forces againſt the Veientes and Fidenates) withdrew his Companies out of the battaile, hoping thereby to leaue the Romanes to ſuch an ouerthrow, as might make them weake enough for the Albanes to deale with; Tullus, who notwithſtanding this falſehood, obtained the victory, did reward Metius with a cruell death, cauſing him to be tyed to two Chariots, and ſo torne in pieces. Then was Alba deſtroyed and the Citizens carried to Rome, where they were made free Denizens, the noble Families being made Patritians; among which were the Iulij: of whom C. Iulius Cæſar being deſcended, not onely gloried in his ancient, royall, and forgotten pedegree, in full aſſembly of the Romanes, then gouerned by a free Eſtate of the People: but by his rare induſtrie, valour, and iudgement, obtained the Soueraigtie of the Romane Empire (much by him enlarged) to himſelfe and his poſteritie; whereby the name of Æneas, and honour of the Troian and Alban Race, was ſo reuiued, that ſeldome, if euer, any one Family hath attained to a proportionable height of glory.

§ V.

Of the beginning of Rome, and of Romulus birth and death.

OF Rome, which deuoured the Alban Kingdome, I may here beſt ſhew the beginnings, which (though ſomewhat vncertaine) depend much vpon the birth and education of Romulus, the grand-childe of Numitor, the laſt that reigned in Alba. For how not onely the bordering people, but all Nations betweene Euhrpates and the Ocean where broken in pieces by the yron teeth of this fourth Beaſt, it is not to be deſcribed in one place, hauing beene the worke of many Ages; whereof I now doe handle onely the firſt, as incident vnto the diſcourſe preceding. Q. Fabius Pictor, Portius tius Cato, Calphurnius Piso, Sempronius, and others, seeke to deriue the Romans from Ianus: but Herodotus, Marsylus, and many others of equall credit, giue the Græcians for their an-Strab. l. 5. f. 159. cestors: and as Strabo reporteth in his fifth Booke; Cæcilius rerum Romanarum scriptor eo argumento colligit, Romam à Græcis esse conditam, quod Romani Græco ritu, antiquo instituto, Herculi rem sacram faciunt, matrem quoque Euandri venerantur Romani; Cæcilius (saith he) a Romane Historiographer, doth by this argument gather, that Rome was built by the Greeks, because the Romanes, after Greekish fashion, by ancient ordinance doe sacrifice to Hercules: the Romanes also worship the mother of Euander.

Plutarch in the life of Romulus remembred many founders of that Citie: as Romanus the sonne of Vlysses and Circe; Romus the sonne of Emathion, whom Diomedes sent thither to from Troy; or that one Romus, a Tyrant of the Latines, who draue the Tuscans out of that Countrey, built it. Solinus bestowes the honour of building Rome vpon Euander, saying, That it was beforetimes called Valentia. Heraclides giues the denomination to a captiue Lady, brought thither by the Græcians: others say, That it was anciently called Febris, after the name of Februa, the mother of Mars; witnesse Saint Augustine in his third Booke de Ciuitate Dei. But Liuie will haue it to be the worke of Romulus, euen from the foundation: of whom and his consorts, Iuuenal to a Roman Citizen, vaunting of their originall, answered in these Verses:

Attamen vt longe repetas, longeque reuoluas
Maiorum quisquis primus fuit ille tuorum,
Aut pastor fuit, aut illud quod dicere nolo.

Yet though thou fetch thy pedegree so farre;
Thy first Progenitor, who ere he were,
Some Shepheard was, or else, that Ile forbeare.

meaning either a Shepheard, or a Theefe.

Now of Romulus begetting, of his education and preseruation, it is said, That he had Rhea for his mother, and Mars supposed to be his father, that he was nurst by a Wolfe, found and taken away by Faustula, a Shepheards wife. The same vnnaturall nursing had Cyrus, the same incredible fostering had Semiramis; the one by a Bitch, the other by Birds. But, as Plutarch saith, it is like enough that Amulius came couered with armour to Rhea, the mother of Romulus, when he begat her with childe: and therein it seemeth to me that he might haue two purposes; the one, to destroy her, because she was the daughter and heire of his elder brother, from whom he iniuriously held the Kingdome; the other to satisfie his appetite, because she was faire and goodly. For she being made a Nunne of the goddesse Vesta, it was death in her, by the Law, to breake her chastitie. I also finde Fauchet f. 114 in Fauchet his Antiquitez de Gaule, that Merouée, King of the Frances, was begotten by a Monster of the Sea: but Fauchet sayes, Let them beleeue it that list; Il le croira qui voudra: Also of Alexander, and of Scipio African, there are poeticall inuentions: but to answere these imaginations in generall, it is true, that in those times, when the World was full of this barbarous Idolatry, and when there were as many gods as there were Kings, or passions of the minde, or as there were of vices and vertues; then did many women greatly borne, couer such slips as they made, by protesting to be forced by more than humane power: so did Oenone confesse to Paris, that she had beene rauished by Apollo. And Anchyses boasted that he had knowne Venus. But Rhea was made with childe by some man of Warre, or other, and therefore called Mars, the god of battell, according to the sense of the time. Oenone was ouercome by a strong wit, and by such a one as had those properties ascribed to Apollo. The Mother of Merouée might fancie a Sea Captaine to be gotten with yong by such a one: as the Daughter of Inachus fancied, according to Herodotus. Æneas was a bastard and begotten vpon some faire Harlot, called for her beautie Venus, and was therefore the childe of lust, which is Venus. Romulus was nurst by a Wolfe, which was Lupa, or Lupina, for the Curtesans in those dayes were called Wolfes, quæ nunc (saith Halicarnassæus) honestiori vocabulo amicæ appellantur; which are now by an honester name called friends. It is also written, that Romulus was in the end of his life taken vp into heauen, or rather out of the world by his father Mars, in a great storme of thunder, and lightning: so was it said that Æneas vanished away by the Riuer Numicus:

but thereof Liuie also speaketh modestly; for hee rehearseth the other opinion that the storme was the furie of the Senators, but seemeth to adhere partially to this taking vp; and many Authors agree, that there was an vnnaturall darkenesse, both at his birth and at his death, and that hee might be slaine by thunder or lightning, it is not vnlikely. For the Emperour Anastasius was slaine with lightning, so was Strabo the Father of Pompey slaine with a thunder-bolt: so Carus the Emperour (who succeeded Probus) whilest hee lodged with his Armie vpon the Riuer Tigris, was there slain with lightning. But a Mars of the same kinde might end him that began him; for he was begotten by a man of war, and by violence destroyed. And that he died by violence (which destinie followed most of the Roman Emperors) it appeareth by Tarquinius Superbus: who was the seuenth King after him: who when he had murthered his Father-in-law, commanded that he should not be buried, for (said hee) Romulus himselfe died and was not buried. But let Halicarnasseus end this dispute; whose words are these: They (saith hee) who drew neerest to the truth, say that he was slaine by his owne Citizens; and that his crueltie in punishments of offendors, together with his arrogancie, were the cause of his slaughter. For it is reported, that both when his mother was rauished, whether by some man, or by a god, the whole body of the Sunne was eclipsed, and all the earth couered with darknesse like vnto night, and that the same did happen at his death.

Such were the birth and death of Romulus: whose life historified by Plutarch, doth containe (besides what is here alreadie spoken of him) the conquest of a few miles which had soone beene forgotten, if the Roman greatnesse built vpon that foundation, had not giuen it memorie in all ages following, euen vnto this day. A valiant man he was, very strong of bodie, patient of trauell, and temperate in diet, as forbearing the vse of wine and delicacies: but his raging ambition he knew not how to temper, which caused him to slay his brother, and neglect to reuenge the death of Tatius, his companion in the Kingdome, that he himselfe might be Lord alone in those narrow Territories. He reigned 37. yeres: first alone, then with Tatius, and after his death, single, till hee was slaine, as is alreadie shewed: after which time the Soueraignetie fell into the hands of Numa, a man to him vnknowne, & more Priest-like then King-like: wherein Rome it selfe in her later times hath somewhat resembled this King. For hauing long beene sole Gouernesse till Constantinople shared with her: afterwards, when as the Greeke Emperour was crushed by forraine enemies, and the Latines dispoyled of Imperiall power, shee fell into the subjection of a Prelate, swelling by degrees from the Sheepe-hooke to the Sword, and therewith victorious to excessiue magnificence, from whence by the same degrees it fell, being driuen from luxurie to defensiue armes, and therein hauing beene vnfortunate, at length betakes herselfe againe to the Crosier staffe.

And thus much of Rome in this place by occasion of the Storie of the times of King Ahaz, during whose reigne in Iurie, the foundations of this famous Citie were laid.

CHAP. XXV.

Of Ezekia, and his Contemporaries.

§. I.

Of the beginning of Ezechias, and of the agreeing of Ptolomies, Nabonassar, Nabopolassar, and Mardocempadus, with the historie of the Bible.

AS the first yeere of Ahaz his Reigne was confounded with the last of his father Iotham, so was the later end of his sixteene yeres taken vp in the three first of Ezekias his sonne. This appeares by the Reigne of Hosea, ouer Israel, which beganne in the twelfth of Ahaz, and therefore the third thereof was concurrent with Ahaz his fourteenth. But the third of Hosea was the first of Ezekia; so it follows, that Ezekia beganne to reigne in his Fathers foureteenth yeere. Like enough it is, that the third yeere of Hosea, the same being the fourteenth of Ahaz, was almost spent when Ezekia beganne, and so ſo the fifteenth yeere of Ahaz may haue beene concurrent, for the moſt part, with the firſt of Ezekia.

By ſuppoſing that Hoſea began his Kingdome, when the twelfth yeere of Ahaz was almoſt compleat, ſome would finde the meanes how to diſioyne the firſt of Hezekia from the fifteenth of Ahaz, placing him yet one yeere later, of which yeere, Ahaz may perhaps haue liued not many dayes. But ſeeing that the foureteenth and fifteenth yeeres of Ezekia, may not be remoued out of their places; it is vaine labour to alter the firſt yeere.

2 Kin. 19. 35. In the foureteenth yeere of Ezekia, Senacherib inuading Iuda, and the Countries adioyning, loſt his Armie by a miraculous ſtroake from Heauen, fled home, and was ſlaine. The yeere following it was that God added fifteene yeeres to the life of Ezekia, when he had already reigned foureteene of his nine and twenty: and the ſame yeere was that miracle ſeene of the Sunnes going backe; of which wonder (as I heare) one Bartholomew Scultet, who is much commended for skill in Aſtronomie, hath by calculation found the very day which anſwered vnto the twenty fifth of April, in the Iulian yeere, being then Thurſday. I haue not ſeene any workes of Scultet; but ſurely to finde a motion ſo irregular and miraculous, it is neceſſary that he produce ſome record of obſeruation made at ſuch a time. Howſoeuer it be, the fifteenth yeere of Ezekia agreed vpon; and therefore we may not alter the firſt. As for that ſaying, which is vſuall in like caſes,

2 Chron. 28. 27 that Ahaz ſlept with his Fathers, and Ezekia his Sonne reigned in his ſtead, it doth no more proue that Ezekia reigned not with his Father, than the like ſaying doth inferre the like at the death of Iehoſaphat, and ſucceſſion of Ieboram; whereof, as concerning the beginning of the Sonne to reigne whileſt his Father liued, wee haue already ſaid enough.

Of this godly King Ezekias, we finde, that his very beginning teſtified his deuotion and zeale. For whether it were ſo, that his vnfortunate and vngracious Father (who had out-worne his reputation) gaue way to his Sons proceedings, which perhaps it lay not in him to hinder; or whether (as I rather thinke) the firſt yeere and firſt moneth of

2 Chro. 29. v. 3. his reigne, wherein Ezekias opened the doores of the Temple, were to be vnderſtood as the beginning of his ſole gouernment; we plainly finde it to haue beene his firſt worke,

2 Chron 30. that he opened the doores of the houſe of the Lord, which Achaz had ſhut vp, cleanſed the Citie and Kingdome of the Idols, reſtored the Prieſts to their offices and eſtates, commanded the Sacrifices to be offered which had beene for many yeeres neglected, & brake downe the braſen Serpent of Moſes, becauſe the people burnt incenſe before it, and he

2 King 18. called it Nehuſhtan, which ſignifieth a lumpe of braſſe. He did alſo celebrate the Paſſe-ouer with great magnificence, inuiting thereunto the Iſraelites of the ten Tribes: many there were, euen out of thoſe Tribes, that came vp to Ieruſulem, to this feaſt. But the generall multitude of Iſrael did laugh the Meſſengers of Ezekia to ſcorne.

It was not long ere they that ſcorned to ſolemnize the memoriall of their deliuerance out of the Ægyptian ſeruitude, fell into a new ſeruitude, out of which they neuer were deliuered. For in the fourth of Ezekia his reigne, Salmanaſſar the Sonne of Tiglath, the Sonne of Belochus, hearing that Hoſea King of Iſrael had practiſed with Soe King of Ægypt, againſt him, inuaded Iſrael, beſieged Samaria, and in the third yeare (after the inhabitants had endured all ſorts of miſeries) forced it, and carried thence the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Aſſyria and Media: among whom Tobias and his Sonne of the ſame name, with Anna his Wife, were ſent to Niniue; in whoſe Seates and Places the Aſſyrians ſent ſtrangers of other Nations, and among them many of the ancient Enemies of the Iſraelites, as thoſe of Cutha, Ana, Hamah, and Sphernaim, beſides Babylonians: whoſe Places and Nations I haue formerly deſcribed in the Treatiſe of the Holy Land.

Theſe later Aſſyrian Kings, and the Perſians, which followed them, are the firſt, of whom we finde mention made both in Prophane and Sacred bookes. Theſe therefore ſerue moſt aptly to ioyne the times of the old World, (whereof none but the Prophets haue written otherwiſe than fabulouſly) with the Ages following that were better knowne, and deſcribed in courſe of Hiſtory. True it is, that of Cyrus and ſome other Perſians, we finde in the Bible the ſame names by which other Authors haue recorded them: but of Phul and Salmanaſſar, with other Aſſyrian, Chaldean Kings, diuerſity of name hath bred queſtion of the perſons. Therefore, whereas the Scriptures doe ſpeake of Salmanaſſar, King of Aſſur, who reigned in the time of Ahaz and Ezekia, Kings of Iuda, and of Hoſea King of Iſrael, whom he carried into captiuitie: and whereas Ptolomie makes mention mention of Nabonaſſar, ſpeaking preciſely of the time wherein he liued; it is very pertinent to ſhew, that Salmanaſſar and Nabonaſſar were one and the ſame man. The like reaſon alſo requireth, that it be ſhewed of Nebuchadnezzar, that he was the ſame, whom Ptolomie calleth Nabopolaſſar.

Of both theſe points Bucholerus hath well collected ſufficient proofe from the exact calculations of ſundry good Mathematicians. For by them it appeares, that betweene Nabonaſſar and the birth of Chriſt, there paſſed ſeauen hundred fortie and ſixe yeeres: at which diſtance of time the reigne of Salmanaſſar was. One great proofe hereof is this, which the ſame Bucholerus alleadgeth out of Eraſmus Reinholdus, in the Prutenick Tables. Mardocempadus King of Babylon (whom Ptolomie, ſpeaking of three Eclipſes of the Moone, which were in his time, doth mention) was the ſame whom the Scriptures call Merodach, who ſent Embaſſadours to Hezekia, King of Iuda. So that if we reckon backwards to the difference of time, betweene Merodach and Salmanaſſar, we ſhall finde it the ſame which is betweene Mardocempadus and Nabonaſſar. Likewiſe Functius doth ſhew, that whereas from the deſtruction of Samaria, to the deſtruction of Ieruſalem, in the nineteenth of Nabuchadneſſar, we collect out of the Scriptures, the diſtance of one hundred thirty and three yeeres: the ſelfe-ſame diſtance of time is found in Ptolomie, betweene Nabonaſſar and Nabopolaſſar. For, whereas Ptolomie ſeemes to differ from this accompt, making Nebonaſſar more ancient by an hundred and fortie yeeres, than the deſtruction of Ieruſalem, we are to vnderſtand that he tooke Samaria in the eighth yeere of his reigne; ſo that the ſeauen foregoing yeeres added to theſe one hundred thirty and three, make the accompts of the Scriptures fall euen with that of Ptolomie. Ptolomies computation is, that from the firſt of Nabonaſſar, to the fifth of Nabopolaſſar, there paſſed one hundred twentie and ſeauen yeeres. Now if we adde to theſe one hundred twentie ſeauen, the thirteene enſuing of Nabuchadneſſars yeere, before the Citie and Temple were deſtroyed, we haue the ſumme of one hundred and fortie yeeres. In ſo plaine a caſe more proofes are needeleſſe, though many are brought, of which this may ſerue for all, that Ptolomie placeth the firſt of Nabopolaſſar one hundred twentie and two yeeres, after the firſt of Nabonaſſar, which agreeth exactly with the Scriptures. To theſe notes are added the conſent of all Mathematicians: which in accompt of times I hold more ſure than the authoritie of any Hiſtory; and therefore I thinke it folly to make doubt, whereas Hiſtorians and Mathematicall obſeruations doe ſo throughly concurre.

Yet foraſmuch as that argument of the learned Scaliger doth reſt vnanſwered, whereby he proued Baladan the Father of Merodach, to haue beene this Nabonaſſar, I will not ſpare to loſe a word or two in giuing the Reader ſatisfaction herein. It is true, that the next obſeruations of the heauenly Bodies, which Ptolomie recorded, after the time of Nabonaſſar, were in the reigne of Mardocempadus; the ſecond yeere of whoſe reigne, is, according to Ptolomie, concurrent in part with the twentie ſeauen of Nabonaſſar. For the ſecond of three ancient Eclipſes which he calculates, being in the ſecond yeere of Mardocempadus, was from the beginning of Nabonaſſar twentie ſeauen yeeres, ſeauenteene dayes, and cleauen houres: the accompt from Nabonaſſar, beginning at high-noone the firſt day of the Ægyptiam moneth Thot, then anſwering to the twenty ſixt of Februarie; and this Eclipſe being fiftie minutes before mid-night, on the eighteenth day of that Moneth, when the firſt day thereof agreed with the nineteenth of Februarie; ſo that the difference of time betweene the two Kings Nabonaſſar and Mardocempadus, is noted by Ptolomie, according to the Ægyptian yeeres. But how does this proue, that Mardocempadus or Merodach, was the Sonne of Nabonaſſar? yea, how doth it proue, that he was his next Succeſſour, or any way of his Linage? It was enough to ſatisfie me, in this argument, that Scaliger himſelfe did afterwards beleeue Mardocempadus to haue beene rather the Nephew, than the Sonne of Baladan, or Nabonaſſar. For if hee might be either the Nephew, or the Sonne; hee might perhaps be neither the one, nor the other. But becauſe our Countrie-man Lidyate hath reprehended Scaliger for changing his opinion; and that both Torniellus, who followes Scaliger herein, and Sethus Caluiſius, who hath drawne into forme of Chronologie, that learned worke, De Emendatione Temporum, doe hold vp the ſame aſſertion, confounding Baladan with Nabonaſſar: I haue taken the paines to ſearch, as farre as my leiſure and diligence could reach, after any ſentence that might proue the Kindred or ſucceſſion of theſe two. Yet cannot cannot I finde in the Almageſt (for the Scriptures are either ſilent in this point, or aduerſe to Scaliger; and other good authority, I know none, in this buſineſſe) any ſentence more neerely prouing the ſucceſſion of Merodach to Nabonaſſar, than the place now laſt rehearſed: which makes no more, to ſhew that the one of theſe was Father to the other, than (that I may vſe a like example) the as neere ſucceſſion of William the Conqueror, declares him, to haue beene Sonne, or Grand-childe to Edward the Confeſſor. This conſidered, we may ſafely goe on with our accompt from Nabonaſſar, taking him for Salmanaſſar; and not fearing, that the Readers will be driuen from our booke, when they finde ſomething in it, agreeing with Annius, foraſmuch as theſe Kings mentioned in Scriptures, reigned in Babylon and Aſſyria, in thoſe very times which by Diodorus and Ptolomie are aſſigned to Beloſus, Nabonaſſar, and Mardocempadus, and the reſt: no good Hiſtory naming any others, that reigned there in thoſe ages; and all Aſtronomicall obſeruations, fitly concurring, with the yeeres that are attributed to theſe, or numbred from them.

§. II.

Of the danger and deliuerance of Iudæa from Sennacherib.

WHen Salmanaſſar was dead, and his ſon Sennacherib in poſſeſſion of the Empire, in the foureteenth yeere of Ezechias, he demanded of him ſuch Tribute as was agreed on, at ſuch time as Tiglath, the Grand-father of Sennacherib, and Father of Salmanaſſar, inuited by Ahaz, inuaded Rezen King of Damaſcus, and deliuered him from the dangerous Warre which Iſrael had vndertaken againſt him. This Tribute and acknowledgement when Ezechias denied, Sennacherib, hauing (as it ſeemes) a purpoſe to inuade Ægypt, ſent one part of his Armie to lye before Ieruſalem. Now though Ezechias (fearing this powerfull Prince) had acknowledged his fault, and purchaſed his peace, as he hoped, with thirty hundred talents of ſiluer, and thirty talents of gold: wherewith he preſented Sennacherib, now ſet downe before Lachis in Iudæa; yet vnder the colour of better aſſurance, and to force the King of Iudæa to deliuer hoſtages, the Aſſyrian enuironed Ieruſalem with a groſſe Armie, and hauing his Sword in his hand, thought it the fitteſt time to write his owne conditions. 2 Kin. 18. 21.

Ezechias directed his three great Counſellers, to parlie with Rabſaces, ouer the Wall; and to receiue his demands: who vſed three principall arguments to perſwade the people to yeelde themſelues to his Maſter Sennacherib. For though the Chancellor, Steward, and Secretarie, ſent by Ezechias, deſired Rabſaces to ſpeake vnto them in the Syrian tongue, and not in the Iewiſh, yet he with a louder voice directed his ſpeech to the multitude in their owne language. And for the firſt, he made them know, That if they continued obſtinate, and adhered to their King, that they would, in a ſhort time, be inforced to eate their owne dung, and drinke their owne vrine: Secondly, he altogether diſabled the King of Ægypt, from whom the Iudæans hoped for ſuccour; and compared him to a broken Staffe, on which whoſoeuer leaneth, pierceth his owne hand: Thirdly, that the gods who ſhould helpe them, Ezechias had formerly broken and defaced, meaning chiefely (as it is thought by ſome) the braſen Serpent, which had beene preſerued euer ſince Moſes time: and withall he bade them remember the gods of other Nations: whom, notwithſtanding any power of theirs, his Maſter had conquered and throwne downe; and for God himſelfe, in whom they truſted, hee perſwaded them by no meanes to relye on him, for hee would deceiue them. But finding the people ſilent (for ſo the King had commanded them) after a while, when he had vnderſtood that the King of Arabia was marching on with a powerfull Armie, hee himſelfe left the Aſſyrian forces in charge to others, and ſought Sennacherib at Libna in Iudæa, either to informe him of their reſolution in Ieruſalem, or to conferre with him concerning the Armie of Tarhaca the Arabian. Soone vpon this there came letters from Sennacherib to Ezechias, whom hee partly aduiſed, and partly threatned to ſubmit himſelfe: vſing the ſame blaſphemous outrage againſt the all-powerfull God, as before. But Ezechias ſending thoſe Counſellers to the Prophet Eſay, which had lately beene ſent to Rabſaces, receiued from him comfort, and aſſurance, that this Heathen Idolater ſhould not preuaile; againſt whom the King alſo beſought aide from Almightie God, repeating the moſt inſolent and blaſphemous parts of Sennacheribs letter, before the 2 Kings 18. 21.

Altar

Altar of God in the Temple, confessing this part thereof to be true. That the King of Ashur had destroyed the Nations and their Lands, and had set fire on their gods, for they were no Gods, but the worke of mans hands, euen wood and stone, &c. 2 Kings 19.

The reason that moued Sennacherib to desire to possesse himselfe in haste of Ierusalem, was, that he might thereinto haue retraited his Armie, which was departed as it seemeth from the siege of Pelusium in Ægypt, for feare of Terhaca: and though the Scriptures are silent of that enterprise (which in these bookes of the Kings, and of the Chronicles or Paralipomenon, speake but of the affaires of the Iewes in effect) yet the ancient Berosus, and out of him Iosephus, and Saint Hierome, together with Herodotus, remember it as followeth. Herodotus calleth Sennacherib King of Arabia and Assyria: which he might iustly doe, because Tiglath his Grand-father held a great part thereof, which he wrested from Pekah King of Israel: as Gilead ouer Iordan, and the rest of Arabia Petræa adioyning: the same Herodotus also maketh Sethon King of Ægypt, to be Vulcans Priest; and reporteth that the reason of Sennacheribs returne from Pelusium in Ægypt, which he also besieged, was, that an innumerable multitude of Rats had in one night eaten in sunder the Bow-strings of his Archers, and spoyled the rest of their weapons in that kinde, which no doubt might greatly amaze him: but the approach of Tarhaca, remembred by Iosephus and Berosus, was the more vrgent. Saint Hierome vpon the seauen and thirty of Esay, out of the same Berosus, as also in part out of Herodotus, whom Iosephus citeth somewat otherwise than his words lye, reports Senacheribs retrait in these words. Pugnasse autem Senacherib Regem Assyriorum contra Ægyptios, & obsedisse Pelusium, iamque extructis aggeribus vrbi capiendæ, venisse Tarachan Regem Æthiopum in auxilium, & eius nocte iuxta Ierusalem, centum octoginta quinque millia exercitus Assyrij pestilentia corruisse narrat Herodotus: & plenissimè Berosus Chaldaicæ scriptor Historiæ, quorum fides depromptis libris petenda est; That Sennacherib King of the Assyrians fought against the Ægyptians, and besieged Pelusium, and that when his Mounts were built for taking of the Citie, Tarhacas King of the Æthiopians came to helpe them, and that in one night, neere Ierusalem, one hundred eightie fiue thousand of the Assyrian Armie perished by pestilence; of these things (saith Hierome) * Herodotus reports: and more at large Berosus a writer of Chaldaan Storie, whose credit is to be taken from their owne Bookes. Out of Esay it is gathered, that this destruction of the Assyrian Armie was in this manner: Thou shalt be visited of the Lord of Hoasts with thunder and shaking, and a great noyse, a whirlewinde and a tempest, and a flame of deuouring fire. But Iosephus hath it more largely out of the same Berosus, an authority (becausse so well agreeing with the Scriptures) not to be omitted; Sennacheribus autem ab Ægyptiaco bello reuertens, ostendit ibi exercitum, quem sub Rabsacis imperio reliquerat peste diuinitus immissâ deletum, primâ nocte posteaquam Vrbem oppugnare cœperat, absumptis cum Ducibus & Tribunis centum octoginta quinque millibus Militum; qua clade territus, & de reliquis copijs sollicitus, maximis itineribus in regnum suum contendit, ad regiam quæ Ninus dicitur. Vbi paulo post per insidias Seniorum è filijs suis, Adramelechi, & Selennari, vitam amisit: occisus in ipso Templo quod dicitur Arasci; quem præcipuo cultu dignabatur: quibus ob patricidium à popularibus pulsis & in Armeniam fugientibus, Asaracoldas minor filius in Regnum succeſsit; Sennacherib (saith Iosephus) returning from the Ægyptian Warre, found there his Armie, which he had left vnder the command of Rabsaces, destroyed by a pestilence sent from God, the first night that he had begunne to assault the Towne: one hundred fourescore and fiue thousand of the Souldiers being consumed with their Chiefstaines and Coronells. With which destruction being terrified, and withall afraid what might become of the rest of his Armie, he made great marches into his Kingdome, to his Royall Citie, which is called Ninus, where shortly after by the treason of two of the eldest of his Sonnes, Adramelech and Selennar or Sharezer, hee lost his life in the Temple dedicated to Arasces, or Nesroch: whom hee especially worshipped. These his Sonnes being for their parricide chased away by the people: and flying into Armenia, Asaracoldas his yonger Sonne succeeded in the Kingdome. Who in the beginning of his reigne sent new troupes out of Assyria and Samaria, to fortifie the Colonie therein planted by his grand-father Salmanassar. What this Nesroch was, it is vncertaine: Hierome in his Hebrew traditions hath somewhat of him, but nothing positiuely. It is certaine, that Venus Vrania was worshipped by the Assyrians; and so was Iupiter Belus, as Dion, Eusebius, and Cyrillus Lyr. witnesse. Many fancies there are, what cause his sonnes had to murther him; but the most

AFter this maruellous deliuery, Ezekias ſickned, and was told by Iſaiah, that he muſt dye: but after he had beſought God with teares for his deliuery, Iſaiah, as he was going from him, returned againe, and had warrant from the Spirit of God to promiſe him recouery after three dayes, and a prolongation of life for fifteene yeeres. But Ezekias ſomewhat doubtfull of this exceeding grace, prayeth a 2 King 20. ſigne to confirme him: whereupon, at the prayer of Iſaiah, the ſhadow of the Sunne caſt it ſelfe the contrary way, and went backe tenne degrees, vpon the Dyall of Achaz. The cauſe that moued Ezekias to lament (ſaith Saint Hierome) was, becauſe he had as yet no ſonne, and then in deſpaire that the Meſsias ſhould come out of the houſe of Dauid, or at leaſt of his Seede. His diſeaſe ſeemeth to be the Peſtilence, by the medicine giuen him by the Prophet, to wit, a maſſe of Figges, layed to the Botch or Sore.

This wonder when the Wiſe-men of Chaldea had told to Merodach, King of Babylon, the firſt of that houſe, he ſent to Ezekias, to be informed of the cauſe: at which time Ezekias ſhewed him all the Treaſure he had, both in the Court and in the Kingdome: for which he was reprehended by the Prophet Iſaiah, who told him; The dayes
Eſay 39. are at hand, that all that is in thine houſe, and whatſoeuer thy fathers haue layed vp in ſtore to this day, ſhall be carried into Babel; nothing ſhall be left, ſaith the Lord. It may ſeeme ſtrange, how Ezekia ſhould haue got any treaſure worth the ſhewing: for Senacherib had robbed him of all, the yeere before. But the ſpoyle of the ſame Senacherib his Campe repayed all with aduantage, and made Ezekia richer vpon the ſuddaine than euer he had beene: which vnexpected wealth was a ſtrong temptation to boaſting. After this time Ezekia had reſt, and ſpending without noyſe that addition which God had made vnto his life; he dyed, hauing reigned nine and twentie yeeres. One onely offenſiue Warre he made, which was againſt the Philiſtims with good ſucceſſe.
Eccleſ 48. Among his other acts (ſhortly remembred in Eccleſiaſticus) he deuiſed to bring water to Ieruſalem.

In two reſpects they ſay that he offended God: the one, that he reioyced too much at the deſtruction and lamentable end of his enemie; the other, that he ſo much gloried in his riches, as he could not forbeare to ſhew them to ſtrangers. But the reaſon which moued Ezekias (ſpeaking humanely) to entertaine the Embaſſadours of Merodach in this friendly and familiar manner, was, becauſe he came to viſit him, and brought him a preſent, congratulating the recouery of his health; as alſo in that Merodach had weakned the houſe of Senacherib, his fearefull enemy. For Merodach, who was Commander and Lieutenant vnder Senacherib in Babylon, vſurped that State himſelfe, in the laſt yeere of that King, and held it by ſtrong hand againſt his ſon Aſſerhadden; who was not onely ſimple, but impaired in ſtrength, by the moleſtation of his brothers. This aduantage Merodach eſpied, and remembring, that their anceſtor Phul Belochus had ſet his owne maſter Sardanapalus beſides the cuſhion, thought it as lawfull for himſelfe to take the opportunity which this Kings weakeneſſe did offer, as it had beene for Belochus to make vſe of the others wickedneſſe: and ſo, finding himſelfe beloued of the Babylonians, and ſufficiently powerfull, he did put the matter to hazard, and preuailed. The aſſertion of this hiſtory is made by the ſame arguments that were vſed in maintaining the common opinion of Writers, touching Phul Belochus; which I will not here againe rehearſe. So of this new Race, which cut a-ſunder the Line of Ninus, there were onely fiue Kings.

Phul Belochus.	who reigned	48	yeeres.
Tiglath Phalassar.		27
Salmanassar.		10
Senacherib.		7
Assarhaddon.		10

But forasmuch as the last yeere of Salmanassar was also the first of Senacherib his son, we reckon the time, wherein the house of Phul held the Assyrian Kingdome, to haue been an hundred and one yeeres, of which, the last fiue and twentie were spent with Ezekia, vnder Salmanassar, Senacherib, and Assarhaddon.

§. IIII.

The Kings that were in Media during the reigne of Ezekia: Of the difference found betweene sundry Authors, in rehearsing the Median Kings. Other contemporaries of Ezekia: of Candaules, Gyges, and the Kings descended from Hercules.

IN the time of Ezekia, Medidus, and after him Cardicas, reigned in Media. Whether it were so, that variety of names, by which these Kings were called in seuerall Histories, hath caused them to seeme more than indeede they were; or whether the sonnes reigning with the fathers, haue caused not onely the names of Kings, but the length of Time, wherein they gouerned Media, to exceede the due proportion: or whether the Copies themselues, of Ctesias and Arrian his Metasthenes, haue beene faulty, as neither of these two Authors is ouer-highly commended of auntiesse: sorie is, that the names, number, and length of reigne, are all very diuersly reported of these Median Kings, that follow Arbaces: therefore it needs not seeme strange, that I reckon Medidus and Cardicas as contemporaries with Ezekia. For to reconcile so great a difference, as is found in those Writers that varie from Eusebius, is more then I dare vndertake. I will onely here set downe the roll of Kings that reigned in Media, accordingly as sundry Authors haue deliuered it.

Annius his Metasthenes orders them and their reignes thus:

Arbaces.	who reigned	28	yeeres.
Mandanes.		50
Sosarmon.		30
Articarmin.		50
Arbianes.		22
Artæus.		40
Attines.		22
Astybarus, with his sonne Apanda.		20
Apanda alone.		30
Darius with Cyrus.		36

Diodorus Siculus following Ctesias (as perhaps Annius made his Metasthenes follow Diodore, with some little variation, that he might not seeme a borrower) placeth them thus.

Arbaces.	who reigned	28	yeeres.
Mandanes.		50
Sosarmus.		30
Artycas.		50
Arbianes.		22
Arfæus.		40
Artynes.		22
Aribæus.		40
Astybaras.	the continuance of these two he doth not mention.
Astyages.

Mercator hath laboured with much diligence, to reconcile these Catalogues, and to make them also agree with Eusebius. But forasmuch as it seemes to me an impossible matter, to attaine vnto the truth of these forgotten times, by coniectures founded vpon

Cteſias and Metaſthenes, I will lay the burthen vpon Euſebius, who liued in an age better furniſhed than ours, with bookes of this argument. Let it therefore ſuffice, that theſe two Kings (whom I haue reckoned as contemporaries with Ezekia) Medidus and Cardiceas, are found in Euſebius: for whether Cardiceas were Diodorus his Arbianes, I will not ſtay to ſearch. The Kings of Media, according to Euſebius, reigned in this order.

Arbaces.	reigned	28	yeeres.
Sofarmus.		30
Medidus.		40
Cardiceas.		15
Deioces.		54
Phraortes.		24
Cyaxares.		32
Aſtyages.		38

Theſe names, and this courſe of ſucceſſion I retaine; but adde vnto theſe, Cyaxares the ſonne of Aſtyages, according to Xenophon; and ſomtimes follow Herodotus, in letting down the length of a Kings reigne, otherwiſe than Euſebius hath it: of which variation I will render my reaſons in due place.

The twentie nine yeeres of Ezekia were concurrent, in part, with the rule of the firſt fiue that were choſen Gouernors of Athens for ten yeeres, that is, of Charops, Æſimides, Elidicus, and Hippones. Touching the firſt of theſe I heare nothing, ſaue that Rome was built in his firſt yeere, of which perhaps himſelfe did not heare. Of the ſecond and third I finde onely the names. The fourth made himſelfe knowne by a ſtrange example of iuſtice, or rather of cruelty, that he ſhewed vpon his owne Daughter. For he finding that ſhe had offended in vnchaſtity, cauſed her to be lockt vp with an Horſe, giuing to neither of them any foode: ſo the Horſe, conſtrained by hunger, deuoured the vnhappy Woman.

In Rome, the firſt King, and founder of that Citie Romulus, did reigne both before, and ſomewhat after Ezekia.

In Lydia, Candaules the laſt King, ruled in the ſame age.

This Region was firſt called Mæonia. Lydus the ſonne of Atys reigning in it, gaue the name of Lydia, if we beleeue ſuch authority as we finde. This Kingdome was afterward, by the appointment of an Oracle, conferred vpon Argon, who came of Alcæus the ſon of Hercules, by Iardana, a bond-woman. The race of theſe Heraclide continued reigning fiftie fiue yeeres (in which two and twentie Generations paſſed) the ſonne continually ſucceeding the father. Candaules the ſon of Myrſus was the laſt of his race, who doated ſo much vpon the beautie of his owne Wife, that he could not be content to enioy her, but would needes enforce one Gyges, the ſonne of Daſcylus, to behold her naked body; and placed the vnwilling man ſecretly in her chamber, where he might ſee her preparing to bedward. This was not ſo cloſely carried, but that the Queene perceiued Gyges at his going forth, and vnderſtanding the matter, tooke it in ſuch high diſdaine, that ſhe forced him the next day to requite the Kings folly with treaſon. So Gyges, being brought againe into the ſame chamber by the Queene, ſlew Candaules, and was rewarded not only with his Wife, but with the Kingdome of Lydia. He reigned thirty eight yeeres, beginning in the laſt of Ezekia, one yeere before the death of Romulus.

After Gyges, his ſon Ardys reigned nine & forty yeres; then Sadyattes, twelue; Halyattes, fiftie ſeauen; and finally Cræſus, the ſon of Halyattes, fourteene yeeres: who loſt the Kingdome, and was taken by Cyrus of Perſia.

And here by the way we may note, that as the Lydian Kings, whom Cræſus his Progenitor diſpoſſeſt, are deduced from Hercules, ſo of the ſame Hercules there ſprang many other Kings, which gouerned ſeuerall Countries very long; as in Aſia, the Myſians; in Greece the Lacedæmonians, Meſſenians, Rhodians, Corinthians, and Argiues; and from the Argiues, the Macedonians; as likwiſe from the Corinthians, the Syracuſanes; beſides many great and famous, though priuate, Families.

But of the Heraclida that reigned in Lydia, I haue not troubled my ſelfe to take notice in the time of their ſeuerall reignes: for little is found of them, beſide the bare names, and the folly of this laſt King Candaules.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the Kings that reigned in Ægypt, betweene the deliuerance of Israel from thence, and the reigne of Ezekiah in Iuda, when Ægypt and Iuda made a league against the Assyrians.

That many names of Ægyptian Kings, found in Historie, are like to haue belonged onely to Viceroyes. An example proouing this out of William of Tyre his Historie of the holy warre.

THe emulation and quarrels arising in these times, between the mighty Kingdomes of Ægypt and Assyria, doe require our paines, in collecting the most memorable things in Ægypt, and setting downe briefly the state of that Countrie, which had continued long a flourishing Region, and was of great power, when it contended with Assyria for the Maistrie. Of Cham the sonne of Noah, who first planted that Country, and of Osiris, Orus, and other ancient Kings, that reigned there, vntill the Israelites were thence deliuered, more hath beene saide alreadie than I can stand to; though I hold it no shame to faile in such coniectures. That which I haue deliuered, in speaking mine opinion of the Ægyptian Dynasties, must beere againe helpe me. For it may truely be affirmed, That the great number of Kings, which are saide to haue reigned in Ægypt, were none other than Viceroyes or Stewards, such as Ioseph was; and such as were the Soldanes in later ages. Therefore I will not onely forbeare to seeke after those, whom Herodotus and Diodorus haue reckoned vp, from the mouthes of Ægyptian Priests, deliuering them by number, without rehearsing their names; but will saue the labour of marshalling them in order, whose names onely are found; the yeares of their reignes, and other circumstances prouing them to haue beene Kings in deed, being not recorded.

But that I may not seeme before hand, to lay an imaginarie ground, whereupon after I may build what I list; it were not amisse, to giue vnto the Reader such satisfaction in this point, as apparent reason, and truth of Historie doth afford. First therefore, wee ought not to beleeue those numbers of Generations, which the lying Priests haue reckoned vp, to magnifie their Antiquities. For wee know, that from Abraham, our Sauiour Christ was remoued onely fortie two descents, which makes it euident, that in farre shorter time, namely before the Persian Empire, there could not haue passed away twice as manie successions in Ægypt: especially considering, that many of these, whose continuance is expressed, hauing reigned longer than fortie yeeres. It followes that we should square the number of the Ægyptian Kings in some euen proportion, to those which did beare rule in other Countries. As for the rest, whose names we finde scattered here and there; any man that will take the paines to reade the nintéenth booke of the holy Warre, written by William Archbishop of Tyre, may easily perswade himselfe, that it is not hard to finde names enow, of such as might be thought to haue reigned in Ægypt, being none other than Regents or Viceroyes. Yet will I here insert, as briefly as I can, some things making to that purpose for the pleasure and information of such, as will not trouble themselues with turning ouer many Authors.

When Elahdeeb the Caliph ruled in Ægypt, one Dargan, a powerfull and a subtile man, made himselfe Soldan, by force and cunning, chasing away Sanar an Arabian, who was Soldan before & after him. This Dargan ministred matter of quarrell to Amalricke King of Ierusalem, and sustained, with little losse, an inuasion, which Amalricke made vpon Ægypt. Hereupon he grew so insolent and proud, that Sanar the former Soldan hoped to make his partie good against him, if he could get any forces wherwith to enter Ægypt.

Briefly,

Briefly, Sanar sueth to Noradine, King of Damasco, for aide, who sends an Army of his Turkes, vnder the command of Syracon, against the Soldan Dargan. So Dargan and Sanar met, and fought: The Victorie was Dargans; but he enioyed it not: for in few daies after, hee was slaine by treason, whereby Sanar did recouer his Dignitie: which to establish, he slew all the Kindred and Friends of Dargan, that he could finde in the great Citie of Cairo.

To all these doings, the Caliph Elhadech gaue little regard: for he thought it little concerned him, which of them liued, and had the administration of the Kingdome, whilest he might haue the profit of it, and enioy his pleasure. But new troubles presently arise, which (one would thinke) do neerly touch the Caliph himselfe. Syracon with his Turkes, whom Sanar hath gotten to come into Ægypt, will not now be intreated there to leaue him, and quietly go their way home. They seize vpon the Towne of Belbeis, which they fortifie, and there attend the arriuall of more company from Damasco, for the conquest of all Ægypt. The Soldan perceiues their intent, and findes himselfe not strong enough to expell them; much lesse to repell the Turkish Armie, that was likely to second them. He therefore sends Messengers to King Almaricke of Ierusalem, whom with large promises, hee gets to bring him aide, and so driues out the Turkes. Of all this trouble, the great Caliph heares nothing, or not so much, as should make him looke to the playing of his owne game.

A greater mischiefe ariseth, concerning the Caliph Elhadech particularly, in his owne Title. Syracon, Captaine of the Turkes that had beene in Ægypt, goes to the Caliph of Baldach (who was opposite to him of Ægypt, each of them claiming as heire to Mahomet that false prophet, the Soueraignetie ouer all that were of the Saracen Law) and tells him the weakenesse of the Ægyptian, with his owne abilitie of doing seruice in those parts, offering his best meanes for the extirpation of the Schismaticall Caliph, and the reduction of all Ægypt, with the Westerne parts, vnder the subiection of the Babylonian. This motion is readily and ioyfully entertained; all the Easterne Prouinces are vp in Armes; and Syracon, with a mighty power, descendeth into Ægypt. The noyse of this great expedition so affrighteth King Almaricke, that with all his forces hee hasteth into Ægypt: well knowing how neerely it concerned him and his Kingdome of Ierusalem, to keepe the Saracens from ioyning all vnder one head. Sanar the Soldan perceiuing the faithfull care of the Christians his friends, welcomes them, and bestirs himselfe in giuing them all manner of content, as it behooued him: for by their admirable valour, hee finally draue the enemies out of the Countrie. But this victorie was not so soone gotten, as it is quicklie told.

Strange it is (which most concernes our present purpose) that of so desperate a danger, the Caliph, as yet, seemes to know nothing. May we not thinke him to haue beene King in title onely, who medled so little in the Gouernment? The Soldan, finding that the Christians (without whose helpe, all was lost) could not well stay, so long as his necessities required; makes large offers to King Almaricke, vpon condition that he should abide by it. He promiseth a great Tribute (William of Tyre calls it a Tribute; the Saracens, perhaps, called it a Pension) which the Kings of Ierusalem should receiue out of Ægypt, for this behoouefull assistance. But the Christians vnderstanding that the Soldan (how much soeuer he tooke vpon him) was subiect to an higher Lord, would make no bargain of such importance, with any other than the Caliph himselfe. Hereupon Hugh Earle of Cæsars, and a Knight of the Templars, are sent vnto Elhadech to ratifie the couenants. Now shall we see the greatnesse of the Caliph and his estate.

These Embassadors were conueighed by the Soldan to Cairo; where arriuing at the Palace, they found it guarded by great troupes of Souldiers. The first entrance was through darke Porches, that were kept by many armed bands of Æthiopians, which with all diligence did reuerence to the Soldan as he passed along. Through these streights the Warders led them, into goodly open Courts, of such beautie and riches, that they could not retaine the gratitie of Embassadors, but were enforced to admire the things which detained their eyes. For there they saw goodly Marble Pillars, gilded Beames, all wrought ouer with embossed workes, curious pauements, fish-ponds of marble with cleare waters, and many sorts of strange birds, vnknowne in those parts of the world, as comming perhaps from the East Indies, which then was vndiscouered. The further they went, the greater was the magnificence; for the Caliph his Eunuches conueyed them into other Courts within these; as farre excelling the former, as the former did surpasse ordinarie houses. It were tedious perhaps to rehearse, how, the further they entred, the more high state they found, and cause of maruaile; suffice it, that the good Archbishop, who wrote these things, was neuer held a vaine Author. Finally they were brought into the Caliphs owne lodgings, which were yet more stately, and better guarded; where entring the Presence, the Soldan hauing twice prostrated himselfe, did the third time cast off his Sword, that he wore about his necke, and throw himselfe on the ground, before the curtaine, behinde which the Caliph sate. Presently the trauerse, wrought with Gold and pearles was opened, and the Caliph himselfe discouered, sitting with great Maiestie on a throne of gold, hauing few of his most inward seruants and Eunuches about him. When the Soldan had humbly kissed his Masters feet, he briefly told the cause of his comming, the danger wherein the land stood, and the offers that he had made vnto King Almericke, desiring the Caliph himselfe to ratifie them, in presence of the Embassadors. The Caliph answered, That he would throughly performe all which was promised. But this contented not the Embassadors: They would haue him to giue his hand vpon the bargaine; which the Ægyptians, that stood by, thought an impudent request. Yet his greatnesse condescended at length, after much deliberation, at the earnest request of the Soldan, to reach out his hand. When the Earle of Cæsarea saw that the Caliph gaue his hand, neither willingly nor bare, he told him roundly thus much in effect: Sir, Truth seekes no holes to hide it selfe; Princes, that will hold couenant, must deale openly, nakedly, and sincerely; Giue vs therefore your bare hand, if you meane that we shall trust you, for wee will make no bargaine with your Gloue. Much adoe there was about this: for it seemed against the Maiestie of such a Prince to yeeld so farre. But, when it would none otherwise be, with a smiling cheare (though to the great griefe of his Seruants) he vouchsafed to let the Earle take him by the bare hand; and so rehearsing the couenants word by word, as the Earle spake them, he ratified all; dismissing finally the Embassadors, with such rewards as testified his Greatnesse.

In this Caliph and his Sultan, wee may discerne the Image of the ancient Pharaoh, and his Viceroy: we see a Prince of great estate, sitting in his Palace, and not vexing himselfe with the great preparations made against him, which terrifie his neighbour Countries: we see his Viceroy, in the meane season, vsing all Royall power; making warre & peace; entertaining, & repelling Armies of strangers; yea making the Land of Ægypt tributarie to a forren Prince. What greater authoritie was giuen to Ioseph, when Pharaoh said vnto him, Thou shalt be ouer mine house, and at thy word shall all my people be armed, onely in the Kings Throne will I be aboue thee, Behold, I haue set thee ouer all the Land of Ægypt.

I doe not commend this forme of Gouernment; neither can I approue the coniecture of mine Author, where he thinkes, that the Ægyptians, euer since Iosephs time, haue felt the burden of that seruitude which he brought vpon them, when he bought them, and their Lands, for Pharaoh. Herein I finde his iudgement good; that he affirmes this manner of the Ægyptian Kings, in taking their ease, and ruling by a Viceroy, to be part of the ancient customes, practised by the Pharaohs. For we finde, that euen the Ptolomies (excepting Ptolomæus Lagi, and his sonne Philadelphus, founder and establisher of that race) were giuen, all of them, wholly to please their owne appetites, leauing the charge of the Kingdome to Women, Eunuches, and other ministers of their desires. The pleasures which that Countrie afforded, were indeed sufficient to inuite the Kings thereof vnto a voluptuous life; and the awfull regard wherein the Ægyptians held their Princes, gaue them securitie, whereby they might the better trust their Officers, with so ample commission. But of this matter, I will not stand longer to dispute. It is enough to haue shewed, that the great and almost absolute power of the Viceroyes gouerning Ægypt, is set downe by Moses, and that a liuely example of the same is found in William of Tyre; who liued in the same age; was, in few yeeres after, Chancellour of the Kingdome of Ierusalem; and had full discourse with Hugh Earle of Cæsarea, touching all these matters. Wherefore it remaines, that we be not carried away with a vaine opinion, to beleeue that all they were Kings, whom reports of the fabulous Ægyptians haue honoured with that stile; but rest contented with a Catalogue of such, as we finde by circumstance, likely to haue reigned in that Country; after whom it followes that we should make enquiry.

§. II.

Of Acherres; whether he were Vchoreus that was the eighth from Oſymandyas. Of Oſymandyas and his Tombe.

IN this buſineſſe I hold it vaine to be too curious. For who can hope to attaine to the perfect knowledge of the truth, when as Diodorus varies from Herodotus, Euſebius, from both of them; and late Writers, that haue ſought to gather the truth out of theſe and others, finde no one with whom they can agree? In this caſe Annius would doe good ſeruice, if a man could truſt him. But it is enough to be beholding to him, when others doe either ſay nothing, or that which may iuſtly bee ſuſpected. I will therefore hold my ſelfe contented, with the pleaſure that he hath done me, in ſaying ſomewhat of Oſiris, Iſis, Orus, and thoſe antiquities remoued ſo farre out of ſight: as for the Kings following the departure of Iſrael out of Ægypt, it ſhall ſuffice, that Herodotus, Diodorus, and Euſebius, haue not beene ſilent, and that Reineccius hath taken paines, to range into ſome good order the names that are extant in theſe, or elſe found ſcattering in others.

From the departure of Iſrael out of Ægypt, vnto the reigne of Thuoris (who is generally taken to bee the ſame that the Greekes call Proteus) there is little or no diſagreement about the Ægyptian Kings. Wherefore I ſet downe the ſame which are found in Euſebius, and giue to euery one the ſame length of reigne.

Acherres was the firſt of theſe, who ſucceeded vnto Chenchers, that periſhed in the Red Sea. This King ſeemes to Reineccius to be the ſame whom Diodorus calls Vchoreus, the founder of Memphis. But whereas mention is found in Diodorus of a great King, named Oſymandyas, from whom Vchoreus is ſaid to be the eighth; it will either hardly follow, that Timaus (as Reineccius coniectures) was the great Oſymandias; or elſe that this Acherres was Vchoreus: for the diſtance betweene them was more then eight generations. Mercator iudgeth Oſymandyas to haue been the husband of Ancheres, Orus the ſeconds daughter; thinking that Manethon (cited by Ioſephus) doth omit his name, and inſert his wiues, into the Catalogue of Kings, becauſe he was King in his wiues right. As for Vchoreus, it troubles not Mercator to finde him the eighth from this man: for he takes Ogdous, not to ſignifie in this place of Diodore (as that Greeke word elſe doth) the eighth, but to bean Ægyptian name, belonging alſo to Vchoreus, who might haue had two names, as many of the reſt had. I will not vexe my braines in the vnprofitable ſearch of this, and the like inextricable doubts. All that Diodore hath found of this Oſymandias, was wrought vpon his monument; the moſt thereof in figures, which I thinke the Ægyptians did fabulouſly expound. For whereas there was pourtraied a great Armie with the ſiege of a Towne, the captiuitie of the People, and the triumph of the Conqueror; all this, the Ægyptians ſaid to denote the conqueſt of Bactria made by that King: which how likelie it was, let others iudge. I hold this goodly peece of worke, which Diodore ſo particularly deſcribes, to haue been erected for a common place of buriall, to the ancient Kings and Queenes of Ægypt, and to their Viceroyes; whileſt yet they were not ſo ambitious, as euery one to haue his own particular monument, ſtriuing therein to exceed all others. This appeares by the many ſtatuaes, therein placed, by the Warres, the iudgement ſeat, the receiuing of Tribute, the offering Sacrifice to God, the account of Reuennues, and plentie of all Cattell and Foode; all which were there curiouſly wrought, ſhewing the ſeuerall Offices of a Gouernour. On the Tombe of Oſymandyas was this inſcription. I am Oſymandyas King of Kings; If any deſire to know what I am, or where I lie, let him exceed ſome of my workes. Let them, that hope to exceed his workes, labour to know what he was. But ſince by thoſe words, Or where I lie, it ſhould ſeeme that hee lay not there interred, wee may lawfully ſuſpect that it was Ioſeph, whoſe body was preſerued among the Hebrewes, to be buried in the land of Canaan, and this empty Monument might King Orus, who out-liued him, erect in honor of his high deſerts, among the royal Sepulchers. To which purpoſe, the plentie of Cattell, and all manner of viands, had good reference. The name Oſymandias doth not hinder this coniecture; ſeeing Ioſeph had one new name giuen to him by Pharaoh, for expounding the dreame, and might, vpon further occaſions, haue another, to his increaſe of honor. As for that ſtile, King of Kings, it was perhaps no more than Beglerbeg, as the Turkiſh Baſſaes are called, that is, Great aboue the Great.

Now

Now although it be so, that the reckoning falls out right, betweene the times of Ioseph and Acherres (for Acherres was the eight in order, that reigned after the great Orus, whose Viceroy Ioseph was) yet will I heereby seeke, neither to fortifie mine owne coniecture, as touching Ioseph, nor to inferre any likelihood of Acherres his beeing Vchoreus. For it might well be, that Memphis was built by some such King as was Gehoar, Lieutenant vnto the Caliph Elcain; who hauing to his Masters vse conquered Ægypt, and many other Countries, did build, not farre from old Memphis, the great Citie of Cairo (corruptly so pronounced) naming it El Cahira, that is, an enforcing, or an imperious Mistresse, though he himselfe were a Dalmatian slaue. Iohn Leo Hist. Afric. l. 1 & l. 8.

§. III.

Of Cherres, Armeus, Rameſſes, and Amenophis. Of Myris, and the Lake that beares his name.

When Acherres had reigned eight yeeres, Cherres succeeded, and held the Kingdome fifteene yeeres: then reigned Armeus fiue yeeres, and after him Rameſſes, threescore and eight. Of Armeus and Rameſſes is that Historie vnderstood by Eusebius, which is common among the Greekes, vnder the names of Danaus and Ægyptus. For it is said that Danaus, being expelled out of Ægypt by his brother, fledde into Greece, where he obtained the Kingdome of Argos: that he had fiftie Daughters, whom vpon seeming reconciliation, he gaue in marriage to his brothers fiftie sonnes, but commanded euery one of them to kill her husband the first night; that onely Hypermnestra, one of his Daughters, did saue her husband Lynceus, and suffered him to escape; finally, That for this fact, all the bloudie sisters, when they died, were enioyned this foolish punishment in Hell, to fill a leaking Vessell with water.

The reigne of Danaus in Argos was indeed in this age; but that Armeus, was Danaus; and Rameſſes, Ægyptus; is more then Reinecius beleeues: he rather takes Armeus to haue beene Myris, or Meris, who caused the great lake to be made which beares his name. For my owne part, as I can easily beleeue, that he which fled out of Ægypt into Greece, was a man of such qualitie as the Soldan Sanar, of whom we spake before; so doe I not finde how in so short a reigne, as fiue yeeres, a worke of that labour could bee finished, which was required vnto the Lake of Myris, and the Monuments therein; whereof his owne Sepulcher and his wiues being some part, it is manifest that hee was not buried in Argos. Wherefore of Myris, and of all other Kings, whose age is vncertaine, and of whose reignes we haue no assurance, I may truely say, that their great workes are not enough to proue them of the house of Pharaoh, seeing that greater deeds or more absolute, than were those of Ioseph, who bought all the people of Ægypt as bond-men, and all their Land for bread; of Gehoar, who founded Cairo; and of Sanar, who made the Countrie Tributarie; were performed by none of them.

It shall therefore be enough to set downe the length of their reignes, whom we finde to haue followed one another in order of succession: but in rehearsing the great acts which were performed, I will not stand to examine, whether they that did them were Kings or no.

The Lake of Myris is, by the report of Diodore and Herodotus, three thousand sixe hundred furlongs in compasse, and fiftie fadomes deepe. It serued to receiue the waters of Nilus, when the ouer-flow, being too great, was harmefull to the Countrie; and to supply the defect, by letting out the waters of the Lake, when the Riuer did not rise high enough. In opening the sluces of this Lake, for the letting in or out of waters, were spent fiftie talents; but the Lake it selfe defraied that cost; seeing the tribute imposed vpon Fish taken therein, was euery day one talent, which Myris gaue to his Wife to buy sweet oyntments, and other ornaments for her bodie. In the middest of it was left an Iland, wherein were the Sepulchers of Myris and his Wife, and ouer each of them a Pyramis, that was a furlong, or (according to Herodotus) fiftie paces high; hauing on the tops their statues, sitting in Thrones. I finde not the description of this Lake in Maps, answerable to the report of Historians: yet is it very great. The yeeres of Armeus are by Manethon diuided, by inserting one Armesis (whom Eusebius omits) that should haue reigned one yeere and odde moneths of the time; but I hold not this difference worthy of examination.

After

After Rameſſes, his ſonne Amenophis held the Kingdome fortie yeares. Some giue him onely nineteene yeeres; and Mercator thinkes him to haue been the King that was drowned in the Red Sea: whereof I haue already ſpoken in the firſt Booke.

§. IIII.

Of the Kings that reigned in the Dynaſtie of the Larthes.

SEthoſis, or Zethus, reigned after his Father Amenophis, fiftie fiue yeeres. To him are aſcribed the famous acts of that ancient Seſoſtris. But the ſtate of the world was not ſuch at theſe times, that ſo great an expedition as the old Seſoſtris made, could haue beene eyther eaſily performed, or forgotten in the Countries through which he paſſed, had it now beene performed; as any man will perceiue, if hee looke vpon my Chronologicall Table, and conſider who liued with this Zethus. With this King began the Dynaſtie of the Larthes; which Reineccius coniectures to haue had the ſame ſignification, wherein the old Kings of Hetruria, were called Lartes, (the Hetrurians being iſſued out of Lydia, the Lydians out of Ægypt) and to haue ſignified as much as Imperator or Generall. The Warres in which theſe Kings were Generalls, I take to haue beene againſt the Æthiopians: for ſure I am, that they troubled not the Countrie of Paleſtina, that lay next vnto them on the one hand; nor is it likely that they trauelled ouer the deſart ſands, on the other hand; to ſeeke matter of conqueſt, in the poore Countries of Africa. But theſe Generalls (if the Larthes were ſuch) were not many. Fiue onely had that title; and the laſt of theſe tooke it, perhaps, as hereditarie from the firſt; in ſuch ſort as the Roman Emperours were proud for a while, to bee called Antonini, till the moſt vnſuteable conditions of Heliogabalus, made his ſucceſſors forbeare the name.

Here it may be obiected, that the Dynaſties (as appeares by this particular) tooke name from the Kings, that the Kings alſo did adminiſter the gouernment themſelues; and that therefore I am deceiued in aſcribing ſo much vnto the Viceroyes. But it is to be conſidered, that what is ſaid of theſe Larthes, depends onely vpon coniecture, and that the authoritie of the Regents, or Viceroyes, might be great enough, though ſome few Kings tooke the conduct of Armies into their owne hands. For ſo wee finde in Iohn Leo, that the Soldan of Ægypt (after ſuch time as the Soldane Saladine, murdering the Caliph, got the Soueraignetie to himſelfe) had vnder him a Viceroy, ſtiled Eddaguadare, who had authoritie to place, or diſplace, any Magiſtrates, or Officers; and that this mans Familie was almoſt as great, as the Soldans owne. Yet was there alſo the Amir Cabir, or Lord Generall of the Soldans forces, who had the charge of defending the Land, and might as he thought good, ſpend of the Soldans Treaſure. So might the office of the Viceroyes continue, though the Kings themſelues, taking the charge, or title of Generalls vpon them, did ſomwhat abridge the greatneſſe of that ſecond place. As for the names of the Dynaſties, it skills not whence they were drawne; whether from their Countrie, as thoſe of the Thebans and Diapolitans, or from ſome eminent men, or man, who ruled in that time; as many thinke, that the ſeuenteenth Dynaſtie was called of the Sheep-heards, becauſe Ioſeph gouerned in part thereof; or from the Kings themſelues that reigned; as this was ſaid to be of the Larthes or Generalls. The next, as Manetho (but Annius his Manetho) hath it, was without any Larthes or Generals, yet was it not without Kings, foraſmuch as Vaphres, and Seſac, reigned therein, if many others did not. But let vs now returne to the buſineſſe which we left.

Ramſes was King after Zethus, or Sethoſis, threeſcore and ſixe yeeres. He is miſtaken for that ſecond Seſoſtris, of whom I haue ſpoken in the firſt bookes. I find nothing worth rehearſall of this Ramſes, or of Amenophis and Annemenes, that followed him in order, the former of which reigned fortie, the later ſixe and twenty yeeres. Wherefore it may very well bee, that the name which Zethus had from valour, was taken by theſe as hereditarie.

Thuoris, the laſt of the Larthes, reigned onely ſeuen yeeres; yet is hee thought to haue beene that Proteus, of whom Herodotus hath mention, ſaying, That he took Helena from Paris, and after the ſacke of Troy, reſtored her to Menelaus. I neede ſay no more in refutation of this, than that the time of Thuoris his reigne, laſted not ſo long as from the Rape of Helen to her reſtitution.

This

This Proteus or Cetes (as he is named by some) together with Thon, and others, mentioned by Greeke Writers in this businesse, or in other such matters, may seeme to be vnder-Officers: for such only are like to haue had their residencie about Pharos, and the Sea-coast, where Menelaus arriued.

Of Proteus, who detained Helen, it is said, That he could foretell things to come, and that he could change himselfe into all shapes: whereby is signified his craftie head; for which he is growne into a Prouerbe. The Poets fained him a Sea-God, and keeper of Neptunes Seale-fishes; for belike hee was some vnder-Officer to the Admirall, hauing charge of the Fishing about the Isle of Pharos, as was said before.

Remphes, the Sonne of Proteus, is reckoned the next King, by Diodore, as also by Herodotus, who calls him Ramsinitus, and tells a long tale, fit to please children, of his couetousnesse, and how his treasure-house was robbed by a cunning Theefe, that at last married his Daughter. But of this a man may beleeue what hee list. How long this King reigned I know not, nor thinke that either he, or his Father, did reigne at all.

§. V.

Of the Ægyptian Kings whose names are found scattering in sundrie Authors, their times being not recorded. The Kings of Ægypt, according to Cedrenus. Of Vaphres and Sesac.

MAny other names of Ægyptian Kings, are found scattered heere and there; as Tonepherfobis, of whom Suidas deliuers onely the bare name and title; Senemures, or Senepos, mentioned in Macrobius, who perhaps was the same that by Suidas is called Senyes, or Eucnes, noted by occasion of a great Physicion that liued vnder him; Banchyris, recorded by the same Suidas, for his great justice; and Thulis, of whom Suidas tells great matters; as that his Empire extended to the Ocean Sea; that he gaue name to the Isle of Thule, which some take to be Iseland; and that he consulted with the Deuill, or (which is all one) with Seraphis, desiring to know, who before him had beene, or after him should be so mighty as himselfe. The answete or confession of the Deuill was remarkeable; which I finde Englished in the translation of Plessis his worke, Of the trunesse of Christian religion. The Greeke Verses are somewhat otherwise, and much more imperfect in those Copies that I haue of Cedrenus and Suidas, but the sense is all one; which is this;

First God, and next The word, and then The Spirit,
Which three be One, and joyne in One all three:
Whose force is endlesse. Get thee hence fraile wight,
The Man of Life vnknowne excelleth thee.

I should haue thought that Suidas had borrowed all this of Cedrenus, had I not found somewhat more in Suidas, than Cedrenus hath hereof; as the forme of inuocation which Thulis vsed, and that clause, of his giuing name to the Iland: though in this last point I hold Suidas to be deceiued; as also Cedrenus is, or (at least) seems to me, in giuing to this King such profound antiquitie of reigne. Indeed the very name of that booke, cited often by Cedrenus, which he calls Little Genesis, is alone enough to breed suspition of some imposture: but the Frierly stuffe that he alledgeth out of it, is such as would serue to discredit himselfe, were it not otherwise apparant, that hee was a man both deuout, and of good iudgement, in matters that fell within his compasse. I will here set downe the List of olde Ægyptian Kings deliuered by him, and leaue the censure to others.

The first King of Ægypt that he sets downe, is Mizraim, the sonne of Cham. After him he finds many of a new race, deriuing their pedigree thus: Nimrod, the son of Chus, was also called Orion, and further, tooke vpon him the name of the Planet Saturne, had to wife Semiramis, who was of his own Linage, and by her three sonnes; Picus, surnamed Iupiter, Belus and Ninus. Picus chasing his father out of Assyria into Italie, reigned in his stead thirtie yeeres; and then gaue vp that Kingdome to Iuno, his sister and wife, and to Belus his sonne: after which Belus, who reigned onely two yeeres, Ninus had the Kingdome, and married his owne mother Semiramis. But Picus went into Italie, to visit his olde father Saturne; Saturne forth-with resigned the Kingdome vnto him. Picus Iupiter reigned in Italie threescore and two yeeres, had threescore and tenne Wiues or Concubines, and about as many children: finally died, and lyes buried in the Isle of Crete.

The Principall of Iupiters ſonnes were Faunus, Perſeus, and Apollo. Faunus was called by the name of the Planet Mercurie: he reigned in Italie, after his father, fiue and thirtie yeeres: and then (finding that all his brethren conſpired againſt him) he went into Ægypt, with abundance of Treaſure; where, after the death of Mizraim, he got the Kingdome, and held it nine and thirty yeres. After Mercurie, Vulcan reigned in Ægypt, foure yeeres and a halfe. Then Sol, the ſonne of Vulcan, reigned twentie yeeres and a halfe. There followed in order Soſis, Oſiris, Orus, and Thules, of whom wee ſpake before: the length of their ſeuerall reignes is not ſet downe. After Thules, was the great Seſoſtris King twenty yeeres. His ſucceſſor was Pharao, called Narecho, that held the Crowne fiftie yeeres, with which there paſſed from him the ſurname of Pharao, to a very long poſteritie.

Theſe reports of Cedrenus I hold it enough to ſet downe as I finde them: let their credit reſt vpon the Author.

Others yet we finde, that are ſaid to haue reigned in Ægypt, without any certaine note, when, or how long: about whom I will not labour, as fearing more to be reprehended of vaine curioſitie, in the ſearch made after theſe already rehearſed, than of negligence, in omitting ſuch as might haue beene added.

Vaphres, the father in law to Salomon; and Seſac, the afflicter of Reheboam, leade vs againe into faire way, but not farre. The name of Vaphres is not found in the Scriptures; but wee are beholding to Clemens Alexandrinus and Euſebius for it. Theſe giue vs not the length of his reigne; but we know, that he liued in the times of Dauid and of Salomon. He came into Paleſtina with an Armie, took Gezar from the Canaanites, and gaue it to his daughter, Salomons wife: though for her ſake perhaps it was, that in time following either he, or (as I rather take it) Seſac his ſonne did fauour the enemies of Salomon, who kept ſo many Wiues and Concubines, beſides this Ægyptian Princeſſe. In the life of Reheboam all hath beene written that I finde of Seſac, excepting the length of his reigne, which muſt haue beene ſixe and twentie yeeres, if he were that Smendis with whom Euſebius begins the one and twentieth Dynaſtie.

3. King. 9. 16. & 11. v. 18, 19, &c.

Now foraſmuch as it would ſerue to no great purpoſe, that wee knew the length of Seſac his reigne, and of theirs that followed him, vnleſſe therewithall wee knew the beginning of Seſac, vpon which the reſt haue dependance; this courſe I take. From the fourth yeere of Iehoiakim, King of Iuda, in which Pharao Neco was ſlaine, I reckon vpwards the yeeres of the ſame Neco, and of his predeceſſors, vnto the beginning of Seſac: by which accompt, the firſt yeere of Seſac is found, concurrent with the twentieth of Salomons reigne, and the twentie ſixe of Seſac with the fifth of Reheboam: wherein Seſac ſpoyled the Temple, and died, enjoying the fruits of his Sacriledge no longer, than Ioas the Iſraelite, & Craſſus the Romane did; who, after him, ſpoyled the Temple of Ieruſalem.

To fill vp the time betweene Seſac and Neco, I haue rather taken thoſe Kings that I finde in the Greeke Hiſtorians, than them which are in Euſebius his Catalogue. For of theſe that are deliuered by Euſebius, we finde no Name nor Act recorded elſwhere, ſaue onely of Boccheris, who is remembred by Diodore, Plutarch, and others, much being ſpoken of him, that makes him appeare to haue beene a King. Hereunto I may adde, that the ſucceſſion is often interrupted in Euſebius by Æthiopians, which got the Kingdome often, and held it long: whereas contrariwiſe it appeares by the Prophet Eſay, that the Counſellors of Pharao did vaunt of the long and flouriſhing continuance of that houſe, inſomuch, that they ſaid of Pharaoh, I am the Sonne of the wiſe, I am the Sonne of the ancient King. But that which ouerthrowes the reckoning of Euſebius, is, the good agreement of it with his miſtaken times of the Kings of Iuda. For though it pleaſe him well to ſee how the reignes of Ioſias and Neco meet by his computation, yet this indeed marres all; the reigne of Ioſias being miſplaced. This error growes from his omitting, to compare the reignes of the Kings of Iuda with theirs of Iſrael: by which occaſion, Ioram, King of Iſrael, is made to reigne three yeeres after Ahazia of Iuda; Samaria is taken by Salmanaſſar before Hezekia was King: and in a word, all, or moſt of the Kings, haue their beginnings placed in ſome other yeere of their collateralls than the Scriptures haue determined.

§. VI. Of

Of Chemmis, Cheops, Cephrenes, and other Kings recited by Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, which reigned betweene the times of Rehoboam and Ezekia.

FOllowing therefore the Greeke Hiſtorians, I place Chemmis, or (according to Diodore) Chembis, firſt in the ranke of thoſe that were Kings after Seſac. Hee reigned fiftie yeeres, and built the greateſt of the three Pyramides, which was accounted one of this worlds Wonders. The Pyramis hath his name from the ſhape, in that it reſembleth a flame of fire, growing from the bottome vpwards narrower and narrower to the top. This of Chemmis being foure-ſquare, had a Baſe of ſeuen akers euerie way, and was aboue ſixe akers high. It was of a very hard and dureable Stone, which had laſted, when Diodore ſaw it, about a thouſand yeeres, without complaining of any iniurie that it had ſuffered by weather in ſo long ſpace. From the reigne of Chemmis, vnto the age of Auguſtus Cæſar, wherein Diodore liued, are indeede a thouſand yeeres; which doth giue the better likelyhood vnto this time wherein Chemmis is placed. As for this and other Pyramides, late Writers doe teſtifie, that they haue ſeene them yet ſtanding.

After Chemmis, Diodore placeth Cephrenes his brother; but doubtfully, and enclining rather to the opinion, that his ſonne Chabreus ſucceeded. Herodotus hath Cheops (who might be Chabreus) and Cephrenes after him. Theſe are ſaid to haue beene brethren, but the length of their reignes may argue the later to haue beene ſonne to the former: for Cheops reigned fiftie yeeres; Cephrenes fiftie ſixe. Theſe were, as Chemmis had beene, builders of Pyramides, whereby they purchaſed great hatred of their people, who already had ouer-labored themſelues in erecting the firſt. Theſe Pyramides were ordained to be Tombes for thoſe that raiſed them; but the malice of the Ægyptians is ſaid to haue caſt out their bodies; and to haue called their Monuments by the name of an Heardſman, that kept his Beaſts thereabouts. It may be, that the robbing them of their honor, and entituling a poore fellow to their workes, was held to be the caſting out of their bodies: otherwiſe, it is hard to conceiue, how it might be, that they, who had not power to auoid the like ſlauerie, laid vpon them by the younger brother or ſonne, ſhould haue power or leiſure to take ſuch reuenge vpon his Predeceſſor. To the like malice may bee aſcribed the tale deuiſed againſt Cheops his Daughter; That her Father, wanting money, did proſtitute her, and that ſhe, getting of euery man that accompanied her, one ſtone, did build with them a fourth Pyramis, that ſtood in the middeſt of the other three. Belike ſhe was an inſolent Lady, and made them follow their drudgery, for her ſake, longer a while than they thought to haue done, in raiſing a Monument, with the ſuperfluitie of her Fathers prouiſions. Diodor. l. 1. Herod. l. 2.

Mycerinus, the ſonne of Cephrenes, reigned after his Father ſixe yeeres. He would haue built as his fore-goers did, but preuented by death, finiſhed not what he had begun. The people thought him a good King, for that he did ſet open the Temples, which Cheops and Cephrenes had kept ſhut. But an Oracle threatned him with a ſhort life of ſixe yeres onely, becauſe of this his deuotion; For (ſaid the Oracle) Ægypt ſhould haue beene afflicted an hundred and fiftie yeeres, which thy Predeceſſors knew, and performed for their parts; but thou haſt releaſed it, therefore ſhalt thou liue but ſixe yeeres. It is very ſtrange, that the gods ſhould be offended with a King for his pietie; or that they ſhould decree to make a Countrie impious, when the people were deſirous to ſerue them; or that they hauing ſo decreed, it ſhould lie in the power of a King, to alter deſtinie, and make the ordinance of the gods to faile in taking full effect. But theſe were Ægyptian gods. The true God was, doubtleſſe, more offended with the reſtitution of ſuch Idolatrie, than with the interruption. And who knowes, whether Chemmis did not learne ſomewhat at Ieruſalem, in the laſt yeere of his Father Seſac, that made him perceiue, and deliuer to thoſe that followed him, the vanity of his Ægyptian ſuperſtition? Moſt ſure it is that his reigne, and the reignes of Cheops, and Cephrenes, were more long and more happie, than that of Mycerinus, who, to delude the Oracle, reuelled away both dayes and nights, as if by keeping candles lighted, hee had changed his nights into dayes, and ſo doubled the time appointed: a ſeruice more pleaſing to the Diuell, than the reſtitution of Idolatrie durſt then ſeeme, when it could ſpeede no better. I finde in Reineccius fiftie yeeres assigned to this King; which I verily beleeue to haue been some error of the print, though I finde it not corrected among other such ouersights: for I know no Author that giues him so many yeeres, and Reineccius himselfe takes notice of the Oracle, that threatned Mycerinus with a short life, as is before shewed.

Bocchorus is placed next vnto Mycerinus, by Diodore, who speakes no more of him than this, that he was a strong man of body, and excelling his predecessors in wit. He is spoken of by diuers Authors, as one that loued iustice; and may bee taken for that Banchoris, whom Suidas commends in that kinde: Eusebius reckons 44. yeeres of his reigne.

After Bocchorus, one Sabacus an Æthiopian followes, in the Catalogue of Diodore; but certaine ages after him. Herodotus, quite omitting Bocchorus, hath Asychis; who made a sharpe law (as it was then held) against bad debtors, that their dead bodies should be in the creditors disposition, till the debt were paied. This Asychis made a Pyramis of bricke, more costly and faire, in his owne iudgement, than any of those that the former Kings had raised. Besides this Asychis, Herodotus placeth one Anysis, a blinde man, before the Æthiopian. The reignes of these two are perhaps those many ages, which the Ægyptians, to magnifie their antiquities, accounted betweene Bocchorus, and him that followed them. But all this could make but sixe yeeres; and so long doth Functius, so long doth Reineccius hold, that these two Kings, between them both did gouerne. If any man would lengthen this time, holding it vnprobable that the reignes of two Kings should haue been so soone spent; hee may doe it by taking some yeeres from Sethon or Psammeticus, and adding them to either of these. To adde vnto these, without subtracting from some other, would breede a manifest inconuenience: forasmuch as part of Sesac his reigne, must haue beene in the fifth of Rehoboam, as also the last of Pharao Neco was the fourth of Iehoiakim, and the first of Nabuchadnezzar. For mine owne part I like it better to allow sixe yeeres only to these two Kings, than to lose the witnesse of Herodotus, who, concurring herein with the Scriptures, doth speake of Sennacheribs warre: at which time Sethon was King of Ægypt. I will not therefore adde yeeres vnto these obscure names; for by adding vnto these men three yeres, we shall thrust the beginning of Sethon out of place, and make it later than the death of Sennacherib. In regard of this agreement of Herodotus with the Scriptures, I am the more willing to hold with him, in his Ægyptian Kings. Otherwise it were a matter of no great enuie, to leaue both Asychis and Anysis out of the roll; which were easily done, by placing Sesac lower, and extending his life yet sixe yeeres further, or more, (if the like abridgement shall bee required of Psammeticus his reigne) into the yeeres of Rehoboam.

1. King. 14. 25. 2. Chro 12. v. 2.

Of Sabacus the Æthiopian, who tooke the Kingdome from Anysis, it is agreed by the most, that he reigned fiftie yeeeres. He was a mercifull Prince, not punishing all capitall offences with death, but imposing bondage and bodily labour vpon malefactors; by whose toyle he both got much wealth into his owne hands, letting out their seruice to hire, and performed many workes, of more vse than pompe, to the singular benefit of the Countrey. Zonoras calls this King Sua; the Scriptures call him So. Hosea, the last King of Israel, made a league with him against Salmanassar, little to his good: for the Ægyptian was more rich than warlike, and therefore his friendship could not preserue the Israelite from destruction.

It seemes, that the encroching power of the Assyrian, grew terrible to Ægypt about these times; the victories of Tiglath Phulassar, and Salmanassar, hauing eaten so farre into Syria, in the reigne of this one King So or Sabacus. Yea, perhaps it was in his dayes (for his reigne began in the fourth of Menahem) that Phul himselfe did make the first entrance into Palæstina. This caused So to animate the halfe subdued people, against their Conquerours; but the helpe which he and his Successor gaue them was so faint, that Sennacheribs Embassador compared the Ægyptian succour to a broken staffe of Reede. Such indeed had Hosea found it, and such Ezekia might haue found it, had hee not beene supported by the strong staffe of Him, that ruleth all Nations with a rodde of yron. It appeareth by the words of Rabsake, that the opinion was great in Iuda, of the Ægyptian forces, for Charrets and Horse-men; but this power, whatsoeuer it was, grew needfull, within a little while, for the defence of Ægypt it selfe which So left vnto Sethon his successor, hauing now fulfilled the fiftie yeeres of his reigne. Herodotus and Diodorus haue both one tale, from the relation of Ægyptian Priests, concerning the departure of this King; saying, that he left the Countrie, & willingly retired into Æthiopia, because because it was often signified vnto him in his dreames, by the god which was worshipped at Thebes, that his reigne should be neither long nor prosperous, vnlesse hee slew all the Priests in Ægypt; which rather than to do, he resigned his Kingdome. Surely, these Ægyptian gods were of a strange qualitie, that so ill rewarded their seruants, and inuited Kings to doe them wrong. Well might the Ægyptians (as they likewise did) worship Dogs as gods, when their chiefe gods had the propertie of Dogs, which loue their Masters the better for beating them. Yet to what end the Priests should haue feigned this tale, I cannot tell; and therefore I thinke that it might be some deuice of the fearefull olde man, who seeing his Realme in danger of an inuasion, sought an honest excuse for his departure out of it, and withdrawing himselfe into Æthiopia, where hee had beene bred in his youth. What if one should say, that the Æthiopia into which hee went, was none other than Arabia, whereof Tirhaka the King (perhaps at the instigation of this man) raised an Armie against Sennacherib, when he meant to inuade Ægypt, within two or three yeeres after? But I will not trouble my selfe with such enquirie. This I hold, that So, or Sebacus, was not indeed an Æthiopian (for in his time liued the Prophet Esay, who mentioneth the antiquitie of Pharaohs house) but onely so surnamed for his education, and because issuing from thence, he got the Kingdom from Anysis, who was his opposite. The quiet and milde forme of his gouernment, his holding the Kingdome so long without an Armie; and many other circumstances argue no lesse. But whether finally hee betooke a priuate life, or whether hee fore-went his Life and Kingdome at once, being now very olde, it is time that we leaue him, and speake of Sethon his next Successor, who is omitted by Diodore, but remembred by Herodotus, by a sure token of his hauing beene King.

§. VII.

Of Sethon who reigned with Ezekia, and sided with him against Sennacherib.

THe first yeere of Sethons reigne falls into the twelfth of Ezekia, which was the fift of Sennacherib. It was a troublesome age, and full of danger; the two great Kingdomes of Assyria and Ægypt, beeing then ingaged in a Warre, the issue whereof was to determine, whether of them should rule or serue. The Assyrian had the better men of Warre; the Ægyptian better prouision of necessaries: the Assyrian, more Subjects; the Ægyptian, more Friends; and among the new conquered halfe Subjects of Assur, many that were Ægyptian in heart, though Assyrian in outward shew.

Of this last sort were Ezekia, and his people; who, knowing how much it concerned Pharao, to protect them against his owne great Enemie, preferred the friendship of so neere and mighty a Neighbour, before the seruice of a terrible, yet farre remoued King. But herein was great difference, betweene Ezekia and his Subjects: For the good King, fixing his especiall confidence in God, held that course of policie, which hee thought most likely to turne to the benefit of his Countrie: the multitude of Iudea, looking into the faire hopes which this Ægyptian league promised, were puffed vp with vaine conceits, thinking that all was safe, and that now they should not need to feare any more of those iniuries, which they had suffered by the Assyrians, and so became forgetfull of God, taking counsaile but not of him. The Prophet Esay complained much of this presumption; giuing the people of Iuda to vnderstand, That the Ægyptians were men, and not God, and their Horses flesh, and not spirit; that God himselfe should defend Israel vpon repentance, and that Assur should fall by the sword, but not of man. As for the Ægyptians (said the Prophet) they are vanitie, and they shall helpe in vaine, their strength is to sit still.

According to the Prophets words it came to passe. For in the treatie of Confederacie that was held at Zoan, all manner of contentment and assurance was giuen to the Iewes, by Sethon, or his Agents, who filled them with such reports, of Horses and Charets, that they did not looke (as Esay saith) vnto the Holy one of Israel, nor seeke vnto the Lord. But he yet is wisest.

After a while came Sennacherib with his Armie, & wakened them out of these dreams; for Sethon their good Neighbour, as neere as he was, did seeme farre off, being vnreadie, when his helpe was most needfull. It may seeme that hee purposed, rather to make Palestina than Ægypt the stage, whereon this great Warre should be acted, and was not without hope, that the Assyrians and Iewes, weakening one another, should yeeld vnto him a faire aduantage ouer both. Yet he fought with monie; for hee ſent Horſes and Camels laden with treaſure, to hire the Arabians, whom Eſay calleth a people that cannot profit.

Eſay 30.6. Theſe Arabians did not profit indeede; for (beſides that it ſeemes by the ſame place of Eſay, that the rich treaſures miſcarried, and fell into the enemies hands before any helpe appeared from Tirhaca,) all the ſtrong Cities of Iuda were taken by Sennacherib, except Libna, Lachis, and Ieruſalem it ſelfe, which were in ſore diſtreſſe, till the ſword of God, Eſay 31.9. and not of Man, defeated the Aſſyrian, who did goe, for feare, to his Tower, that is, hee fled to Nineue, where he was ſlaine.

Concerning this expedition of Sennacherib, Herodotus takes this notice of it: That it was purpoſed againſt Ægypt, where the men of warre, being offended with Sethon their King, who had taken away their allowance, refuſed to beare armes in defence of him and their Country; that Sethon being Vulcans Prieſt, bemoaned himſelfe to his god, who by dreame promiſed to ſend him helpers; that hereupon Sethon, with ſuch as would follow him, (which were crafts-men, ſhop-keepers, & the like) marched towards Peluſium; and that a great multitude of field-mice entring the Campe of Sennacherib by night, did ſo gnaw the bowes, quiuers, and ſtraps of his mens armour, that they were faine the next day to flie away in all haſte, finding themſelues diſarmed. In memorie hereof (ſaith Herodotus) the ſtatue of this King is ſet vp in the Temple of Vulcan, holding a Mouſe in his hand, with this inſcription: Let him, that holds me, ſerue God. Such was the relation of the Ægyptian Prieſts, wherein how farre they ſwarued from the truth, being deſirous to magnifie their owne King, it may eaſily be perceiued. It ſeemes that this Image of Sethon was fallen downe, and the tale forgotten in Diodorus his time, or elſe perhaps, the Prieſts did forbeare to tell it him (which cauſed him to omit it) for that the Nation of the Iewes was then well knowne to the world, whereof euery childe could haue told, how much falſehood had beene mingled with the truth.

Wee finde this hiſtorie agreeable to the Scriptures, thus farre forth; That Sennacherib King of the Aſſyrians and Arabians, (ſo Herodotus calleth him: the Syrians, or peraduenture ſome borderers vpon Syria, being meant by the name of Arabians) liued in this age, made Warre vpon Ægypt, and was miraculouſly driuen home. As for that exployt of the Mice, and the great pleaſure that Vulcan did vnto his Prieſt; happy it was (if Sethon were a Prieſt) that he tooke his god now in ſo good a moode. For within three or foure yeeres before this, all the Prieſts in Ægypt ſhould haue beene ſlaine, if a mercifull King had not ſpared their liues, as it were halfe againſt the gods will. Therefore this laſt good turne was not enough to ſerue as an example, that might ſtir vp the Ægyptians to piety, ſeeing that their deuotion, which had laſted ſo long before, did bring all the Prieſts into danger of ſuch a bad reward. Rather I thinke, that this Image did repreſent Sennacherib himſelfe, and that the Mouſe in his hand, ſignified Hieroglyphically (as was the Ægyptian manner of expreſſing things) the ſhamefull iſſue of his terrible expedition, or the deſtruction of his Armie, by meanes which came, no man knew from whence. For the vengeance of God, ſhewed vpon this vngodly King, was indeed a very good motiue to pietie. But the Embleme, together with the Temple of Vulcan (being perhaps the chiefe Temple in that Towne where this Image was erected) might giue occaſion to ſuch a fable; the Deuill helping to change the truth into a lie, that God might bee robbed of his honour. Yet that wee may not belie the Deuill, I hold it very likely, that Sethon finding himſelfe in danger, did call vpon his gods, that is, vpon Vulcan, Serapis, or any to whom he had moſt deuotion. But ſo had other of his predeceſſors done in the like need: yet which of them had obtained ſuccour by the like miracle? Surely the Iewes (euen ſuch of them as moſt were giuen to Idolatrie) would haue beene aſhamed of the Eſay 31.1. confidence which they repoſed in the Charets of Ægypt, becauſe they were many, and in the Horſemen, becauſe they were very ſtrong; had it beene told them, that Sethon, in ſtead of ſending thoſe Horſe-men and Charets, was beſeeching Vulcan to ſend him and them good lucke, or elſe (for theſe alſo were Ægyptian gods) addreſſing his prayers to ſome Onyon or Cat. Howſoeuer it was, doubtleſſe the prophecie of Eſay tooke effect, which ſaid, They ſhall be all aſhamed of the people that cannot profit them, nor helpe, nor do them good, but ſhall be a ſhame and alſo a reproch. Such is commonly the iſſue of humane wiſedome, when reſting ſecure vpon prouiſion that it ſelfe hath made, it will no longer ſeem to ſtand in need of God.

Some there are who take Sethon to haue been ſet downe by Euſebius, vnder the name of Tarachus

Tarachus the Æthiopian, and therefore the twenty yeeres which are giuen to Tarachus, they allow to the reigne of Sethon. These haue well obserued, that Tarachus the Æthiopian is mentioned in the Scriptures, not as a King of Ægypt, but as a friend to that Countrie, or at least an enemy to Senacherib, in the warre last spoken of; the Æthiopians (as they are englished) ouer which he reigned, being indeede Chusites or Arabians. Hereupon they suppose aright, that Eusebius hath mistaken one King for another. But whereas they think that this Tarachus or Tirhaka, is placed in the roome of Sethon, & therefore giue to Sethon the twentie yeeres of Tarachus, I hold them to haue erred on the other hand. For this Æthiopian (as he is called) began his Reigne ouer Ægypt, by Eusebius his accompt, after the death of Senacherib and of Ezekia, in the first yeere of Manasses King of Iuda. Therefore he, or his yeeres, haue no reference to Sethon.

Herodotus forgets to tell how long Sethon reigned; Functius peremptorily, citing no author, nor alleadging reason for it, sets him downe thirty three yeeres; many omit him quite; and they that name him, are not carefull to examine his continuance. In this case, I follow that rule which I propounded vnto my selfe at the first, for measuring the reignes of these Ægyptian Kings. The yeeres which passed from the fift of Rehoboam, vnto the fourth of Iehoiakim, I so diuide among the Ægyptians, that giuing to euery one the proportion allowed vnto him by the Author in whom he is found, the rest is to be conferred vpon him whose length of reigne is vncertaine; that is vpon this Sethon. By this accompt I finde the thirty three yeeres, that are set downe by Functius, to agree very neerely, if not precisely, with the time of Sethons reigne; therefore I conforme my owne reckoning to his, though I could be content to haue it one yeere lesse. The reason of this computation I shall render more at large, when I arriue at the time of Psammiticus, whereupon it hath much dependance, and whereinto the course of this History will shortly bring me, the Ægyptian affaires growing now to be interlaced with the matters of Iuda, to which is meete that I returne.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of Manasse and his Contemporaries.

§. I.

Manasse, the Sonne of Ezekias, forgetting the pietie of his Father, and the prosperity which followed him, set vp, repaired, adorned, and furnished, all the Altars, Temples, and high Places, in which the Diuell was by the Heathen worshipped. Besides, he himselfe esteemed the Sunne, the Moone, and the Starres, with all the Hoste of Heauen, as gods, and worshipped them: and of all his acts the most abominable was, that he burnt his Sonnes for a Sacrifice to the Diuell Moloch, or Melchor, in the Valley of Hinnon, or Benhennon: wherein was kindled the fire of Sacrifice to the Diuels.

He also gaue himselfe to all kinde of Witchcraft and Sorcerie, accompanied and maintained those that had familiar Spirits, and all sorts of Enchanters: besides, hee shed so much innocent bloud, as Ierusalem was repleniſhed therewith, from corner to corner. For all his vices and abominations, when he was reprehended by that aged and reuerent Prophet Esay (who was also of the Kings race, and as the Iewes affirme, the Father-in-law of the King) he caused the Prophet neere vnto the Fountaine of Siloe to be sawne in sunder, with a woodden saw, in the eightieth yeere of his life: a cruelty more barbarous and monstrous than hath beene heard of. The Scriptures indeede are silent hereof, yet the same is confirmed by Epiphanius, Isidore, Eusebius, and others, too many to rehearse, and too good to be suspected. Therefore the Lord brought vpon them the Captaines of the Host of the Kings of Ashur, which tooke Manasse, and put him in fetters, and bound him in chaines, and carried him to Babel: Where after he had lien twenty yeeres as a captiue, and dispoyled of all honour and hope; yet to his hearty repentance and continuall timall prayer, the God of infinite mercy had respect, and moued the Assyrians heart to deliuer him.

It is also likely that Merodach, because he loued his father Ezechias, was the easilier perswaded to restore Manasse to his liberty and estate. After which, and when he was againe established, remembring the miseries which followed his wickednesse, and Gods great mercies toward him, he changed forme, detested his former foolish and deuillish Idolatry, and cast downe the Idols of his owne erecting, prepared the Altar of God, and sacrificed thereon. He repaired a great part of Ierusalem: and dyed after the long reigne of fiftie fiue yeeres. Glycas and Suidas report, that Manasse was held in a cage of yron by the Assyrians: and therein fed with bread of bran and water, which men may beleeue as it shall please their fancies.

§. II.

Of troubles in Ægypt following the death of Sethon. The reigne of Psammiticus.

THat the wickednesse of King Manasses was the cause of the euill, which fell vpon his Kingdome and Person, any Christian must needes beleeue: for it is affirmed in the Scriptures. Yet was the state of things, in those parts of the World such, at that time, as would haue inuited any Prince (and did perhaps inuite Merodach, who fulfilled Gods pleasure, vpon respect borne to his owne ends) desirous to enlarge his Empire, to make attempt vpon Iuda. For the Kingdome of Ægypt, which was become the pillar, whereon the state of Iuda leaned, about these times was miserably distracted with ciuill dissention, and after two yeeres, ill amended by a diuision of the gouernment betweene twelue Princes. After some good agreement betweene these, eleauen of them fell out with the twelfth of their colleagues, and were all finally subdued by him, who made himselfe absolute King of all. This Inter-regnum, or meere Anarchie, that was in Ægypt, with the diuision of the Kingdome following it, is placed by Diodore, who omitteth Sethon, betweene the reigne of Sabacus, and Psammiticus: but Herodotus doth set the Aristocratie, or twelue Gouernours, immediately before Psammiticus, who was one of them, and after Sethon.

The occasion of this dissension seemes to haue beene the vncertainty of title to that Kingdome (for that the crown of Ægypt passed by succession of bloud, I haue often shewed) which ended, for a while, by the partition of all among twelue, though things were not setled, vntill one had obtained the Soueraignty.

These twelue Rulers gouerned fifteene yeeres, in good seeming agreement, which to preserue, they made strait couenant and alliances one with another, being iealous of their estate, because an Oracle had foretold, that one of them should depose all the rest, noting him by this token, that hee should make a drinke-offering, in Vulcans Temple, out of a Copper goblet. Whilest this vnitie lasted, they ioyned together in raising a Monument of their Dominion, which was a Labyrinth, built neere vnto the Lake of Meris; a worke so admirable, that (as Herodotus, who beholding it, affirmes) no words could giue it commendation, answerable to the statelinesse of the worke it selfe. I will not here set downe that vnperfect description, which Herodotus makes of it, but thinke enough to say, that he preferres it farre before the Pyramides, one of which (as he saith) excelled the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, or any of the faireſt workes in Greece. Diodorus reports this Labyrinth to haue beene the worke of Marus, or Memides, a King which liued fiue generations before Proteus, that is, before the Warre of Troy; and from this Labyrinth (saith he) Dedalus tooke the patterne of that which he made for Minos in Crete. Who this Marus, or Memides was, I cannot tell. Reineccius takes him to haue beene Annemenes, which reigned immediately before Thuoris. But this agrees not with Diodore: for Dedalus & Minos were both dead long before Annemenes was King. Belike Reineccius, desiring to accommodate the fabulous relations of Manethon, Chæremon, & others, that are found in Iosephus, touching Amenophis and his children, to the storie of Amasis, and Actisanes the Æthiopian, mentioned by Diodore; held it consequent, after he had coniectured Manethons Amenophis to be Diodorus his Amasis; that Sethon should be Actisanes, and that Annemenes should be Marus. If in this case I might intrude a coniecture; the times which we now handle are those, about which Reineccius hath erred in making search; Amasis was Amyrtis, Actisanes was Sabacus; and Marus was one of these twelue Princes, to whom Herodotus giues

the honour of building this famous Labyrinth. For Actisanes the Æthiopian deposed Amasis; Sabacus the Æthiopian deposed Amysis; Actisanes governed well, and was milde in punishing offenders; so likewise was Sabacus; Marus the next King after Actisanes built this Labyrinth; and the next (saving Sethon, whom Diodore omits, as having not heard of him) that ruled after Sabacus, performed the same worke, according to Herodotus, who was more likely to heare the truth, as living neerer to the Age wherein it was performed. The varietie of names, and difference of times, wherein Diodore beleeued the Priests, might be a part of the Ægyptian vanitie, which was familiar with them, in multiplying their Kings, and boasting of their antiquities. Here I might adde, that the twelue great Hals, Parlours, and other circumstances remembred by Herodotus, in speaking of this building, doe helpe to proue, that it was the worke of these twelue Princes. But I hasten to their end.

At a solemne feast in Vulcans Temple, when they were to make their drinke-offerings, the Priest, forgetting himselfe, brought forth no more than eleuen Cuppes. Hereupon Psammiticus, who standing last, had not a Cup, tooke off his brazen Helmet, and therewith supplyed the want. This caused all the rest to remember the Oracle, and to suspect him as a Traitor; yet, when they found that it was not done by him vpon set purpose, or ill intent, they forbare to kill him, but, being iealous of their estate, they banished him into the marish Countries by the Sea side. This Oracle, and the euent, is held by Diodore as a fable, which I beleeue to haue beene none other: In the rest Herodotus & Diodore agree, saying, that Psammiticus hyred Souldiers out of Caria and Ionia, by whose aide hee vanquish his Companions, and made himselfe sole King.

The yeeres of his reigne, according to Herodotus, were fiftie foure; according to Eusebius, fortie foure; Mercator, to reconcile these two, giues fortie foure yeeres to his single reigne, and ten to his ruling, ioyntly with the Princes before spoken of. Indeede, hee that was admitted, being a man growne (for he cannot in reason be supposed to haue beene then a yong fellow) into the number of the twelue Gouernors, must be thought to haue liued vnto extreame age, if he ruled partly with others, partly alone, threescore and nine yeeres. I therefore yeelde rather to Eusebius; but will not aduenture to cut fiue yeers from the Aristocratie: though peraduenture Psammiticus was not at first one of the twelue, but succeeded (either by election, or as next of bloud) into the place of some Prince that dyed, and was ten yeeres companion in that gouernment.

Another scruple there is, though not great, which troubles this reckoning. The yeeres of these Ægyptians, as we finde them set downe, are more by one, than serue to fill vp the time, betweene the fift of Rehoboam, and the fourth of Iehoiakim. This may not be. Wherefore either we must abate one yeere from Sethons reigne; that was of vncertaine length; or else (which I had rather doe; because Functius may haue followed better authority than I know, or than himselfe alleadgeth, in giuing to Sethon a time so neerely agreeing with the truth) we must confound the last yeere of one reigne, with the first of another. Such a supposition were not insolent. For no man can suppose, that all the Kings, or any great part of them, which are set downe in Chronologicall tables, reigned precisely so many yeeres as are prescribed vnto them, without any fractions: it is enough to thinke, that the surplusage of one mans time, supplyed the defect of anothers. Wherefore I confound the last yeere of those fifteene, wherein the twelue Princes ruled, with the first of Psammiticus; who surely did not fall out with his Companions, fight with them, and make himselfe Lord alone, all in one day.

Concerning this King, it is recorded, that he was the first in Ægypt, who entertained any strait amitie with the Greekes; that he retained in pay his Mercenaries of Caria, Ionia, and Arabia, to whom he gaue large rewards and possessions; and that he greatly offended his Ægyptian Souldiers, by bestowing them in the left wing of his Armie, whilest his Mercenaries held the right wing (which was the more honorable place) in an expedition that he made into Syria. Vpon this disgrace it is said, that his Souldiers, to the number of two hundred thousand, forsooke their naturall Countrey of Ægypt, and went into Æthiopia, to dwell there: neither could they be reuoked by kinde Messages, nor by the King himselfe, who ouer-tooke them on the way; but when he told them of their Countrey, their Wiues, and Children, they answered, that their weapons should get them a Countrey, and that nature had enabled them to get other wiues and children.

It

It is also reported of him, That he caused two Infants to be brought vp in such sort, as they might not heare any word spoken; by which meanes, he hoped to finde out, what Nation or Language was most ancient; forasmuch as it seemed likely, that nature would teach the children to speake that language, which men spake at the first. The issue hereof was, that the children cried, Beccus, Beccus, which word being found to signifie Bread in the Phrygian tongne, serued greatly to magnifie the Phrygian antiquitie. Goropius Becanus makes no small matter of this, for the honour of his Low-Dutch; in which the word Becker, signifies (as Baker in Englisth) a maker of bread. He that will turne ouer any part of Goropius his workes, may finde enough of this kinde, to perswade a willing man, that Adam and all the Patriarks vsed none other tongue than the Low-Dutch, before the confusion of languages at Babel; the name it selfe of Babel, being also Dutch, and giuen by occasion of this confusion; for that there they began to babble, and talke, one knew not what.

But I will not insist vpon all that is written of Psammiticus. The most regardable of his acts was the siege of Azotus in Palestina, about which he spent nine and twenty yeeres. Neuer haue we heard (saith Herodotus) that any Citie endured so long a siege as this; yet Psammiticus carried it at the last. This Towne of Azotus had beene won by Tartan, a Captaine of Senacherib, and was now, as it seemeth, relieued; but in vaine, by the Babylonian, which made it hold out so well.

§. III.

What reference these Ægyptian matters might haue to the imprisonment and enlargement of Manasses. In what part of his reigne Manasses was taken prisoner.

WEre it certainely knowne, in what yeere of his reigne Manasses was taken prisoner, and how long it was before he obtained libertie; I thinke we should finde these Ægyptian troubles to haue beene no small occasion, both of his captiuitie and enlargement: God so disposing of humane actions, that euen they, who intended onely their owne businesse, fulfilled onely his high pleasure. For either the ciuill warres in Ægypt that followed vpon the death of Sethon; or the renting of the Kingdome, as it were, into twelue peeces; or the warre betweene Psammiticus and his Colleagues; or the expedition of Psammiticus into Syria, and the siege of Azotus, might minister vnto the Babylonian, either such cause of hope, to enlarge his Dominion in the South parts; or such necessity of sending an Armie into those parts, to defend his owne, as would greatly tempt him, to make sure worke with the King of Iuda. The same occasions sufficed also, to procure the deliuerie of Manasses, after he was taken. For he was taken (as Iosephus hath it) by subtiltie, not by open force, neither did they that apprehended him, winne his Countrey, but onely waste it. So that the Iewes, hauing learned wit; by the ill successe of their folly, in redeeming Amazia, were like to be more circumspect, in making their bargaine vpon such another accident: and the Babylonian (to whom the Ægyptian matters presented more weighty arguments of hope and feare, than the little Kingdome of Iuda could afford) had no reason, to spend his forces, in pursuing a small conquest, but as full of difficultie as a greater, whereby he should compell his mightiest enemies to come to some good agreement; when by quitting his present aduantage ouer the Iewes, he might make his way the fairer into Ægypt.

Now concerning the yeere of Manasses his reigne, wherein he was taken prisoner; or concerning his captiuitie it selfe, how long it lasted; the Scriptures are silent, and Iosephus giues no information. Yet I finde cited by Torniellus three opinions, the one of Bellarmine, who thinkes that Manasses was taken in the fifteenth yeere of his reigne; the other of the Author of the greater Hebrew Chronologie, who affirmes, that it was in his twentie seauenth yeere; the third, of Rabbi Kimhi vpon Ezekiel, who saith, that he was fortie yeeres an Idolater, and liued fifteene yeeres after his repentance. The first of these coniectures is vpheld by Torniellus, who reiects the second, as more vnprobable, and condemnes the third as most false. Yet the reasons alleadged by Torniellus in defence of the first, and refutation of the last opinion, are such as may rather proue him to fauour the Cardinall, as farre as he may, (for where neede requires, hee doth freely dissent from him) than to haue vsed his accustomed diligence in examining the matter, before before he gaue his iudgement. Two arguments he brings to maintaine the opinion of Bellarmine: the one, that Ammon the Sonne of Manaſſes, is ſaid by Ioſephus, to haue followed the workes of his Fathers youth; the other, that had Manaſſes growne old in his ſinnes, it is not like that he ſhould haue continued, as he did, in his amendment vnto the end of his life. Touching the former of theſe arguments, I ſee no reaſon, why the ſinnes of Manaſſes might not be diſtinguiſhed from his repentance in his old age, by calling them workes of his youth, which appeared when he was twelue yeeres old; though it were granted that he continued in them (according to that of Rabbi Kimhi) vntill hee was but fifteene yeeres from death. Touching the ſecond; howſoeuer it be a fearefull thing, to caſt off vnto the laſt thoſe good motions vnto repentance, which we know not whether euer God will offer vnto vs againe; yet were it a terrible hearing, That the ſinnes, which are not forſaken before the age of two and fiftie yeeres, ſhall be puniſhed with finall impenitency. But againſt theſe two collections of Torniellus, I will lay two places of Scripture, whence it may be inferred, as not vnlikely, That Manaſſes continued longer in his wickedneſſe, than Ballarmine hath intimated, if not as long as Rabbi Kimki hath affirmed. In the ſecond Booke of Kings, the euill which Manaſſes did, is remembred at large, and his repentance vtterly omitted; ſo that his amendment may ſeeme to haue taken vp no great part of his life; the ſtory of him being thus concluded, in the one and twentieth Chapter: Concerning the reſt of the acts of Manaſſes, and all that he did, and his ſinne that he ſinned, are they not written in the booke of the Chronicles of the Kings of Iuda? The other place is in the foure and twentieth Chapter of the ſame Booke, where in rehearſing the calamities with which that Nation was puniſhed in the time of Iehoiakim, the great Grand-childe of this Manaſſes, it is ſaid; Surely by the commandement of the Lord came this vpon Iuda, that he might put them out of his ſight, for the ſinnes of Manaſſes, according to all that he did, and for the innocent blood that he ſhed (for he filled Ieruſalem with innocent blood) therefore the Lord would not pardon it. Who ſo conſiders well theſe places, may finde ſmall cauſe to pronounce it moſt falſe, That the repentance and amendment of Manaſſes was no earlier then fifteene yeeres before his death; or moſt probable, That when he was twenty ſeauen yeeres old; he repented, and becomming a new man, liued in the feare of God fortie yeeres after. I will no longer diſpute about this matter, ſeeing that the truth cannot be diſcouered. It ſufficeth to ſay, that two yeeres of ciuill diſſenſion in Ægypt; foureteene or fifteene yeeres following, wherein that Kingdome was weakened, by partition of the Soueraignty: the warre of Pſammiticus againſt his Aſſociates: and foure and twenty yeeres, of the nine and twenty, wherein the ſiege of Azotus continued, being all within the time of Manaſſes, did leaue no one part of his reigne (after the firſt fifteene yeeres) free from the danger of being oppreſſed by the Babylonian, whoſe men of warre had continuall occaſions of viſiting his Countrey. All which I will adde hereto is this; that the fifteenth of Manaſſes, was the laſt yeere of Sethon in Ægypt, and the one and thirtieth of Merodach his reigne, or (accounting from the death of Aſarhaddon) the twentieth: The ſeauen and twentieth of Manaſſes was the tenth of the twelue Princes, and the three and fortieth of Merodach: his fortieth, was the twenty third of Pſammiticus, and the fift of Nabulaſſar, the ſonne of Merodach, in Babylon: but which of theſe was the yeere of his impriſonment, or whether any other, I forbeare to ſhew mine opinion, leſt I ſhould thereby ſeeme to draw all matters ouer-violently to mine owne computation.

2 King. 21. 17.

2 King. 24. 3. 4

This was the firſt great maſtrie that the Babylonians had of the Kingdome of Iuda. For though Achaz promiſed Tribute to Salmanaſſar, yet Ezechias neuer payed it. True it is, that he hoped to ſtay Sennacheribs enterpriſe againſt him, by preſenting him with three hundred talents of ſiluer, and thirty of gold, beſides the plate which couered the doores and pillars of the Temple.

2 King. 18.

But Manaſſes being preſſed with greater neceſſity, could refuſe no tollerable conditions, that the Babylonian would impoſe vpon him; among which it ſeemes, that this was one, (which was indeede a point of ſeruitude) that he might not hold peace with the Ægyptians, whileſt they were enemies to Babylon. This appeares not onely by his fortifying with men of warre all the ſtrong Cities of Iuda after his returne (which was rather againſt Pſammiticus, whoſe party he had forſaken, than againſt the Babylonian, with whom he had thenceforth no more controuerſie) but likewiſe by that oppoſition, which Ioſias made afterwards to Pharao Neco, in fauour of Nabulaſſar, which had beene againſt all reaſon reaſon and policie, if it had not beene his duty by couenant. Of this I will ſpeake more in conuenient place.

†. IIII.

Of the firſt and ſecond Meſſenian warres, which were in the reignes of Ezekia, and Manaſſes, Kings of Iuda.

NOw concerning ſuch actions as were performed abroad in the world, about theſe times of Manaſſes; the moſt remarkeable were the Meſſenian Warres; which happened in this age, and being the greateſt action performed in Greece, betweene the Troian and Perſian Wars, deſerue not to be paſſed ouer with ſilence.

The firſt Meſſenian Warre began and ended in the dayes of Ezekia; the ſecond in the reigne of Manaſſes: but to auoide the trouble of interrupting our Hiſtorie, I haue thought it beſt, to rehearſe them both in this place. Other introduction is needeleſſe, than to ſay, that the poſteritie of Hercules, driuing the iſſue of Pelops and the Achæans out of their ſeates, diuided their lands betweene themſelues, and erected the Kingdomes of Lacedæmon, Argos, Meſſene, and Corinth; all which agreeing well together a while, did afterwards forget the bond of Kindred, and ſought one anothers ruine with bloudy Wars; whereof theſe Meſſenian were the greateſt.

The pretended grounds of the Meſſenian Warre, are ſcarce worth remembrance; they were ſo ſleight. Ambition was the true cauſe of it: wherewith the Lacedæmonians were ſo tranſported, that any thing ſerued them as a colour, to accompliſh their greedy deſires. Yet other matter was alleaged; namely, that one Polychares a Meſſenian had ſlaine many Lacedæmonians, for which the Magiſtrates of Sparta deſiring to haue him yeelded into their hands, could not obtaine it. The Meſſenians on the other ſide, excuſed Polychares, for that he was growne franticke, through iniuries receiued from Euæphnes a Lacedæmonian. This Euæphnes had bargained to giue paſture to the Cattell of Polychares, and was therefore to receiue part of the increaſe: but not contented with the gaine appointed, he ſold the Cattaile, and ſlaues that kept them, to Merchants; which done, he came with a faire tale to his friend, ſaying, that they were ſtollen. Whileſt the lye was yet ſcarce out of his mouth, one of the ſlaues that had eſcaped from the Merchants, came in with a true report of all. The Lacedæmonian being thus deprehended, confeſſed all, and promiſed large amends; which to receiue, he carried the Sonne of Polychares home with him; but hauing him at home, he villanouſly ſlew him. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians hauing refuſed, after long ſuite made by the wretched Father, to doe him right againſt this Theeſe and Murderer, ought not to picke matter of quarrell, out of thoſe things, which he did in that madneſſe, whereinto they themſelues had caſt him. So ſaid the Meſſenians, and further offered to put the matter to compromiſe, or to ſtand vnto the iudgement of the Amphictyones, who were as the generall Counſaile of Greece, or to any other faire courſe. But the Lacedæmonians, who had a great deſire to occupie the faire Countrie of Meſſene, that lay cloſe by them, were not content with ſuch allegations. They thought it enough, to haue ſome ſhew for their doings, which the better to colour, they reckoned vp many old iniuries, and ſo without ſending any defiance, ſecretly tooke an oath to hold warre with Meſſene, till they had maſtered it: which done, they ſeized vpon Amphia, a frontier Towne of that Prouince, wherein they put all to the Sword without mercy, very few eſcaped.

Hereupon the Meſſenians tooke Armes, and were met by the Enemie. A furious battaile was fought betweene them, which ended not vntill darke night, with vncertaine victory. The Meſſenians did ſtrongly encampe themſelues; The Lacedæmonians, vnable to force their Campe, returned home. This Warre began in the ſecond yeere of the ninth Olympiad, and ended in the firſt of the foureteenth Olympiad, hauing laſted twentie yeeres. The two enemie Nations tried the matter, for a while, with their proper forces; the Lacedæmonians waſting the inland parts of Meſſene; and the Meſſenians, the Sea-coaſt of Laconia. But it was not long ere friends, on both ſides, were called in to helpe. The Arcadians, Argiues, and Sicyonians, tooke part with Meſſene; the Spartans had, beſides many Subiects of their owne, aide from Corinth, and hired Souldiers out of Crete. So a ſecond, third, and fourth battaile, were fought, with as great obſtinacie as the firſt; ſauing that, in the fourth battaile; the Lacedæmonians were enforced eed to turne their backs; in the other fights, the victory was ſtill vncertaine, though in one of them the Meſſenians loſt Euphaes their King, in whoſe ſtead they choſe Ariſtodemus.

Many yeeres were ſpent ere all this bloud was ſhed; for peſtilent diſeaſes, and want of money to entertaine Souldiers, cauſed the Warre to linger. And for the ſame reaſons, did the Meſſenians forſake all their inland Townes, excepting Ithome, which was a mountaine with a Towne vpon it, able to endure more than the enemies were likely to doe. But, as ſome Authors tell vs, the Lacedæmonians were ſo obſtinate in this Warre, becauſe of their vow, that hauing abſented themſelues ten yeeres from Sparta, their wiues ſent them word, that their Citie would grow vnpeopled, by reaſon that no children had beene borne them in all that time: Whereupon they ſent backe all their ableſt young men, promiſcuouſly to accompany the young women, who got ſo many of them with childe, as they became a great part of their Nation, and were called Parthenians. Diodorus referres the begetting of theſe Parthenians to a former time. But in proceſſe of this Meſſenian Warre, when the Diuell in an Oracle had aduiſed the Meſſenians to ſacrifice a Virgin of the ſtocke of * Ægyptus, that ſo they might be victorious againſt the Lacedæmonians; the lot falling vpon the Daughter of one Lyciſcus; Epibolus the Prieſt, willing to ſaue her, ſaid, ſhe was onely a foſtered childe, and not borne of the wife of Lyciſcus: which anſwere giuing delay to the execution of the Maide, Lyciſcus ſecretly fled away with her into Sparta. Then Ariſtodemus, which afterwards was King, voluntarily offered his owne Daughter: but a young Noble man, being in loue with the Maide, when otherwiſe he could not preuaile, ſaid openly that ſhe was no Virgin, but that he had deſloured her, and got her with childe: whereupon the Father in a rage ripped vp his innocent Daughters belly, to diſproue the Louers ſlander: at the graue of which Daughter of his, afterwards falling, by other ſuperſtitions, into deſpaire of preuailing againſt the Lacedæmonians, he ſlew himſelfe, to the great hurt of his Countrey, which he loued moſt dearely. For after his death the Meſſenians loſt their courage, and finding themſelues diſtreſſed by many wants, eſpecially of victuals, they craued peace; which they obtained in moſt rigorous conditions. Halfe the yeerely fruites of their Land they were bound to ſend vnto Sparta; and they, with their Wiues, to make ſolemne lamentations, at the death of euery Spartan King; they were alſo ſworne to liue in true ſubiection to the Lacedæmonians; and part of their Territorie was taken from them, which was giuen to the Aſmæi, and ſuch as had followed the Spartans in this Warre.

* This Aegyptus was the yongeſt Sonne of Creſphon by Merope, the daughter of Cypſelus King of Arcadia: of which Creſphon the chiefe nobilitie of the Meſſenians was propagated.

This peace being made vpon ſo vneuen tearmes, was not like to hold long. Yet nine and thirtie yeeres it continued (the Meſſenians not finding how to helpe themſelues) and then brake out into a new and more furious Warre, than the former. The able young men, that were growne vp in the roome of thoſe Meſſenians whom the former Warre had conſumed, began to conſider their owne ſtrength and multitude, thinking themſelues equall to the Lacedæmonians, and therefore ſcorned to ſerue ſuch Maſters, as had againſt all right, oppreſſed their Fathers. The chiefe of theſe was Ariſtomenes, a noble Gentleman, of the houſe of Æpytus; who perceiued the vniforme deſires of his Countrie-men, aduentured to become their Leader. He therefore ſounding the affections of the Argiues and Arcadians, which he found throughly anſwerable to his purpoſe, began open warre vpon the State of Lacedæmon. This was in the fourth yeere of the three and twentieth Olympiad; when the Lacedæmonians, haſted to quench the fire before it ſhould grow too hot, with ſuch forces as they could raiſe of their owne, without troubling their friends, meaning to deale with their Enemies, ere any ſuccour were lent them. So a ſtrong battaile was fought betweene them, and a doubtfull; ſaue that the Meſſenians were pleaſed with the iſſue; foraſmuch as they had thereby taught their late proud Lords, to thinke them their equals. Particularly, the valour of Ariſtomenes appeared ſuch in this fight, that his people would haue made him their King; but hee, refuſing the honour of that name, accepted of the burthen, and became their Generall. Within one yeere another battaile was fought, whereunto each part came better prouided. The Lacedæmonians brought with them the Corinthians, and ſome other friends to helpe: the Meſſenians had the Argiues, Arcadians and Sicyonians. This alſo was a long and bloudie fight; but Ariſtomenes did ſo behaue himſelfe, that finally hee made the Enemies runne for their liues. Of ſuch importance was this victory, that the Lacedæmonians beganne to bethinke themſelues, of making ſome good agreement.

But one Tyrtæus an Athenian Poet, whom by appointment of an Oracle they had gotten to direct them, re-enforced their spirits with his Verses. After this, Aristomenes tooke by surprise a Towne in Laconia, and vanquished in fight Anaxander King of Sparta, who did set vpon him in hope to haue recouered the bootie.

But all these victories of Aristomenes perished, in the losse of one battaile, whereof the honour (if it were honour) or surely the profit, fell vpon the Lacedæmonians, through the treason of Aristocrates, King of Arcadia, who being corrupted by the enemies with money, fled away, and left the Messenians exposed to a cruell butcherie. The losse was so great, that together with Andania their princall Citie, all the townes in Messene, standing too farre from the Sea, were abandoned, for lacke of men to defend them, and the Mount Era fortified, whither the multitude, that could not be safe abroad, was conueyed into a place of safetie. Here the Lacedæmonians found a tedious worke, that held them eleauen yeeres. For besides that Era it selfe was a strong peece, Aristomenes with three hundred stout Souldiers, did many incredible exploits, that wearied them, and hindred their attendance on the siege. He wasted all the fields of Messene, that were in the enemies power, and brake into Laconia, taking away Corne, Wine, Cattaile, and all prouisions, necessarie for his owne people; the Slaues and houshold stuffe hee changed into money, suffering the owners to redeeme them. To remedy this mischiefe the Lacedæmonians made an Edict, that neither Messene, nor the adioyning parts of their owne Countrie, should be tilled or husbanded; which bred a great tumult among priuate men, that were almost vndone by it. Yet the Poet Tyrtæus appeased this vproare with pleasing Songs. But Aristomenes grew so bold, that he not onely ranged ouer all the fields, but aduentured vpon the Townes, surprised, and sackt Amycla, and finally caused the enemies to encrease and strengthen their Companies; which done, there yet appeared no liklihood of taking Era.

In performing these and other seruices, thrice Aristomenes was taken prisoner; yet still he escaped. One escape of his deserues to be remembred, as a thing very strange and maruailous. He had with too much courage aduentured to set vpon both the Kings of Sparta; and being in that fight wounded, and felled to the ground, was taken vp senseless, and carried away prisoner, with fiftie of his Companions. There was a deepe naturall Caue into which the Spartans vsed to cast head-long, such as were condemned to dye for the greatest offences. To this punishment were Aristomenes and his companions adiudged. All the rest of these poore men dyed with their fals; Aristomenes (howsoeuer it came to passe) tooke no harme. Yet was it harme enough to be imprisoned in a deepe Dungeon, among dead carcasses, where he was like to perish through hunger and stench. But after a while he perceiued by some small glimmering of light (which perhaps came in at the top) a Foxe that was gnawing vpon a dead body. Hereupon he bethought himselfe, that this beast must needes know some way, to enter the place and get out. For which cause he made shift to lay hold vpon it, and catching it by the taile with one hand, saued himselfe from biting with the other hand, by thrusting his coate into the mouth of it. So letting it creepe whither it would, he followed, holding it as his guide, vntill the way was too strait for him; and then dismissed it. The Foxe being loose, ran through an hole, at which came in a little light; and there did Aristomenes delue so long with his nailes, that at last he clawed out his passage. When some fugitiues of Messene brought word to Sparta, that Aristomenes was returned home, their tale sounded alike, as if they had said, that a dead man was reuiued. But when the Corinthian forces, that came to helpe the Lacedæmonians in the siege of Era, were cut in peeces, their Captaines slaine, and their Campe taken; then was it easily beleeued, that Aristomenes was aliue indeede.

Thus eleauen yeeres passed whilest the enemies houering about Era, saw no liklihood of getting it; and Aristomenes with small forces did them greater hurt than they knew how to requite. But at the last, a slaue, that had fled from Sparta, betrayed the place. This fellow had enticed to lewdnesse the wife of a Messenian, and was entertained by her, when her husband went forth to watch. It happened in a rainie-winter-night, that the husband came home vnlooked for, whilest the Adulterer was within. The Woman hid her Paramour, and made good countenance to her husband, asked him, by what good fortune he was returned so soone. He told her, that the storme of foule weather was such, as had made all his fellowes leeue their Stations, and that himselfe had done as the reſt did; as for Ariſtomenes, he was wounded of late in fight, and could not looke abroad; neither was it to be feared, that the enemies would ſtirre, in ſuch a darke rainie night as this was. The ſlaue that heard theſe tidings, roſe vp ſecretly out of his lurking hole, and got him to the Lacedæmonian Campe with the newes. There he found Emperamus his Maſter, commanding in the Kings abſence. To him he vttered all; and obtaining pardon for his running away, guided the Armie into the Towne. Little or nothing was done that night. For the Allarme was preſently taken; and the extreame darkeneſſe, together with the noiſe of winde and raine, hindered all directions. All the next day was ſpent in moſt cruell fight; one part being incited, by meere hope of ending a long worke; the other enraged by meere deſperation. The great aduantage that the Spartans had in numbers, was recompenced partly by the aſſiſtance, which women and children (to whom the hatred of ſeruitude had taught contempt of death) gaue to their husbands and fathers; partly by the narrowneſſe of the ſtreetes and other paſſages, which admitted not many hands to fight at once. But the Meſſenians were in continuall toyle; their enemies fought in courſe, refreſhing themſelues with meate and ſleepe, and then returning ſupplyed the place of their wearie fellowes, with freſh Companions. Ariſtomenes therefore, perceiuing that his men for want of reliefe were no longer able to hold out, (as hauing beene three dayes, and three nights vexed with all miſeries, of labour, watchings, fighting, hunger and thirſt, beſides continuall raine and cold) gathered together all the weaker ſort, whom hee compaſſed round with armed men, and ſo attempted to breake out through the midſt of the enemies. Emperamus Generall of the Lacedæmonians was glad of this: and to further their departure, cauſed his Souldiers to giue an open way, leauing a faire paſſage to theſe deſperate madmen. So they iſſued forth, and arriued ſafe in Arcadia, where they were moſt louingly entertained.

Vpon the firſt bruit of the taking of Era, the Arcadians had prepared themſelues to the reſcue: but Ariſtocrates their falſe-hearted King, ſaid it was too late, for that all was already loſt. When Ariſtomenes had placed his followers in ſafety, he choſe out fiue hundred the luſtieſt of his men, with whom he reſolued to march in all ſecret haſte vnto Sparta, hoping to finde the Towne ſecure, and ill manned, the people being runne forth to the ſpoyle of Meſſene. In this enterpriſe, if he ſped well, it was not doubted, that the Lacedæmonians would be glad to recouer their owne, by reſtitution of that which they had taken from others; if all failed, an honourable death was the worſt that could happen. There were three hundred Arcadians that offered to ioyne with him; but Ariſtocrates marred all, by ſending ſpeedy aduertiſement thereof, to Anaxander King of Sparta. The Epiſtle which Anaxander ſent backe to Ariſtocrates, was intercepted by ſome that miſtruſted him to whom it was directed. Therein was found all his falſehood, which being publiſhed in open aſſembly, the Arcadians ſtoned him to death, and caſting forth his body vnburied, erected a monument of his trecherie, with a note: That the Periurer cannot deceiue God.

Of Ariſtomenes no more is remaining to be ſaid, than that committing his people to the charge of his Son Gorgus and other ſufficient Gouernors, who ſhould plant them in ſome new ſeate abroad, he reſolued himſelfe to make aboade in thoſe parts, hoping to finde the Lacedæmonians worke at home. His daughters he beſtowed honourably in marriage. One of them Demagetus, who reigned in the Ile of Rhodes, tooke to wife, being willed by an Oracle, to marry the daughter of the beſt man in Greece. Finally, Ariſtomenes went with his daughters to Rhodes, whence he purpoſed to haue trauailed vnto Ardys the Sonne of Gyges King of Lydia, and to Phraortes King of Media: but death preuented him at Rhodes, where he was honourably buried.

The Meſſenians were inuited by Anaxilas (whoſe great Grandfather was a Meſſenian, and went into Italie after the former warre) being Lord of the Rhegians in Italie, to take his part againſt the Zancleans in Sicilie, on the other ſide of the Streights. They did ſo; and winning the Towne of Zancle, called it Meſſene, which name it keepes to this day.

This ſecond Meſſenian warre ended in the firſt yeere of the twentie eight Olympiade. Long after which time, the reſt of that Nation, who ſtaying at home ſerued the Lacedæmonians, found meanes to rebell; but were ſoone vanquiſhed, and being driuen to forſake Peloponneſus, they went into Acarnania; whence likewiſe, after few ages they were expelled by the Lacedæmonians, and then followed their ancient Countriemen into Italie and Sicilie; ſome of them went into Africa, where they choſe vnto themſelues a ſeate.

It is very ſtrange, that during two hundred and foure ſcore yeeres, this baniſhed Nation retained their name, their ancient cuſtomes, language, hatred of Sparta, & loue of their forſaken Countrie, with a deſire to returne vnto it. In the third yeere of the hundred and ſecond Olympiad, that great Epaminondas, hauing tamed the pride of the Lacedæmonians, reuoked the Meſſenians home, who came flocking out of all quarters, where they dwelt abroad, into Peloponneſus. There did Epanimondas reſtore vnto them their old poſſeſſion, and helpe them in building a faire Citie; which, by the name of the Prouince, was called Meſſene, and was held by them euer after, in deſpight of the Lacedæmonians, of whom they neuer from thenceforth ſtood in feare.

§ V.

Of the Kings that were in Lydia and Media, while Manaſſes reigned. Whether Deioces the Mede were that Arphaxad which is mentioned in the Booke of Iudith. Of the hiſtorie of Iudith.

ARdys King of Lydia, and Phraortes of the Medes, are ſpoken of by Pauſanias, as reigning ſhortly after the Meſſenian war. Ardys ſucceeding vnto his father Gyges, began his reigne of nine and fortie yeeres, in the ſecond of the fiue and twentieth Olympiad. He followed the ſteps of his father, who encroaching vpon the Ionians in Aſia, had taken Colophon by force, and attempted Miletus and Smyrna. In like manner Ardys wan Priene, and aſſailed Miletus; but went away without it. In his reigne, the Cimmerians, being expelled out of their owne Countrie by the Scythians, ouerran a great part of Aſia, which was not freed from them before the time of Alyattes this mans Grandchilde, by whom they were driuen out. They had not onely broken into Lydia, but wan the Citie of Sardes; though the Caſtle or Citadell thereof was defended againſt them, and held ſtill for King Ardys; whoſe long reigne was vnable, by reaſon of this great ſtorme, to effect much.

Phraortes was not King vntill the third yeere of the nine and twentieth Olympiad, which was ſix yeeres after the Meſſenian war ended; the ſame being the laſt yeere of Manaſſes his reigne ouer Iuda.

Deioces the father of this Phraortes, was King of Media, three and fiftie of theſe fiue and fiftie yeers in which Manaſſes reigned. This Deioces was the firſt that ruled the Medes in a ſtrict forme, commanding more abſolutely than his Predeceſſours had done. For they, following the example of Arbaces, had giuen to the people ſo much licence, as cauſed euery one to deſire the wholeſome ſeuerity of a more Lordly King. Herein Deioces anſwered their deſires to the full. For he cauſed them to build for him a ſtately Palace; he tooke vnto him a Guard, for defence of his perſon; he ſeldome gaue preſence, which alſo when he did, it was with ſuch auſterity, that no man durſt preſume to ſpit or cough in his ſight. By theſe and the like ceremonies he bred in the people an awfull regard, and highly vpheld the Maieſtie, which his Predeceſſours had almoſt letten fall, through neglect of due comportiments. In execution of his Royall Office, he did vprightly and ſeuerely adminiſter iuſtice, keeping ſecret ſpies to informe him of all that was done in the Kingdome. He cared not to enlarge the bounds of his Dominion, by encroaching vpon others; but ſtudied how to gouerne well his owne. The difference found betweene this King, and ſuch as were before him, ſeemes to haue bred that opinion which Herodotus deliuers, that Deioces was the firſt who reigned in Media.

Herod. lib. 1.

This was he that built the great City of Ecbatane, which now is called Tauris; and therefore he ſhould be that King Arphaxad, mentioned in the ſtorie of Iudith, as alſo Ben Merodach, by the ſame accompt, ſhould be Nabuchodonoſor the Aſſyrian, by whom Arphaxad was ſlaine, and Holophernes ſent to worke wonders vpon Phud and Lud, and I know not what other Countries. For I reckon the laſt yeere of Deioces to haue beene the nineteenth of Ben Merodach; though others place it otherwiſe, ſome earlier in the time of Merodach Baladach, ſome later, in the reigne of Nabulaſſar, who is alſo called Nabuchodonoſor.

In

In fitting this booke of Iudith to a certaine time, there hath much labour beene spent with ill successe. The reignes of Cambyses, Darius Hystaspis, Xerxes, and Ochus, haue beene sought into; but afford no great matter of likelihood: and now of late, the times, foregoing the destruction of Ierusalem, haue beene thought vpon, and this age that we haue in hand, chosen by Bellarmine, as agreeing best with the storie; though others herein cannot (I speake of such as faine would) agree with him. Whilest Cambyses reigned, the Temple was not rebuilt, which in the storie of Iudith, is found standing and dedicated. The other two Persian Kings, Darius and Xerxes are acknowledged to haue beene very fauourable to the Iewes; therefore neither of them could be Nabuchodonosor, whose part they refused to take, and who sent to destroy them. Yet the time of Xerxes hath some conueniences, aptly fitting this History; and aboue all, the opinion of a few Ancient writers (without whose iudgement the authority of this Booke were of no value) hauing placed this argument in the Persian Monarchie, inclines the matter to the Reigne of this vaine-glorious King. As for Ochus, very few, and they faintly, entitle him to the businesse. Manifest it is, and granted, that in the time of this Historie, there must be a returne from captiuitie lately foregoing; the Temple rebuilt; Ioacim High Priest; and a long peace, of threescore and ten yeeres or thereabout, ensuing. All these were to be among the Iewes. Likewise on the other side, we must finde a King that reigned in Niniue, eighteene yeeres at the least; that vanquished and slew a King of the Medes; one whom the Iewes refused to assist; one that sought to be generally adored as God, and that therefore commanded all temples, of such as were accounted gods, to be destroyed; one whose Viceroy or Captaine Generall knew not the Iewish Nation, but was faine to learne what they were of the bordering people.

Of all these circumstances; the Priesthood of Ioacim, with a returne from Captiuitie, are found concurring, with either the time of Manasses before the destruction of Ierusalem, or of Xerxes afterward: the rebuilding of the Temple a while before, and the long peace following, agree with the reigne of Xerxes; the rest of circumstances requisite, are to be found all together, neither before, nor after the Captiuitie of the Iewes, and desolation of the Citie. Wherefore the briefe decision of this controuersie is, That the Booke of Iudith is not Canonicall. Yet hath Torniellus done as much, in fitting all to the time of Xerxes, as was possible in so desperate a case. For he supposeth, that vnder Xerxes there were other Kings, among which Arphaxad might be one (who perhaps restored and re-edified the Citie of Ecbatane, that had formerly beene built by Deioces) and Nabuchodonosor might be another. This granted, he addes, that from the twelfth yeere to the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor, that is fiue or sixe yeeres, the absence and ill fortune of Xerxes, in his Gracian expedition (which he supposeth to haue beene so long) might giue occasion vnto Arphaxad, of rebelling: and that Nabuchodonosor hauing vanquished and slaine Arphaxad, might then seeke to make himselfe Lord of all, by the Armie which he sent forth vnder Holofernes. So should the Iewes haue done their duties, in adhering to Xerxes their Soueraigne Lord, and resisting one that rebelled against him; as also the other circumstances rehearsed before, be well applied to the argument. For in these times, the affaires of Iurie were agreeable to the Historie of Iudith, and such a King as this supposed Nabuchodonosor, might well enough be ignorant of the Iewes, and as proud as we shall neede to thinke him. But the silence of all Histories, takes away beliefe from this coniecture: and the supposition it selfe is very hard, that a rebell, whose King was abroad, with an Armie consisting of seuenteene hundred thousand men, should presume so farre, vpon the strength of twelue hundred thousand foot, and twelue thousand Archers on horsebacke, as to thinke that he might doe what he list, yea that there was none other God then himselfe. It is indeede easie to finde enough that might be said against this deuice of Torniellus: yet if there were any necessity, of holding the booke of Iudith, to be Canonicall, I would rather choose to lay aside all regard of prophane Histories, and build some defence vpon this ground; than, by following the opinion of any other, to violate, as they all doe, the text it selfe. That Iudith liued vnder none of the Persian Kings, Bellarmine (whose workes I haue not read, but finde him cited by Torniellus) hath proued by many arguments. That she liued not in the Reigne of Manasses, Torniellus hath proued very substantially, shewing how the Cardinall is driuen, as it were to breake through a wall, in saying that the text was corrupted, wherein it spake of the destruction of the Temple foregoing her time. That the Kings Arphaxad and Nabuchodonosor, chodonosor, found out by Torniellus, are the children of meere fantasie, it is so plaine that it needes no proofe at all. Wherefore we may truely say, that they, which haue contended about the time of this Historie, being well furnished of matter, wherewith to confute each other, but wanting wherewith to defend themselues (like naked men in a stonie field) haue chased Holofernes out of all parts of time, and left him and his great expedition, Extra anni solisque vias, in an age that neuer was, and in places that were neuer knowne.

Iudith c. 2. ver. 23. & 25. Surely, to finde out the borders of Iapheth, which were towards the South, and ouer against Arabia; or the Countries of Phud and Lud, that lay in Holofernes his way; I thinke it would as much trouble Cosmographers, as the former question hath done Chronologers. But I will not busie my selfe herewith; hauing already so farre digressed, in shewing who liued not with Manasses, that I thinke it high time, to returne vnto mine owne worke, and rehearse what others I finde, to haue had their part, in the long time of his Reigne.

§. VI.

Of other Princes and actions that were in these times.

THE first yeere of Manasses was the last of Romulus; after whose death, one yeere the Romanes wanted a King. Then was Numa Pompilius a Sabyne chosen; a peaceable man and seeming very religious in his kinde. He brought the rude people, which Romulus had employed onely in warres, to some good ciuilitie, and a more orderly fashion of life. This he effected by filling their heads with superstition; as perswading them, that he had familiaritie with a Nymph called Egeria, who taught him a many of Ceremonies, which he deliuered vnto the Romans as things of great importance. But all these deuices of Numa were, in his owne iudgement, no better then meere delusions that serued onely as rudiments to bring the sauage multitude of theeues and out-lawes, gathered into one body by Romulus, to some forme of milder discipline, then their boysterous and wilde natures was otherwise apt to entertaine. This appeared by the Bookes that were found in his graue, almost sixe hundred yeeres after his death, wherein the Superstition taught by himselfe was condemned as vaine. His graue was opened by chance, in digging a piece of ground that belonged to one L. Petilius a Scribe. Two Coffines or Chests of stone were in it, with an inscription in Greeke and Latine letters, which said, That Numa Pompilius the sonne of Pompo, King of the Romanes lay there. In the one Coffin was nothing found; his body being vtterly consumed. In the other were his Bookes, wrapped vp in two bundels of waxe; of his owne constitutions seuen, and other seauen of Philosophie. They were not onely vncorrupted, but in a manner fresh and new. The Pretour of the Citie desiring to haue a sight of these Books, when he perceiued whereunto they tended, refused to deliuer them backe to the owner, and offered to take a solemne oath that they were against the Religion then in vse. Hereupon the Senate, without more adoe, commanded them to be openly burnt. It seemes that Numa did meane to acquite himselfe vnto wiser ages, which he thought would follow, as one that had not beene so foolish as to beleeue the Doctrine wherein he instructed his owne barbarous times. But the poyson wherewith he had infected Rome, when hee sate in his Throne, had not left working, when he ministred the Antidote out of his graue. Had these Bookes not come to light, vntill the dayes of Tully and Cæsar, when the miste of ignorance was somewhat better discussed; likely it is that they had not onely escaped the fire, but wrought some good (and peraduenture generall) effect. Being as it was, they serued as a confutation, without remedy, of Idolatry that was inueterate.

Numa reigned three and fortie yeeres in continuall peace. After him Tullus Hostilius the third King was chosen, in the sixe and fortieth of Manasses, and reigned two and thirtie yeeres, busied, for the most part in warre. Hee quarrelled with the Albanes, who met him in the fielde; but in regard of the danger, which both parts had cause to feare, that might grow vnto them from the Thuscanes, caused them to bethinke themselues of a course, whereby without effusion of so much bloud, as might make them too weake for a common enemie, it might be decided, who should command, and who obey.

There

There were in each Campe three Brethren, Twins borne at one birth (Dionyſius ſayes that they were Coſen Germans) of equall yeeres and ſtrength, who were appointed to fight for their ſeuerall Countries. The end was, that the Horatij, Champions for the Romanes, got the victory, though two of them firſt loſt their liues. The three Curatij that fought for Alba (as Liuie tels it) were all aliue, and able to fight, yet wounded, when two of their oppoſites were ſlaine; but the third Horatius, pretending feare, did runne away, and thereby drew the others, who by reaſon of their hurts, could not follow him with equall ſpeed, to follow him at ſuch diſtance one from another, that returning vpon them, he ſlue them, as it had beene in ſingle fight, man after man, ere they could ioyne together and ſet vpon him all at once. Dionyſius reports it ſomewhat otherwiſe, telling very particularly, what wounds were giuen and taken, and ſaying, that firſt one of the Horatij was ſlaine, then one of the Curatij, then a ſecond Horatius, and laſtly the two Curatij, whom the third Horatius did cunningly ſeuer the one from the other, as is ſhewed before.

This is one of the moſt memorable things in the old Roman Hiſtorie, both in regard of the action it ſelfe, wherein Rome was laid, as it were in a wager, againſt Alba, and in reſpect of the great increaſe which thereby the Roman State obtained. For the Citie of Alba did immediately become ſubiect vnto her owne Colonie, and was ſhortly after, vpon ſome treacherous dealing of their Gouernour, vtterly razed, the people being remoued vnto Rome, where they were made Citizens. The ſtrong Nation of the Latines, whereof Alba, as the mother Citie, had beene chiefe, became ere long dependant vpon Rome, though not ſubiect vnto it, and diuers pettie States adiacent, were by little and little taken in: which additions, that were ſmall, yet many, I will forbeare to rehearſe (as being the works of ſundrie ages, and few of them remarkeable conſidered apart by themſelues) vntill ſuch time as this fourth Empire, that is now in the infancie, ſhall grow to be the maine ſubiect of this Hiſtorie.

The ſeuenth yeere of Hippomenes in Athens, was current with the firſt of Manaſſes. Alſo the three laſt Gouernours for ten yeeres, who followed Hippomenes, were in the ſame Kings time. Of theſe I finde only names, Leocrates, Abſander, and Erizias. After Erizias yeerely Rulers were elected.

Theſe Gouernours for ten yeeres, were alſo of the race of Medon and Codrus, but their time of rule was ſhortned, & from tearme of life reduced vnto ten yeres; it being thought likely that they would gouerne the better, when they knew that they were afterwards to liue priuate men vnder the command of others. I follow Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus, in applying their times vnto thoſe yeeres of the Olympiads, wherein the Chronologicall table, following this worke, doth ſet them. For he not onely profeſſeth himſelfe to haue taken great care in ordering the reckoning of times; but hath noted alwaies the yeeres of the Greeks, how they did anſwere vnto the things of Rome, throughout all the continuance of this Hiſtorie. Whereas therefore hee placeth the building of Rome, in the firſt yeere of the ſeuenth Olympiad, and affirmes, that the ſame was the firſt yeere of Charops gouernement in Athens; I hope I ſhall not need excuſe, for varying from Pauſanias, who ſets the beginning of theſe Athenians ſomewhat ſooner.

Dion. Halic. l. 1 fol. 43. & 45.

In the Reigne of Manaſſes it was, that Midas, whom the Poets fained to haue had Aſſes eares, held the Kingdome of Phrygia. Many fables were deuiſed of him; eſpecially that hee obtained of Bacchus, as a great gift, that all things which hee ſhould touch, might immediately be changed into Gold: by which meanes he had like to haue beene ſtarued (his meat and drinke being ſubiect to the ſame transformation) had not Bacchus deliuered him from this miſerable facultie, by cauſing him to waſh himſelfe in the Riuer Pactolus, the ſtreame whereof hath euer ſince, forſooth, abounded in that precious Metall. Finally, it is ſaid hee died by drinking Buls bloud; being inuaded by the Scythians.

In this age flouriſhed that Antimachus, who (ſaith Plutarch in the life of Romulus) obſerued the Moones Eclipſe at the foundation of Rome.

The Mileſians, or, (as Euſebius hath it) the Athenians hauing obtained ſome power by Sea, founded Macicratis a City on the Eaſt of Ægypt. Pſammiticus herein ſeemes to haue aſſiſted them, who vſed all meanes of drawing the Greekes into Ægypt, accounting them his ſureſt ſtrength. For neither Miletus nor Athens were now of power ſufficient to plant a Colonie in Ægypt by force.

About

Plut. & Eusb. About this time Archias with his companion Miscellus, and other Corinthians founded Syracusa in Sicily, a Citie in after-times exceeding famous.

*Whence in Strabo there is sinus Astacenus a part of Propontis where this Citie standeth. Paus. l. 5. Hal. l. 3. Strabo l. 6. The Citie of Nicomedia sometime* Astatus, was enlarged and beautified in this age by Zipartes natiue of Thrace. Sybilla of Samus, according to Pausanias, liued much about this time.

About these times also was Croton founded vpon the Bay of Tarentum by Miscellus, the companion of Archias that built Syracusa. Strabo makes it somewhat more ancient: and so doth Pausanias.

Iustin. l. 3. Paus. l. 10. About the same time the Parthenians being of age, and banished Lacedæmon, were conducted by Phalantus into Italie: where it is said they founded Tarentum: but Iustine and Pausanias finde it built before, and by them conquered and amplified: and about the same time Manasse yet liuing, the Citie Phaselis was founded in Pamphylia, Gela in Sicily, Interamne in the Region of the Vmbri, now Vrbin in Italie. About which time also Chalcedon in Asia, ouer against Byzantium (now Constantinople) was founded by the Megarenses: who therefore were vpbraided as blinde, because they chose not the other side of Bosphorus. It were a long worke to rehearse all that is said to haue beene done in the fiue and fiftie yeeres of Manasses: that which hath alreadie beene told is enough: the rest being not greatly worth remembrance, may well be omitted, reseruing only Ben Merodach, and Nabulassar, to the businesse that will shortly require more mention of them.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of the times from the death of Manasses to the destruction of Ierusalem.

Of Ammon and Iosias.

2. King 21. 2. Chron 33. Ammon the sonne of Manasse, a man no lesse wicked than was his Father before his conuersion, restored the exercise of all sorts of Idolatrie: for which God hardened the hearts of his owne seruants against him: who slew him after hee had reigned two yeeres. Philo, Eusebius, and Nicephorus giue him ten yeeres, following the Septuagint.

2 King. 22. 2 Chron 34. Iosias succeeded vnto Ammon, being but a child of 8. yeres olde, he began to seek after the God of Dauid his Father; and in his twelfth yere he purged Iuda and Ierusalem from the high places, and the groues, & the carued and molten Images: and they brake downe in his sight the Altars of Baalim: He caused all the Images as well those which were grauen, as molten, to be stampt to powder, and strewed on their graues that had erected them, and this he commanded to be done throughout all his Dominions. He also slew those that sacrificed to the Sunne and Moone, and caused the Chariots and Horses of the Sunne to be burnt. Of Iosias it was prophecied in the time of Ieroboam the first, when he erected the Golden Calfe at Bethel, that a childe should be borne vnto the house of Dauid, Iosias by name, and vpon thee (said the Prophet speaking to the Altar) shall he sacrifice the Priests of the high places, that burne incense vpon thee: a prophecy verie remarkable.

1. King. 13. In the eighteenth yeere of his reigne, hee rebuilt and repaired the Temple, at which time Helkiah the Priest found the Booke of Moses, called Deuteronomy, or, of the Law, which he sent to the King: which when he had caused to be read before him, and considered of the seuere commandements therein written, the prosperitie promised to those that obserue them, and the sorrow and extirpation to the rest, he rent his garments, and commanded Helkiah, and others, to aske counsell of the Prophetesse Huldah, or, Olda, concerning the Book, who answered the messengers in these words: Thus saith the Lord, Behold, I will bring euill vpon this place, and vpon the inhabitants thereof, euen all the curses that are written in the Booke, which they haue read before the King of Iuda, because they haue

2. Chro. 34. 24. forsaken forſaken mee, and burnt incenſe to other gods. Onely for the King himſelfe, becauſe he was a louer of God and his Lawes, it was promiſed that this euill ſhould not fall on Iuda and Ieruſalem in his dayes, but that he himſelfe ſhould inherit his graue in peace. 2. King 22. 15. 2. Chron. 34.

Ioſias aſſembled the Elders, cauſed the Booke to be read vnto them, made a couenant with the Lord, and cauſed all that were found in Ieruſalem and Beniamin to doe the like, promiſing thereby to obſerue the Lawes and commandements in the Booke contained.

The execution done by Ioſias vpon the Altar, idols, monuments, and bones of the falſe Prophets, at Bethel, argueth his Dominion to haue extended vnto thoſe Countries, that had beene part of the Kingdome of the ten Tribes. Yet I doe not thinke, that any victorie of Ioſias in warre got poſſeſſion of theſe places; but rather that Ezekias, after the flight and death of Senacherib, when Merodach oppoſed himſelfe againſt Aſarhaddon, did vſe the aduantage which the faction in the North preſented vnto him, and laid hold vpon ſo much of the Kingdome of Iſrael, as he was able to people. Otherwiſe alſo it is not improbable, that the Babylonian finding himſelfe vnable to deale with Pſammiticus in Syria (as wanting power to raiſe the ſiege of Azotus, though the Towne held out nine and twenty yeeres) did giue vnto Manaſſes, together with his libertie, as much in Iſrael as himſelfe could not eaſily defend. This was a good way to breake the amitie that the Kings of Iuda had ſo long held with thoſe of Ægypt, by caſting a bone betweene them, and withall by this benefit of enlarging their Territoris with addition of more than they could challenge, to redeeme the friendſhip of the Iewes, which had beene loſt by iniuries done, in ſeeking to bereaue them of their owne. When it is ſaid, that Manaſſes did after his deliuerance from impriſonment, put Captaines of warre in all the ſtrong Cities of Iuda; it may be that ſome ſuch buſineſſe is intimated, as the taking poſſeſſion, and fortifying of places deliuered into his hands. For though it be manifeſt that he tooke much paines, in making Ieruſalem it ſelfe more defenſible; yet I ſhould rather beleeue, that hee, hauing already compounded with the Babylonian, did fortifie himſelfe againſt the Ægyptians, whoſe ſide he had forſaken, than that he trauelled in making ſuch prouiſions, only for his mindes ſake. The earneſtneſſe of Ioſias in the King of Babel his quarrell, doth argue, that the compoſition which Manaſſes had made, with that King or his Anceſtor, was vpon ſuch friendly tearmes, as required not onely a faithfull obſeruation, but a thankefull requitall. For no perſwaſions could ſuffice to make Ioſias ſit ſtill, and hold himſelfe quiet in good neutralitie, when Pharao Neco King of Ægypt paſſed along by him, to warre vpon the Countries about the Riuer of Euphrates. 2. Chro. 33. 14.

The laſt yeere of Ioſias his reigne it was, when as Neco the ſonne of Pſammiticus, came with a powerfull Armie towards the border of Iudea, determining to paſſe that way, being the neereſt toward Euphrates, eyther to ſtrengthen the paſſages of that Riuer, about Carchemiſh, or Cercuſium, for the defence of Syria (as long after this, Dioclesian is ſaid by Ammianus Marcellinus to haue done,) or perhaps to inuade Syria it ſelfe. For it ſeemeth that the truauaile of Pſammiticus had not beene idlely conſumed about that one Towne of Azotus, but had put the Ægyptians in poſſeſſion of no ſmall part of Syria, eſpecially in thoſe quarters, that had formerly belonged vnto the Adades Kings of Damaſco. 2. Chro. 35. 20.

Neither was the induſtrie of Neco leſſe than his Fathers had beene, in purſuing the warre againſt Babel. In which war, two things may greatly haue auailed the Ægyptians, and aduanced their affaires and hopes: the extraordinarie valor of the mercenary Greeks, that were far better Souldiers than Ægypt of it ſelfe could afford; and the danger wherein Aſſyria ſtood, by the force of the Medes, which vnder the command of more abſolute Princes, began to feele it ſelfe better; and to ſhew what it could doe. Theſe were great helpes, but of ſhorter endurance than was the warre; as in place more conuenient ſhall be noted. At the preſent it ſeemes, that either ſome preparation of the Chaldæans to reconquer, did enforce, or ſome diſabilitie of theirs to make reſiſtance, did inuite the King of Ægypt, into the Countries bordering vpon Euphrates; whither Pharao Neco aſcended with a mighty Armie.

Theſe two great Monarchs, hauing their ſwords drawne, and contending for the Empire of that part of the World, Ioſias aduiſed with himſelfe to which of theſe hee might adhere, hauing his Territorie ſet in the mid-way betweene both, ſo as the one could not inuade the other; but that they muſt of neceſſitie tread vpon the very face and bodie of his Countrie; Now though it were ſo that Neco himſelfe deſired by his Embaſſadors,

2. Chron. 35. leaue to passe along by Iudæa, protesting that hee directed himselfe against the Assyrians onely, without all harmefull purpose against Iosias; yet all sufficed not, but the King of Israel would needs fight with him.

Many examples there were, which taught, what little good the friendship of Ægypt could bring to those that had affiance therein: as that of Hosea the last King of Israel, who when he fell from the dependance of the Assyrian, and wholly trusted to Sabacus or Sous King of Ægypt, was vtterly disappointed of his hopes, and in conclusion lost both his life and estate, which the Assyrian, so rooted vp and tare in pieces, as it could neuer after be gathered together or replanted. The calamities also that fell vpon Iuda in the thirteenth and fourteenth yeeres of Ezekia, whilest that good King and his people relied vpon Sethon; and more lately, the imprisonment of Manasses, were documents of sufficient proofe, to shew the ill assurance, that was in the help of the Ægyptians, who (neere neighbors though they were) were alwaies vnready, when the necessities of their friends required their assistance. The remembrance hereof might bee the reason why Neco did not seeke, to haue the Iewes renew their ancient league with him, but onely craued that they would be contented to sit still, and behold the pastime betweene him and the Assyrians. This was an easie thing to grant; seeing that the countenance of such an Armie, as did, soone after this, out-face Nabulassar vpon his owne borders, left vnto the Iewes, a lawfull excuse of feare, had they forborne to giue it any checke vpon the way. Wherefore I beleeue, that this religious and vertuous Prince Iosias, was not stirred vp onely by politike respects, to stop the way of Neco; but thought himselfe bound in faith & honor, to doe his best in defence of the Babylonian Crowne; whereunto his Kingdome was obliged, either by couenant made at the enlargement of Manasses, or by the gift of such part as he held in the Kingdome of the ten Tribes. As for the Princes and people of Iuda, they had now a good occasion to shew, both vnto the Babylonians, of what importance their friendship was, and to the Ægyptians what a valiant Nation they had abandoned, and thereby made their enemie.

Some thinke, that this action of Iosias, was contrarie to the aduice of Ieremie the Prophet; which I doe not finde in the Prophecie of Ieremie, nor can finde reason to beleeue. Others hold opinion, that he forgat to aske the counsell of God: and this is very likelie; seeing hee might beleeue that an enterprize grounded vpon fidelitie and thankefulnesse due to the King of Babel, could not but be displeasing vnto the Lord. But the wickednes of the people (in whom the corruptions of former times had taken such roote, as all the care of Iosias in reforming the Land, could not plucke vp) was questionlesse farre from harkening how the matter would stand with Gods pleasure, and much farther from enquiring into his secret will, wherein it was determined, that their good King, whose life stood betweene them and their punishment, should now be taken from among them, and that in such sort, as his death should giue an enterance to the miseries ensuing. So Iosias leauying all the strength he could make, neere vnto Megiddo, in the halfe Tribe of Manasses, encountered Necho: and there hee receiued the stroake of death, which lingring about him till hee came to Ierusalem, brought him to the Sepulchers of his Anteſtors. His losse was greatly bewailed of all the people and Princes of Iuda, especially of Ieremie the Prophet: who inserted a sorrowfull remembrance thereof in his booke of Lamentations.

Lam. 4. v. 20.

§. II.

Of Pharao Neco that fought with Iosias: Of Iehoahaz and Iehoiakim Kings of Israel.

OF these warres, and particularly of this victorie, Herodotus hath mention, among the acts of Neco. He tels vs of this King, that he went about to make a channell, whereby Ships might passe, out of Nilus into the Red sea. It should haue reached aboue an hundred miles in length, and beene wide enough for two Gallies to row in front. But in the middest of the worke, an Oracle foretold that the Barbarians should haue the benefit of it, which caused Neco to desist when halfe was done. There were consumed in this toylesome businesse twelue hundred thousand Ægyptians; a losse great enough to make the King forsake his enterprize, without troubling the Oracle for admonition. Howsoeuer it were, he was not a man to be idle; therefore hee built a Fleet, and and leauied a great Armie, wherewith he marched against the King of Babel. In this expedition he vsed the seruice, as well of his Nauie, as of his land-forces; but no particular exploits of his therein, are found recorded, saue onely this victorie against Iosias, where Herodotus calls the place Magdolus, and the Iewes Syrians; which is a small error, seeing that Iudæa was a Prouince of Syria, and Magdolus or Magdala is taken to haue beene the same place (though diuersly named) in which this battell was fought. After this, Necus tooke the Citie of Cadytis, which was perhaps Carchemish, by Euphrates, and made himselfe Lord, in a manner, of all Syria, as Iosephus witnesseth. Ioseph. Ant. Iud. l. 10. cap. 7.

Particularly we finde, that the Phœnicians, one of the most powerfull Nations in Syria, were his Subiects, and that by his command they surrounded all Africa, setting saile from the gulfe of Arabia, and so passing along all the Coast, whereon they both landed, as need required, and sowed corne for their sustenance; in that long voyage which lasted three yeeres. This was the first Nauigation about Africa, wherein that great Cape, now called Of good hope, was discouered; which after was forgotten, vntill Vasco de Gama the Portingall found it out, following a contrarie course to that which the Phœnicians held; for they, beginning in the East, ranne the way of the Sunne, South and then Westward, after which they returned home by the pillars & streights of Hercules (as the name was then) called now the streights of Gybraltar, hauing Africke still on the right hand: but the Portingals, beginning their voyage not farre from the same streights, leaue Africke on the Larboord, and bend their course vnto the East. That report of the Phœnicians, which Herodotus durst not beleeue, how the Sun in this iournie was on their right hand, that is, on the North side of them, is a matter of necessarie truth; and the obseruation then made hereof, makes me the better to beleeue, that such a Voyage was indeed performed. Herod. l. 4.

But leauing these discourses of Neco his magnificence, let vs tell what he did, in matters more importing his Estate. The people of Iuda, while the Ægyptians were busie at Carchemish, had made Iehoahaz their King, in the roome of his father Iosias. The Prophet Ieremie calls this new King Shallum, by the name of his younger brother; alluding perhaps to the short Reigne of Shallum King of the tenne Tribes: for Shallum of Israel reigned but one moneth; Iehoahaz no more than three. He was not the eldest son of Iosias: Wherefore it may seeme that he was set vp as the best affected vnto the King of Babel; the rest of his house being more inclined to the Ægyptian, as appeares by the sequele. An Idolater he was, and thriued accordingly. For when as Neco had dispatched his businesse in the North parts of Syria, then did he take order for the affaires of Iudæa. This Countrie was now so farre from making any resistance, that the King himselfe came from Riblah in the Land of Hamath, where the matter wen so ill on his side, that Neco did cast him into bonds, and carry him prisoner into Ægypt, giuing away his Kingdome to Eliakim his elder brother, to whom of right it did belong. The Citie of Riblath, in after times called Antiochia, was a place vnhappie to the Kings and Princes of Iuda, as may bee obserued in diuers examples. Yet heere Iehoiakim, together with his new name, got his Kingdome; an ill gaine, since hee could no better vse it. But how-euer Iehoiakim thriued by the bargaine, Pharao sped well, making that Kingdome Tributarie, without any stroke stricken, which three moneths before was too stout to giue him peace, when hee desired it. Certaine it is, that in his march outward, Neco had a greater taske lying vpon his hands, than would permit him to waste his forces vpon Iudæa: but now the reputation of his good successe at Megiddo, and Carchemish, together with the dissention of the Princes Iosias his sonnes (of whom the eldest is probably thought to haue stormed at the preferment of his yonger brother) gaue him power to doe, euen what should please himselfe. Yet he did forbeare to make a conquest of the Land; perhaps vpon the same reason, which had made him so earnest, in seeking to hold peace with it. For the Iewes had suffered much, in the Ægyptians quarrell, and being left by these their friends, in time of need, vnto all extremities, were driuen of necessitie to forsake that partie, and to ioyne with the enemies; to whom if they shewed themselues faithfull, who could blame them? It was therefore enough to reclaime them; seeing they were such a people as would not vpon euery occasion shift side, but endure more, than Pharao, in the pride of his victories, thought that any henceforth should lay vpon them: so good a Patron did he meane to be vnto them. Neuertheless hee laid vpon them a Tribute, of an hundred Talents of siluer, and one Talent of gold; that so hee might both reape at the present, some fruit of his paines taken, and leaue vnto them some document in the future, of Ier. c. 22. v. 32. 2. Kin. c. 34. v. 32.

greater puniſhment than verball anger, due to them, if they ſhould rebell. So he departed, carrying along with him into Ægypt the vnfortunate King Iehoahaz, who died in his Captiuitie.

The reigne of Iehoahaz was included in the end of his Fathers laſt yeere; otherwiſe it would hardly be found, that Iehoiakim, his ſucceſſour, did reigne tenne whole yeeres; whereas the Scriptures giue him eleuen, that are current and incomplete. If any man will rather caſt the three moneths of this ſhort reigne, into the firſt yeere of the brother, than into the fathers laſt; the ſame arguments that ſhall maintaine his opinion, will alſo proue the matter to be vnworthy of diſputation; and ſo I leaue it.

Iehoiakim in impietie was like his brother, in faction hee was altogether Ægyptian, as to 10 hauing receiued his Crowne at the hand of Pharao. The wickednesſe of theſe laſt Kings, being expreſſed in Scriptures none otherwiſe, than by generall words, with reference to all the euill that their Fathers had done; makes it apparent, that the poyſon wherewith Ahaz and Manaſſes had infected the Land, was not ſo expelled by the zealous goodneſſe 2. Chron. cap. 36 verſe 14. of Ioſias, but that it ſtill cleaued vnto the chiefe of the people, Yea vnto the Prieſts alſo; and therefore it was not ſtrange, that the Kings had their part therein. The Royall authoritie was much abaſed by the dangers wherein the Countrie ſtood, in this troubleſome age: the Princes did in a manner what they liſted; neither would the Kings forbeare to profeſſe, that they could denie them nothing. Yet the beginning of Iehoiakim had the countenance of the Ægyptian to grace it, which made him inſolent and cruell; 20 as wee finde by that example of his dealing with Vria the Prophet: though heereinalſo the Princes doe appeare to haue beene inſtigators. This Holy man denounced Gods iudgements againſt the Citie and Temple, in like ſort as other Prophets had formerlie done, and did in the ſame age. The King with all the men of power, and all the Princes, hearing of this, determined to put him to death. Heereupon the poore man fled into Ægypt: but ſuch regard was had vnto Iehoiakim, that Vria was deliuered vnto his Embaſſadour, and ſent backe to the death; contrarie to the cuſtome vſed, both in thoſe dayes, and ſince among all ciuill Nations, of giuing refuge vnto ſtrangers, that are not held guiltie of ſuch inhumane crimes, as for the generall good of mankinde ſhould be exempted from all priuiledge. 30

It concerned Pharao to giue all contentment poſſible to Iehoiakim: for the Aſſyrian Lyon, that had not ſtirred in many yeeres, began about theſe times, to roare ſo lowd vpon the bankes of Euphrates, that his voyce was heard vnto Nilus, threatning to make himſelfe Lord of all the Forreſt. The cauſes that hitherto had withdrawne the houſe of Merodach, from oppoſing the Ægyptian in his conqueſt of Syria, require our conſideration in this place; before wee proceed to commit them together at Charchemiſh, where ſhortly after this, the glory of Ægypt is to fall. 40

§. III.

Of the Kings of Babylon and Media. How it came to paſſe that the Kings of Babel could not giue attendance on their buſineſſe in Syria; which cauſed them to loſe that Prouince.

MErodach the ſonne of Baladan, who taking the aduantage that Sennacheribs miſaduenture and death, together with the diſſenſion betweene his children preſented, made himſelfe King of Babylon, was eleuen yeeres troubled with a powerfull Enemie Aſarhaddon the ſonne of Sennacherib, reigning ouer the Aſſyrians in Niniue; from whom whileſt hee could not any other way diuert his cares, hee was faine to omit all buſineſſe in Syria, and (as hath beene formerly ſhewed) to make ouer vnto Ezekia, ſome part of the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes. From this moleſtation, the death of Aſarhaddon did not onely ſet him free, but gaue vnto him ſome part of Aſſyria, if not (as is commonly, but leſſe probably thought) the whole Kingdome. How greatly this was to the liking of the Aſſyrians, I will not heere ſtand to enquire: his long reigne following, and his little intermedling in matters of Syria, make it plaine, that he had work enough at home, either in defending or in eſtabliſhing that which hee had gotten. Ioſephus giues him the honour of hauing wonne Niniue it ſelfe; which wee may beleeue; but ſurely hee did not hold it long. For in the times ſoone following, that great Citie was free, and vanquiſhed Phraortes the Median. Perhaps it yeelded vpon ſome capitulation:

and refused afterwards to continue subiect, when the Kings being of the Chaldean race, preferred Babylon before it.

Some thinke that this was the Assyrian King, whose Captaines tooke Manasses prisoner; but I rather beleeue those that hold the contrarie; for which I haue giuen my reasons in due place. To say truth, I finde little cause why Merodach should haue looked into those parts, as long as the Iewes were his friends, and the Ægyptians, that maligned the Northerne Empire, held themselues quiet at home, which was vntill the time of Psammiticus, about the end of this Kings Reigne, or the beginning of his sonne.

Ben Merodach the son and successour of this King, is not mentioned in the Scriptures; yet is he named by good consent of Authors, and that speake little of his doings. The length of his Reigne is gathered by inference to haue beene one and twentie yeeres, for so much remaineth of the time that passed betweene the beginning of his Fathers and his Nephewes Reignes (which is a knowne summe) deducting the yeeres of his Father, and of his sonne Nabulassar. This (as I take it) was he that had Manasses Prisoner and released him. Hee speddc ill in Syria; where Psammiticus, by the vertue of his Mercenarie Greekes, did much preuaile. This may haue beene some cause that he released Manasses, and did put into his hands some part more of the Kingdome of Samaria: which is made probable by circumstances alleaged before.

Nabulassar that reigned in Babylon after his Father Ben Merodach, had greater businesse in his owne Kingdome, than would permit him to looke abroad: insomuch as it may be thought to haue beene a great negligence or ouer-sight of Psammiticus and Neco, that they did not occupie some good part of his Dominions beyond Euphrates. For it was in his time, that Phraortes King of the Medes inuaded Assyria, and besieged Ninive; from whence he was not repelled by any force of Nabulassar, but constrained to remoone by the comming of Scythians, who in these ages did ouer-flow those parts of the World, laying hold vpon all, that they could master by strong hand. Of these Scythians, and the Lordship that they held in Asia, it is cõuenient that I speake in this place; shewing briefly afore-hand, how the Medes, vpon whom they first fell, were busied in the same times with hopes of conquering Assyria.

Pharaortes, the sonne of Deioces, King of the Medes, hauing by many victories enlarged his Dominions, conceiued at length a faire possibilitie of making himselfe Lord of Ninive.

That Citie (as Herodotus reports it) hauing been a Soueraigne Ladie, was not forsaken of all her dependants; yet remained in such case, that of her selfe she was well enough. Herod. lib. 1.

This makes it plaine, that howsoeuer Merodach had gotten possession of this imperiall seat, and made it subiect as was the rest of the Countrie; yet it found the meanes to set it selfe at libertie: as after this againe he did, when it had beene regained by Nabulassar his Grand-childe.

Sharpe warre, and the very noueltie of suddaine violence, vse to dismay any State or Countrie, not inured to the like: but custome of danger hardeneth euen those that are vnwarlike. Ninive had beene the Palace of many valiant Kings lately reigning therein; it had suffered, and resisted, all the furie, wherewith either Domesticall tumults betweene the sonnes of Senacherib, or forreign warre of the Babylonians, could afflict it: and therefore it is the lesse wonderfull, that Phraortes did speed so ill in his iourney against it. Hee and the most of his Armie perished in that expedition: whereof I finde no particular circumstances (perhaps he vnderualued their forces, and brought a lesse power than was needfull.) It is enough, that herein we may beleeue Herodotus.

Cyaxares the sonne of Phraortes, a brauer man of warre than his Father, wan as much of Asia the lesse, as lay Eastward, from the Riuer of Halys; he sought reuenge vpon the Assyrians for the death of his Father, and besieged Ninive it selfe, hauing a purpose to destroy it. I rather beleeue Eusebius, That hee tooke the Citie, and fulfilled his displeasure vpon it, than Herodotus, That the Scythian Armie came vpon him whilest hee lay before it. For where equall authorities are contradictorie (as Eusebius, though far later then Herodotus, yet hauing seen other Authors that are now lost, it is to be valued according to his great reading) there doe I hold it best, to yeeld vnto the best likelihoods.

To thinke that the Scythians came vpon Cyaxares, whilest he lay before Ninive, were to accuse him of greater improuidence, than ought to bee suspected in one commended as a good Souldier. But to suppose that he was faine to leaue the Towne, when a Warre ſo dangerous fell vpon his owne Countrie, doth well agree both with the condition of ſuch buſineſſe as that Scythian expedition brought into thoſe parts, and with the State of the Chaldaan and Aſſyrian affaires enſuing.

The deſtruction of this great Citie is both foretold in the Booke of Tobit, and there ſet downe as happening about theſe times; of which Booke whoſoeuer was the Author, he was ancient enough to know the Storie of thoſe ages, and hath committed no ſuch errour in reckoning of times, as ſhould cauſe vs to diſtruſt him in this. As for the Propheſie of Nahum, though it be not limited vnto any certaine tearme, yet it appeares to haue taken effect, in the finall deſtruction of Niniue by Nabuchodonoſor, according to the common opinion. For the Prophet hath mention of a Conqueſt of Ægypt, foregoing this calamitie, whereof we will ſpeake in due place. Some that aſcribe more authoritie then the reformed Churches yeeld, to the Booke of Tobit, are carefull, as in a matter of neceſſitie, to affirme, that about theſe times, Niniue was taken; but they attribute (coniecturally) the victorie ouer it, to Ben Merodach: a needleſſe coniecture, if the place of Euſebius be well conſidered. Yet I hold it probable, that Nabulaſſar the ſon of Ben Merodach, did ſeize vpon it, and place a King or Viceroy therein, about ſuch time as the Countrie of Aſſyria was abandoned by Cyaxares, when the Scythian Warre ouer-whelmed Media. For then was the Conqueſt wrought out readie to his hand; the ſwelling ſpirits of the Niniuites were allayed, and their malice to Babylon ſo much aſſwaged, that it might be thought a great fauour, if Nabulaſſar, appointing vnto them a peculiar King, tooke him and them into protection: though afterwards to their confuſion, this vnthankfull people and their King, rebelled againe, as ſhall be ſhewed in the Reigne of Nabuchodonoſor.

§. IIII.

The great expedition of the Scythians, who ruled in Aſia eight and twentie yeeres.

†. I.

The time of this expedition.

NOW that I haue ſhewed what impediment was giuen by the Aſſyrians and the Medes, to the Babylonians, who thereby were much diſabled to performe any action of worth vpon the Ægyptians in Syria; it is time that I ſpeake of that great Scythian expedition, which grieuouſly afflicted not onely the Babylonians, but the Medes and Lydians, with the Countries adiacent, in ſuch wiſe, that part of the trouble redounded euen to the Ægyptians themſelues. Of the Scythian people in generall, Herodotus makes very large diſcourſe, but interlaced, as of matter ill knowne, with many Fables; of this expedition he tels many particulars, but ill agreeing, with conſent of time. Concerning his fabulous reports, it will be needleſſe to recite them, for they are farre enough diſtant from the buſineſſe in hand. The computation of times which by inference out of his relations, may ſeeme very ſtrange, needeth ſome anſwer in this place: leſt otherwiſe I ſhould eyther ſeeme to make my ſelfe too bold with an Authour, in citing him after a manner different from his owne tale; or elſe to be too forgetfull of my ſelfe, in bringing to act vpon the Stage, thoſe perſons, which I had already buried. Eight and twentie yeeres, he ſaith, that the Scythians reigned in Aſia, before Cyaxares deliuered the Countrie from them. Yet hee reports a warre betweene Cyaxares and Halyattes the Lydian, as foregoing the ſiege of Niniue; the ſiege of Niniue being ere the Scythians came. And further he tels, how the Scythians, hauing vanquiſhed the Medes, did paſſe into Syria, and were encountred in Paleſtina by Pſammiticus King of Ægypt, who by gifts and entreatie procured them to depart from him. Theſe narrations of Herodotus may, euery one of them, be true; though not in ſuch order of time, as hee hath marſhalled them. For Pſammiticus was dead before Cyaxares began to reigne: and Cyaxares had ſpent halfe of his fortie yeeres, ere Halyattes was King of Lydia; ſo that hee could not, after thoſe Lydian Warres, reigne eight and twenty yeeres together with the Scythians. It is true, that Euſebius doth alſo call Pſammis the ſonne of Pharao Necco, by the name of Pſammiticus; and this King Pſammis may, by ſome ſtrained coniecture, be thought to haue beene he that met with the Scythians: for hee liued

with

with both Cyaxares and Halyattes. But Eusebius himselfe referres all that businesse of the Scythian irruption into Palæstina, to Psammiticus the Father of Necho, whom hee leaues dead before the Reigne of Halyattes. Therefore I dare not relye vpon Herodotus, in this matter, otherwise than to beleeue him, that such things were in these ages, though not in such order as he sets them downe.

It remaines, that I collect as well as I can, those memorials which I finde of this expedition scattered in diuers places: a worke necessarie, for that the greatnesse of this action was such, as ought not to be omitted in a generall Historie; yet not easie, the consent of those that haue written thereof, being nothing neere to vniformitie.

I haue noted before, that in the Reigne of Ardis King of Lydia, the Cimmerians ouerranne that Kingdome, and were not expelled, vntill Halyattes the Nephew of Ardys got the vpper hand of them. In these times therefore of Ardis, Sadiattes, and Halyattes, are we to finde the eight and twentie yeeres, wherein the Scythians reigned ouer Asia. Now forasmuch as Psammiticus the Ægyptian had some dealings with the Scythians, euen in the height of their prosperitie, wee must needs allow more than one or two of his last yeeres vnto this their Dominion. But the beginning of Halyattes his Reigne in Lydia, being three and twentie yeeres compleat after the death of Psammiticus, leaues the space very scant, eyther for the great victories of the Scythians, necessarily supposed before they could meete the Ægyptian in Syria, or for those many losses, which they must haue receiued ere they could be driuen quite away. To increase this difficultie, the victorious Reigne of Nabuchodonosor in Babylon, is of no small moment. For how may we thinke it possible, that hee should haue aduentured the strength of his Kingdome against the Ægyptians and Iewes, had he stood in daily feare of losing his owne; to a more mighty Nation, that lay vpon his necke? To speake simply as it appeares to me; the victories ascribed to Cyaxares and Halyattes ouer these warlike people, were not obtained against the whole body of their Armie, but were the defeatures of some troopes, that infested their seuerall Kingdomes; other Princes, and among these, Nabulassar hauing the like successe, when the pleasures of Asia had mollified the courages of these hardie Northerne Laddes. Wherefore we may probably annexe the eight and twentie yeres of the Scythians rule, to as many almost the last of Nabulassars Reigne, in compasse whereof their power was at the greatest. This is all that I can say of the time, wherein Asia suffered the violence of their oppressors.

†. II.

What Nations they were that brake into Asia; with the cause of their Iournie.

TOuching the expedition it selfe, Herodotus tells vs, that the Cimmerians being driuen out of their Countrie by the Scythians, inuaded and wasted some part of Asia; and that the Scythians not contented with hauing wonne the land of the Cimmerians, did follow them, I know not why, into farre remoued quarters of the world, so (as it were by chance) falling vpon Media and Ægypt, in this pursuit of men that were gone another way into Lydia. Heereby wee may gather that the Cimmerians were an odious and base people; the Scythians, as mischieuous and fooliſh; or else Herodotus, and some other of his Countrimen, great slanderers of those, by whom their Nation had beene beaten, and Ionia, more than once, grieuously ransackt. The great valour of the Cimmerians or Cimbrians is so well knowne, and their many Conquests so well testified in Histories of diuers Nations, that the malice of the Greekes is insufficient to staine them with the note of Cowards. These were the posteritie of Gomer, who peopled the greatest part of our Westerne World, and whose re-flow did ouerwhelm no small portion of Greece and Asia, as well before and after, as in the age whereof we doe now entreat. Hee that would more largely informe himselfe of their originall and actions, may peruse Goropius Becanus his Amazonica; of many things in which Booke, that may be verified, which the learned Ortelius is said to haue spoken, of all Goropius his workes, that it is easie to laugh at them, but hard to confute them: There wee finde it prooued, by such arguments and authorities, as are not lightly to be regarded, that the Cimmerians, Scythians and Sarmatians, were all of one Linage and Nation; how soeuer distinguished in name, by reason of their diuers Tribes, professions, or perhaps dialect of speech. Homer indeed hath mention of the Cimmerians; whose Countrie whether he placeth in the West, as neere vnto the Ocean and bounds of the Earth, or in the North, as being farre from the Sunne, and couered with eternall darkneſſe; certaine it is that he would haue them neere neighbours to Hell: for he had the ſame quarrell to them, which Herodotus had; and therefore belike would haue made them ſeeme a kinde of Goblins. It was the manner of this great Poet (as Herodotus writing his life affirmes) to inſert into his workes the names of ſuch as liued in his owne time, making ſuch mention of them, as the good or ill done by them to himſelfe deſerued. And for this reaſon it is proued by Euſtathius, that the Cimmerians were ſo diſgraced by him, becauſe they had waſted his Countrie. Perhaps that inuaſion of Phrygia by the Amazons, whereof Homer puts a remembrance into Priamus his diſcourſe with Helen, was the very ſame, which Euſebius noteth to haue happened ſomewhat before the age of Homer, at what time the Cimmerians with the Amazons, together inuaded Aſia.

This is certaine, that both the Amazons and the Cimmerij (who in after-times were called Cimbri) did often breake into Greece and Aſia; which though it bee not in expreſſe tearmes written, that they did with ioynt-forces, yet ſeeing they inuaded the ſelfe-ſame places, it may well be gathered, that they were companions. One iourney of the Amazons into Greece, mentioned alſo by Euſebius, was by the ſtreights of the Cimmerians, as we finde in Diodore, who further telleth vs, that the Scythians therein gaue them aſ-Diod. lib. 4. c. 2. Diod. lib. 2. c. 11. ſiſtance. The ſame Authour, before his entrie into thoſe diſcourſes of the Amazons, which himſelfe acknowledgeth to be fabulous, doth report them to haue beene wiues of the Scythians, and no leſſe Warre-like than their Husbands; alleadging the example of that Queene who is ſaid to haue ſlaine the great Perſian Cyrus. That it was the manner of the Cimbri to carry their wiues along with them to the Warres; and how deſperate the courage was of thoſe Women; the terrible deſcent of them into Italie, when Marius the Roman ouerthrew them, giues proofe ſufficient. I will not heere enter into a diſcourſe of the Amazons; another place will giue mee better leiſure to ſpeake of them: but ſeeing that they are noted by diuers Hiſtorians to haue belonged vnto the Cimmerians, to the Scythians, and to the Sarmatians, we may therefore the better approue Goropius his concluſion, That theſe three Nations were one, at leaſt that they were neere allies.

Now as concerning the expulſion of the Cimmerians by the Scythians, it appeares to haue beene none other than the ſending a Colonie of them foorth into Aſia, with an Armie of Scythians to helpe them, in purchaſing a new ſeate, and eſtabliſhing the plantation.

The Sarmatians alſo were companions in this iournie. For the Citie of Nouograd in Ruſſia (which Countrie is the ſame that was called Sarmatia) ſtood in their way homewards, as ſhall anon be further ſhewed. So that all the North was vp in Armes: and therefore it is no maruell though many Countries felt the weight of this great inundation. Such another voyage was that, which the ſame people made fiue hundred yeres and more after this, when they were encountred by the Romans. For they iſſued from Plutarch in the life of Marius. the parts about the Lake Maotis; they were then likewiſe aſſiſted (ſaith Plutarch in the moſt likely report of them) by the Scythians their neighbours; they had in their Armie aboue three hundred thouſand fighting men, beſides a huge multitude of women and children; they wandered ouer many Countries, beating all downe before them; and finally, thinking to haue ſetled themſelues in Italie, they diuided their Companie, for the more eaſie paſſage thither, and were conſumed in three terrible battailes by the Roman Conſuls. Meere neceſſitie enforced theſe poore Nations, to trouble the World, in following ſuch hard aduentures. For their Countrie, beeing more fruitfull of men than of ſuſtenance, and ſhut vp on the North ſide with intollerable cold, which denied iſſue that way to their ouer-ſwelling multitudes; they were compelled to diſcharge vpon the South, and by right or wrong to driue others out of poſſeſſion, as hauing title to all that they had power to get, becauſe they wanted all, that weaker, but more ciuill, people had. Their ſturdie bodies, patient of hunger, cold, and all hardneſſe, gaue them great aduantage ouer ſuch as were accuſtomed vnto a more delicate life, and could not bee without a thouſand ſuperfluities. Wherefore moſt commonly they preuailed verie farre; their next neighbours giuing them free paſſage, that they might the ſooner be ridde of them; others giuing them, beſides paſſage, victuals and guides to conduct them to more wealthie places; others hiring them to depart with great preſents; ſo as the farther they went on, the more pleaſant Lands they found, and the more effeminate people.

†. III.

Of the Cimmerians warre in Lydia.

THe firſt Companie of theſe, conſiſting for the moſt part of Cimmerians, held the way of the Euxine Seas, which they had ſtill on the right hand; leauing on the other ſide, and behinde them, the great Mountaines of Caucaſus. Theſe hauing paſſed through the Land of Cholchis, that is now called Mengrelli, entered the Countrie of Pontus, and being arriued in Paphlagonia, fortified the Promontorie whereon Sinope, a famous Hauen Towne of the Greekes, was after built. Here it ſeemes that they beſtowed the weakeſt and moſt vnſeruiceable of their traine, together with the heauieſt part of their carriages, vnder ſome good gard: as drawing neere to thoſe Regions, in conqueſt whereof they were to trie the vtmoſt hazard. For in like ſort afterwards did the Cimbri (of whom I ſpake euen now) diſpoſe of their impediments, leauing them in a place of ſtrength, where Antwerpe now ſtands, when they drew neere vnto Gaule, vpon which they determined to aduenture themſelues in the purchaſe. From Synope, the way vnto Phrygia, Lydia, and Ionia, was faire and open to the Cimmerians, without any ledge of Mountaines, or any deepe Riuers at all to ſtay their march: for Iris and Halys they had alreadie paſſed. Herod. lib. 4.

What battells were fought between theſe inuaders and the Lydians, and with what variable ſucceſſe the one or other part wanne and loſt, I finde not written, nor am able to coniecture. This I find, that in the time of Ardys, the Cimmerians got poſſeſſion of Sardes the capitall Citie of Lydia; only the Caſtle holding out againſt them. Further I obſerue, that whereas Herodotus tells of the acts performed by Gyges and Ardys Kings of Lydia, before this inuaſion, and by Halyattes and Cræſus in the times following; all that Ardis did againſt the Cimmerians, and all, ſaue burning the Mileſians Corne fields, that was done in twelue yeres by Sadiattes his Son (who perhaps had his hands ſo full of this buſineſſe, that hee could turne them to nothing elſe) is quite omitted: whereby it may ſeeme, that neither of the two did any thing worthie of remembrance in thoſe wars, but were glad enough that they did loſe all.

Certainly the miſeries of warre are neuer ſo bitter and many, as when a whole Nation, or great part of it, forſaking their owne ſeates, labour to root out the eſtabliſhed poſſeſſours of another Land, making roome for themſelues, their wiues and children. They that fight for the maſterie, are pacified with tribute, or with ſome other ſeruices and acknowledgements, which had they beene yeelded at the firſt, all had beene quiet, and no ſword bloudied. But in theſe migrations, the aſſailants bring ſo little with them, that they need all which the defendants haue, their Lands and Cattell, their houſes and their goods, euen to the cradles of the ſucking infants. The mercileſſe tearmes of this controuerſie arme both ſides with deſperate reſolution: ſeeing the one part muſt either winne, or periſh by famine; the other defend their goods, or loſe their liues without redemption. Moſt of the Countries in Europe haue felt examples thereof; and the mightie Empire of Rome was ouerthrowne by ſuch inuaſions. But our Iſle of Britaine can beſt witneſſe the diuerſitie of Conqueſts; hauing by the happy victorie of the Romans, gotten the knowledge of all Ciuill Arts, in exchange of libertie, that was but ſlenderly inſtructed therein before; whereas the iſſue of the Saxon and Daniſh Warres, was, as were the cauſes, quite contrarie. For theſe did not ſeeke after the Dominion onely, but the entire poſſeſſion of the Countrie, which the Saxons obtained, but with horrible crueltie, eradicating all of the Britiſh Race, and defacing all memoriall of the ancient inhabitants through the greater part of the Land. But the Danes (who are alſo of the Cimmerian bloud) found ſuch end of their enterprize, as it may ſeeme that the Cimmerians in Lydia, and Scythians in the higher Aſia, did arriue vnto. So that by conſidering the proceſſe of the one, we ſhall the better conceiue the fortune of the other. Many battailes the Danes wonne, yet none of ſuch importance, as ſufficed to make them abſolute Conquerours: Many the Saxons wonne vpon the Danes, yet not ſo great, as could driue them quite away, and backe from hence, after they had gotten firme footing. But in courſe of time, the long continuance euen of vtter enmitie, had bred ſuch acquaintance betweene them, as bowing the natures of both theſe people, made the one more pliant vnto the other. So their diſagreeable qualities, both ill and good, being reduced into one milde temper, no ſmall number of the Danes became peaceable cohabitants with the Saxons, in England, where great ſlaughter had made large roome; others returning home, found their owne Country wide enough to receiue them, as hauing disburthened it ſelfe of many thouſands, that were ſent to ſeeke their graues abroad. And ſuch (as I thinke) was the end of the Cimmerian warre in Lydia; whereunto though ſome victorie of Halyattes may haue haſtened the concluſion, yet the wearieſome length of time ſeemes to haue done moſt, in compelling them to deſire of reſt. I know not why I ſhould feare to adde heereunto my further coniecture; which is, that the matter was ſo compounded betweene the Cimmerians and Halyattes; that the Riuer of Halys ſhould diuide their Territories. For Halys was henceforth the border of the Lydians, and on the Eaſterne ſide of the Riuer was the Countrie of the Amazons, that is indeed, of the Cimmerians and other Scythian people; whoſe wiues and daughters theſe warlike women are ſuppoſed to haue beene.

And hereunto the quarrell enſuing, betweene Halyattes and Cyaxares the Mede, hath very good reference. For Halyattes (as is ſaid) fought in defence of certaine Scythians, vpon whom the Median ſought reuenge. And it ſtands with reaſon, that the Lydians and Cimmerians, being much weakened with mutuall ſlaughters, ſhould haue ioyned in a league of mutuall defence for their common ſafetie: though otherwiſe it had beene dangerous to Halyattes, if hee had permitted the Median to extend his Kingdome ſo farre Weſtward, whatſoeuer the pretences might be, of taking reuenge vpon ſuch as had ſpoiled each of their Countries. As for that occaſion of the Warre betweene theſe two Kings, which Herodotus relates, I finde it of little waight, and leſſe probabilitie. Hee tells of Scythians, that being chaſed out of their Countrie by faction, came vnto Cyaxares; who committed vnto them certayne Boyes, to bee inſtructed in the Scythian tongue, and feate of Archerie. Now it ſo fell out (ſaith he) that theſe Scythians vſing much to hunt, and commonly bringing home ſomewhat with them, did neuertheleſſe other-whiles miſſe of their game, and come home as they went. Hereupon the King being froward and cholericke, bitterly reuiled them; and they, as impatient as hee, killed one of the Boyes that was vnder their charge, whom dreſſing like Veniſon, they preſented vnto him; which done, they fledde vnto Halyattes. This Herodotus deliuers, as the ground of a Warre that laſted ſixe yeeres betweene the Medes and Lydians; the one King demanding theſe Fugitiues to be deliuered into his hand, the other refuſing to betray ſuch men as were become his ſuppliants. To this I will ſay no more, than that I ſee no cauſe that might induce the Scythians, to betake themſelues to either of theſe Kings, vnto whom their Nation had wrought ſo much diſpleaſure. Particularlie they had reaſon to diſtruſt Cyaxares, for the treacherie that he ſhewed in the maſſacring of their Countrie men, that were in his Kingdome; of whom it is now meet that wee ſhould ſpeake.

†. IIII.

The Warre of the Scythians in the higher Aſia.

AS the Cimmerians held their courſe Weſterly, along the ſhores of the Euxine Sea: ſo the Scythians and Sarmatians tooke the other way, and hauing the Caſpian Sea on their left hand, paſſed betweene it and Caucaſus through Albania, Colthene, and other obſcure Nations, where now are the Countries of Seruan and Georgia, and ſo they entered into Media. The Medes encountred them in Armes; but were beaten, and thereupon glad to come to any agreement with them. This was in the time of Phraortes, whileſt Pſammiticus reigned in Ægypt. If it were in the ſixth yeere of Nabulaſſars Reigne ouer Babylon (ſuppoſing him to haue reigned fiue and thirtie; otherwiſe we muſt allow to Ben Merodach what we take from him) then doe the eight and twenty yeeres of their Dominion end, one yere before the great Nabuchodonoſor was King; ſo giuing him good leaue to prouide ſecurely, for the inuaſion of Syria, which expedition hee began while his Father yet liued, as Ioſephus out of Beroſus relates the Hiſtorie.

Now the Medes, deſirous to ſaue themſelues as well as they might, from this terrible Nation, which when they had no luſt to a ſecond triall of the ſword, refuſed not to vndergoe goe the burthen of a Tribute, but thought nothing dishonourable, that would serue to remoue these troublesome guests into some other lodging. On the other part, the Scythians finding still the Countries pleasanter and better, the further that they marched into the South, did suffer themselues to be perswaded, that a little more trauaile, would adde a great deale more to their content. For they relyed so much vpon their owne valour, that they feared no resistance; and being the brauest men, they thought it reason that they should dwell in the best Region. That Phraortes perswaded them into Ægypt, I doe not thinke: Babylon was neere enough; whither if he could send these Locusts to graze, then should not his vnfriendly Neighbours haue cause to laugh at his misfortune. What shift Nabulassar made with them, or that at all he had any dealings with them, I doe not reade. But it is well known, that his Dominions lay in the middest betweene Media and Ægypt; as also, that they made all those parts of Asia Tributarie; wherefore we may very well beleeue, that they watered their horses in his Riuers, and that he also was content to giue them prouender.

Psammiticus hearing of their progresse (like the iealous Husband of a faire Wife) tooke care that they might not looke vpon Ægypt; lest the sight thereof should more easily deraine them there, than any force or perswasion, that he could vse, would send them going. Therefore he met them in Syria, presuming more on the great gifts which he meant to bestow vpon them, than on his Armie that should keepe them backe. Ægypt was rich; and halfe the riches had not beene ill spent in sauing all. Yet Psammiticus tooke the most likely course, whereby to make his part good against them by strong hand, in case they had beene so obstinate as to refuse all indifferent composition. For he lay close vpon the edge of the Wildernesse in Gaza (as I take it) the Southermost border of Palestina: whence he neuer aduanced to meete with the Scythians; but gaue them leaue to feele as much of the scalding Sunne-beames, ill agreeing with their temper, as all the length of Syria could beat vpon them. When they were come as farre as Ascalon, the next Citie to Gaza, then did he assay them with goodly words, accompanied with gifts, which were likely to worke so much the better, by how much the worse they were pleased with the heate of a Climate so farre different from their owne. Psammiticus had at his backe a vast wildernesse, ouer the scorching sands whereof, the Scythians more patient of cold and wet, than of the contrary distempers, could ill haue endured to pursue him, through vnknowne wayes, had they fought with him and preuailed: especially the Kingdome of Ægypt being ready to entertaine him with reliefe, and them with new trouble at the end of their wearie iourney. Wherefore they were content to be intreated, and taking in good part his courteous offers, returned back to visiite their acquaintance in the high Countries. The Ægyptian King (besides that he preserued his owne Estate from a dangerous aduenture, by hyring this great Armie to depart from him) found all his Cost well repayed in the processe of his warres in Syria, where the Nations beyond Euphrates had no power to molest him, being more than euer troubled themselues with the returne of their oppressors. For the Scythians, resoluing now to seeke no further, began to demand more than the Tribute formerly imposed. And not contented to fleece the Naturals with grieuous exactions, they presumed to liue at discretion vpon the Countrie, taking what they listed from the Owners; and many times (as it were to saue the labour of taking often) taking all at once. This Tyrannous Dominion they long vsed ouer the higher Asia, that is, ouer the Countrie lying betweene the Caspian and Red Seas; and betweene India and Asia the lesse. Happy it was for the poore people, that in so large a space of ground, there was roome enough for these new comers; otherwise the calamitie that fell, as it were by chance, vpon those priuate men, to whose wealth any Scythian did beare a fancie, would haue lighted in generall vpon all at one clap, leauing few aliue, and none able to relieue their fellowes. Yet it seemes that the heauiest burthen lay vpon Media; for it was a fruitfull, Countrie not farre from their owne home, and lay vnder a Climate well agreeing with the constitution of their bodies; there also it was that they had the fatall blow, by which their insolent Rule was taken from them.

Cyaxares King of the Medes, who in this extremity was no better then a Rent-gatherer for the Scythians, perceiuing that his Land lay vnmanured and waste, through the negligence of his people, that were out of heart by daily oppressions, and that the matter could not be remedied by open force, resolued to proue what might be done by stratagem. Herod. lib. 1.

ſtratagem. The managing of the buſineſſe is thus deliuered in briefe; That he, and his Medes, feaſted the better part of the Scythians; made them drunke, and ſlew them; recouering hereby the poſſeſſion of all that they had loſt.

Such another ſlaughter was committed vpon the Danes in England; but it was reuenged by their Countrimen, with greater cruelty than euer they had practiſed before. That the Scythians, which eſcaped this bloudy feaſt, made any ſtirre in Media, I doe not finde; neither doe I reade that either in reuenge hereof, or vpon other pretence, the Medes were troubled by inuaſion from Scythia in time following.

This is the more ſtrange, for that the Armie returning home out of Media, was very ſtrong, and encountred with oppoſition (as Herodotus reports it) no leſſe than it had found abroad. Wherefore it may be, that the deuice of Cyaxares to free his Countrey, tooke good effect, with leſſe bloud-ſhed than hath beene ſuppoſed. For if he ſurpriſed all the chiefe of them, it was no hard matter to make a good compoſition. Many of them doubtleſſe in eight and twenty yeeres had ſo well ſetled themſelues, that they were deſirous of reſt, and might be permitted, without any danger, to remaine in the Countrie; many (of whom I ſhall ſpeake anon) hauing done what they could in the buſineſſe, for which they came forth, were willing to returne home, with what they had gotten; ſuch as were not pleaſed with either of theſe two courſes, might goe ioyne with the Cimmerians in Lydia, or ſeeke their fortunes in other Prouinces, among their owne Companions. Whereas all the Families of the North are ſaid to haue beene with Nabuchadnezzar, it may be vnderſtood, that a great part of the Scythians, vpon hope of gaine, or deſire to keepe what they had already gained, were content to become ſubiect vnto Nabulaſſar: mens loue of their wealth being moſt effectuall, in taming the more vnquiet loue of inordinate liberty. This is certaine, that Nabuchadnezzar, as euer after, ſo in his firſt beginning of warre, did beate the Ægyptians, who in ages foregoing had beene accuſtomed to deale with the Babylonians after another faſhion: and this new ſucceſſe of that King may be imputed, in regard of humane meanes, to ſuch addition as this of new forces.

Ier. 25. 9.

Of the Scythian Armie returning out of Media, diuers Authors report a Storie, which confirmes me in the opinion, that this Companie went forth to aſſiſt their kindred and friends, in acquiring a new ſeate, and eſtabliſhing their plantation. For theſe had left their wiues behinde them; a good argument to proue that they meant to come againe. The Scythian women, to comfort themſelues in their husbands abſence, became bed-fellowes to their ſlaues. Theſe got a luſty brood of youths, that were loath to be troubled with Fathers in Law, and therefore prepared to fight with them at their returne. If they were onely the children of ſlaues, which compounded an Armie (as Herodotus would haue it, who tels vs, that the Scythians were wont to pull out all their bond-mens eyes) it muſt needes be that they were very Boyes, or elſe that the Women did very little while continue chaſte. Wherefore I rather beleeue that tale as it is told by the Ruſſes themſelues, who agreeing in the reſt with the conſent of Hiſtories, make that report of their Anceſtors returning homewards; which I will ſet downe, as I finde it in Maſter Doctor Fletcher his exact diſcourſe of the Ruſſe Common-wealth. They vnderſtood by the way, that their Cholopey, or Bond-ſlaues whom they left at home, had in their abſence poſſeſſed their Townes, Lands, Houſes, Wiues, and all. At which newes being ſomewhat amazed, and yet diſdaining the Villanie of their ſeruants, they made the more ſpeede home: and ſo not farre from Nouograd met them in warlike manner marching againſt them. Whereupon aduiſing what was beſt to be done, they agreed alſo to ſet vpon them with no other ſhew of weapon but with their horſe-whips (which as their manner is, euery man rideth withall) to put them in remembrance of their ſeruile condition, thereby to terrifie them, and abate their courage. And ſo marching on, and laſhing all together with their whips in their hands, they gaue the onſet: which ſeemed ſo terrible in the eares of their Villaines, and ſtrooke ſuch a ſenſe into them of the ſmart of the whip, which they had felt before, that they fled all together like Sheepe before the Driuers. In memorie of this victorie, the Nouogradians euer ſince haue ſtamped their Coine (which they call a Dingot, Nouogradskoy, currant through all Ruſsia) with the figure of a Horſeman ſhaking a whip aloft in his hand. It may ſeeme, that all the women of that Countrie, haue fared the worſe euer ſince, in regard of their vniuerſall fault: for ſuch a Pudkey or whip, as terrified thoſe ſlaues, curiouſly wrought by her ſelfe, is the firſt preſent that the Moſcouian Wife, euen in time of wooing, ſends to him that ſhall be her husband, in token of ſubiection; being well well assured to feele it often on her owne loines. But this was a Document vnto the Scythians, or rather Sarmatians (for Nouograd stands in the Countrie that was called Sarmatia) to beware of absenting themselues any more so long from their Wiues; which after this, I finde not that they did.

Thus much I thought good to set downe of the Scythian expedition; not onely because it is the most memorable act performed abroad by that Nation, famous in Histories, and terrible to many Countries; but for that it appeares to haue beene a great cause, of the Ægyptians preuailing hitherto in Syria, and about Iudæa, which continues yet a while the centre of our discourse.

§ V.

*Of Princes liuing in diuers Countries, in these ages.

MAuing thus farre digressed from the matters of Iuda, to auoide all further occasion of doing the like, I will here insert a note of such Kings and men of marke, as were betweene the death of Manasses, and the ruine of Ierusalem. Of the Ægyptians, Babylonians, Medes, and Lydians, I haue spoken as much as I thought needefull. In Rome, Tullus Hostilius held the Kingdome, vntill the one and twentieth yeere of Iosias; at which time Ancus Martius succeeding, reigned foure and twenty yeeres. After him L. Tarquinius Priscus, a new-come stranger, but very rich, preuailed so farre by his graciousnesse among the people, that he got the kingdome to himselfe, disappointing the sonnes of Ancus, ouer whom he was Tutor. He began in the fourth yeere of Zedekia, and reigned eight and thirtie yeeres. In this time it was, namely, in the second yeere of the thirtieth Olympiad, that the Lacedæmonians, bethinking them how to be auenged of the Arcadians, who gaue succour to the Messenians against them in the former warre; entred their Territorie, tooke the Citie of Phigalia or Phialia, from whence their Garrisons were soone after beaten out. Cypselus expelling the race of the Bacidæ, made himselfe Lord of Corinth about these times, and gouerned it in peace thirtie yeeres; leauing for successour his sonne Periander, one of the seauen Sages, but a cruell Tyrant: who among other vile acts, slew his owne wife, and afterwards, as in her honour, stripped all the Corinthian women starke naked, burning their apparell, as an acceptable offering to her Ghost. Hereby we may perceiue, that the wisedome of the Greekes was not excellent in those dayes; when such a one as this could be admired as excelling all the Countrie.

In these times also were Zaleucus and Draco, famous Lawgiuers, the one among the Locrians in Italie, the other in the Citie of Athens. The Lawes of Draco were so rigorous, that he was said to haue written them with blould: for he rewarded euery small offence with death. Wherefore his Constitutions were soone abrogated, and power giuen to Solon, by the Athenians, to make new in their stead. But the Lawes of Zaleucus were very milde. He forbad any Gentlewoman to walke abroad with more than one Bond-woman attending on her, vnlesse it were when she was drunke; or to goe forth of the Towne by night, vnlesse it were to some sweet-hearts bed; or to dresse her selfe vp in immodest brauery, vnlesse it were to inueigle a louer. By which pleasant Ordinances, he effected his desire: for none would seeme, in breaking the Statutes, to be in such case as challenged the dispensation. It is noted in this man as a singular example of iustice, that when his owne son had committed adulterie, and was therefore to lose both his eyes, he did not cause him to be pardoned, but gaue one eye of his owne to saue the yong man (who also lost one) from vtter blindenesse.

I shall not henceforth neede, so farre to wander, as hitherto I often haue done, in pursuing of actions collaterall to the Historie, for inserting them in their order of time. The Chaldæans will soone fall vnder the Persians; ere long, encounter with the Greekes; the Greekes, with the Romans; the Romans, with many Nations. Concerning all these, as they shall successiuely present themselues, in their flourishing Estate; it will be enough to recapitulate the most memorable accidents, that befell them in their Minoritie. But in the long space of more than thirteene hundred yeeres, which passed betweene the calling of Abraham, and the destruction of Ierusalem, wee finde little matter, wherein the History of Israel had any dealing with other Nations, than the very neerest borderers. Yet reade we of many Kingdomes, that in these many ages were erected, and throwne downe; as likewise, many memorable acts were performed in Greece and elsewhere, though not following one another at any neere distance; all which must haue beene quite omitted, or else reserued vnto a very vnseasonable rehearsall, had they not beene disposed in this method, whereof he that will not allow the conueniency, may pardon the necessity.

§. VI.

The oppression of Iudæa, and destruction of Ierusalem by the Chaldæans.

NOw to returne to the Iewish Storie, from whence we haue so farre digressed. In the third yeere of Iehoiakim, Nabuchodonosor the second, his Father yet liuing, entred Iudæa with a great Armie, who besieging and forcing Ierusalem, made Iehoiakim his Vassall in despight of Necho, that had established him King, and tooke with him for pledges Daniel, being as yet a childe, with Ananias, Misael, and Azarias. Also hee tooke a part of the Church treasures; but stayed not to search them throughly; for Necho hasted to the succour of Iehoiakim, hoping to finde Nabuchodonosor in Iudæa: wherein this great Babylonian had no disposition to hazard himselfe and his Armie, it being a Countrie of an euill affection towards him, as also farre off from any succour or sure place of retrait. If he had, as may be supposed, any great strength of Scythian horse-men in his Armie; it was the more wisely done of him, to fall backe, out of the rough, mountainous, and ouer-hot Countrie, into places that were more euen and temperate. But besides all these reasons, the death of his father, happening at the same time, gaue him iust occasion to returne home, and take possession of his owne Kingdome; before he proceeded further in the second care, of adding more vnto it. This he did at reasonable good leisure: for the Ægyptian was not ready to follow him so farre and to bid him battaile, vntill the new yeere came in; which was the fourth of Iehoiakim, the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the last of Necho. In this yeere the Babylonian lying vpon the Banke Euphrates (his owne Territorie bounding it on the North-side) attended the arriuall of Necho. There, after a resolued contention for victory. Necho was slaine, and his Armie remaining forced to saue it selfe, which full ill it did, by a violent retrait. This victorie Nabuchodonosor so well pursued, as he recouered all Syria, and whatsoeuer the Ægyptians held out of their proper Territorie towards the North. The Ægyptians being in this conflict beaten, and altogether for the present discouraged, Iehoiakim held himselfe quiet, as being friend in heart vnto the Ægyptian, yet hauing made his peace with the Chaldæan the yeere before; who contented with such profit as he could then readily make, had forborne to lay any Tribute vpon Iuda. But this coole reseruednesse of Iehoiakim, was, on both sides, taken in ill part. The Ægyptian King Psammis, who succeeded vnto Necho, began to thinke vpon restoring Iehoahaz, taken Prisoner by his Father, and setting him vp, as a Domesticall Enemie, against his vngratefull brother. Against all such accidents, the Iudæan had prepared the vsuall remedy, practised by his fore-fathers: for hee had made his owne sonne Iechonia King with him long before, in the second yeere of his owne Reigne, when the Boy was but Eight yeeres old. As for this rumour of Iehoahaz his returne; the Prophet Ieremie foretold, that it should proue idle, saying: he shall not returne thither, but he shall dye in the place whither they haue led him captiue, and shall see this Land no more. The Ægyptians indeede, hauing spent all their Mercenarie forces, and receiued that heauie blow at Carchemish, had not remaining such proportion of sharpe steele, as of faire gold, which without other helpe, is of little effect. The valour of Necho was not in Psammis Apries who reigning after Psammis, did once aduenture to shew his face in Syria; but after a bigge looke, he was glad to retire, without aduenturing the hazard of a battaile. Wherefore this decaying Nation fought onely with braue words, telling such friuolous tales, as men that meane to doe nothing, vse, of their glorious acts fore-passed, against Iosias and Iehoahaz. In this case it was easie for Iehoakim to giue them satisfaction, by letting them vnderstand the sincerity of his affection towards them, which appeared in time following. But Nabuchodonosor went to worke more roundly. He sent a peremptory message to Iehoakim, willing him not to stand vpon any nice points, but acknowledge himselfe a Subiect, and pay him Tribute: adding hereunto such fearefull threats, as made the poore Iudæan lay aside all thought of Pharaoh, and yeelde to doe, as the more mighty would haue him. So hee continued in the

2 Chron. 36. 5.

Ier. 22. 11. & 12.

Ioseph Antiq. lib. 10. cap. 7.

the obedience of Nabuchodonoſor three yeeres. At this time Ieremie the Prophet cried out againſt the Iewes, putting them in minde that he had now three and twenty yeeres exhorted them to repentance, but becauſe they had ſtopt their eares againſt him, and the reſt of the Prophets, he now pronounced their captiuitie at hand, and that they ſhould endure the yoke of bondage full ſeauenty yeeres. The ſame calamitie he threatned to all the neighbouring Nations, to the Ægyptians, Moabites, Ammonites, Idumeans, and the reſt; for telling that they ſhould all drinke out of the Babylonian Pitcher, the wine of his furie, whom they had forſaken and after the ſeauenty yeeres expired, that the Babylonians themſelues ſhould taſte of the ſame cup, and be vtterly ſubuerted by the Medes, and Ier. 25. the Iudeans permitted to returne againe into their owne fields and Cities. The firſt impriſonment of the Prophet Ieremie ſeemes to haue beene in the fourth yeere of this Iehoiakim, at which time Baruch the Scribe wrote all his Prophecies out of his mouth, whom he ſent to reade them vnto the people, and afterward to the Princes, who offered them to the King: but fearing the Kings furie, they had firſt ſet Ieremie at liberty, and aduiſed him and Baruch to hide themſelues.

Iehoiakim, after he heard a part of it and perceiued the ill newes therein deliuered, made no more adoe, but did cut the Booke in pieces and caſt it into the fire. All which Ieremie cauſed to be new written, with this addition; that the dead body of Iehoiakim, ſhould be caſt out, expoſed in the day to the heat, and in the night to the froſt, and there ſhould be none of his ſeede to ſit on the Throne of Dauid.

Time thus running on, while Iehoiakim reſted ſecure of all danger, as Tributary to the Babylonian, yet well thought of by the Ægyptian; the mightie Citie of Tyre oppoſed it ſelfe againſt the Chaldean forces; and vpon iuſt confidence of her owne ſtrength, deſpiſed all preparation that could be made againſt her. Now foraſmuch as the tearme of ſeauentie yeers was preſcribed vnto the deſolation, as well of Tyre, as of Ieruſalem, & other Townes and Countries; it is apparent, that they which refer the expugnation of this Citie vnto the nineteenth yeere of Nabuchodonoſor, haue ſure authority for their warrant. Whereupon likewiſe it followes of neceſſity, that the ſiege thereof began in the ſeauenth of his Reigne; as hauing laſted thirteene yeeres.

Here I will take leaue to intrude a briefe note, concerning the ſeuerall beginnings that are reckoned of this great Prince his Rule, whereupon hath riſen much diſputation. The third yeere of Iehoiakim, was the laſt of Nabulaſſar, who being deliuered from other cares, tooke notice of ſuch as had reuolted from him vnto Pharaoh Necho, and ſent this Noble Prince, his ſonne, with an Armie into Syria, to reclaime them. In this expedition was Daniel carried away, who therefore makes mention of the ſame yeere. The yeere next following, being the fourth of Iehoiakim, was the firſt of Nebuchadnezzar; which Ieremie affirmeth in expreſſe words; and from this we reckon all his time and actions that follow. In his three and twentieth yeere he conquered Ægypt; and then began to reigne as a great Monarch, finding none that durſt offend him. The ſecond from this yeere it was, wherein he ſaw that viſion, of the Image conſiſting of ſundry Metals; which did prefigurate the ſucceſſion of great Kingdomes, that ſhould rule the Earth, before the comming of Chriſt. I will not ſtand to diſpute about this, which is the beſt concluſion that I finde, of long diſputations: but returne vnto the ſiege of Tyre, which began in the ſeauenth of his Reigne.

Dan. 2. v. 1. Ierem. 25. 1.

The Citie of Tyre couered all the ground of an Iſland, that was diuided from the maine, by a deepe and broad channell of the Sea. The Chaldeans had no Fleet, and were no Sea-men; the Tyrians, in multitude of goodly Ships, and skill to vſe them, excelled all other Nations; and euery winde, from one part or other, brought needefull prouiſions into the Citie. Wherefore neither force, nor famine could greatly hurt the place; whereof neuertheleſſe the iudgements of God (denounced againſt it by Eſay, Ieremie, Ezechiel.) had threatned the deſtruction; and the obſtinate reſolution of Nabuchodonoſor, had fully determined to performe it. This high-minded King, impatient of reſiſtance, vndertooke a vaſt piece of worke, euen to fill vp the Sea, that parted the Iſland from the Continent. The Citie of old Tyrus, that ſtood oppoſite to the new, vpon the firme Land, and the mountaine of Libanus neere adioyning that was loaden with Cedars, and aboundance of other trees, might furniſh him with materials. Thirteene yeeres were ſpent in this laborious, and almoſt hopeleſſe buſineſſe. Which needeth not ſeeme ſtrange: for Alexander working vpon that foundation which was remayning of Nabuchodonoſors Peere; and being being withall assisted by a strong Fleet, was yet seauen moneths ere he could make way into the Citie. Wherefore, if the raging of the Sea was able to carry away that wherewith Alexander laboured to couer a shelue; with much more violence could it ouerturne, and as it were consume, the worke of Nabuchodonosor, who laid his foundations in the bottome of the deepe, striuing as it were, to fill the empty belly of this Cormorant; whereas the Macedonian did onely stop the throat of it. Euery man knowes, God could haue furthered the accomplishment of his owne threats, against this place (though it had not pleased him to vse, either miracle, or such of his more immediate weapons, as are Earthquakes, and the like) by making at least the Seas calme, and adding the fauourable concurrence of al second helpes. But so it pleaseth him oftentimes, in chastising the pride of man, to vse the hand of man; euen the hand of man striuing, as may seeme, against all resistance of nature and fortune. So in this excessiue labour of the Chaldæans, Euery head was made bald, and euery shoulder was made bare. Yet Nabuchodonosor would not giue ouer till he was master of the Towne.

Ezek. 29.

Ioseph. Antiq. Iud. l. 10. c. 7.

When he was entred vpon this desperate seruice; whether it were so, that some losses receiued, some mutinie in his Armie, or (which is most likely; and so Iosephus reports it) some glorious rumours of the Ægyptians, gaue courage to his euill willers; Iehoiakim renounced his subiection, and began to hope for the contrary of that which quickly fell out. For Nabuchodonosor gaue him no leisure to doe much hurt: but with part of his Armie marched directly into Iudæa; where the amazed King made so little resistance (the Ægyptians hauing left him, as it were in a dreame) that he entred Ierusalem, and layed hands on Iehoiakim: whom he first bound and determined to send to Babylon, but changing counsell, he caused him to be slaine in the place, and gaue him the Sepulcher of an Asse, to be deuoured by beasts and rauenous birds, according to the former Prophecies: leauing in his place, Iehoiakin or Iechonias his sonne; whom after three moneths and ten dayes, Nabuchodonosor remoued, and sent prisoner to Babylon, with Ezekiel, Mardocheus, and Iosedech, the high Priest. The mother of Iechonias, together with his seruants, Eunuchs, and all the ablest men, and best Artificers of the Land, were also then carryed away Captiues. This Iechonias, following the counsell of Ieremie the Prophet, made no resistance, but submitted himselfe to the Kings will: wherein he both pleased God, and did that which was best for himselfe; though at the present it might seeme otherwise, to such as considered the euill that befell him, rather then the greater euill that he thereby auoided. This onely particular act of his is recorded; which was good. But it seemes that he was partaker, at least, of his Fathers faults, if not an instigator: which was the cause, that his submitting himselfe to Gods pleasure did not preserue his Estate: for so we reade in generall words, that he did euill in the sight of the Lord, according to all that his Father had done. In his stead Nabuchodonosor established Mathania his Vncle in the Kingdome of Iuda, and called him Zedechias, which is as much to say, as the Iustice of God. For like as Neco, King of Ægypt, had formerly displaced Iehoahaz, after his Father Iosias was slaine, and set vp Iehoiakim, the sonne of another mother; so Nabuchodonosor slue Iehoiakim, who depended on the Ægyptians, and carrying his sonne Iechonias Prisoner to Babel, gaue the Kingdome to this Zedechias, that was whole Brother to that Iehoahaz, whom Neco tooke with him into Ægypt. From Zedechias he required an oath for his faithfull obedience, which Zedechias gaue him, and called the liuing God to witnesse in the same, that he would remaine assured to the Kings of Chaldea.

In the first yeere of Zedechias, Ieremie saw and expounded the Vision of the ripe and rotten Grapes, the one signifying those Iudæans that were carried away captiue, the other those that stayed, and were destroyed.

In the fourth of Zedekias, Ieremie wrote in a Booke all the euill that should fall vpon Babylon, which Booke or scrole he gaue to Sheraia, when he went with the King Zedechias to Babylon, to visit Nabuchodonosor; willing him first to reade it to the Captiue Iewes, and then to binde it to a stone, and cast it into Euphrates, pronouncing these words: Thus shall Babel be drowned, and shall not rise from the euill that I will bring vpon her. This iournie of Zedekias to Babel is probably thought to haue beene in way of visitation, carrying some presents. But I further thinke, that hee had some suite there to make, which his Lordly Master refused to grant, and sent him away discontented. For at his returne all the bordering Princes sent Messengers to him, inciting him (as it seemes) to those vnquiet counsels, from which Ieremie dehorted both him and them. The Prophet, by Gods appointment, made bonds and yokes; one of which he wore about his own necke, others he ſent vnto the fiue Kings, of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, and Zidon, by thoſe Meſſengers which came to viſit Zedechias: making them know, that if they & the Kings of Iuda abode in the obedience of Babylon, they ſhould then poſſeſſe and enioy their owne Countries; if not, they ſhould aſſuredly periſh by the ſword, by fire, and by peſtilence.

He alſo fore-told them, that thoſe Veſſels, which as yet remained in Ieruſalem, ſhould alſo trauaile after the reſt, and at length they ſhould be reſtored againe.

The ſame yeere Ananias, the falſe Prophet, tooke off the woodden Chaine which Ieremie wore, in ſigne of the Captiuitie of the Iewes, and brake it: Vaunting, that in like manner, after two yeeres, God would breake the ſtrength of Babel, and the yoke which he layed on all Nations; reſtore Iechonias, and all the Iewes, with the Veſſels and riches of the Temple, and giue an end to all theſe troubles. But Ieremie in ſtead of his woodden Yoke wore a Coller of yron: and in ſigne that Ananias had giuen a deceitfull and falſe hope to the people, he fore-told the death of this cold Prophet, which ſeized vpon him in the ſecond moneth. After this, when Zedechias had wauered long enough betweene Faith and Paſſion, in the eight yeere of his Reigne he practiſed more ſeriouſly againſt Nabuchodonoſor, with his Neighbours, the Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites, Tyrians, and others that were promiſed great aides of the Ægyptians: in confidence of whoſe reſiſtance, he determined to ſhake off the Babylonian yoke. Hereof when Nabuchodonoſor had knowledge, he marched with his Armie in the dead of Winter, toward Ieruſalem, and beſieged it. Ieremie perſwaded Zedechias to render the Citie and himſelfe: but being confident of the helpe from Ægypt, and being perſwaded by his Counſellors, and falſe Prophets, that it was vnpoſſible that the Kingdome of Iuda ſhould be extirpate, vntill the comming of Silo (according to the Prophecie of Iacob) he deſpiſed the words of Ieremie, and impriſoned him. For Ieremie had told the King that the Citie ſhould be taken and burnt; that the King ſhould not eſcape, but be taken Priſoner, and brought to the preſence of Nabuchodonoſor; that he ſhould not periſh by the ſword, but being carried to Babel, die his naturall death. Gen. 49. 10. Ier. 32. & 34.

Ieruſalem, being the following yeere, ſurrounded by Nabuchodonoſors Armie; the King of Ægypt, Pharao Hophra, according to Ieremie (Herodotus calleth him Apries) entred the border of Iuda, with his Armie, to ſuccour Zedechias, of whoſe reuolt he had beene the principall Author. But Ieremie gaue the Iewes faithfull counſell, willing them not to haue any truſt in the ſuccours of Ægypt: for he aſſured them, that they ſhould returne againe, and in no ſort relieue them. And it fell out accordingly. For when the Chaldæans remoued from Ieruſalem to encounter the Ægyptians, theſe vaunting Patrons abandoned their enterpiſe, and taking Gaza in their way homeward, returned into Ægypt, as if they had already done enough; leauing the poore people of Ieruſalem to their deſtined miſeries. Ier. 44. Herod. lib. 2.

In the meane while the Iewes, who, in their firſt extremity, had manumiſed their Hebrew Bond-men (as Gods Law required at the yeere of Iubile) and made them free, thereby the better to encourage them to fight; did now vpon the breaking vp of the Chaldean Armie, repent them of their Charitie: and thinking all had beene at an end, held them perforce to their former ſlauerie. But the Chaldees being returned to the ſiege, the Prophet Ieremie, when the State of Ieruſalem began now to grow to extremitie, counſelled Zedechias to render himſelfe vnto them; aſſuring him of his owne life, and the ſafetie of the Citie, if he would ſo doe. But his obſtinate heart conducted him to that wretched end, which his neglect of God, and his infidelity and periurie, had prouided for him. Leuit. 25. 39. 40. &c. Ier. 34. Ier. 39.

Three and twenty Moneths (as ſome doe reckon it) or according to Ioſephus eighteene, the Babylonian Armie lay before Ieruſalem, and held it exceeding ſtraightly beſieged. For they built Forts againſt it round about, or (as P. Martyr hath it) extruxerunt contra eam turrem ligneam per circuitum: They ſurrounded the Citie with woodden Towers, ſo as the beſieged could neither ſally out, nor receiue into the Citie any ſupply of men or victuals. Ioſephus reports, that they ouer-topped the Wals, with high Towers raiſed vpon mounts; from which they did ſo beat vpon the Wall with their Engines, that the defendants were compelled to forſake their ſtations. Now although it were ſo that the beſieged alſo raiſed Counter-buildings, like vnto theſe, yet the great King of Babel, who commanded all the Regions thereabouts, and had the Woods and Riuers Ier. 39. 2 Kings 25. 1. Ioſeph. Ant. Iud. lib. 10. cap. 11.

to obey him, found meanes to ouer-throw all the Citizens endeuours; and to beat down as faſt from without, as they raiſed from within; the body and foundation of his owne workes being guarded, by the Walls of Ieruſalem interpoſed; and theirs within, layed open to their enemies diſturbance. Beſides, both famine and peſtilence (which commonly accompany men ſtreightly beſieged) grew on faſt vpon them, whereby, when the number, ſtrength, and courage of the Iewes failed, the Chaldæans made a breach, and forcing an entry, their Princes did ſeat themſelues, as Lords of the Towne, in the middle gate. Zedechias beholding this vncomfortable ſight, and finding no remedy of the danger preſent, loſt both his courage and his hope at once; and ſhifted himſelfe together with his Wiues, Children, Princes, and principall Seruants, out of the Citie, by a way vnder ground; leauing his amazed and guideleſſe people, to the mercileſſe ſwords of their enemies. Thus he, who, when Ieremie the Prophet perſwaded him to render himſelfe, deſpiſed both the counſell of God, and the force of Nabuchodonoſor; vſed now that remedy, which Wolphius truely tearmeth: triſte, turpe, & infœlix: Woefull, ſhamefull, and vnfortunate.

By this ſecret ſubterrane vault, Zedechias making his ſtealth, recouered (by the helpe of the darke night) the Plaines or Deſarts of Iericho: but by reaſon of the traine, that followed him and his, (euery one leading with him thoſe whom they held moſt deare vnto them) he was eaſily traced and purſued. How great ſoeuer the company was that attended on him, yet, as Ioſephus reports it, they on whoſe fidelity he moſt repoſed himſelfe, no ſooner beheld the Chaldæans approach, but they all abandoned his defence, and ſhifted themſelues into the Deſarts as they could. For whom God had forſaken, no man followed, but the Miniſters of his vengeance; by whom Zedechias being made Priſoner, with his Children, and Princes, he was conueighed to Rebla or Reblath a Citie (as ſome thinke) of Nephtalim, where Nabuchodonoſor then lay, as a place indifferent betweene Ieruſalem and Tyre, with both which at one he had to doe.

Ioſeph. Antiq. l. 10. c. 11.

Now after Nabuchodonoſor had layed before Zedekias the many graces and benefits conferred vpon him, together with the notable falſehood and periurie, wherewith he had requited them; he commanded his Children, Princes, and Friends, to be ſlaine before his face. This being done, to the end that ſo lamentable a ſpectacle ſhould be the laſt, that euer he ſhould behold in the World, he cauſed his eyes to be torne out of his head, and ſo carried him in a ſlauiſh manner to Babel, where he conſumed the reſt of his wretched life in perpetuall impriſonment. Herein this moſt maruailous Prophecie of Ezechiel was performed; Adducam eum in Babylonem & ipſam non videbit. I will bring him into Babylon, and he ſhall not ſee it.

Ezek. 12.

Thus in the Eleauenth and laſt yeere of Zedekias, which was the eighteenth of Nabuchodonoſor, the Chaldæans entred the Citie by force, where ſparing no ſexe nor age, they committed all to the ſword that they therein found, 3534. In the yeere next following, Nabuzaradan, Generall of the Armie, burnt the Kings Palace, and the reſt of Ieruſalem: and after this fire had laſted from the ſeauenth to the tenth day, he alſo burnt the Temple of God to the ground, when it had ſtood foure hundred thirtie and one yeeres.

After this, vpon a ſecond ſearch, Nabuzaradan (not yet ſatiated with bloud) commanded ſeauenty and two others to be ſlaughtered, which had hidden themſelues from the firſt furie, to wit, the chiefe and the ſecond Prieſt, two Commanders of Zedechias his men of Warre, fiue of his Houſe-hold ſeruants, and others to that number; carrying away to Babylon the ableſt of the people throughout all Iudæa; and leauing the pooreſt labouring ſoules, with ſome that followed the partie of Nabuchodonoſor, to till the ground: ouer whom he left Gouernour, Godolia the Nephew of that Saphan, whom Ioſias had formerly employed in the reformation of Religion, who is, for his iuſtice and equitie, by Ioſephus highly commended. This man, a Iewe by Nation, left Zedechias as it ſeemeth, in the beginning of the warre: and by Ieremies deſire to liue with him, it appeareth that he had embraced the ſame aduice, which the Prophet gaue vnto Zedechias; which was, to ſubmit himſelfe altogether to the Babylonian, who being ordained by God to exerciſe his iuſtice, was therefore reſiſtleſſe. The Prophet Ieremie being left to his owne choice, either to liue in Chaldæa, or elſewhere, he made election of Godoliah, to whom he was recommended; who not onely embraced Ieremie, but gaue comfort to all the other Iewes, that were left vnder his charge, promiſing them fauour & liberty, ſolong as they remained obedient Subiects to Nabuchodonoſor, by whom he was eſtabliſhed Prouinciall Gouernour of his owne Nation.

But ere that yeere was expired, a Prince of the late Kings houſe (who during the ſiege of Ieruſalem, had kept himſelfe out of the ſtorme, with Baalis King of the Ammonites) being followed by ten other choſen men, while Godoliah feaſted them in Maſpha or Mitſpa, the Citie of his reſidence, trayterouſly ſlue him, together with diuers Chaldæans and Iewes that accompanied him. This done, he made an eſcape, and in his way encountring with eightie perſons, repairing towards Godoliah with preſents, he ſlue the moſt of them, and ſpared the reſt, becauſe they promiſed to diſcouer vnto him ſome Treaſures hidden in the fields during the warre. He alſo tooke with him a Daughter of Zedechias, committed to the care of Godoliah by Nabuchodonoſor. This practice and intent of Iſmael had beene formerly diſcouered vnto Godolia by Iohanan, one of the Leaders of the few remaining Iewes; but Godoliah was incredulous.

Iudæa being now left without a Gouernour (for Iſmael durſt not take it vpon him, but retired himſelfe, or rather fled as faſt as he could to the Ammonites) the reſidue of the Iewes, fearing the reuenge of the Chaldæans, reſolued to flye away into Ægypt, and beſought Ieremie to aske counſell of God for them: who readily made them anſwere, that if they remained in Iudæa, God would prouide for them, and ſhew them mercy; but if they ſought to ſaue themſelues in Ægypt, that they ſhould then vndoubtedly periſh. Notwithſtanding this aduice, the Iewes held their determination; and deſpiſing the Oracle of God, and conſtrayning Ieremie and Baruch to accompanie them, they trauailed into Ægypt, and inhabited by the permiſſion of Pharao, neere vnto Taphnes: where, when Ieremie often reprehended them for their Idolatrie, foretelling both the deſtruction of themſelues, and the Ægyptians alſo, he was by theſe his owne hardhearted and vngratefull Countrimen, ſtoned to death; and by the Ægyptians, who greatly reuerenced him, buried neere the Sepulchre of their owne Kings.

Finis Libris ſecundi.

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORIE OF THE WORLD:

Intreating of the Times from the destruction of Ierusalem, to the time of PHILIP of MACEDON.

THE THIRD BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

Of the time passing betweene the destruction of Ierusalem, and the fall of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.

Of the connexion of Sacred and prophane Historie.

THE course of Time; which in prophane Histories might rather be discerned through the greatest part of his way, hitherto passed in some out-worne foot-steps, than in any beaten path, hauing once in Greece by the Olympiads, and in the Easterne Countries by the accompt from Nabonassar, left surer markes, and more appliable to actions concurrent, than were the warre of Troy, or any other token of former date; begins at length in the ruine of Ierusalem to discouer the connexion of antiquitie fore-spent, with the storie of succeeding ages. Manifest it is, that the originall and progresse of things could ill be sought in those that were ignorant of the first creation: as likewise that the affaires of Kingdomes and Empire afterwards growne vp, are not to be found among those, that haue now no state nor policie remaining of their owne. Hauing therefore pursued the storie of the world vnto that age, from whence the memorie of succeeding accidents is with little interruption of fabulous discourse deriued vnto vs, I hold it now conuenient briefly to shew, by what means and circumstances the Historie of the Hebrewes, which of all other is the most ancient, may be conioyned with the following times, wherein that Image of sundry mettals, discouered by God vnto Nebuchadnezzar, did reigne ouer the earth, when Israel was either none, or an vnregarded Nation.

Herein I doe not hold it needefull, to insist vpon those authorities, which giue, as it were by heare-say, a certaine yeere of some old Assyrian King vnto some action or euent, whereof the time is found expressed in Scripture: for together with the end of Ninus his line line in Sardanapalus, if not before, all ſuch computations were blotted out; the ſucceſſion of Belochus and his iſſue that occupied the kingdome afterwards, depending vpon the vncertaine relations of ſuch, as were neither conſtant in aſſigning the yeeres of his beginning, nor of credit enough for others to relye vpon. Let it therefore ſuffice, that the conſent and harmonie, which ſome haue found in the yeeres of thoſe ouer-worne Monarchs, doth preſerue their names, which otherwiſe might haue beene forgotten. Now concerning the latter Kings of that Nation, howſoeuer it be true that we finde the names of all or moſt of them in Scriptures, which are recorded by prophane Hiſtorians, yet hereby could we onely learne in what age each of them liued, but not in what yeere his reigne began or ended, were it not that the reigne of Nabuchadnezzar is more preciſely applyed to the times of Iehoiakim and Zedekias. Hence haue we the firſt light whereby to diſcouer the meanes of connecting the ſacred and prophane Hiſtories. For vnder Nebuchadnezzar was the beginning of the captiuitie of Iuda, which ended when 70. yeeres were expired; and theſe 70. yeeres tooke end at the firſt of Cyrus, whoſe time being well knowne, affords vs meanes of looking backe into the ages paſt, and forwards into the race of men ſucceeding. The firſt yeere of Cyrus his reigne in Perſia, by generall conſent, is ioyned with the firſt yeere of the 55. Olympiad, where, that he reigned three and twentie yeeres before his Monarchie, and ſeauen yeeres afterwards, it is apparent, and almoſt out of controuerſie. Giuing therefore foure hundred and eight yeeres vnto the diſtance betweene the fall of Troy, and the inſtauration of the Olympiads by Iphitus; we may eaſily arriue vnto thoſe antiquities of Greece, which were not meerly fabulous. As for Princes ruling the whileſt in ſundry parts of the world, S. Auguſtine and others may be truſted in ſetting downe their times, which they had by Tradition from authors of wel-approued faith and induſtrie.

From Cyrus forwards, how the times are reckoned vnto Alexander, and from him to the battaile of Actium, it were (peraduenture) in this place impertinent to ſet downe. But ſeeing that the beginning and end of the Babylonian captiuitie are markes whereby we are chiefly directed, in paſſing from the firſt vnto the lateſt yeeres of the world, through any ſtorie, with leaſt interruption; it is very expedient that we take ſome paines to informe our ſelues truely of the 70. yeeres, during which it continued, euen from Nebuchadnezzar vnto Cyrus.

§. II.

A brieſe rehearſall of two opinions, touching the beginning of the captiuitie: with an anſwere to the cauils of Porphyrie, inueighing againſt S. Matthew, and Daniel, vpon whom the later of theſe opinions is founded.

MAny Commentators, and other Hiſtorians, & Chronologers finde, that the captiuity then began, when Iechonias was carried priſoner into Babylon, eleauen yeres before the finall deſtruction of Ieruſalem vnder Zedekias. This they proue out of diuers places in Ezekiel, eſpecially out of the fourteenth chapter, where he makes a plaine diſtinction betweene the beginning of the Captiuitie, and vtter deſtruction of Ieruſalem by Nabuzaradan, in theſe words: In the fiue and twentieth yeere of our being in captiuitie, in the beginning of the yeere, in the tenth day of the moneth, in the foureteenth yeere after that the Citie was ſmitten. In which words he beginneth the captiuitie in plaine termes, eleauen yeeres before the Citie was deſtroyed. Beroaldus is of opinion that it began in the firſt of Nabuchodonoſor, and the fourth of Ioakim, which he endeuours to proue out of the ſecond of Chronicles, but more eſpecially out of Saint Matthew, and Daniel, whoſe words afford matter of diſputation, but ſerue not to make good ſo much as Beroaldus would enforce. That place of S. Matthew, and the whole booke of Daniel, haue miniſtred occaſion of ſcoffing and railing at the Chriſtian religion to that wretched man Porphyrie, who, not vnderſtanding how the ſonnes of King Ioſias were called by diuers names, as Epiphanius hath ſhewed at large, thought that the Apoſtle had ſpoken hee knew not what in reckoning the ſonnes, or, according to ſome tranſlations, the Sonne and Nephewes of that good King, begotten about the time of the captiuitie. Vpon Daniel alſo the ſame Porphyrie doth ſpend the twelfth of his malicious bookes written againſt the Chriſtians, affirming that theſe prophecies and viſions remembred by Daniel, were written long after his death, and at, or neere the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. This fond supposition of his, Eusebius, Apollonius, and others, haue sufficiently answered. For the seauenty Interpreters, who conuerted the old Testament about an hundred yeeres before Epiphanes, did also turne this booke of Daniel out of Hebrew into Greeke, as a part of Scripture receiued. And were there no other argument to confound Porphyrie, than that of Alexander Macedon, it were sufficient, who liued diuers yeeres before Antiochus Epiphanes. For Iaddus the high Priest shewed that great Conqueror, when he came towards Ierusalem to haue destroyed it, this booke of Daniel, wherein he beheld his owne glory foretold, as the same was plainely expounded vnto him; which not onely stayed his hand from the harme of that Citie and people, but his assurance and resolution was so confirmed and strengthened thereby, as despising all future perill and resistance, he conquered Darius, and the Easterne Empire in a shorter time than Nabuchodonosor had done one Citie, to wit, Tyre in Phœnicia.

Ioseph.ant.11.

It is true indeede that the Iewes themselues giue lesse authoritie to Daniel, than to Moses, and the Prophets, accompting his booke among those which they call Cetaphim, or Hagiographa, or holy Writings, which they say Esdras and the Seniors of the Synagogue compiled after their returne from Babylon. But first, that the booke of Daniel (I meane so much as is found in the Hebrew) is Canonicall: secondly, that it was written by Daniel himselfe, and not by Esdras and the Seniors; we may assure our selues by testimonie of Councels, and Fathers. For in the Counsell of Laodicea held about the yeere of our Lord 368. after the death of Iouinian the Emperour, and after the Nicene Councell three and forty yeeres, this booke of Daniel was receiued, verified and confirmed among the other Canonicall Scriptures, as in the Epitomie of the same Counsell it may be seene; and so doth Meliton the most ancient Bishop of Sardis number it, witnesse Eusebius in his Ecclesiasticall history, the fourth booke, and fiue and twentieth chapter: so doth the same Author in the Catalogue of Canonicall bookes vpon Origen, so doth Hilarius in his Preface vpon the Psalmes, and Epiphanius in his booke of Waights and Measures, &c. To these I may adde Saint Hierome, Gregorie Nazianzene, and others. For the Hagiographa bookes or holy Writings, the Iewes and Rabbines reckon to be these, Daniel, Psalmes, Prouerbs, Iob, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Hester, Esra, Nehemiah, and the Chronicles. And that it was Daniel, and not Esdras, that wrote this booke, Gods commandement vnto him by his Angell, to seale vp the same to the time appointed, is an vnanswerable testimonie. Yea that which exceedeth all strength of other proofe, our Saui our Christ who citeth no Apocryphall Scripture, in Matthew and Marke alleageth Daniel the Prophet, to wit, the last verse of his ninth chapter. Further, in the fift of Iohn, Christ distributeth the risen from the dead, as in Daniel the twelfth, verse the second. Saint Paul describeth Antichrist out of Daniel, and the Reuelation is wholly an interpretation of Daniels visions.

§. III

That the 70. yeeres of captiuitie are to be numbered from the destruction of Ierusalem; not from the migration of Iechonia.

HAuing thus farre digressed, in maintaining that authority, which must often be cited in the present argument, it is now conuenient, that we returne vnto the differences of opinion, concerning the beginning of these 70. yeeres. Neither will I stand to trouble my selfe and others with laying open the grounds or weakenesse of that which Eusebius and some few nameless Authors, haue sometimes held in this point, which is lately reuiued by Beroaldus; but will forth-with enter into consideration of that opinion, which many both ancient and late Writers haue so earnestly maintained, that it wants not much of being common.

Foure Kings of Iuda were carried away captiues to Babylon: First, Manasses; then Iehoiakim, and with him among others, Daniel the Prophet: thirdly, Iechonias, and with him Ezekiel: lastly, Zedekias, at which time the Citie and Temple were destroyed. To the first of these captiuities the beginning of the 70. yeeres is referred by none that I haue read; to the second, by few and with weake proofe; to the third, by very many and with much confidence. For besides those places of Ezekiel already cited, there is a strong argument gathered gathered out of Ieremie, which may seeme to make the matter plaine. For the Prophet in comforting the people that were carried away with Iechonias, vseth these words: Thus saith the Lord, After 70. yeeres be accomplished at Babel, I will visit you, and perform my good promise towards you, and cause you to returne to this place. Ierem. 29. 10.

But it stands indeed with little reason that we should seeke the interpretation of a prophecie out of circumstances, when the prophecie is such as doth sufficiently expound it selfe. Ieremie had alreadie, in the fourth yeere of Iehoiakim, denounced the iudgement of God against the Land, for the sinnes and impœnitencie of that obstinate people, in these words: Behold, I will send and take to me all the families of the North, saith the Lord, and Nebuchadnezzar, the King of Babel, my seruant; and will bring them against this Land, and against the Inhabitants thereof, and against all these Nations round about, and I will destroy them, and make them an astonishment, and an hissing, and a continuall desolation. Moreouer, I will take from them the voyce of mirth, and the voyce of gladnesse, the voyce of the Bridegroome, and the voyce of the Bride, the noyse of the mill-stones, and the light of the candle, and this whole Land shall be desolate, and an astonishment, and these Nations shall serue the King of Babel 70. yeeres. And when 70. yeeres are expired, I will visit the King of Babel. Ierem. 29. 10. 16. 17. & 18.

Heere we see prescribed vnto the captiuitie the terme of 70. yeeres, which were to commence, neither when the prophecie was vttered; nor when Iehoiakim, who then reigned, was taken by Nebuchadnezzar; nor yet in the time of Iechonia; but with the vtter desolation of the Citie, whereof Ieremie did againe giue notice to those that were alreadie in Babylon, at such time as he sent them the comfort of deliuerance before rehearsed. And so did the people vnderstand this prophecie, in those times when they saw it accomplished, beginning the 70. yeeres at the time of the desolation, as manifestly appeares in the end of the Historie of Iuda, where it is said thus: They burnt the house of God, and brake downe the wall of Ierusalem, and burnt all the Palaces thereof with fire, and all the precious vessels thereof to destroy all: And they that were left by the sword, carried he away to Babel, and they were seruants to him and to his sonnes, vntill the Kingdome of the Persians had rule, to fulfill the word of the Lord by the mouth of Ieremia, vntill the Land had her fill of her Sabbaths: for all the daies that she lay desolate, shee kept Sabbath, to fulfill 70. yeeres. But in the first yeere of Cyrus King of Persia (when the word of the Lord, spoken by the mouth of Ieremia, was finished) the Lord stirred vp the spirit of Cyrus. 2. Chro. 36. 19. Wee seldome find one piece of Scripture so precisely and plainely expounded by another, as in this prophecie, to haue afterwards beene the subiect of altercation. For one can hardly deuise, how eyther the desolation could haue beene expressed more sensibly, than it was by the Prophet, or the euent of the prophecie haue beene more exactly set downe, than it was in the place now last of all cited. If it be requisite that we bring more proofe in so euident a case, the ninth Chapter of Daniel yeelds testimonie sufficient, vnto this expedition of Ieremia his prophecie, that Ierusalem was to lie waste 70. yeeres. For in the first yeere of Darius the Mede, which was the last of the 70. Daniel obtained of God the deliuerance that had beene promised by prayer, which hee made vpon consideration of the time that was expired: as he telleth in these words: In the first yeere of his reigne, I Daniel vnderstood by bookes the number of the yeeres, whereof the Lord hath spoken vnto Ieremiah the Prophet, that he would accomplish 70. yeeres in the desolation of Ierusalem. Dan. 9. 2. So that howsoeuer the time of Daniel his owne captiuitie be reckoned from the taking of Iehoiakim, and that the people carried away with Iechonia, did accompt, as well they might, the yeeres of their owne captiuitie; yet with the generall desolation of the Countrie, wherein were few or none of the Israelites left remaining to inhabite, beganne in the ninteenth yeere of Nabuchodonosor the great captiuitie, which by Gods appointment continued vnto the end of seuentie yeeres.

This I will not further seeke to proue, by the authoritie of Iosephus and others affirming the same; for as much as that which already hath beene produced, is enough to satisfie any man that hath not fully determined to hold the contrarie.

§. IIII.

Sundrie opinions of the Kings which reigned in Babylon during the 70. yeeres.

WHat Kings reigned in Babylon, during these seuentie yeeres of the captiuity, and how long each of them did weare the Diademe, it is a matter of no great importance to know; for as much as neither their acts were notable in the age wherein they liued, nor the length of their reignes, any way helpfull to the concordance of times, fore-going or succeeding. The conquests recounted by Xenophon of Syria, Arabia, (or rather some part of it) Hyrcania, Bactria, and perhaps of some other Countries, may seeme fruits of the victories obtained by Nebuchadnezzar the Great (or by some of his Ancestors) in the former part of his life, before he betooke himselfe to ease, and to the sumptuous building of his great Babel, for the house of his Kingdome, and for the honour of his Maiestie, where it may seeme that hee and his Heires kept a great state, and did very little. The idle behauiour of the Assyrian Souldiers, in such skirmishes as afterwards they had with the Medes, doth argue no lesse. For whereas vnder Nebuchadnezzar, they were so stout and industrious, that (to omit other proofes) they attempted, and finished, that hardie piece of worke, of winning the strong Citie of Tyre, by ioyning vnto it the continent, filling vp the deepe and broad channell of the Sea, diuiding it from the maine with a mole, or peere of earth, and other matter, the reparation whereof, when the Sea had washed it away, was the very greatest of Alexanders workes; in the times following, they became timorous, that they durst not approach neerer to the enemie than their bowes would carrie, but were readie to turn their backs, as soone as anie, though inferiour in numbers, aduenturing within the distance offered to charge them.

Now as their actions from the end of Nebuchadnezzars warres, till the ruine of their Empire, were not worthy to bee recorded; so was the distinction of their times, and reigne of their seuerall Kings, vnworthy of the great labour that hath in vaine beene taken in that businesse. For when it is granted, that the captiuity of Iuda, ending with that Empire, lasted 70. yeeres, wee may as reasonably forbeare to search into the particular continuance of two or three slothful Kings, as we are contented to be ignorant of the ages of the Patriarchs, and their children liuing in the Ægyptian seruitude; resting satisfied in both with the generall assured summe.

Yet for as much as many haue trauelled in this businesse, vpon desire (as I take it) to approue the beginning and end of the 70. yeres, not onely by the reignes of other Princes, ruling else-where, but by the times of the Assyrians themselues: I will not refuse to take a little paines in collecting their opinions, and shewing what I thinke, may best bee held for likely, if the certaine truth cannot be found.

The opinions are many, and greatly repugnant, both in recounting the Kings themselues, and in setting downe the yeeres of their seuerall reignes. The first (as I take it) the surest, is theirs, who meerely follow the authoritie of the Scriptures, without borrowing any helpe from others. These name onely three Kings, Nabuchadnezzar, Euilmerodach, and Balthasar. Neither haue they onely the silence of Daniel, who names none other to be their warrant, but the prophecie of Ieremie precisely, and in a manner purposely teaching the very same. For God, by the mouth of that Prophet, shewing that he being absolute Lord of all, would dispose of all according to his owne will, and making it known that he had put some Countries here named, into the hands of the King of Ierem. 27. v. 7. Babel, saith thus: And all Nations shall serue him, and his Sonne, and his Sonnes Sonne, vntill the very time of his Land come also; then many Nations and great King shall serue themselues of him. These words expressing the continuance of the Chaldean Empire, and number of the Kings, will hardly be qualified with any distinction. But indeed I finde no other necessitie of qualification to be vsed heerein, than such as may grow out of mens desire to reconcile the Scriptures vnto profane authors. And this desire were not vniust, if the consent of all histories were on the one side, and the letter of the holy Text were single on the other side.

But contrariwise, the Authors which are cited in this case, are so repugnant one to the other, and the proofes of their different reports are so slender and vnsufficient, that the succession of these Princes, had it not bin thus deliuered in scriptures, but only set down by some ſome Author of equall credit with the reſt, might very well haue found and deſerued as good beliefe, as any of thoſe things which they haue deliuered in this point. For ſome there are, who following Ioſephus, deriue that Empire, as by deſcent from father to ſon, through fiue generations; beginning with Nabuchodonoſor the great, and giuing to him 43. yeeres; to Euilmerodach 18. to Nigliſar the ſonne of Euilmerodach 40, to Laboſardach the ſonne of Nigliſar 9. moneths, and laſtly to Balthaſar (whom Ioſephus intimates to be of the race of Nabuchodonoſor, without naming his father) 17. yeeres. And this opinion (ſaue that he forbeares to reckon the yeeres, and plainely calls Balthaſar the ſonne of Laboſardach) Saint Hierome doth follow, alledging Beroſus and Ioſephus as a ſectator of Beroſus, for his Authors; though Beroſus as he is cited by Ioſephus, report the matter farre otherwiſe. For hee tells vs that Euilmerodach the ſonne of Nabuchodonoſor did reigne but two yeres, being for his wickednesſe and luſt, ſlaine by his ſiſters husband Nizigliſſoroor, who occupied the kingdome after him foure yeeres, and left it to his owne ſonne Laboſardach; who being an ill-conditioned boy, was at the end of nine moneths ſlaine by ſich as were about him, and the kingdome giuen to one Nobonidus, who held it by the election of the Conſpirators, and left it vnto Cyrus after 17. yeeres. This relation ill agrees with that of Ioſephus, and both of them as bad with the Scriptures, in number eyther of yeeres, or of generations; yet the particularities which they handle, haue procured vnto them ſome authority, ſo that the names which they haue inſerted, are taken as it were vpon truſt. There is a third opinion which makes the three laſt kings brethren, and ſonnes of Euilmerodach; and this may well enough agree with the Scripture: though I had rather beleeue Xenophon, who ſaith that the laſt King of Babylon was immediate ſucceſſour to his father. But whereas the Author of the Scholaſticall Hiſtorie, who is founder of this opinion, placeth betweene him that tooke Ieruſalem, and Euilmerodach, another Nabuchodonoſor: plaine enough it is that he hath, out of any Hiſtorie ſacred or profane, as little warrant to guide him, as we haue reaſon to follow him. Euſebius, Sulpitius Seuerus, and Theodoret, vpon better ground, haue ſuppoſed, that Euilmerodach and Balthaſar were brethren and ſonnes of the great Nabuchodonoſor. This is built on the fifth chapter of Daniel, wherein Balthaſar (for of Euilmerodach there is none that euer doubted) is often called Nabuchodonoſor his ſonne. And ſo common grew this explication, that S. Hierome called it the vulgar opinion. But the place of Ieremie before cited, proues that Balthaſar was not the ſonne indeed, but the grand-childe of that great conquerour, though by the phraſe very common in Scriptures, and familiar in thoſe Eaſterne languages, he was called the ſonne.

Ioſephus antiq. lib. 10. cap. 12.

Ioſ. contr. Appian. lib. 1.

Xenoph. Cyropæd. lib. 4.

Annius his Metaſthenes hits very rightly the ſeuentie yeres of captiuity, giuing to Nabuchodonoſor 45. yeeres, to Euilmerodach 30. yeeres, and to the three ſonnes of Euilmerodach, nephews of Nabuchodonoſor fourteene yeres; that is, to Reg-Aſſar the eldeſt ſon three yeeres, to Lab-Aſſar Dach the ſecond ſonne ſixe yeeres, and to Balthaſar the third ſonne fiue.

To this accompt agreeing with the Scriptures, both in the whole ſumme of yeeres, and in the number of generations, I haue ſometime ſubſcribed, as not daring to reiect an appearance of truth, vpon no greater reaſon than becauſe the Author was of Annius his edition. Yet could I not ſatisfie my ſelfe herein; both for that none of the Ancient, and few ſuch of the moderne Writers as deſerue to bee regarded, haue conſented with this Metaſthenes; and for that in making Balthaſar ſucceed vnto his brother in the kingdome, and not vnto his father, he is wholly againſt Xenophon, whoſe Hiſtorie of the elder Cyrus in his Aſſyrian warre I can not ſlightly value in many reſpects, and eſpecially becauſe it is very agreeable to the Scriptures, in the taking of Babylon, while the king was at his drunken feaſt.

Seeking therefore diligently into all circumſtances that might giue any light in this obſcuritie, I found manifeſt proofe, that the time allotted vnto Balthaſar, by Annius his Metaſthenes, was farre ſhort of the truth, which is enough to render all ſuſpected that he hath ſaid in diſtributing what part of the 70. yeeres he pleaſed amongſt the reſt. For in the third yeere of Balthaſar, Daniel ſaw a viſion, after which he was ſicke certaine dayes, but when he roſe vp, he did the Kings buſineſſe: from which buſineſſe, that he did afterwards withdraw himſelfe, and liue retired, ſo long that he was forgotten in the Court, it appeares plainely, both by the many words which the old Queene vſed to ſet out his ſufficiencie, and by the Kings asking of him, when hee came into his preſence, whether hee were

Dan. ch. 8. ver. 1. and 27.

Dan. c. 5. v. 11 12. & 13. Dan. 2. 49. were Daniel. Now to thinke that a man of such account and place as Daniel had held, could in two yeeres haue beene worne out of remembrance, were in my iudgement a very strange conceit, which rather than I would entertaine, I can well be contented, to thinke the whole storie (thus related) a part of Annius his impostures.

Out of these reports of Iosephus, Berosus, and others, many new opinions are framed, by coniectures of late Writers. For the endurance of the captiuitie being 70. yeeres, and these yeeres extending vnto the first of Cyrus, in which course of time Nebuchadnezzar, his sonne and grand-child, must haue reigned; it hath seemed needfull to supply the yeeres of these three descents, by inserting some, whose reignes might fill vp the whole continuance of the captiuitie; with which the time allotted by Berosus and others, to Euilmerodach and Balthasar, ioyned vnto the yeeres following the ninteen of Nebuchadnezzar, (wherein Ierusalem was laid desolate) are nothing euen.

Therefore Mercator and others following him, fashion the yeeres of Euilmerodach in this sort. They say, that the 18. yeeres giuen to him by Iosephus in the tenth of his Antiquities, should be read and numbred 28. yeeres, and the two yeeres that Berosus hath allowed to Euilmerodach should be written 23. in the first number the figure of (1) is mistaken for the figure of (2) and in the later there should haue been added the figure of (3) to that of (2:) this granted (to wit) that Euilmerodach reigned 28. yeeres, whereof fiue together with his father, and 23. after his death, and the same number of 23. added to the 25. which Nabuchodonosor liued after the destruction of Ierusalem, make 49; then 4. yeeres of Niglisar according to Berosus, 9. moneths of Labassardach his sonne, and 17. yeeres of Labonidus or Balthasar, make vp the number of 70. yeeres to the first of Cyrus. But whether by errour in figures, or in words, the numbers be vtterly mistaken in all copies extant; vpon how weake a foundation doe they build, who hauing nothing to helpe them, saue onely the bare names of two vnknowne Kings, found in Authors manifestlie corrupted, and such as if they had beene entirely extant, were not worthy, to haue that place of Ieremie called into dispute, in regard of their authoritie?

§ V.

A more particular examination of one opinion touching the number, persons, and reignes of the Babylonian Kings.

THer suppositions, little different in substance from this of Mercator, I purpose lie forbeare to rehearse, as falling vnder the same answere. That of Ioseph Scaliger I may not forget, as deseruing to be considered apart from the rest. Hee giues to Nebuchadnezzar 44. yeeres, to Euilmerodach two, to Belsazer, fiue: and to Nabonidus 17. So that from the 19. of Nabuchadnezzar, in which Ierusalem was destroyed, vnto the time of Cyrus hee accounteth onely 59. yeeres; beginning (as many doe) the captiuitie 11. yeres sooner, from the transportation of Iechonia. But hereof enough hath beene said alreadie. That which wee are now to consider, is his distribution of the time running between the 19. of Nabuchadnezzar, and the fall of the Caldean Empire: wherein if he haue erred, then is all further inquisition friuolous.

Concerning the length of Nabuchadnezzars reigne, I shall hereafter vpon better occasion deliuer my opinion. The time which he giues to Euilmerodach, is very short, and more precisely agreeing with Berosus than with the Scriptures. For we finde in Ieremie, that this Euilmerodach in the first of his reigne, shewing all fauour to Iechonia, did among other things take order for him at his table; and that he did continually eat bread before him all the dayes of his life. His portion was a continuall portion giuen him of the King of Babel, euery day a certaine, all the dayes of his life vntill he died. The very sound of these words (which is more to be esteemed, than the authority of Berosus, were he perfectly extant) imports a farre longer time than two yeeres, wherein Iechonia, vnder this gentle Prince, enioyed the comfort sent by God, whose commandement he had obeyed in yeelding himselfe to Nabuchadnezzar. Indeede how long Iechonia did liue, it cannot be proued; but plaine it is hereby, that all his remaining dayes he did eate bread before this King. Now that he liued not so short a while after this as 2. yeeres, it is more than likely, for he was but 55. yeeres old when he was set at liberty, hauing bin 37. yeeres in the prison, whereinto he was cast at the age of 18. yeeres; after which time it seemes plaine that he begat Salathiel, as well by the age of Zorobabel, who is said to haue beene

but a young man, and one of Darius his Pages threeſcore yeeres after this, as by other circumſtances of his impriſonment it ſelfe.

Of Belſazer, to whom Scaliger giues the next fiue yeeres, naming him alſo Laboroſoardoch, I ſhould wonder why hee calls him Nebuchadnezzars daughters ſonne, were it not that herein I finde him very carefull to helpe out Beroſus, by ſhifting in his Nirigliſſoroor, as husband to Nabuchadnezzars daughter, and Protector of his ſonne foure of theſe yeeres; by which meanes there remaines about one yeere to Belſazer alone, agreeing neerely with the nine moneths aſſigned by Beroſus to the ſonne of Nigliſar. But Ieremie hath told vs that it was to Nebuchadnezzar, and to his ſon, and to his ſons ſon (not to his daughters ſonne) that the Empire was promiſed: which difficultie if Scaliger could not helpe, it was well done of him, to paſſe it ouer with ſilence.

Nabonidus the laſt of theſe (whom others, deſirous to reconcile Beroſus to the Scriptures) haue iudged to be all one with Balthaſar, is by Scaliger thought to be Darius of the Medes. But herein Scaliger is no firme Beroſian: for Beroſus makes him of the ſame ſtocke or race a Babylonian. I ſpeake not this to diſgrace the trauaile of that moſt learned man (for it highly commends his diligence and iudgement, that he was not ſo wedded to any author, as affected with the loue of truth) but to ſhew that hee himſelfe hauing in ſome points diſliked thoſe Writers, whom in generall he approueth, might with greater reaſon haue wholly reformed them by the Scriptures, wherein can be no error. Two things there are which chiefly did breed or confirme this opinion in Scaliger, that he whom Beroſus calls Nabonidus, was the ſame whom Daniel had called Darius of the Medes: Firſt, the phraſe of Scripture, which ſignifies vnto vs, that Darius tooke the kingdome, not ſaying that he wanne it by force of armes: Secondly, a fragment of Megaſthenes found in Euſebius, wherein this Nabonidus is called the Median. Touching the word of the Originall, or of the Greeke tranſlation, which expreſſing no force of armes, doth only ſignifie, that Darius tooke or receiued the kingdome; I ſee no reaſon why wee ſhould thereupon inferre, that the next King entred by Election: ſeeing Daniel relateth not the meanes and circumſtances of Balthaſars death, but onely the ſwift accompliſhment of his owne prophecie. Neither could it indeed haue properly beene ſaid (if Daniel had cared to vſe the moſt expreſſiue termes) that Darius of the Medes breaking into the Citie, did winne the kingdome; ſeeing this was performed by Cyrus in the abſence of Darius, though by his forces, and to his vſe. Now concerning the fragment of Megaſthenes, true it is; that in Euſebius his workes printed at Baſile, in the yeere 1559. I finde onely thus much of Megaſthenes, cited out of Alpheeus; That Nabuchodonoſor was more valiant than Hercules; that he ſubdued all Lybia, and the reſt of Aſia as farre as to the Armenians; and that as the Chaldeans report, being returned into his kingdome, and rapt with a diuine furie, he cried with a loud voyce: O Babylonians, I foretell ye of a great calamitie, that ſhall come vpon you, which neyther Bel, nor any of the gods ſhall auert: There will come a Perſian, halfe an Aſſe, that ſhall bring ſlauery vpon yee: and that, this and the like when he had ſpoken, hee vaniſhed. Of all this I beleeue little or nothing, ſauing that Nabuchodonoſor knew beforehand, that his Empire ſhould be tranſlated, as Daniel had foretold, from the golden head, to the ſiluer breſt. But that hee wanne all Africa or Lybia, I doe hold it neither true nor probable.

If Scaligers copy of Euſebius were the more perfect, out of which Megaſthenes tells vs that Nabuchodonoſor wanne both Africke and Spaine, I beleeue the fragment ſo much the leſſe: and am as little mooued with the authoritie of it, where it calls a Median the pride and confidence of the Aſſyrians; as where it tells of Nebuchadnezzar his owne vaniſhing away. Indeede that ſame title of halfe an Aſſe, by which he calleth Cyrus, makes me to ſuſpect the fable as cunningly forged out of Apollo his Oracle, wherein hee termeth him a Mule, becauſe his parentage was more noble on the mothers ſide, than on the fathers; as Mules are begotten by Aſſes vpon Mares. And thus much in anſwer of the two principall foundations whereon this opinion is built. As for the concinnitie and coherence which it had within it ſelfe, I eaſily allow it. But this proues nothing, for meere fictions haue not wanted theſe commendations: neither can any man beleeue that one ſo iudicious, induſtrious and deepely learned as Ioſeph Scaliger, would ouer-ſhoot himſelfe in ſetting downe repugnancies.

It now remaineth to examine the agreement of this with the Scriptures, from which there is no appeale. And herein it ſeemes that Scaliger, well knowing his own ſufficiency, hath hath beene little carefull to satisfie men that would frame Arguments against him. For if the prophecie of Daniel were true, that the Kingdome of Balthasar was diuided, and giuen to the Medes and Persians, either we must thinke that Darius of the Medes was not Nabonidus, or else wee must bethinke our selues what Persian it might be that shared the kingdome with him. For it is not more certaine, that Balthasar lost his life and Kingdome, than that his Kingdome was diuided and giuen to the Medes and Persians. Neither did the Medes and Persians fall out and fight for it, as by supposing Nabonidus to haue beene Darius, they should be thought to haue done; but these two Nations did compound the body of that Empire, and were accounted as Lords ouer all the subiect Prouinces, insomuch that the Greeke Historians did commonly call those warres which to Darius, and after him Xerxes, made vpon Greece, The warres of the Medes. Yea to Dan. 8. 20. cleare this point, euen Daniel himselfe resembles that King, with whom Alexander fought, vnto a Ramme with two hornes, calling him the King of the Medes and Persians. Wherefore the whole Nation of Chronologers were not to haue beene condemned by Ioseph Scaliger, for maintaining vpon such good grounds, that Darius of the Medes, was partner with Cyrus in his victories, and not a Chaldean King by him subdued. Neither was Iosephus to be the lesse regarded, for affirming that Balthasar was destroyed by Darius of the Medes, and his nephew Cyrus, though herein he varied from Berosus, and others, whose authority elsewhere he gladly citeth. For Iosephus had no reason to beleeue any mans faith or knowledge of those times, halfe so well as Daniels whom I beleeue that he vnderstood as farre as was needfull in this case. Lawfull it was for him to alleage all Authors that had any mention, though vnperfect, of the same things that were contained in the writings of the Iewes, to whose histories thereby hee procured reputation in the Roman world, where they were strangers, and might seeme fabulous. Euen so doe Eusebius, and other Writers, willingly embrace the testimonies of heathen bookes making for the truth im some particulars; yet will they not therefore be tried in generall by the selfe same Ethnicke Philosophers, but leaue them where they are against the truth; as Iosephus in this case hath left Berosus. And thus much I thought it meet to say of Scaligers opinion in this point; holding neuertheless in due regard his learning and iudgement, which if in some things it had not failed, the miracle had then beene very great.

§. VI.

What may bee held as probable of the Persons and Times of Nabuchodonosor his successors.

IT now remaines that I freely acknowledge mine owne weakenesse, who cannot finde how the 70. yeeres of captiuitie are to bee diuided among them which reigned in Babylon, though I finde that the distribution made of them, in such wise as already is rehearsed, be ill agreeable to the holy Scriptures. Wherefore I may truely say with Pererius, that wee ought liberally to pardon those whose feet haue failed them in the slipperie wayes of Chronologie, wherein both learning and diligence are subiect to take a fall at one time or other, by ignorance, forgetfulnesse, or heedlesse reckoning. Yet will I aduenture to deliuer my opinion, wherein the iudgement of Lyra and others (holding those onely to haue reigned ouer Chaldeans, whose Names are found in the Scriptures) appeares more conformable to reason and account of time, than any of the other Sentences or Coniectures before rehearsed. Not that I will take vpon mee to defend Lyra his Coniectures, when hee supposeth by Nigliſar and Labosardach to bee meant the same persons which are called in Scriptures Euilmerodach and Balthasar (for this can by no good colour be maintained,) but onely to shew that the Kings by him cited, are likely to haue occupied the whole time of seuenty yeeres. First therefore let vs consider the reigne of Nabuchadnezzar, in whose eighteenth yeere Ierusalem was taken and sackt, but in his ninteenth layd vtterly desolate.

Most of Writers haue giuen to him 43. yeeres of reigne, following therein Berosus. There are who haue added one yeere more; and some haue made it vp 45. To dispute about the certainety were needlesse: for in shewing by what length of time the Scriptures measure him, we shall shew the certaine truth.

Manifest

Manifest it is, that the 19. yeere of Nebuchadnezzar, is ioyned with the 11. of Zedekia; as also that his eight yeere, was the first yeere of Iechonia his captiuitie; the reigne of Zedekia occupied all the meane space being of 11. yeeres. This is generally agreed vpon, so that it needes no further proofes: As for the beginning of his successor Euilmerodach, it was in the seuen and thirtieth yeere of Iechonia his captiuitie; so that Nebuchadnezzar after his 8. yeere (which was the first of Iechonia his bondage) reigned 35. whole yeres, and peraduenture a good part of the sixe and thirtieth, forasmuch as Iechonia was inlarged with so great fauour, not vntill the end of the yeere. Substracting therefore out of these foure and forty, which Nebuchadnezzars reigne did well-neere occupie, those eighteene yeeres of his which passed away before the captiuitie of Iuda, and ruine of the city, we haue remaining sixe and twenty yeeres of the seuentie, that were almost wholly spent when his sonne began to reigne. 2. King. 2. 5. 8. & Iere. 51. 12. 2. King. 24. 12. 2. King. 25. 27 & Ier. 52. 31.

It is now to be considered how the remainder of the seuentie yeeres were diuided betweene the Kings ruling in Babylon vntill the first of Cyrus. A question more difficult (as I said before) than greatly needfull: the whole summe being certaine, and the distinction of times affording no benefit in knowledge of their actions, who were slothfull Princes. Neither can any man the more iustly suspect the beginning or end of the whole 70 yeres, for that the distribution of some part of them is only coniecturall; seeing that none who giues any other termes to their beginning or end, hath refused to follow both vnlikely and desperate coniectures in diuiding them. I will therefore bee bold to doe as others haue done; knowing well before-hand, that whosoeuer shall discouer my error, must do me the pleasure (which I could rather wish in a case more materiall) of making me to vnderstand the truth.

Of the foure and forty yeeres remaining in accompt of Nebuchadnezzars death, wee are to take away the last, which was the first of Darius the Mede, and then hauing authoritie good enough to warrant vs from blame of presumption, in giuing vs seuenteene yeeres to Balthasar, we finde left in our hands to bestow vpon Euilmerodach sixe & twentie yeeres. Of the yeere belonging vnto Darius the Mede, I haue already spoken what I thought sufficient, in deliuering my opinion of the beginning and continuance of this captiuity. That Balthasar did reigne seuenteen yeeres, we haue the authority of Iosephus, before cited in expresse words; Wee haue also the generall consent of all, or the most late Writers, interpreting Berosus his Nabonidus, who reigned so long; and Balthasar to haue beene one. But nothing moueth mee so much to beleeue this Tradition, as first those euident places in Daniel, shewing that in the third yeere of Balthasar hee followed the Kings businesse, and yet was forgotten ere the end of his reigne, (a proofe sufficient of no few yeeres, passing vnder this man, especially seeing it is no where found that Daniels employments tooke end either that yeere or the next.) Secondly, the consideration of Cyrus his warres against the Assyrians, which beginning with the death of this mans father, and being alwaies prosperous, could hardly haue occupied any longer time, though wee make large allowance to his deeds in the lower Asia, which fell out in the midde-way: I haue already shewed, that there appeares in the Scriptures likelihood enough to make it credible, that the reigne of Euilmerodach was not short: and that men of great iudgement haue found it most probable, that he was a King three & twenty yeeres. More, I thinke, they would haue allowed him, had not the desire of satisfying Berosus caused them to rest content with this. And surely it were greatly to bee wished, that bookes of such antiquitie, as those of Berosus, were extant without corruption; a great light (no doubt) they would yeeld in many darke passages of Antiquitie. I will yet confesse, that were his workes neuer so excellent, and in all things else vnquestionably true, I would not therefore condescend vnto him in some one point, wherein the Scriptures were his open enemie. How much lesse ought I obey a broken fragment of his, containing onely seuen or eight lines, and part euen of the title corrupted, as they beleeue that follow him in the rest? The Scriptures haue told vs that God gaue the Empire to Nebuchadnezzar, to his sonne, and to his sonnes sonne: How long each of them held it, wee finde not expressed; yet would we gladly know it of Berosus, or of any other that would teach vs; prouided alwaies, that helping vs in a particularitie, hee destroyed not thereby the generall truth. More words are needlesse. It is enough to say with others, that Berosus or Iosephus who cited him, hath been wronged by the carelesnesse of Scribes; and that it was as easie for those Scribes to erre in writing two Dan. c. 8. v. 1. & 27. & c. 5. v. 11, 12. & 13 Ierem. 27. 7.

for fixe and twentie, as for three and twentie, or perhaps more easie. For the omission of the second figure, was as likely the one way as the other: and the Character 5. signifying 6. hath a neerer resemblance of β that stands for 2. than hath γ which is vsed for 3. So that the numerall notes β 5. expressing 26. were not safe enough from being mistaken in the true copie, and might be altered, as ill written, if some crooked hand, or other mischance not vnusuall, had omitted the first stroke of the former letter, or added a dash to the latter, which might cause them to seeme not two different figures, but the one a correction of the other, which how it could be supposed in βγ standing for 23. I doe not well perceiue. As for the Arithmeticall figures now in vse, they were long after the time of Iosephus brought in by the Arabians, and therefore doe not appertaine vnto this businesse; vnlesse wee should ghesse that his workes were corrupted in that vnlearned age, which following the Saracen conquest, was little occupied in the studies of humanitie, but in a sort wholly giuen ouer to the doctrine of Aristotle. If this will serue to make Berosus our friend, so let it be; if not, I will not purchase the fauour of his authoritie, by forsaking Ieremie and Daniel, when they seeme to bee his opposites.

Of the victories which Nabuchodonosor obtained betweene the destruction of Ierusalem, and conquest of Ægypt.

With what actions this time of 70. yeres was entertained by the Babylonian Kings, few haue written, or little is remaining in record. Which may peraduenture haue been some cause that the time it selfe was, and is yet sought to be abridged, as not hauing left sufficient matter to witnesse the length of it. But by such an argument we might as well deny to many people euen their being. For euery Nation (I know not whom I should except) betweene the beginning and last end of it, hath in some slothfull age rather dreamt away the time, than spent it. It is therefore no maruell, if the posteritie of Nabuchodonosor, finding all things readie to their hand, which their hearts could haue desired, betooke themselues to their ease and pleasures, thinking perhaps, like the prodigall sonnes of greedie fathers, their owne wisedome greater, which knew how to enioy, than that of their Ancestors, which wearied away their daies in the restlesse trauell of purchasing: Though indeed the reigne of Nabuchodonosor was so diuided, that his youthfull and strongers yeeres hauing beene exercised in victorious armes, no small part of his life was remaining to be spent in establishing what was gotten, and gathering the fruit of his worthie labours past. The ninteenth yeere of his reigne it was, when destroying vtterly the great and mightie Citie of Ierusalem, hee enriched himselfe with abundance of spoyle, and terrified all that would offer to resist him, by that fearefull example. From that time forward, hee, vntill his three and twentieth yeere, laboured in the conquest of those adioyning Regions, which God had exposed vnto his sword, and commanded to weare his yoke; namely, the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, Tyrians, Sidonians, and Ægyptians, though some of these were already become his followers, and serued vnder him, when Ierusalem was beaten downe and burnt. But the Tyrians, whose Citie was founded on an Iland, safe enough from any danger of a Land-armie, and whose fleet was so strong, that they needed not to feare any enemie at sea, were neither danted with the fall of their neighbour Cities, nor with the obstinate resolution of this mighty Prince, imploying all his power to their subuersion.

That the Citie of Tyre was rather well pleased, than any way discouraged with the fall of Ierusalem (which had held the same course that Tyrus did, and endured all that might bee in the same quarrell against the common enemie) appeares by the words which Ezechiel condemneth as the common voyce of Tyrus; Aha, the gate of the people is broken, it is turned vnto me; for seeing shee is desolate, I shall be replenished. Yet at length, euen in the ninteenth yeere of Nabuchodonosor, that great worke of his, whereof we haue alreadie spoken, began to appeare aboue the waters, and threaten them with ineuitable mischiefe.

Ierem. 25. Esai. 23. 15.

But those prophecies of Ieremie and of Esay, which appoint vnto this desolation of Tyre the same terme of 70. yeeres, that was prescribed vnto the reigne of the Chaldeans, doe plainely plainely shew, that shee followed Ierusalem, the same nineteenth yeere of Nabuchodonosor, in the same, or a very like fortune. The particularities, which doubtlesse were memorable in the issue of so great and laborious a siege, are in a manner vtterly lost. Thus much we finde, That the Citizens perceiuing the Towne vnable to hold out, embarked themselues, and fledde into the Isle of Cyprus. Neuertheless it seemes that this euasion serued onely the principall men, who escaping with their goods, abandoned the poorer sort vnto the enemies furie. For not onely such people of Tyre as dwelt on the Continent (who are called her Daughters in the field) were put to the sword; but the like execution was done in the streets, into which, with excessiue labour, the Assyrian made way for his Horses and Chariots. Thus Nabuchodonosor caused his Armie to serue a great seruice against Tyrus, wherein euery head was made bald, and euery shoulder was made bare, yet had hee no wages, nor his Armie; but was faine to rest contented with the Honour of hauing destroyed that Citie, which in all mens iudgements had beene held inuincible. Ezech. 29. 18.

The destruction of these two great and powerfull Cities, hauing made the name of the Chaldaans dreadfull in the eares of all the Nations thereabout; Nabuchodonosor vsed the aduantage of that reputation which he had obtained by victories already gotten, to the getting of more, and more profitable, with lesse paine. The Kingdome of Aegypt was the marke at which he aimed; a Country so abounding in all riches and pleasures, that it might well haue tempted any Prince, finding himselfe strong enough to seeke occasion of quarrell against it; and so farre an enemie to the Crowne of Babylon, that had it beene poorer, yet either it must haue beene subdued, or the conquest of Syria could ill haue beene established. Nenertheless it was needfull, that before hee entred into this businesse, the Countries adiacent should bee reduced into such termes, that either they should wholly stand at his deuotion, or at least be vnable to worke him any displeasure. And heerein the decree of God concurred, as in all prosperous enterprises, with reason of state. For the people of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Damascus, Kedar, Hazar, and other adioyning Regions, whom God for their sinnes had condemned to fall vnder the Babylonian swords, were such, as regarding onely their owne gaine, had some of them, like Rauens, followed the Chaldaan Armie, to feed vpon the carcasses that fell by the crueltie thereof; others taking aduantage of their neighbours miseries, occupied the Countries which were by his victories belonging to Nabuchodonosor; all of them thinking, that when the Assyrian had satisfied his furie, he should be faine to forsake those desolate parts, and leaue the possession to those that could lay hand vpon it. Particularlie the Edomites and Philistims had shewed much malice to the Iewes when their Citie was taken. What good seruice they had done to the Chaldaans, I finde not; if they did any, it is likely to haue beene with reference to their owne purposes, wherein they were disappointed. The Ammonites were not contented to reioyce at the fal of Ierusalem, but presently they entered vpon the Country of Gad, and tooke possession, as if not the Assyrians, but they, had subdued Israel. Neither can I perceiue what other ground that practise had of Baalis King of the Ammonites, when he sent Ismael, a Prince of the bloud of Iuda, to murther Gedalia, whom the King of Babel had left Gouernour ouer those that remained in Israel; and to carry captiue into the Ammonites Countrie the people that abode in Mizpah, than a desire of embroiling Nabuchodonosor with so many labours at once, as should make him retire into his owne Country, and abandon those wasted Lands to himselfe and others, for whom they lay conueniently. Such or the like policie the Moabites did exercise, whose pride and wrath were made frustrate by God, and their dissimulation condemned, as not doing right. Ezech. 25. 3. Ierem. 49. 1. Ezech. 25. 12. & 15. Ierem. 40. 14. & 41. 2. & 10. Ier. 48. 27. & 9 expedition. This is manifest, that all the principall Townes in these Regions were burnt, and the people slaine, or made slaues, few excepted, who being preserued by flight, had not the courage to returne to their habitations ouer-hastily, much lesse to attempt any thing against Nabuchodonosor, but liued as miserable out-lawes, or at least oppressed wretches, vntill the end of the seuentie yeeres, which God had prescribed vnto the desolation of their Countries, as well as of the Land of Iuda.

All these Nations had the art of rauening, which is familiar to such as liue or border vpon desarts; and now the time afforded them occasion to shew the vttermost cunning of their theeuish wits. But Nebuchadnezzar did cut asunder all their deuices by sharpe and suddaine warre, ouer-whelming them with vnexpected ruine, as it were in one night; according to the propheties of Esay, Ieremie, and Ezechiel, who fore-told, with little difference of words, the great hatte, and fruitlesse end of the miserie that should come vpon them. With which of them he first began, I finde not; it seemes that Moab was the last which felt his hand: for so doe many good Authors interpret the propheste of Esay, threatning Moab with destruction after three yeeres, as hauing reference to the third yeere following the ruine of Ierusalem; the next yeere after it being spent in the Aegyptian Esay 16. 14.

§. VIII.

That Ægypt was conquered, and the King therein reigning slaine by Nabuchodonosor, contrarie to the opinion of most Authors: who following Herodotus and Diodorus, relate it otherwise.

WHen by a long course of victorie Nabuchodonosor had brought into subiection all the Nations of Syria, and the bordering Arabians, in such wise, that no enemie to himselfe, nor friend of the Ægyptian, was left at his backe, that might giue impediment vnto his proceeding, or take aduantage of any misfortune; then did he forth-with take in hand the conquest of Ægypt himselfe, vpon which those other Nations had formerly beene depending. Of this expedition, and the victorious issue thereof, the three great Prophets, Esay, Ieremie, and Ezechiel, haue written so plainely, that I hold it altogether needlesse to looke after more authoritie, or to cite for proofe halfe of that which may be alleaged out of these. Neuertheless, wee finde many and good Authors, who following Herodotus, and Diodorus Siculus, are well contented to straine these Prophecies with vnreasonable diligence vnto such a sense, as giues to Nabuchodonosor little more than the honour of hauing done some spoyle in Ægypt, omitting the conquest of that Land by the Babylonian, and referring the death of Apries or Hophra to a chance long after following, which had no coherence with these times or affaires. So preposterous is the delight which many men take in the meanes and second helpes conducing to their purpose, that oftentimes they doe preferre the Commentator before the Author; and to vphold a sentence, giuing testimonie to one clause, doe carelesly ouerthrow the historie it selfe, which thereby they sought to haue maintained. The reports of Herodotus and Diodorus, concerning the Kings of Ægypt, which reigned about these times, are already rehearsed in the former booke: but that which they haue spoken of Apries, was purposely reserued vnto this place. Herodotus doth affirme that he was a very fortunate King, but wherein he telleth not; (vnlesse we should vnderstand that he was victorious in the Warre, which he is said to haue made vpon Tyrus and Sidon) that he reigned fiue and twenty yeeres, and was finally taken and put to death by his owne Subiects, who did set vp Amasis, as King, which preuailed against him. The rebellion of the Ægyptians he imputeth to a great losse which they receiued in an expedition against the Cyrenians, by whom almost their whole Armie was destroyed. This calamitie the people of Ægypt thought to be well pleasing to their King, who had sent them on this dangerous expedition, with a purpose to haue them consumed; that so he might with greater securitie reigne ouer such as staied at home. So they who escaped, and the friends of such as were slaine, rebelled against Apries, who sent Amasis to appease the tumult; but Amasis became Captaine of the rebels, and was by them chosen King. Finally, the whole Land consented vnto this new Election; whereby Apries was driuen to trust vnto his forraine Mercenaries, the Ionians and Carians, of whom he kept continually in readinesse thirty thousand good Souldiers that fought valiantly for him, but were at length vanquished by the great number of the Ægyptian forces, amounting vnto two hundred and fiftie thousand, which were all by birth and education men of Warre. Apries himselfe being taken prisoner, was gently intreated by Amasis for a while, vntill the Ægyptians, exclaiming vpon him, as an extreame enemie to the Land, got him deliuered into their hands, and strangled him, yet they gaue him honourable buriall. Such is the report of Herodotus, with whom Diodorus Siculus doth neerely agree, telling vs that Apries did vanquish the Cyprians and Phœnicians in battell at Sea, tooke by force and demolished Sidon, with the other townes of Phœnicia, and the Isle of Cyprus, and finally, perished as is before rehearsed, when her had had reigned two and twentie yeeres. This authoritie were enough (yet not more than enough) to informe vs of Apries his hiſtorie, if greater authoritie did not contradict it. But the deſtruction of Ægypt by the Babylonian, foretold by the Prophets, which hath no coherence with theſe relations, hath greater force to compell our beliefe, than haue the traditions of Ægyptian Prieſts (which the Greeke Hiſtorians followed) and greater probabilities to perſwade thoſe that looke onely into humane reaſons. For Eſay propheſied long before of the ſhamefull captiuitie of the Ægyptians, whom the King of Aſſur ſhould carry away naked, yong and old, in ſuch wiſe, that the Iewes, who fled vnto them for deliuerance from the Aſſyrian, ſhould be aſhamed of their owne vaine confidence in men ſo vnable to defend themſelues. Eſa. 20. ver. 4. & 64.

But Ezekiel & Ieremie, as their prophecies were neerer to the time of execution, ſo they handled this Argument more preciſely. For Ezekiel telleth plainely, that Ægypt ſhould be giuen to Nebuchadnezzar, as wages for the ſeruice which he had done at Tyre: Alſo he recounteth particularly all the chiefe Cities in Ægypt, ſaying, That theſe by name ſhould be deſtroyed, and goe into captiuitie, yea, that Pharaoh and all his armie ſhould be ſlaine by the ſword. Wherefore it muſt needs be a violent expoſition of theſe Prophecies, which by applying the iſſue of ſuch threatnings to an inſurrection and rebellion, concludes all, without any other alteration in Ægypt, than change of the Kings perſon, wherein Amaſis did ſucceed vnto Apries, by force indeed, but by the vniforme conſent of all the people. Certainely, if that notable place of Ieremie, wherein hee foretelleth how the Iewes in Ægypt ſhould ſee Pharao Hophra deliuered into the hand of his enemies, as Zedekia had beene, were to be referred vnto the time of that rebellion, whereof Herodotus hath ſpoken, as the generall opinion hath ouer-ruled it; then was it vainely done of the ſame Prophet (which God forbid that any Chriſtian ſhould thinke, ſeeing hee did it by the appointment of God himſelfe) to hide in the clay of a Bricke-hill, thoſe very ſtones, vpon which the throne of Nabuchodonoſor ſhould bee ſet, and his pauilion ſpredde. Yea then was that prophecie no other than falſe, which expreſſed the end of Pharaoh thus: Behold, I will viſite the common people of No, and Pharaoh, and Ægypt, with their gods and their kings, euen Pharaoh, and all that truſt in him: and I will deliuer them into the hands of thoſe that ſeeke their liues, and into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babel, and into the hands of his ſeruants. The cleareneſſe of this prophecy beeing ſuch as could not but refute that interpretation of many other places, which referred all to the rebellion of Amaſis, it cauſed me to wonder what thoſe Commentators would ſay to it, who are elſewhere ſo diligent in fitting all to the Greeke hiſtorians. Wherefore looking vpon Iunius, who had in another place taken the enemies of Pharaoh Hophra to be Amaſis, and his followers, I found him heere acknowledging that the Ægyptian Prieſts had notably deluded Herodotus with lies, coyned vpon a vaine-glorious purpoſe of hiding their owne diſgrace and bondage. And ſurely it may well bee thought, that the hiſtorie of Nebuchadnezzar, was better knowne to the Iewes, whom it concerned, than to the Greekes, that ſcarcely at any time heard of his name. Therefore I ſee no cauſe why we ſhould not rather beleeue Ioſephus, reporting that Nabuchodonoſor in the three and twentieth yeere of his reigne, and the fift yeere of the deſtruction of Ieruſalem, did conquer Ægypt, kill the King thereof, and appoint another in his ſtead, than Herodotus or Diodore; who being meere ſtrangers to this buſineſſe, had no great reaſon to labour in ſearching out the truth, but might reſt contented with any thing that the Prieſts would tell them. Now if ſetting aſide all aduantage of authoritie, we ſhould onelie conſider the relations of Ioſephus, and of the Greeke Hiſtorians, as either of them might be verified of it ſelfe by apparant circumſtances, without reflecting vpon the Hebrew Prophets, or Ægyptian Prieſts; me thinkes the death of Apries can no way be approued as hauing beene wrought by conſent of the people, but affords great matter of ſuſpition; yea, though no man had oppoſed the reports of Herodotus and Diodore. For the great loue and honor which the Ægyptians did beare vnto their Kings, is notorious by the vniforme teſtimonie of all others that haue handled the matters of that Countrey, as well as by the report of Diodore himſelfe. How then can wee thinke it probable, that Apries hauing wonne great victories, did for one onely loſſe fall into the hatred of all his people, or which may ſerue to perſwade vs, that a King of Ægypt would ſeeke, or ſo demeane himſelfe, that he might be thought to ſeek the deſtruction of his naturall ſubiects? As for that armie of thirtie thouſand ſouldiers, Carians and Ionians, which the King of Ægypt, whom Amasis tooke prisoner, is said to haue kept for his defence: doth it not argue that he was a forrainer, and one that armed himselfe against the Ægyptian, wishing them few and weake; rather than any of the Pharaohs, who accounted the force of the Country, as assuredly their owne, as the strength of their owne bodies? It were more tedious then any way needfull, to vse all Arguments that might be alledged in this case. The very death of this supposed Apries, which the clamours of the people obtained of Amasis, who sought to haue kept him aliue, doth intimate that hee was some forren Gouernour, not a naturall Prince; otherwise the people would haue desired to saue his life, and Amasis to take it quickely from him. I will not labour any further to disproue that opinion, whereunto I should not haue yeelded, though it had stood vpon to great apparance of truth, considering that the voice of Truth it selfe cries out against it; but leaue the circumstances, prouing the Conquest of Ægypt by Nabuchodonosor, to be obserued, where due occasion in course of the storie following shall present them.

How Ægypt was subdued and held by Nabuchadnezzar.

IT is a great losse, that the generall Historie of the Word hath suffered, by the spoile and waste which Time hath made of those Monuments, that should haue preserued the memorie of such famous actions as were accomplished by this mightie Prince Nabuchodonosor; wherein, whether his Vertue, or Fortune were greater, it is now vncertaine. That his Victories following the Conquest of Syria, and the Neighbour-Prouinces, were such as did more enlarge his Dominion, than all the former Warres had done, it may easily be gathered out of Ezekiel, who reckoneth vp in his thirtieth chapter (besides the whole Countrey of Ægypt) Phut and Lud, with other Nations that may seeme to haue reached out into Mauritania, as people subdued by this great Babylonian. The circumstances of these Warres are either in a manner vterly lost; but that the victorie was easie and swift, any man shall finde, who will take the paines to conferre the places, wherein the three great Prophets touch this Argument. Thus much I thinke worthy of more particular obseruation; that Pharaoh, who (as is alreadie noted in the former Booke) thought himselfe most safe in Ægypt by the well defenced situation of his Countrey, did very vnwisely in suffering his enemies to sweepe the way cleane vnto his owne doores, by consuming all his friends and adhærents in Syria. For as the labour of this businesse did more harden than wearie the Chaldaan Army, so the confidence and vaine securitie of the Ægyptians, relying vpon the difficult passages which the enemie was to make thorow the Arabian deserts, and the much aduantage which the great riuer of Nilus would afford vnto themselues, did little auaile them in prouision for the war, and much astonish them (as may iustly be thought) in the time of execution: it being vsually seene, that the hearts of men faile, when those helpes faile, in which they had reposed more confidence than in their owne vertue. Hitherto the Kingdome of Ægypt had flourished vnder the rule of the Pharaohs, about a thousand fiue hundred and foure score yeeres; but from this time forward it remained forty yeeres without a King, vnder the subiection of the Babylonians; and then at length it began to recouer by little and little the former greatnesse, yet so, that it was neuer dreadfull vnto others, God hauing said of that people, I will diminish them, that they shal no more rule the Nations. For whereas it hath beene said of Pharaoh: I am the sonne of the wise, I am the sonne of the ancient Kings: and whereas he had vanted, The Riuer is mine, and I haue made it; the Princes of Ægypt now became fooles, the riuer failed them, the King himselfe was taken and slaine, and that ancient linage quite extinguished. This came to passe in the first yeere after the destruction of Ierusalem, and the three and twentieth of Nebuchadnezzar, at which time (saith Iosephus) Hee slew the King then reigning, placed another in his roome, and carried captiues thence to Babylon, the Iewes whom hee found in that Countrie. Now concerning the time which Iosephus giues vnto this businesse, and the businesse it selfe, I haue already shewed, that it is warranted by all the Prophecies which insinuate the same. As likewise the last destruction of Ierusalem, and carrying away those vnto Babel, who inhabited the miserable ruines of that great city, which was in the same three & twentieth yeere of Nebuchadnezzar, is not vnprobably thought by good good authors to haue beene at the returne from this Ægyptian expedition. But whereas Ioſephus tels vs, that there was another King put in the roome of Apries by Nebuchadnezzar, we muſt vnderſtand, that he was onely a Viceroy, and not (as ſome haue miſtaken it) thinke that this was Amaſis. For to place the beginning of Amaſis his reigne in the three and twentieth of Nebuchadnezzar, were as well repugnant vnto the prophecies before alleadged, as to all Chronologie and hiſtorie. Some there are, which to helpe this inconuenience, imagine that there were two ſucceſſiuely bearing the name of Amaſis; others, that there were two Apries, the one ſlaine by Nebuchadnezzar, the other by Amaſis: a queſtion of ſmall importance, becauſe the difference is onely about a name, it being once granted that the perſon mentioned in Scriptures, was depriued of life and kingdome by the Aſſyrians. Yet for any thing that I can perceiue, that Apries, of whom the Greeke Hiſtorians wrote, could not be the Deputie of Nebuchadnezzar, ſeeing that he was the Grand-childe of Pharao Necho, and made warre (as they report) vpon the Phœnicians, who were before the Ægyptians, become ſubiect vnto the Crowne of Babylon. I might adde, perhaps, that he whom Nebuchadnezzar left as Gouernour of Ægypt, was more likely to haue had ſome Chaldæan or Aſſyrian, than Ægyptian name; vnleſſe we ſhould thinke that he had beene a traytor to his naturall Prince, and ſo rewarded by the Conquerour with Lieutenantſhip of the Countrey: about which it were but friuolous to diſpute. Thus much in briefe we ought to beleeue, that Nabuchodoſor made an abſolute Conqueſt of Ægypt; that he was not ſo fooliſh as to giue it away, any man may gueſſe; that he appointed one to rule the Countrey, it is conſequent vnto the former, and hath authority of Ioſephus; that this Gouernour (or ſome ſucceſſour of his) was afterwards taken and ſlaine by Amaſis, I ſee probabilitie enough to perſwade my ſelfe, and yet can well be content, that others vſe their liberty, and beleeue what they liſt. As for the armie which this Ægyptian King Apries is ſuppoſed to haue kept of Ionians and Carians; I hold them to be none other than the gariſons of mercenary ſouldiers which were left by the Aſſyrian for the guard of his Viceroy, & cuſtody of the new ſubdued Prouince: as likewiſe the company returning from Cyrene and Barce, who together with the friends of ſuch as were ſlaine in that expedition, remembred before out of the Greeke Hiſtorians, depoſed and ſlew Apries, I take them to haue beene the Ægyptian fugitiues, which then recouered their owne Countrey. Sure it is that this Prophecie of Ezekiel was verified, At the end of fortie yeeres will I gather the Ægyptians from the people where they were ſcattered, and I will bring againe the captiuitie of Ægypt, and will cauſe them to returne into the land of Pathros, into the land of their habitation, and they ſhall be there a ſmall kingdome. Ezek. 30. v. 13. & 14.

Ezek. 29. 13. 14. & 15. Esay 19. 11. Ezek. 29. 9. Ioseph. Ant. Iud. libr. 10. c. 11. Ierem. 52. 30.

If the Ægyptian Prieſts alluded hereunto in the tale which they made of Amaſis his obtaining the Kingdome, then are they to be helped with this or the like interpretation; If they deuiſed matter that had no ſhadow of truth, onely to keepe the Greekes from knowledge of their Countries diſgrace; then are they little to be regarded, ſince we know the truth with them.

Of the ſundry accompts drawne from ſundry acts of Nebuchadnezzar, and of the deſtruction of Niniue, by him; the time of which action is vncertaine.

THeſe victories brought the greatneſſe of the Aſſyrian Empire to the full, and from them was reckoned the time of Nebuchadnezzars reigne in ſundry places of Scripture. To ſpeake any more of the queſtions ariſing about the ſupputation of Nebuchadnezzar his times, might ſeeme to be the ouer-handling of one Argument: Yet thus much I will note; that whereas Daniel was carried captiue in the third yeere of Ioiakims reigne (which ran along with ſome part of Nebuchadnezzars firſt yeere) and was kept in diet three yeers more, before he was brought into the Kings preſence; it could not be the ſecond of Nebuchadnezzars Kingdome, wherein he interpreted the forgotten dreame of the great Image, foreſhewing the ſucceſſe of Monarchies, but the ſecond of his Empire. The ſame or the like may be ſaid of diuers places which referre ſundry matters vnto their ſet yeers; as that of Ezekiel before cited, where he fore-tels, that Ægypt ſhould be giuen in reward for the ſeruice done before Tyrus, dating his prophecy in the ſeauen and twentieth yeere; and that of Daniel, placing the erection of the golden Image in the eighteenth yeere: for theſe yeeres held no dependance vpon either the beginning of Dan. 1. & 2.

Nebuchad-

Nebuchadnezzars kingdome, or of his Empire, nor yet vpon any of the captiuities, but had reference to some memorable actions, omitted in Scripture, and therefore not easie to be found, nor worth the labour of vncertaine search.

Of any warre made by Nebuchadnezzar, after such time as he returned from the Conquest of Ægypt, I doe not reade: excepting that against Niniuie, the destruction whereof was fore-told by the Prophet Naum. Niniuie had long before beene taken by Merodach (as in due place hath beene shewed) and together with the rest of Assyria made subiect to Babylon. Yet was it left vnder a peculiar King, who rebelling against the Chaldean, as Iehoiakim and Zedechias, tributary Kings of Iuda, had done, tasted likewise of the same fortune. That the destruction of Niniuie followed the Conquest of Ægypt, it appeareth by the comparison which Nahum the Prophet made betweene this Citie, that was to fall, and the Citie of No in Ægypt, that was fallen already. But how long after this came to passe, it is (me thinkes) vnpossible to finde out. For whereas it is found in an Hebrew Chronologie, that it was in the first of Nebuchadnezzars reigne; the place of Nahum last cited is enough to disproue it. Whereas it is referred by some vnto the first of his Monarchie, which began at the end of the Ægyptian warres; the whole Prophecie of Nahum which went betweene the one and the other, argueth strongly, that there was a longer space of time intercurrent. So that to enquire into the very yeere of this destruction, or other circumstances of the Warre, whether managed by Nabuchodonosor in person, or by his Lieutenants, were somewhat like vnto the vaine curiositie of Tyberius Cæsar, enquiring who was the Mother of Hecuba; or to the like idle paines which he should take, who would seeke to learne what woman that Huzzab Queen of Niniuie was, whose wofull captiuitie the same Prophet Nahum likewise did fore-tell.

Nahum. 3. 8.

§. XI.

Of the later time of Nebuchadnezzar; his buildings, madnesse, and death.

OF the time which this great Monarch spent in quiet, I thinke there are no Monuments extant; saue those which we finde among the prophecies of Daniel. Among these we may reckon his great workes at Babylon, wherewith he pleased himselfe so well, that he brake out into these glorious words: Is not this great Babel that I haue built for the house of the Kingdome, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my Maiestie? Surely if those things be true that are by Iosephus rehearsed of him out of Berosus and Magasthenes, he might well delight himselfe with the contemplation of such goodly and magnificent buildings. For it is said, That he fortified Babylon with a triple wall; that besides other stately workes, he raised those huge arches wherewith were borne vp the high Orchards, hanging as it were in the ayre, and equalling the tops of Mountaines; which most sumptuous frame, that out-lasted all the remainder of the Assyrian, and all the Persian Empire, is said to haue beene reared, and finished in fifteene dayes.

Dan. 4. 27.

But of all this, and other his magnificence, we finde little else recorded, than that (which indeede is most profitable for vs to consider) his ouer-valuing of his owne greatnesse abased him vnto a condition, inferiour to the poorest of men. And not vndeseruedly fell these iudgements of God vpon him. For whereas God had honoured him, not only with many victories, and much happinesse in his owne life, but with a discouery of things to come after him, yea and had approued the certainty of his dreame, by the miraculous reducing of it into his memory, and interpretation thereof by Daniel the Prophet: he neuertheless became so forgetfull of God, whose wonderfull power he had seene and acknowledged, that he caused a golden Image to be set vp and worshipped: ordaining a cruell death as reward vnto them that should dare to disobey his Kingly will and pleasure, which was vtterly repugnant to the law of him that is the King of Kings. Hereof S. Hierome hath well noted; Velox obliuio veritatis, vt qui dudum seruum Dei quasi Deum adorauerat, nunc statuam sibi fieri iubeat, vt ipse quasi Deus in statuâ adoraretur: A hastie forgetfulnesse of the truth, that he who so lately had worshipped (Daniel) the seruant of God, as if he had beene God himselfe, should now command a Statua to be erected vnto himselfe, wherein himselfe might be worshipped as God. From this impietie it pleased God to reclaime him, by the strange and wonderfull deliuery of those blessed Saints out of the fierie fornace; who being throwne into it bound, for refusing to commit Idolatry, were assisted aſſiſted by an Angell; preſerued from all harme of the fire; looſened from their bands; and finally called out with gracious words, and reſtored to their former honour, by the King: who amazed at the miracle, made a decree tending to the honour of God, which by erection of his Image he had violated. Yet this deuotion of Nebuchadnezzar was not ſo rooted in him, that it could bring forth fruit anſwerable to his haſtie zeale. Therefore was he forewarned by God in a dreame of the terrible iudgement hanging ouer his head, which Daniel expounding, aduiſed him to breake off his ſinne by righteouſneſſe, and his iniquitie by mercy towards the poore, that there might be an healing of his error. Hereby it ſeemes that iniuſtice and cruelty were the faults, for which he was threatned, but this threatning ſufficed not vnto his reformation. For that ſo great a Monarch ſhould be driuen from among men; (according to the tenor of the dreame & interpretation) yea, compelled to dwell with the beaſts of the field, and made to eate graſſe as the Oxen, was a thing ſo incredible in mans iudgement, that eaſily it might be thought an idle dreame, and much more eaſily be forgotten at the yeeres end. One whole yeeres leaſure to repent was giuen to this haughtie Prince: which reſpite of the execution may ſeeme to haue bred in him a forgetfulneſſe of Gods ſentence. For at the end of twelue moneths, walking in the royall Palace of Babel, he was ſo ouer-ioyed and tranſported with a vaine contemplation of his owne ſeeming happineſſe, that without all feare of Gods heauie iudgement pronounced againſt him, he vttered thoſe loftie words before rehearſed, in vaunting of the Maieſticall workes which he had reared, as well beſeeming his maieſticall perſon. But his high ſpeeches were not fully ended, when a voice from heauen, telling him that his Kingdome was departed from him, rehearſed ouer vnto him the ſentence againe, was fulfilled vpon him the very ſame houre.

That Salomon, and many other Princes, and great ones, haue taken delight in their owne buildings, it cannot any way be doubted; yet I doe not remember that euer I haue read of any, that were puniſhed for reioycing in workes of this kinde (though it is hard in ioy, or any paſſion of the minde, to keepe a iuſt meaſure) excepting onely this Nebuchadnezzar.

The like may be ſaid of Dauid: for other (and ſome very godly) Kings haue muſtred all their forces to the very laſt man; but few or none haue beene knowne to haue beene puniſhed as Dauid was. Surely I not onely hold it lawfull to reioyce in thoſe good things, wherewith God hath bleſſed vs; but a note of much vnthankfulneſſe to entertaine them with a ſullen and vnfeeling diſpoſition. Yet as all humane affections, wherein due reference to God is wanting, are no better than obſcure clouds, hindring the influence of that bleſſed light, which clarifies the ſoule of man, and prediſpoſeth it vnto the brightneſſe of eternall felicitie; ſo that inſolent ioy, which man in the pride of his vaine imagination conceiueth of his owne worth, doth aboue all other paſſions blaſt our mindes, as it were with lightning, and make vs to reflect our thoughts vpon our ſeeming inherent greatneſſe, forgetting the whileſt him, to whom we are indebted for our very being. Wherefore theſe mala mentis gaudia; The euill ioyes of the minde, were not vnaptly, by the Prince of Latine Poets, beſtowed in the entrance of Hell, and placed further inward than ſorrowes, cares, and feares: not farre from the yron Cabbins of the Furies. And certainely it is no vnlikely token of vengeance neere at hand, when theſe vnreaſonable fluſhes of proud and vaine ioy, doe rage in a minde, that ſhould haue beene humbled with a iuſt repentance, and acknowledgement of ill deſerning.

This was verified vpon Nebuchadnezzar, whoſe puniſhment was ſingular and vnexampled. For he ran among beaſts in the fields and woods, where for ſeauen yeeres he liued, not onely as a ſauage man, but as a ſauage beaſt, for a beaſt he thought himſelfe, ſecundum ſuam imaginationem, as Thomas noteth, and therefore fed himſelfe in the ſame manner, and with the ſame foode that beaſts doe. Not that he was changed in figure externall, according to Medinus, in ſo much as he appeared a beaſt to other mens eyes, as S. Hieromie in the life of Hilarius (how true God knowes) ſpeakes of a woman that appeared to all other mens ſight a Cow, but to Hilarius onely a woman; neither was he changed as Iphigenia the Daughter of Agamemnon was ſaid to be, into a Hinde, nor made a Monſter, as Dorotheus and Epiphanius dreamed: but according to S. Ieromes expoſition of theſe words: At the ſame time was my vnderſtanding reſtored vnto me, &c. Quando dicit (ſaith S. Ierome) ſenſum ſibi redditum, oſtendit non formam ſe amiſiſſe, ſed mentem; When he ſaith that his ſenſe was reſtored vnto him, he ſhewed that he had not loſt his humane ſhape, but his vnderstanding. Seauen yeeres expired, it pleased God to restore Nabuchodonosor, both to his vnderstanding, and his estate, for which he acknowledged and praised God all the rest of his life, confessing his power, and euerlasting being; that he was the Lord of heauen and earth, and wrought without resistance what he pleased in both; that his works were all truth, and his waies righteous. Which gaue argument to many of the Fathers, and others, not to doubt of his saluation; namely, S. Augustine, Theodoret, Lyra, Carthusianus, and others. And for that place of Esay the foureteenth, out of which his perdition may be gathered, the aforenamed Authors apply the same to Balthasar, because Isay, both in the thirteenth and foureteenth Chapter, speaketh of the King, and the destruction of Babylon ioyntly.

§. XII.
Of Euilmerodach.

HAuing already spoken what I could of the succession and yeeres of Nebuchadnezzars posteritie; the most that may be said of him, is said of Euilmerodach, which I will not here againe rehearse.

He lost some part of that which his Father had gotten, and left his Kingdome burning in a warre that consumed it to ashes. He lost Ægypt by rebellion of the people, in the nineteenth yeere of his reigne, which was fortie yeeres after his Father had conquered it. But this agrees neither with the accompt of Herodotus, who allowes to Amasis foure and fortie yeeres of reigne; nor with that of Diodorus, who giues him fiue and fiftie, saying that he died in the third yeere of the threescore and third Olympiad, when Cambyses did conquer Ægypt. There were indeede but seauen and thirtie yeeres, which passed betweene the second yeere of the foure and fiftieth Olympiad, (which was the nineteenth of Euilmerodach, and the first of Amasis) and the fift of Cambyses his reigne, wherein he wan Ægypt; of which seauen and thirtie yeeres it is credibly held, that Psamennitus, the sonne of Amasis, reigned three: so that Amasis could be no longer King than foure and thirtie yeeres. But seeing that these two Greeke Historians haue beene abused by Ægyptian Priests, in the substance of that which was spoken of Amasis, it is no maruell though they were also deceiued in the length of his reigne. This is the plaine answere to this obiection. For to say either that the numbers were miswritten, and foure and fortie set down in stead of foure and thirtie, or that Amasis did temporise a while with the Assyrians, and not beare himselfe as absolute King of Ægypt, vntill the nineteenth of Euilmerodach (at which time, and not before, it hath beene proued out of Ezechiel, that Ægypt became againe a Kingdome) I hold it a superfluous excuse.

Whether these Ægyptian troubles did animate the King of the Medes to deale with Euilmerodach, as with a Prince greater in fame and reputation, gotten by the decayed valour of his people, than in present forces; or whether (as I rather thinke) some foyle receiued by the Assyrian inuading Media, emboldned the Ægyptians to rebell against him: I will neither vndertake, nor seeke to define. Xenophon tels, that the first seruice of yong Cyrus in warre, was vnder Astyages King of the Medes, his Grand-father, in a prosperous fight against the Assyrian Prince, who did set vpon him; at which time Cyrus was fifteene or sixteene yeeres old. If therefore Cyrus liued threescore and three yeeres (as he is said to haue died well stricken in yeeres) which is held to be the ordinary reame of no short life, then was this encounter in the third yeere of Euilmerodach his reigne. Yet by the same reckoning it should follow, that the warre began more early betweene these Nations, for as much as the manner of their fight in former times, with other circumstances insinuating as much, are found in the same place of Xenophon. And it may well be, that the death or destruction of Nabuchodonosor gaue courage vnto those that had felt him a troublesome neighbour, to stand vpon prouder termes with the Assyrians, than in his flourishing estate they durst haue vsed. Howsoeuer the quarrell began, we finde that it ended not before the last ruine of the Assyrian Monarchie. For the Babylonian, being too proud to digest the losses which he receiued by the Medes and their Allies the Persians, drew vnto his partie the Lydians, and all the people of the lesser Asia, with gifts and strong perswasions, hoping so to ouerwhelme his enemies with a strong inuasion, whom in vaine hee had fought to weare out with a dingting Warre.

This

This happened after the death of Astyages, who left the World in the nineteenth yeere of Euilmerodach, at which time Amasis tooke possession of Ægypt. So that the Assyrian hauing his hands already full of businesse, which more earnestly did affect him, seems thereby to haue giuen the better meanes vnto the Ægyptians, of new erecting their Kingdome, which by long distance of place did sundry times finde occasion to rebell in after-ages, and set vp a King within it selfe, against the far more mightie Persian.

The issue of these great preparations made by Euilmerodach against the Medes, was such as opened the way vnto the fulfilling of those prophecies, which were many yeeres before vttered against Babel, by Esay and Ieremie.

For the Assyrians, and their Confederates, who, trusting in their numbers, thought to haue buried the Medes and Persians vnder their thicke showres of arrowes and darts, were encountred with an armie of stout and well-trained men, weightily armed for close fight, by whom they were beaten in open battell, wherein Euilmerodath was slaine. So that great frame of Empire which Nabuchodonosor had raised and vp-held, being shaken and grieuously crackt vnder his vnfortunate Sonne, was left to be sustained by his vnworthy Nephew: a man more likely to haue ouerthrowne it, when it was greatest and strongest, than to repaire it, when it was in way of falling.

§. XIII.

Apriuate coniecture of the Author; serving to make good those things, which are cited out of Berosus, concerning the Successors of Euilmerodach, without wrong to the truth. The qualitie, and death of Balthasar.

THough I haue already (as it seemes to me) sufficiently proued that Balthasar was the Sonne, and immediate Successour to Euilmerodach, yet considering earnestly the coniectures of those Writers, which following Berosus, insert Nigliſar, or Nirgliſſoroor, and his sonne Labassardach betweene them: as also that which I finde in Herodotus of Nitocris, a famous Queene of Babylon; who greatly adorned and fortified that Citie; I haue thought it not superfluous here in this place to shew, by what meanes it was possible that some errour might haue crept into the Historie of those times, and thereby haue brought vs to a needelesse trouble of searching out the truth, as it were by candle-light, in the vncertaine fragments of lost Authors, which we might haue found by day-light, had we adhered onely to the Scriptures. First, therefore I obserue, that the time which Berosus diuides betwixt Euilmerodach, and the two next Kings, agrees with the yeeres in which Nebuchadnezzar liued wilde among brute beasts in the open field: Secondly, that the suddainenesse of this accident, which came in one houre, could not but worke much perturbation in that State, wherein doubtlesse the honour of so noble a Prince was highly regarded, his calamitie pitied, and his restitution hoped; the prediction of Daniel finding reputation in that clause which promised his recouerie, as being verified in that which had bin more incredible. Now if we doe in common reason iudge, what course was like to be taken by the great ones of the Kingdome, for setling the gouernement, whilest the King was thus distracted, we shall finde it most likely, that his Sonne and Heire did occupie the royall Throne, with condition to restore it vnto his Father, when God should enable him to repossesse it. In this his rule Euilmerodach being to supply the vtter want of vnderstanding in his Father, as Protectors doe the vnripenesse of it in young, but reasonable Kings, might easily either commit the insolencies, or fall into the troubles, incident to such an office. That he had in him very small ability of gouernment, it appeares by his ill maintaining the Empire, when he held it in his owne right. That his Sister Nitocris (if Nitocris were his sister) was a woman of an high spirit, it appeares by that which Herodotus reports of her, saying that she was more cunning than Semiramis, as appeared in her magnificent and vsefull workes about the Riuer of Euphrates, and her fortification of Babylon against the Medes, who had gotten many Townes from the Assyrians, and amongst them Niniue. Wherefore it were not vnreasonable to thinke, that such a woman, seeing how the Empire went to decay through her brothers misgouernment, vsed practices to get the rule into her owne hands, and afterwards, as a mother, to leaue it vnto her vngracious sonne. Other time than this, wherein Nitocris could haue reigned, we doe not finde; but we finde in Berosus (as Iosephus hath cited him) that Nigliſar, who got the Kingdome from Euilmerodach, was his sisters husband; husband; which argues this to haue beene the same woman. As for Labassardach the son of Nigliſſar, if at the end of nine Moneths reigne he were for his lewd conditions slaine by the Nobilitie, as the same Berosus reporteth, it seemes that God prepared hereby the way for Nebuchadnezzars restitution (whose tearme of punishment was then expired) by raising such trouble, as should make him the more desired, both of the Princes and the people. I will not here vse many words to confute that which Berosus hath further set downe of Euilmerodach, telling vs that he was slaine by his sisters husband: for the plaine words of the Scripture, named the yeere wherein he gaue liberty to Iechonia, doe plainly testifie that he out-liued the three or foure and fortieth yeere of his Fathers reigne, which was the last of his life.

This may suffice to shew, that they who are said to haue succeeded Euilmerodach in the Kingdome, might indeede haue so done, though not when he held it in his owne right. Of Baltha sar, who was his Sonne & Heire, we finde, that he had such conditions, as God permitted to be in a King for the ruine of the people. He was from his young yeeres of a mischieuous nature; hauing in his Fathers time slaine a Noble yong man that should haue married his sister, onely for spight and enuie to see him kill two wilde beasts in hunting, at which himselfe hauing throwne his Iaueline had missed them. Another great Lord he had gelded, because a Gentlewoman commending his beauty, said it were a happy woman that should be his wife. Such barbarous vilanies caused many which had loued his Father (as a good and gracious, though vnfortunate Prince) to reuolt from him vnto the enemie as soone as he was King. Neither doe I finde that he performed any thing worthy of record, but as a Coward and a Foole he lost all; sitting still, and not once daring to giue battell to them that daily tooke somewhat from him: Yet carelesly feasting when danger had hemmed him in on euery side, and when death arrested him by the hands of those whom he had wronged in his Fathers life. So the end of him was base and miserable; for he died as a foole taken in vnexcusable security, yet had not that happinesse, such as it is, of a death free from apprehension of feare, but was terrified with a dreadfull vision; which had shewed his ruine not in many houres before, euen whilest he was drinking in that wine, which the swords of his insulting enemies drew out of him, together with his latest bloud. It is therefore in this place enough to say of him, That after a dishonourable reigne of seauenteene yeeres, he perished like a beast, and was slaine as he deserued. The rest that concerneth him in question of his time, hath beene spoken heretofore; in matter of his affaires, shall be handled among the acts of Cyrus, to whose storie that of Balthasar is but an appendix.

CHAP. II.

Of the originall and first greatnesse of the Persians.

§. I.

That the Medes were chiefe actors in the subuersion of the Babylonian Empire.

THE Line of Belochus being now extinguished in Balthasar, the Empire of Babylon, and of Assyria, was ioyned first to that of Media, which then was gouerned by Cyaxares or Darius Medus, after whom Cyrus became Lord and Monarch, both of Assyria and of Media it selfe.

Of the race of Phul Belochus there were ten Kings besides himselfe, and of Arbaces as many are found by Metasthenes. These two Prouinciall Gouernours hauing cut downe the last branch of Ninus in Sardanapalus, diuided betweene them the Easterne Empire. Cyaxares (whom the Scriptures call Darius Medus) the last of the race of Arbaces, dying about two yeeres after that the line of Belochus was ended in Balthasar; the Dominions aswell of the Conquerour, as of the conquered, fell to a third Familie, namely, to Cyrus of the house of Achæmenes, the Princes of which bloud reigning in Persia, had formerly formerly beene dependants on the Medes, and were of as little power at home, as of fame abroad in the World.

Of the Family of the Achæmenes, and Line of the Persian Kings, we shall hereafter find occasion in due place to intreat.

The Nation of the Medes descended from Madai the third sonne of Iaphet; that they had Kings soone after the floud, Lactantius and Diodorus haue found record; For Lactantius remembreth an ancient King of the Medes called Hydaspes, and Diodore speaketh of Pharnus with his seauen sonnes, slaine by the Assyrian in the beginning of their Empire.

But of these who succeeded Arbaces the first, that freed his Nation from the Assyrians, I take the list and number from Eusebius, adding Darius Medus: of whom I haue spoken in their proper places heretofore; and they are these.

Arbaces.	Who reigned	28. yeeres.
Sosarmus.		30. yeeres.
Medidus.		40. yeeres.
Cardiceas.		13. yeeres.
Diocles.		53. yeeres.
Phraortes.		24. yeeres.
Cyaxares.		32. yeeres.
Astyages.		38. yeeres.
Darius Medus.

And though the Greekes ascribe the conquest of Babylon to Cyrus alone, yet the Scriptures teach vs, that Darius was not onely King of Media, and had the Persians his followers, but that the Armie victorious ouer Balthazar was his; as the Assyrian and Babylonian Empire also was during his owne life. For we finde in Daniel, that Darius of the Medes tooke the Kingdome being threescore and two yeeres old: And further, what Officers it pleased him to set ouer the Kingdome. And so was it prophecied by Isay long before: Behold, I will stirre vp the Medes against them, &c. And by Ieremie; The Lord hath raised vp the Spirit of the King of the Medes: for his purpose is against Babel to destroy it; and in the eight and twentieth Verse, Prepare against her the Nations, with the King of the Medes, the Dukes thereof, the Princes thereof, and all the Land of his Dominion. These Scriptures Iulius Affricanus doth well open, who taking authority from Diodore, Castor, Thallus, and others, deliuereth that Babylon was taken before Cyrus began to reigne, which also agreeth with Strabo, where he saith, That as the Medes were subiugated by the Persians, so before that, both the Babylonians and Assyrians were mastered by the Medes. And therefore the reports of Iustine, and Herodotus, are not to be receiued, who attribute the taking of Babylon to Cyrus alone.

By what meanes the Empire was translated from the Medes to the Persians.

HOw the Kingdome of the Medes fell into the hands of Cyrus, it is a doubt not sufficiently cleared by Historians, but rather their different relations of his beginnings haue bred the former opinion of those who giue the conquest of Babel to the Persian onely. For some there are who denie that Astyages had any other Successour than Cyrus his Grand-child by Mandane. Whereas Ctesias on the contrary side affirmeth, that Cyrus was no way descended from Astyages (whom he calleth Astigas or Apania) but onely that hauing vanquished him in battaile, and confined him to Bactria, he married his Daughter Amytis. But I finde the relations of Ctesias often cited and seldome followed, and himselfe sometimes very iustly reproued of wilfull vntruth.

Viginier a diligent and learned Historian of this age, produceth many probable reasons that Astyages had no such sonne as Cyaxares, or Darius Medus; and to confirme his opinion the more, he citeth Diodore, Iustine, Strabo, Plato, Aristotle, Isocrates, and before them Castor, Thallus, and Phlegon, who doe not finde any such Successor. Neither doe Tatianus, Theophilus Antiochenus, Iulius Affricanus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Iustine Martyr, Lactantius, Eusebius, S. Hierome, or S. Augustine, make report out of any faithfull Author by them read, that hath giuen other Son or Successour to Astyages than Cyrus.

Yet seeing that this manner of argument ab authoritate negatiuè, doth neuer inforce consent; we may be the bolder (all this great list of noble Writers by him alleaged notwithstanding) to affirme that either Astyages himselfe must haue beene Darius of the Medes, which cannot agree with his place in the course of time; Or else to giue him some other Successour, according to Iosephus and Xenophon, the same whom Daniel calleth Darius. For it is manifest, and without dispute, that the King of the Medes commanded in chiefe, and was absolute Lord of that Conquest, Cyrus during his life, being no other than the Lieutenant of his Armie, and subiect to his authoritie; The strength of both Nations, to wit, the Medes and Persians, with other the Vassals of Darius, being ioyned together to compound it.

But it is very certaine that the honour of that great victorie ouer Babylon was wholly giuen to Cyrus, who was the instrument preordained and forenamedby God himselfe, for this action, but for the deliuery of his Church; a greater worke not onely in the eyes of God, than the subuersion of any State or Monarchie, how powerfull soeuer.

And it may well be thought, that the Souldiers imployed in that seruice did rather ascribe the glory to him that was the best man of Warre, than to the Median, who was greatest in riches and power. All which also falling vpon Cyrus by succession, and continuing in his posteritie, did much augment the fame of his vertue, which among prophane Historians ouergrew altogether the honour due to Cyaxares, both because he was old, and did nothing in person; as also because he soone after quitted the world, and left all to Cyrus, who was possest of whatsoeuer belonged to Darius, before the fame of any such King or Conqueror was carried farre off.

And for the Greeke Historians, they tooke all things from the relation of the Persians, who gaue to Cyrus all the praise of a most excellent Prince, making none his equall. Onely Daniel in the first, fift, and sixt Chapters of his prophecies, makes it plaine, that himselfe not onely liued a great Officer vnder King Darius, but that he continued in that estate to the first of Cyrus; which being the yere of Daniels death, could not haue beene distinguished from the reigne of Darius, if they had begun together and reigned ioyntly; Neither can it be imagined that Darius held the Kingdome by Cyrus permission, considering that Cyrus began after him.

§ III.

Xenophons relation of the Warre with the Medes and Persians, made with ioynt forces vpon the Assyrians, and others.

THese Testimonies of the Scriptures, which neede no other confirmation, yet made more open to our vnderstanding, by that which Xenophon hath written of these wars: The cause whereof, according to his report, was this.

VVnen the Assyrian had enlarged his Empire with victories, and was become Lord of all Syria, and many other Countries, he began to hope that if the Medes could be brought vnder his subiection, there should not then bee left any Nation adioyning able to make head against him. For the King of the Medes was able to bring into the field threescore thousand foot, and ten thousand horse, to which the forces of Persia being ioyned, made an exceeding strong Armie.

The Assyrian considering the strength of such a Neighbour, inuited Cræsus King of Lydia, a Prince very mighty both in men and treasure, and with him other Lords of Asia the lesse to his assistance, alleaging that those Easterne Nations were very powerfull, and so firmely conioyned by league and many alliances, that it would not be easie, no not possible, for any one Nation to resist them. With these incitements, and strengthened with great presents, he drew to himselfe so many adherents, as he compounded an Armie of two hundred thousand foot, and threescore thousand horse; of which, tenne thousand horse, and fortie thousand foot were ledde by Cræsus, who had great cause of enmitie with the Medes, in regard of the Warre made by them against his Father Alyattes; But this great Armie was by Cyaxares King of the Medes, and by Cyrus Generall of the Persian forces, vtterly broken; Vpon which defeat the Assyrian King being also slaine, so many of the Assyrians reuolted, as Babylon it selfe could not longer bee assured without the succours of Mercenaries, waged with great summes of money out of Asia the lesse, Ægypt, and elsewhere. Which new gathered forces were were alſo ſcattered by Cyrus, who following his aduantage, poſſeſt himſelfe of a great part of the leſſer Aſia; at which time it was, as I take it, that Cræſus himſelfe was alſo made priſoner.

The attempt of Babylon following ſoone after, the Armie lying before it being paid by Darius, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, and led by Cyrus his ſiſters ſon, preuailed againſt Balthaſar, as in due time ſhall be ſet downe.

Thoſe Perſians which followed Cyrus, and by him leuied, are numbred thirtie thouſand foot-men, of which a thouſand were armed Gentlemen, the reſt of the common ſort were Archers, or ſuch as vſed the Dart or Sling. So farre Xenophon. Of whom in this argument, as it is true, that he deſcribed in Cyrus the patterne of a moſt Heroicall Prince, with much poeticall addition: So it cannot be denyed, but that the bulke and groſſe of his Narration was founded vpon meere Hiſtoricall truth.

Neither can it indeede be affirmed of any the like Writers, that in euery ſpeech and circumſtance he hath preciſely tyed himſelfe to the phraſe of the ſpeaker, or nature of the occaſion, but borrowed in each out of his owne inuention, appropriating the ſame to the times and perſons of whom he treated. Putting therefore apart the Morall and Politique diſcourſe, and examining but the Hiſtorie of things done, it will eaſily appeare, that Xenophon hath handled his vnder-taken ſubiect in ſuch ſort, that by beautifying the face thereof, he hath not in any ſort corrupted the body.

§. IIII.

The eſtate of the Medes and Perſians in times fore-going this great warre.

FOr it is commonly agreed vpon, that Achæmenes the ſonne of Perſes being Gouernour of Perſia, did aſſociate himſelfe with Arbaces, who commanded in Media in that rebellion againſt Sardanapalus, and that each of them after the victorie obtained, held for himſelfe the Dominion of thoſe Countries, which he had formerly ruled for the Aſſyrians; as alſo that they conueyed ouer the ſame honour and power to their poſteritie; which in Media was not abſolutely Regall, but with ſome reſtraint limited, vntill ſuch time as Deioces tooke vpon him the full authoritie and maieſtie of a King. From the death of Sardanapalus to the reigne of Deioces, are vſually accounted about an hundred and forty yeeres, in the laſt ſixtie whereof there reigned in Aſſyria mighty Princes; namely, Salmanaſſar and his Succeſſours, whoſe great atchieuements in Syria and elſewhere, witneſſe, that the Medes and Perſians found it not for their aduantage to vndertake any offenſiue warre againſt thoſe victorious Kings, it being alſo probable that the league continued as yet betweene theſe the ſucceſſours of Belochus, and Arbaces, who had formerly ſhared the Empire.

Now from the beginning of Deioces to the firſt of Aſtyages, there paſt aboue ninetie yeeres, in which if Herodotus haue written truely, that Phraortes conquered Perſia, and how he and other Kings of Media by many victories greatly enlarged their dominions, and commanded many parts of Aſia, it had beene but an vnaduiſed enterpriſe of the Aſſyrians and Babylonians, to haue waſted themſelues againſt the Syrians and Ægyptians, leauing ſo able and victorious a Nation on their backes. But that the Medes had done nothing vpon the South parts of Perſia; and that the Perſians themſelues were not maſters of Suſiana in Nabuchodonoſors time, it is manifeſt in Daniel, who was then Gouernour for the Babylonian in Suſa or Suſan, the chiefe Citie thereof. It is true indeede, that the Medians, either vnder Cyaxares or Aſtyages, or both, had quarrell with Halyattes the father of Cræſus, which after ſome ſixe yeeres diſpute was compounded.

How the affaires of Perſia ſtood in ſo many ages, I doe not finde any memory. It ſeemeth that the roughneſſe of the mountainous Countrey which they then poſſeſt, with the confederacie which they continued with the Medes, gaue them more ſecurity than fame: For if their Kings, being the poſteritie of Achæmenes, had done any memorable acts, the greatneſſe which they afterward obtained would not haue ſuffered any forgetfulneſſe thereof. But as we finde all Xenophons reports, both of theſe Warres and the ſtate of thoſe Countries to be very conſonant and agreeable to the relation of many other good Authors, ſo it appeares, that the race of Achæmenes held the Principalitie of Perſia from Father to Sonne for many deſcents. And therefore we may better giue credit to Xenophon, who affirmeth, That Cambyses the father of Cyrus was King of Persia: than to those that make him a meane man, and say, that Astiages gaue him his daughter Mandane in marriage, to the end that her son (whose natiuity he feared) might be disabled from any great vndertaking by his fathers ignobilitie.

For what cause of griefe could it be to Astiages, that the sonne of his daughter should become Lord of the best part of Asia? No; it was more likely, that vpon such a Prophecie his loue to his grand-childe should haue encreased, and his care beene the greater to haue married her to some Prince of strength and eminent vertue.

Yea, the same Herodotus, who is the first Author, and as I thinke the deuiser of the mischiefe intended against Cyrus by his Grandfather, doth confesse, That the line of the Achamenida was so renowned, that the great King Xerxes in the height of his prosperitie did thence deriue himselfe, and vaunt of it: which hee would neuer haue done, had they beene ignoble, nor had they beene the vassals of any other King or Monarch.

For in this sort Xerxes in the seauenth of Herodotus deriueth himselfe.

Cambyses.	Ariaramnes.	Darius.
Cyrus.	Arsamnes.	Xerxes.

Of the Achamenida there were two races: of the first was Cyrus the great, whose issue male failed in his two sonnes, Cambyses and Smerdis. This royall family is thus set downe by the learned Reineccius.

Achamenes, the sonne of Perses, first King of Persia.
Darius.
Cyrus, the first of that name, had Cambyses and Atossa; who married to Pharnaces, King of Cappadocia, had Artystona and other daughters.
Cambyses had Cyrus the Great, Cyrus had Cambyses, who succeeded him, and Smerdis slaine by his brother Cambyses.

Of the second were those seauen great Princes of Persia, who hauing ouerthrowne the vsurped royalty of the Magi, chose from among themselues Darius the sonne of Hystaspes King.

This Kingdome of Persia was first knowne by the name of Elam, so called after Elam the sonne of Sem, and the people therein inhabiting, Elamita; by Elianus, Elyma; by Iosephus, Elymi.

Euse. l. 6. c. 8. de Prep. Euang. Suidas deriues this Nation sometimes from Assur, sometime from Magog, of whom they were called Magusæi; which Magusæi, according to Eusebius, are not to be taken for the Nation in generall, but for those who were afterward called the Magi or Wise men. So doe the Greekes, among many other their sayings of them, affirme, That the Persians were anciently written Artæi, & that they called themselues Cephenes. But that they were Elamitæ, Moses and the Prophets, Esay, Ieremie, Ezechiel, Daniel and Esdras in many places confirme: Which also S. Hierome vpon Ieremie the fiue and twentieth, vpon Daniel the eight, and also in his Hebrew questions approoueth, saying: Elam à quo Elamita Principes Persidis; Elam, of whom were the Elamites Princes of Persia.

2 Mac. 9. 1 Mac. 6. And that Citie which the Author of the second booke of the Maccabees calleth Persepolis, is by the Author of the first called Elimais, but is now called Siras, being the same which Antiochus, for the great riches thereof, twice attempted in vaine, and to his great dishonour. And yet this Citie, now called Siras, was not the old Persepolis; for Alexander, at the request of Thais the Harlot, burnt it.

The first King of Persia to vs knowne, if we follow the current of Authors interpreting the foureteenth chapter of Genesis, was Chedorlaomer, who liued with Amraphel or Ninias, and ioyned with him in the warre against those Arabians; who was afterward extinguished by the forces of Abraham.

CHAP.

CHAP. III.

Of Cyrus.

§. I.

Of Cyrus his name, and first actions.

AS touching the name of Cyrus, Strabo saith, That the same was taken from a Riuer which watereth Persia; this great Prince hauing Agradatus for his proper name. But the great Cyrus was not the first of that name. Herodotus otherwise; and that Cyrus signifieth a father in the Persian Tongue, and therefore so intituled by the people. Strab. l. 15.

It is true that for his Iustice and other excellent vertues he was indeede called a Father; but that the name of Cyrus had any such signification, I thinke it be mistaken.

Plutarch hath a third opinion, affirming, That Cyrus is as much to say as the Sunne, in the same Language. Howsoeuer it be, yet the Prophet Esay, almost two hundred yeeres before Cyrus was borne, giues him that name, Thus saith the Lord vnto Cyrus, his Annointed, &c. Plut. in vit. Artax.

Before the Conquest of Babylon, the victories which Cyrus obtained were many and great: among which, the Conquest of Lydia, and other Prouinces thereto subiect, together with the taking of Crœsus himselfe, are not recounted by Eusebius, Orosius, and others, but placed among his latter atchiuements: whose opinion for this difference of time is founded vpon two reasons; namely, That of the Median there is no mention in that last warre against Crœsus: and that the obtaining of Sardis is referred to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad, and the glorious victory which Cyrus had ouer Babylon, to the fiue and fiftieth Olympiad.

The former of which might haue beene vsed (and was by the Greekes) to exclude the Medes from the honor of hauing won Babylon it selfe, which in due place I haue answered. The latter seemes to haue reference to the second Warre which Cyrus made vpon Lydia, when it rebelled; at which time he so established his former Conquest, as after that time these Nations neuer offered to reuolt. Wherefore I like better in this particular, to beleeue with Herodotus, whom the most of Chronologers follow, and finde the enterprise of Sardis to præcede that of Babylon.

§ II.

Of Crœsus the King of Lydia, who made warre vpon Cyrus.

I Haue in the last Booke spoken somewhat of Crœsus, of his race and predecessors, as also of those Kings which gouerned Lydia in more ancient times: of which the first (to prophane Authors knowne) was Lydus the sonne of Atys: Which familie extinguished, the Kingdome was by an Oracle conferred vpon Argon, descended from Hercules, whereof there were two and twentie generations, Candaules being the last, who by shewing his faire Wife naked to Gyges his fauorite, he was by the same Gyges (thereto vrged vpon perill of his owne life by the Queene) the next day slaine. Which done, Gyges enioyed both the Queene and the Kingdome of Lydia, and left the same to Atys his sonne, who was father to Sadyattes, the father of Halyattes (who thrust the Cimerians out of Asia) and Halyattes begat Crœsus: Which fiue Kings, of a third race, enioyed that Kingdome an hundred and seauenty yeeres. Halyattes the father of Crœsus was an vndertaking Prince, and after he had continued a warre against Cyaxares the Median, a Prince very powerfull, and maintained it sixe yeeres: a peace was concluded vpon equall conditions betweene them. Herod. Lt. 3. & 5.

Astyages, the sonne of Cyaxares, and grandfather to Cyrus, thought himselfe greatly honoured by obtaining Aryenes, Crœsus sister, whom he married.

But Cræsus so farre enlarged his dominions after his fathers death, as he was nothing inferior in territorie to any King or Monarch of that age: Of which, about that time there were foure in effect of equall strength; to wit, the Median, the Babylonian, the Ægyptian and the Lydian: onely Nabuchodonosor, after he had ioyned Phœnicia, Palestina, and Ægypt to his Empire, had thence-forward no competitor during his owne life.

But Cræsus, notwithstanding the men and treasure spent in the quarrell of the Babylonians, he yet mastred Æolis, Doris, and Ionia, Prouinces possest by the Greekes in Asia the lesse, adioyning to Lydia; gaue law to the Phrygians, Bithynians, Carians, Mysians, Paphlagonians, and other Nations. And that he also inforst the Ephesians to acknowledge him, notwithstanding they compassed their citie with Dianaes girdle, Herodotus witnesseth. More- Her. l. 5.
ouer, Athenæus out of Berosus (which also Strabo confirmeth) makes report of a Signall Athen. l. 12. c. 37 victory which Cræsus obtained against the Sacæans, a Nation of the Scythians, in memory whereof the Babylonians his allies did yeerely celebrate a Feast, which they called Sacea: All which he performed in foureteene yeeres.

And being now confident in the continuance of his good fortune, and enuious of Cyrus fame, doubting also, that his prosperous vndertakings might in the end grow perillous to himselfe, he consulted with the Oracle of Apollo, whom he presented with maruellous rich gifts, what successe he might hope for against Cyrus, if he vndertooke him: from whom he receiued this riddle; Crœsus passing ouer the Riuer Halys, shall dissolue a great dominion. For the diuell being doubtfull of the successe, payed him with merchandize of both sides like, and might be inuerted either way to the ruine of Persia, or of his owne Lydia.

§. III.

Crœsus his Expedition against Cyrus.

HEreupon Cræsus being resolued to stop the course of Cyrus fortunes, if he could, despised all the arguments vsed by Sandanes to the contrary, who desired him to fore-thinke, That he vrged a Nation inhabiting a barren and mountainous Region, a people not couered with the soft silke of wormes, but with the hard skins of beasts; not fed with such meat as they fancied, but content with what they found; drinkers of water, not of wine: and in a word, a Nation warlike, enduring, valiant and prosperous; ouer whom if he became victorious, hee could thereby enrich himselfe in nothing but fame, in which he already excelled: and if by them beaten, and subiected, so great would his losse appeare of all things which the world hath in account, as the same could neither hastily be told, nor readily conceiued.

Notwithstanding this solide Counsaile, Cræsus hauing prepared a powerfull armie, he led the same towards Media, but in his passage, he was arrested at Pterium, a Citie of great strength in Cappadocia; which while he sought by all meanes to surprise or to force, Cyrus came on, and found the Lydians encamped before it. That each was inferior to other in strength or opinion, I doe not finde: for out of doubt, Cræsus as he excelled any Prince of that age in riches and ability; so was he not vnder any in territorie and fame that then liued.

But as Cratippus of Mitylene answered Pompey when he complained against the gods, because they fauoured a disturber and vsurper of the Common-weale against him who fought for the Romane liberty, That Kingdomes and Commonweales had their encrease and period from diuine Ordinance: so at this time was the Winter of Cræsus prosperity at hand, the leaues of his flourishing fortune ready to fall, and that of Cyrus but in the flower and first spring. The God of all power, and not Admetis Herdman, Apollo, had giuen date to the one, and a beginning of glory to the other.

When these two Armies were in view of each other, after the entertainement of diuers skirmishes, the Persians and Lydians began to ioyne in grosse troupes: supplies from both Kings thrust on vpon the falling off, and aduancement of eitheir Nations: and as the Persians had somewhat the better of the day, so when the darke vaile of night had hidden each armie from the others view, Cræsus doubting what successe the rising Sunne would bring with it, quitted the field to Cyrus, and with all speede possible retyred, and taking the next way into Lydia, recouered Sardis his first Citie and Regall Seat, without any pursuit made by Cyrus to retard him. Where being arriued, and nothing

ſuſpecting Cyrus approach, or any other warre for that Winter, hee diſmiſſed the ſouldiors, and ſent the troupes of his ſundry Nations to their owne Prouinces, appointing them to re-aſſemble at the end of fiue moneths, acquainting his Commanders with his intents for the renewing of the warre at the time appointed.

§. IIII.
The Conqueſt of Lydia by Cyrus.

Cyrus in the following morning finding the Lydians departed, put his armie in order to purſue them, yet not ſo haſtily, and at their heeles, as to be diſcouered. But hauing good intelligence of Cræſus his proceeding, he ſo meaſured his marches, as he preſented not himſelfe before Sardis, till ſuch time as Cræſus had diſpoſed his armie to their Wintring garriſons: which being altogether vnlooked for, and vnfeared, hee ſurrounded Sardis with his Armie: Wherein Cræſus hauing no other Companies than his Citizens and ordinary Gards, after fourteene dayes ſiege the ſame was entred by aſſault, and all executed that reſiſted. Cræſus hauing now neither armes to fight, nor wings to flye, Sardis being on all parts ſtrongly encompaſſed, thruſt himſelfe into the heape and miſerable multitude of his vaſſals, and had vndergone the common fortune of common perſons vanquiſhed, had not a ſonne of his, who had beene dumbe all his life (by extremitie of paſſion and feare enabled) cried out to the ſouldiers to ſpare Cræſus. Who thereupon being taken and impriſoned, deſpoyled of all things but the expectation of death, he was forthwith tied in fetters, and ſet on the top of a great and high heape of wood, to be conſumed to aſhes thereon. To which when the fire was ſet and kindled, remembring the diſcourſe which hee had with the Athenian Law-giuer, he thrice cried out on his name, Solon, Solon, Solon: and being demanded what he meant by that inuocation, he firſt vſed ſilence: but vrged againe, he told them, That hee had now found it true which Solon had long ſince told him, That many men in the race and courſes of their liues might well be accounted fortunate, but no man could diſcerne himſelfe for happy indeed, till his end.

In communi calamitate ſuam quiſque ſortem habet fortunam, Curt.

Memoria meritis perimit: timor vocis eſt incitamentum, &c. Solin. c. 7.

Homò qui in homine calamitoſo miſericors eſt, meimet ſui, Caſſ.

Of which anſwere Cyrus being ſpeedily informed, remembring the changes of fortune and his owne mortalitie, hee commanded his miniſters of Iuſtice to withdraw the fire with all diligence, to ſaue Cræſus, and to conduct him to his preſence: Which done, Cyrus demanded of him, Who it was that had perſwaded him? Or what ſelfe reaſon had conducted him to inuade his territory, and to make him of a friend an enemie? To whom he thus anſwered; It was thy proſperous, and my vnproſperous deſtinie (the Grecian god flattering therewithall my ambition) that were the inuenters and conductors of Cræſus warre againſt Cyrus.

Cyrus being pierſt with Cræſus anſwer, & bewailing his eſtate, though victorious ouer it, did not only ſpare his life, but entertained him euer after as a King and his companion, ſhewing therein a true effect of mercy indeed, Quæ non cauſam ſed fortunam ſpectat.

And herein is the reall difference diſcerned between that behauiour which we call Beneficium latronis, & gratiam Principis: A theefe ſometime ſparing the life of him which is in his power, but vniuſtly: A King that giueth breath, and a continuance of being, to him that was the cauſe and author of his owne euill.

The report made by Xenophon is, That Cyrus did friendly entertaine Cræſus at the firſt ſight, not mentioning that which Herodotus deliuers, and is here already ſet downe, that hee ſhould haue beene burnt aliue. It may very well be, that Xenophon pourtraying (in Cyrus) an heroyeall Prince, thought an intent ſo cruell, fitter to bee forgotten than rehearſed, as too much miſ-beſeeming a generous nature. And it is very likely, that neereneſſe of alliance might with-hold Cyrus (had hee beene otherwiſe vicious) from ſo cruell a purpoſe againſt his grandmothers brother. Howſoeuer it was, the Morall part of the Storie hath giuen much credit and reputation to the report of Herodotus (as to many the like it often doth) and made it paſſe for currant, though the truſt repoſed in Cræſus afterwards may ſeeme to argue, that Cyrus did not vſe him inhumanely at the firſt.

For as Herodotus himſelfe telleth vs, when Cyrus paſt with his Armie ouer Araxes into Scythia, he left Cræſus to accompanie and aduiſe his ſonne Cambyſes, Gouernour of the Empire in his abſence, with whom he liued all the time of Cyrus, & did afterward follow

Cambyſes

Cambyses into Ægypt, where he hardly escaped his tyrannous hand. What his end was, I doe not finde.

But in this time the races of three of the greatest Kings in that part of the world tooke end; to wit, of the Babylonians, Medians and Lydians; in Balthasar, Cyaxares, and Cræsus.

§. V.

How Cyrus wonne Babylon.

AFter this Lydian warre ensued the great Conquest of Babylon, which gaue vnto Cyrus an Empire so large and mighty, that he was iustly reputed the greatest Monarch then liuing vpon earth. How long time the preparations for this great action tooke vp, it is vncertaine; onely it seemes, that tenne whole yeeres did passe betweene his taking those two Cities of Sardes and Babylon, which neuertheless I doe not thinke to haue beene wholly occupied in prouision for the Assyrian warre, but rather to haue beene spent in setling the Estate which hee had already purchased. And heereunto perhaps may be referred that which Ctesias hath in his fragments of a warre made by Cyrus vpon the Scythians, though related as foregoing the victorie obtained against Græsus. He telleth vs, That Cyrus inuaded Scythia, and being victorious ouer that Nation, took Amorges their King prisoner: but being in a second battel ouerthrowne by the wife of Amorges, Sparetha, & therein taken, the one King was deliuered for the other.

Likewise it may be thought, that no small part of those troubles which arose in the lower Asia, grew soone after the departure of the victorious armie, before the Conquest was fully established.

For after Cyrus was returned out of Asia the lesse, many Nations, conquered formerly by Cræsus, and now by Cyrus, reuolted from him; against whom he imployed Pactias, and then Harpagus, who first reduced the Phocians vnder their former obedience: and then the rest of the Greekes inhabiting Asia the lesse, as the Ionians, Carians, Æolians, and Lycians, who resoluedly (according to the strength they had) defended themselues. But in the attempt vpon Babylon it self, it is not to be doubted, that Cyrus employed al his forces, hauing taken order before-hand, that nothing should be able to diuert him, or to raise that siege, and make frustrate the worke vpon which he did set all his rest. And great reason there was, that he should bend all his care and strength vnto the taking of that Citie, which beside the fame and reputation that it held, as being head of an Empire thereon depending, was so strongly fenced with a treble wall of great height, & surrounded with waters vnfoordable, so plentifully victualled for many yeeres, that the inhabitants were not onely free from all doubt and feare of their estate, but despised and derided all purposes and power of their besiegers.

The onely hope of the Medes and Persians, who despaired of carrying by assault a Citie so well fortified and manned, was in cutting off all supplies of victuals and other necessaries; whereof though the Towne was said to bee stored sufficiently for more than twenty yeres, yet might it well be deemed, that in such a world of people as dwelt within those gates, one great want or other would soone appeare, and vanquish the resolution of that vnwarlike multitude. In expecting the successe of this course, the besiegers were likely to endure much trauell, and all in vaine, if they did not keepe streight watch and strong guards vpon all quarters.

This was hard to doe, in regard of the vast circuit of those walls which they were to gird in, with numbers neither great enough, nor of men sufficiently assured vnto their Commander: The consideration whereof ministred vnto the Babylonians matter of good pastime, when they saw the Lydians, Phrygians, Cappadocians, and others, quartered about their Towne to keepe them in, who hauing beene their ancient friends and allies, were more likely to ioyne with them, if occasion were offered, than to vse much diligence on the behalfe of Cyrus, who had, as it were, yesterday laid vpon their neckes the galling yoake of seruitude. Whilest the besieged were pleasing themselues in this deceitfull and vaine gladnesse, that is the ordinarie fore-runner of suddaine calamitie; Cyrus, whom the Ordinance of God made strong, constant, and inuentiue, deuised by so many channels and trenches as were sufficient and capable of Euphrates, and so to draw the same from the walls of Babylon, thereby to make his approach the more facile and assured: which when by the labour of many hands hee had performed,

he ſtayed the time of his aduantage for the execution: for he had left certaine bankes or heads vncut, betweene the maine riuer which ſurrounded the Citie, and his owne Trenches.

Now Balthaſar, finding neither any want or weakeneſſe within, nor any poſſibilitie of approach for his enemies without, prepared an exceeding ſumptuous feaſt, publike Plaies and other Paſtimes, and thereto inuited a thouſand of his Princes or Nobilitie, beſides his wiues, curtizans, and others of that trade. This he did either to let the beſiegers know, that his prouiſions were either ſufficient, not onely for all needefull vſes, but euen for iolitie and exceſſe: Or becauſe he hoped that his enemies, vnder the burthen of many diſtreſſes were well neere broken, or in honour of Bel his moſt reuerenced Idoll: Or that it was his birth or coronation day: Or for many or all theſe reſpects. And he was not contented with ſuch magnificence as no Prince elſe could equal, but (vſing Daniels words) he lifted himſelfe vp againſt the Lord of Heauen: For he and his Princes, wiues and concubines, made carowſing cups of the Veſſels of God, in contempt of whom he praiſed his owne puppets, made of Siluer and Gold, of Braſſe, Iron, Wood, and Stone, Quanta fuit ſtultitia in vaſibus aureis bibentes, ligneos & lapideos Deos laudare; How great a fooliſhneſſe was it (ſaith S. Hierome,) drinking in golden Cups, to praiſe gods of Wood and Stone. While Balthaſar was in this ſort triumphing, and his braines well filled with vapors, hee beheld a hand, which by diuine power wrote on the wall oppoſite vnto him certaine words which he vnderſtood not: wherewith ſo great a feare and amazement ſeized him, as the ioynts of his loynes were looſed, and his knees ſmote one againſt the other. Which paſſion when he had in ſome part recouered, he cried out for his Caldeans, Aſtrologians, and Southſayers, promiſing them great rewards, and the third place of honour in the Kingdome to him that could reade and expound the writing; but it exceeded their Art. In this diſturbance and aſtoniſhment the Queene hearing what had paſt, and of the Kings amazement, after reuerence done, vſed this ſpeech: There is a man in thy Kingdome, in whom is the ſpirit of the holy Gods, and in the dayes of thy father, light, and vnderſtanding and wiſedome, like the wiſedome of the Gods, was found in him, whom the King Nabuchodonoſor thy father, the King (I ſay) thy father made chiefe of the Inchanters, Aſtrologians, Chaldeans, and Southſayers, becauſe a more excellent ſpirit, and knowledge, and vnderſtanding, &c. were found in him, euen in Daniel, &c. Now let Daniel be called, and he will declare the interpretation. Dan. 5. v. 5.

This Queene, Ioſephus takes for the grandmother; Origen and Theodoret for the mother of Balthaſar; either of which may be true: for it appeareth, that ſhe was not any of the Kings wiues, becauſe abſent from the feaſt; and being paſt the age of dancing and banqueting, ſhe came in vpon the bruit of the miracle, and to comfort the King in his diſtraction: and whereas Daniel was forgotten and neglected by others both of younger yeeres and times, this old Queene remembred well what hee had done in the daies of Nabuchodonoſor, grandfather to this Balthaſar, and kept in minde both his religion and diuine gifts. Orig. & Theo. in Dan. Ioſeph. Ant. 10.

When Daniel was brought to the Kings preſence, who acknowledged thoſe excellent graces wherewith God had enriched him, he prayed him, together with promiſes of reward and honour, to reade and interprete thoſe words miraculouſly written; to whom Daniel made anſwere in a farre different ſtyle from that he vſed towards his Grandfather: for the euill which he foretold Nabuchodonoſor, he wiſhed that the ſame might befall his enemies, but to this King (whoſe neglect of God and vice he hated) he anſwered in theſe words, Keepe thy rewards to thy ſelfe, and giue thy gifts to another, yet will I reade the writing vnto the King, and ſhew him the interpretation: Which before he had performed, he gaue him firſt the cauſe of Gods iuſt iudgement againſt him, and the reaſon of this terrible ſentence; whereof the King and all his Wiſe men were vtterly ignorant: Which being written at large in Daniel, hath this effect, That forgetting Gods goodneſſe to his Father, whom all Nations feared and obeyed, and that for his pride and neglect of thoſe benefits, as he depriued him of his eſtate and vnderſtanding; ſo vpon the acknowledgement of Gods infinite power he reſtored him to both. This King notwithſtanding lifted himſelfe vp againſt the ſame God, and preſuming both to abuſe thoſe veſſels dedicated to holy vſes, and neglecting the Lord of all power; praiſed and worſhipped the dead Idols of Gold, Siluer, Braſſe, Iron, Stone, and Wood: and therefore thoſe words, from the Oracle of a true God deliuered, (to wit) Mene Tekel, Vpharſin, Dan. 5. v. 18, 19. 20.

gaue the King knowledge, that God had numbred the time of his Kingdom, and finished it: That he was weighed in the ballance of Gods iustice, and found too light; and that his Empire was diuided and giuen to the Medes and Persians.

The very euening or night of this day, wherein Balthasar feasted and perished, Cyrus either by his espiall, according to Xenophon, or inspired by God himselfe, whose ensigne he followed in this warre, found the time and opportunitie to inuite him: and therefore while the Kings head, and the heads of his Nobilitie were no lesse filled with the vapors of wine, than their hearts with the feare of Gods iudgement, he caused all the banks and heads of his trenches to be opened and cut downe with that diligence, as by them hee drew the great Riuer of Euphrates drie for the present, by whose channell running, his ro armie made their entrance, finding none to disturbe them. All the Towne lay buried (as the Poet saith) in sleepe and wine: such as came in the Persians way, were put to the sword, vnlesse they saued themselues by flight, as some did, who ranne away crying, and filling the streets with an vncertaine tumult.

Such Assyrian Lords as had reuolted from Balthazar, and betakem themselues to the partie of Cyrus, did now conduct a selected companie to the King Palaces, which hauing easily forced, they rushed into the chamber where the King with his Princes were banqueting, slew both him and them without any mercie, who strugled in vaine to keepe those liues which God had newly threatned to take away. And now was the prophecie of Ieremie fulfilled, and that of Esay, two hundred yeeres before this subuersion, who in his seuen and fortieth Chapter, and elsewhere, writeth this destruction so feelingly and liuely, as if he had beene present both at the terrible slaughter there committed, and had seene the great and vnfeared change and calamitie of this great Empire; yea, and had also heard the sorrowes and bewailings of euery suruiuing soule thereunto subiect. His prophesie of this place he beginneth in these words: Come downe, and sit in the dust, O virgine daughter of Babel: sit on the ground, there is no throne, &c. And againe, Sit still and get thee into darkenesse, O daughter of the Chaldaans, for thou shalt no more be called the Ladie of Kingdomes. For though it cannot be doubted, that God vsed Nabuchodonosor and the Chaldaans, to punish the idolatrie of the Iudaans, yet Esay teacheth vs in this place, That he did not yet forget, that the execution of his iudgements was mixt with a rigorous extremitie. For (saith Esay) in the person of God, I was wroth with my people, I haue polluted mine inheritance, and giuen them into thine hand: thou didst shew them no mercie, but thou didst lay thy very heauie yoke vpon the ancient. I will rise vp against them, saith the Lord of Hosts, and will cut off from Babel the name and the remnant, and the sonne and the nephew. And in the thirteenth, Euery one that is found, shall be striken thorow: and whosoeuer ioyneth himselfe, shall fall by the sword, their children also shall be broken in pieces before their eyes, their houses spoyled, and their wiues rauished. So as there is no Historian who was either present at this victory of Cyrus, or that receiued the report from others truely as it was, that could better leaue the same to posteritie after it happened, than Esay hath done in many places of his prophecies, which were written two hundred yeeres before any thing attempted.

Ier. c: 27. Esa. c. 47. Cap. 47. Isai. 14. To wit, Euilmerodach and Balthasar.

The greatnesse and magnificence of Babylon, were it not by diuers graue Authors set downe, might seeme altogether fabulous: for besides the reports of Saint Hierome, Solinus, and Orosius, Aristotle in the third of his Politikes, the second Chapter, receiued the report for true, That one part of the Citie knew not that the rest was taken three daies after. Which is not impossible, if the testimonie of Diodorus Siculus may bee taken; who findes the compasse thereof at three hundred and threescore Stadia or Furlongs, which makes fiue and fortie miles: the walls whereof had so great a breadth, that fixe chariots might passe in front thereon. And of height, according to Ctesias and Clitarcus, three hundred threescore and fiue foot, garnished with an hundred and fifty Towers. Strabo in the beginning of his sixteenth Booke of Geographie giues it a greater circuit, adding fiue and twenty furlongs more to the former compasse, reckoning the same at three hundred fourescore and fiue furlongs, which makes eight and forty mile and one furlong: but finds the wall farre vnder that which Diodore reports: and so doth Curtius measure their thickenesse but at two and thirtie foot, and their height at an hundred cubits; which is also very much: euery cubite containing a foot and halfe of the large measure, though to the whole circuit of the Citie he giues the same with Siculus, and eight furlongs more. Herodotus findes a greater content than Strabo doth, namely, foure hundred and foureſcore furlongs circle; the thickeneſſe of the wall he meaſures at fiftie cubits, and the height at two hundred of the ſame regall cubit. For entrance it had an hundred gates of Braſſe, with poſts and hookes to hang them on of the ſame mettall: and therefore did the Prophet Eſay rightly intitle Babylon, The Princeſſe and glory of Kingdomes. Her. l. 1. Eſa. 47. & c. 13.

But when Cyrus had wonne her, hee ſtript her out of her Princely Robes, and made her a ſlaue, diuiding not onely all her goodly houſes, and her whole Territorie, with all the riches therein contained, among his Souldiers: but beſtowing the inhabitants themſelues as bondſlaues vpon thoſe that had taken poſſeſſion of their goods.

Touching the reigne of Cyrus, and the time which hee enioyed in reſt and pleaſure, I can ſay no more of it, than that it is generally agreed by all Chronologers to haue laſted onely ſeuen yeeres: in which time he made ſuch Conſtitutions, as differ little from the Ordinances of all wiſe Kings that are deſirous to eſtabliſh a Royall power to themſelues and their poſteritie.

§. VI.
The end of Cyrus.

THe laſt warre, and the end of this great King Cyrus, is diuerſly written. Herodotus and Iuſtine deliuer, That after the Conqueſt of Aſia the leſſe, Cyrus inuaded the Maſſagetes, a very warlike Nation of the Scythians, gouerned by Tomyris their Queene: and that in an incounter betweene the Perſians and theſe Northerne Nomades, Tomyris loſt her Armie, and her Son Spargapiſes, that commanded it: In reuenge whereof, this Queene making new leuies of men of Warre, and following the Warre againſt Cyrus, in a ſecond battaile beat the Perſian Armie, and taking Cyrus priſoner, cut off his head from his body, and coſt the ſame into a bolle of bloud, vſing theſe words; Thou that haſt all thy life time thirſted for bloud, now drinke thy fill, and ſatiate thy ſelfe.

It ſhould heereby ſeeme, that Cyrus knowing the ſtrength and multitude of thoſe frozen Nations, was perſwaded to abate their furie by ſome forcible inuaſion and depopulation, becauſe in the time of Cyaxares, father to Aſtyages, thoſe Scythians inuaded Media and Aſia the leſſe, and held the ſame in a ſeruile ſubiection eight and twentie yeeres.

This warre which Metaſthenes calleth Tomyrique, laſted (ſaith hee) ſixe yeeres, and tooke end at the death of Cyrus.

But in this particular I beleeue with Viginer, that this Scythian Warre was rather the ſame which Cyrus made againſt the Sacians, before the Conqueſt of Lydia, according to Cteſias before cited, who calleth Tomyris, Sparetha, though he deliuer the ſucceſſe of that warre otherwiſe than Herodotus doth: The rather (ſaith Viginer) becauſe Strabo in his eleuenth booke reciteth, that Cyrus ſurprized the Sacians by the ſame ſtratageme by which Iuſtine ſaith, he defeated the ſonne of Tomyris. And the ſame Cteſias alſo reporteth, That the laſt warre which Cyrus made was againſt Amorrhæus, King of the Derbicians, a Nation (as the reſt) of Scythia; whom though he ouercame, yet he then receiued the wound of his death, which he ſuffered three daies after. Vig. prim. part. Bib. Cte. l. 15. hiſt. part.

Strabo alſo affirmeth, That he was buried in his owne Citie of Paſagardes, which himſelfe had built, & where his Epitaph was to be read in his time; which is ſaid to haue been this: O vir quicunque es, & vndecunque aduenis, neque enim te aduenturum ignoraui: Ego ſum Cyrus qui Perſis imperium conſtitui, puſillum hoc terræ quo meum tegitur corpus mihi ne inuideas; O thou man, whoſoeuer thou art, or whenceſoeuer thou commeſt; for I was not ignorant that thou ſhouldeſt come: I am Cyrus that founded the Perſian Empire, doe not enuie vnto me this little earth, with which my bodie is couered. Strab. l. 15.

This Tombe was opened by Alexander, as Qu. Curtius reporteth, either vpon hope of treaſure, ſuppoſed to haue beene buried with him, or vpon deſire to honour his dead bodie with certaine ceremonies; in which there was found an olde rotten Target, two Scythian Bowes, and a Sword. The Coffin wherein his bodie lay, Alexander cauſed to be couered with his owne garment, and a Crowne of gold to be ſet vpon it. Theſe things well conſidered, as they giue credit to the reports of Xenophon and Zonaras, ſo they derogate much from Herodotus, who leaues his bodie in the hands of Tomyris. Q. Curt. l. Xen. p. l. 8. Zon. l. 2. c. 29.

And

And surely, had Cyrus lost the Armie of Persia in Scythia, it is not likely, that his sonne would so soone haue transported all his remaining forces into Ægypt, so farre off from that quarter: the Scythian Nation then victorious, and bordering Media; neither had Cambyses beene able in such haste to haue vndertaken and performed so great a Conquest. Wherefore I rather beleeue Xenophon, saying, That Cyrus died aged and in peace: and that finding in himselfe, that he could not long enioy the world, he called vnto him his Nobilitie, with his two sonnes, Cambyses and Smerdis; or after Xenophon, Tanaoxares: and after a long Oration, wherein he assured himselfe, and taught others, of the immortalitie of the Soule, and of the punishments and rewards following the good and ill deseruing of euery man in this life; hee exhorted his sonnes by the strongest arguments he had, to a perpetuall concord and agreement. Many other things he vttered, which make it probable, that hee receiued the knowledge of the true God from Daniel, when hee gouerned Susa in Persia; and that Cyrus himselfe had read the prophecie of Esay, wherein he was expressely named, and by God (for the deliuerie of his people) præordained. Which act of deliuering the Iewes from their Captiuitie, and of restoring the holy Temple and Citie of Hierusalem, was in true consideration the noblest worke that euer Cyrus performed. For in other actions hee was an instrument of Gods power, vsed for the chastising of many Nations, and the establishing of a Gouernment in those parts of the world, which was not long to continue. But herein he had the grace to be an instrument of Gods goodnesse, and a willing aduancer of his Kingdome vpon earth, which must last for euer, though heauen and earth shall perish.

§. VII.

Of Cyrus his Decree for building the Temple of God in Ierusalem.

HAuing therefore spoken of his great victories, mentioned by sundry Historians, the glory of all which was a reward of this his seruice done vnto him that was Author of them and of all goodnesse: I hold it meet at length to speake of the Decree made in the first of his Reigne, being perhaps the first that euer hee made, after his possession of the Babylonian Empire: That the captiue Iewes should returne againe into their owne Territorie, and re-build the House of God in Ierusalem, hauing now endured and finished the threescore and tenne yeeres captiuitie, by the Prophets foretold. For the accomplishing whereof, hee gaue order to his Treasurers to furnish them with all things necessarie and wanting. He also restored vnto them fiue thousand foure hundred threescore and nine Vessels of Gold and Siluer, whereof Nabuchodonosor, the grandfather of Balthasar, had formerly robbed the Temple.

1 Esd. 2. 2. Esd. 7. Phil in bre. The number of the Iewes which returned out of Chaldæa vnder their leader Zorobabel, the sonne of Salathiel, and nephew to King Ieconias, and Iesus or Iosua the sonne of Iosadak, were about fifty thousand; where, as soone as they arriued, they built an Altar to the liuing God, and sacrificed thereon, according to their owne Law, and afterward bethought themselues how to prepare materialls for the re-building of the Temple. 1. Esd. 3. 3. Esd. 5. Esd. c. 4. & 5 Ioseph. Ant. 11.

But no sooner did the Iewes begin to lay any one stone, than the Samaritans and other idolatrous Nations adioyning, gaue all the impediment they could. So did the Gouernours of those Prouinces vnder Cyrus altogether countenance the disturbers, and in no sort fauoured the Iewes, nor the labours nor purposes they had in hand. And not onely those which were but Prouinciall Lieutenants and other officers of lesse place, but Cambyses himselfe; who hauing the charge of the whole Empire, while Cyrus was busied otherwise, countermanded the building begun. And whereas some Authors make doubt, that whatsoeuer Cambyses did when himselfe had obtained the Empire, yet during the life of Cyrus there was no such impediment or prohibition: They may herein resolue themselues out of Esdras, That by the conspiracies of the neighbouring Nations, the building was hindered all the time of King Cyrus life, &c. And therefore it is true, that the Iewes themselues affirme as it is written in the second of Ioan, That the Temple was 46 yeeres in setting vp, hauing receiued so many hinderances from the first foundation to the second of Darius. Esd. 4. v. 16. Esd. 1 c. 5. v. 33 Esd. 1 c. 4. v. 5.

And if we seeke the naturall and politique causes which moued Cambyses to withstand his fathers decree, as well while hee gouerned vnder him, as when himselfe became sole and and ſoueraigne Monarch, we ſhall finde them in that Epiſtle remembred by Eſdras, written by Belemus, Mithridates, and the reſt, Preſidents and Counſellors in Phœnicia, wherein they complaine, that the Iewes were euermore rebellious and troublers of Kings; that their Citie being once built, they would then refuſe to pay Tribute, and fall from the obedience of the Empire, as they had formerly done in the times of other Kings. Eſd. 1. c. 4.

But that which for that preſent ſeemed the moſt forcible impediment was, that Cambyſes, hauing it in his reſolution to inuade Ægypt, and that it was a common opinion, That the Iewes were deſcended of thoſe Nations, becauſe they iſſued thence vnder Moſes, when they conquered Iudæa; their Citie being once repaired and fortified, they might returne to their old vomit, and giue the ſame diſturbance to Cambyſes Conqueſt, which they did to Senacherib, Nabuchodonoſor, and other Kings of Babylon. For as it is written in Ezekiel, Ægypt was the confidence of the houſe of Iſrael. Ezek. c. 29.

But it is to be vnderſtood, as Codoman and others haue obſerued, that Artaxerxes, to whom the Counſellors and Gouernors of Phœnicia complained againſt the Iewes, did not precede, but ſucceede Darius Hyſtaſpes, as in the ſixt and ſeuenth chapters of Eſdras it is made plaine: and alſo that thoſe Gouernors (whoſe Epiſtle ſheweth as much) did not withſtand the building of the Temple, but the fortifying and incloſing of the Citie, as by the reaſons giuen in the ſaid Epiſtle, and by the Kings anſwer, it is euident.

Alſo in the ſixt of Ezra, the foureteenth verſe, the Kings are named in order as they gouerned, and Artaxerxes written after Darius; as: And they built and finiſhed it (to wit, the Temple) by the appointment of the God of Iſrael, and by the commandement of Cyrus and Darius, and Artahſhaſte Kings of Perſia. Laſtly, in the ſeuenth of Ezra it is written; Now after theſe things, in the reigne of Artahſhaſte King of Perſia: which was as much to ſay, as after the finiſhing of the Temple in Darius time. And therefore Artaxerxes in the ſecond of Eſdras is there named by anticipation, not in his owne time and place.

And thus much concerning the rebuilding of the Citie and Temple of Hieruſalem. Which action though proſpered by the hand of God, was very ſlowly purſued by the men whom it moſt concerned, but firſt ſet on foot by Cyrus. The other ordinances of Cyrus, with his forme and manner of gouernment, are to be found in Xenophon. At his death he bequeathed the Empire vnto his eldeſt ſonne Cambyſes, appointing Smerdis or Tanaoxares his yonger ſonne to be Satrapa or Lieutenant of Media, Armenia, and Caduſia; and then died, after he had reigned (ſaith Herodotus) one and thirtie yeeres, or (according to Iuſtine) but thirtie.

§. VIII.

Of Cyrus his iſſue: and whether Atoſſa were his daughter, or (as ſome thinke) were the ſame with Queene Heſter.

CYrus had iſſue two ſonnes, Cambyſes and Smerdis, with three daughters, Atoſſa, Meroe, and Artyſtona: Cteſias addeth to theſe, Amytis. Atoſſa and Meroe their brother Cambyſes married; Artyſtona, Darius, Hyſtaſpes obtained; ſo did he Atoſſa, Cambyſes being dead: who (as ſome Writers haue ſuppoſed) inflamed both her husbands, Darius, and Xerxes after him, to inuade Greece, to be auenged of the whole Nation for the cruell intent that Aman (whom the old tranſlation calleth a Macædonian) had againſt the Iewes, though the opinion of Ioſephus be more probable, who findes Aman to be an Amalekite. But it is hard to be vnderſtood, how Atoſſa, the daughter of Cyrus, ſhould haue beene Eſther; whoſe Hiſtorie ſeemes rather to appertaine to the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus, than of Darius the ſonne of Hyſtaſpes, or of Xerxes. The deſire of Atoſſa to haue Greece brought vnder the yoke of Perſia, was partly grounded vpon the honour which thereby ſhe thought her husband might obtaine, partly vpon a feminine humor of getting many braue Dames, Corinthians, Athenians, and others of that Nation to be her bond-women. Wherefore I cannot giue aſſent to the opinion of Codoman, who vpon the neere ſound of the two names, Atoſſa and Hadaſſa, (by the latter of which Eſther was alſo called) makes them to haue beene one perſon. For though it be true, that Eſther concerning her parentage a while, might be taken for a great Lady; yet Codomans inference is nothing probable, that ſhe ſhould therefore, and for the great affection which the King bare vnto her, be thought the daughter of Cyrus. Certaine it is, that Esther did at length discouer her Kindred and Nation; whereby if Histories could be kept free from this errour, yet the people, and especially the Nobility, must needes haue vnderstood the truth: who neuertheleſſe did ſo well know the parentage of Hoſſa, that for her ſake, as being daughter of Cyrus, her ſonne Xerxes was preferred to the Kingdome before his elder brother, againſt whom alſo he could haue pretended a very weake clayme. But of theſe things more hereafter in fitter place.

CHAP. IV.

The eſtate of things from the death of Cyrus to the reigne of Darius.

§. I.

Of the number and names of the Perſian Kings.

OF the ſucceſſors of Cyrus, and the continuance of the Perſian Empire, there are many opinions; As that of Metaſthenes, who hath numbred the Perſian Kings and their times, as followeth.

Darius Medus, and Cyrus ioyntly	2	yeeres.
Cyrus alone.	22
Priſcus Artaxerxes.	20
Darius Longimanus.	37
Darius Nothus.	19
Artaxerxes Mnemon.	55
Artaxerxes Ochus.	26
Arſes, or Arſames.	4
Darius the laſt, conquered by Alexander.	6

To which Philo agreeth; which number of yeeres added, make in all an hundred nintie and one. But in this Catalogue Metaſthenes hath left out Cambyſes and Xerxes, and names Artaxerxes Aſſuerus for the immediate ſucceſſor of Cyrus; in place (ſaith Melanction) of Darius the ſonne of Hyſtaſpes: for Metaſthenes, as Melanction coniectureth, doth not account Cambyſes in the Catalogue, becauſe his reigne was confounded with that of Cyrus.

There is a ſecond opinion, though ridiculous, of Seder Olam, who finds but foure Perſian Kings from the beginning to the end of that Empire.

Genebrard, Schubert, and Beroaldus haue alſo a differing account from the Greekes; whom neuertheleſſe Euſebius and moſt of the Latines follow, and ſo doth Krentzheim, who hath fully anſwered, and as I take it, refuted all the former Authors varying from that account. For in this ſort doe the Greekes marſhall the Perſian Kings with the times of their reignes.

Chron Krentz. fol 135.

Melanct. giues Cyrus but 29.	Cyrus in all.	30	yeeres.
	Cambyſes, with the Magi.	8
Melanct. but 20	Darius Hyſtaſpes.	36
	Xerxes.	21
	Artaxerxes Longimanus.	40
	Darius Nothus.	19
Melanct. but 40 Melanct. 26.	Artaxerxes Mnemon.	43
	Artaxerxes Ochus.	23
	Arſames.	3
Melanct. 4.	Darius the laſt.	6

Which numbers, put together, make in all two hundred and thirtie.

This

This account (as I haue said) the most Chronologers and the best learned approue. These Persian Princes being all warranted by the authority of the Scriptures, as Peucer in his historicall Animaduersions hath gathered the places; finding first Cyrus in the second of Chronicles, chap. 36. vers. 22. 23. Ezra 1. chap. 1. vers. 1. and often elsewhere.

Secondly Cambyses in the eleauenth of Daniel, who may indeede be well esteemed for one of those three Kings in the second verse named, and so the marginall Commentor vpon the Geneua vnderstands that place; but, vnder correction, mistakes the matter greatly, when he saith in the same note, that Darius Hystaspes was an enemy to the people of God, and stood against them: his great fauour and liberality to the Iewes being elsewhere proued.

Thirdly, is Darius Hystaspes found in Ezra the first, c. 4. v. 5. who in the sixt verse is also named Ahasuerus.

Fourthly, in the eleauenth of Daniel verse the second, Xerxes is plainely foretold and described, and the great warre which he should make against the Greekes by Daniel remembred.

Fiftly, Artaxerxes Longimanus in Ezra the fourth, verse seauen, who is also called Artha sasta, c. 4. 1. lib. Ezra. v. 7. and cap. 7. v. 7.

Sixtly, Darius Nothus, Ezra cap. 4. verse 24. and cap. 5. verse 6. Mehem. cap. 12. verse 22.

Seauenthly, Artaxerxes Mnemon in Nehem. c. 2. v. 1. who was father to Artaxerxes Ochus, and Arsames: for Darius the last, he was of another Family, the Line of Cyrus the Great ending in Ochus, who descended from Xerxes the sonne of Atossa Cyrus his Daughter; and the issue male of Cyrus failing with his owne Sonnes.

But to proceede. Eusebius with the Latines, following the Greekes, apply the beginnings and ends of euery Persian King with their Acts, to some certaine Olympiad; As the war of Astyages (Cyrus his maternall Grand-father) and Alyattes (Cræsus his father) to the nine and fortieth Olympiad; The beginning of Cyrus reigne to the beginning of the fiue and fiftieth Olympiad; The taking of Sardis by Cyrus to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad; The inuasion of Ægypt by Cambyses to the third yeere of the threescore and third Olympiad, and so of the rest. Which reference with good agreement betweene seuerall formes of computation adde the more credit vnto both.

Againe, this historicall demonstration is confirmed by the Astronomicall computation of Ptolomie, who refers the death of Alexander the Great, who died the 12. of Nouember, in the beginning of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad, to the foure hundred and foure and twentieth yeere after Nabonassar. And the Æra of Nabonassar began on the sixe and twentieth of Februarie: which conferred with the Olympiad, was in the ninth Moneth of the first yeere of the eighth Olympiad; So that whether we follow the accompts of the Olympiads, as doe the Greeke Historians, or that of Nabonassar with Ptolomie, we shall finde euery memorable accident to fall out right with each computation. Ptol. in Almag. lib. 3. c. 8.

For Ptolomie reckons the time answerable to two hundred and foure and twenty Iulian yeeres, and an hundred and forty dayes from Nabonassar, to the sixteenth of Iulie in the seauenth yeere of Cambyses.

The Greekes, and namely Diodorus Siculus, place the taking of Ægypt by Cambyses in the second or third yeere of the threescore and third Olympiad, and the beginning of Cambyses seauenth yeere in the first of the threescore and fourth Olympiad: which first of the threescore and fourth Olympiad runs along with part of the two and twentieth of Nabonassar. The like agreement is consequently found about the beginning and end of Cyrus.

Likewise the twentieth of Darius, who succeeded Cambyses, is according to Ptolomie the two hundred and sixe and fortieth of Nabonassar, which (obseruing the differences of Nabonassars Æra and the Olympiad, viz. eight and twentie yeeres) it agrees with the third of the threescore and ninth Olympiad, wherein it is placed by the Greekes. In this Iosephus agrees with the Greekes throughout, sauing that he ioyneth Darius Medus, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, with Cyrus, in the destruction of Babylon; which is true, and not contrary to the Greeke computation, but may very well stand with it.

Lastly, the disagreements and confused accompts of those that follow the other Catalogue of the Persian Kings formerly rehearsed, doth giue the greater credit to this of the Greekes, which being constant in it selfe, accordeth also with the computation of other Historians, and Astronomers, and likewise with the holy Scriptures.

§. II.

Of Cambyses, and the conquering of Ægypt by him.

WE will therfore according to the truth giue the Empire of Persia to Cambyses, the sonne of Cyrus, though degenerate in all things, sauing the desire to increase the greatnesse of his Empire: whereof he was possest in his Fathers time while Cyrus made warre in the North. Ctesias with others giue him a longer reigne than agreeth with the Grecian accompt before receiued.

Lib. 2. c. 2. Herl. 3. pag. 83. l. 4. 5.

In the fifth yeere of his sole reigne, and in the third yeere of the threescore and third Olympiad, according to Diodor & Eusebius, he inuaded Ægypt, and hauing ouerthrown the King thereof, Psammeniticus, he not only caused him to be slaine, but also did put to death all his kindred and dependants, with the most of his children.

Herodotus and Ctesias giue for cause of this Warre (being no other indeed than the Ambition of Cambyses) that when he sent to Amasis King of Ægypt, to haue his daughter in marriage, Amasis presented him with Nitetis the daughter of Apries his predecessor, which Cambyses disdained.

Howsoeuer it were; true it is, that Cambyses gathered an Armie fit for such an enterprise, and caused the same to march. But before they entred Ægypt, Amasis died, and left Psammeniticus, whom Ctesias called Amyrteus, his successour; who enioyed Ægypt after his father (according to the best copies of Herodotus) but sixe Moneths, though other Chronologers giue him sixe yeeres.

But how long soeuer he held the Crowne, in one battell he lost it, and was himselfe taken prisoner.

It is said that Cambyses following therein the example of Cyrus, did not only spare life to the conquered King, but that he also trusted him with the gouernment of Ægypt, and that vpon some reuolt, or suspition thereof, he caused him to be slaughtered. But the race of this King was not so extirpated, if we may beleeue Herodotus and Thucydides, but that he left a Sonne called Inarus, who caused the Ægyptian to reuolt both from Xerxes and Artaxerxes.

That Psammeniticus was at the first entreated gently by Cambyses, I hold it very improbable, if it be true which is also written of him, That he so much hated Amasis the King of Ægypt, who died before his arriuall, that he caused his body to be drawne out of the graue, and after diuers indignities vsed, commanded the same to be burnt, contrary to the custome both of the Ægyptians and Persians. For the Ægyptians vsed to powder their dead bodies with salt, and other drugs, to the end the wormes might not deuoure them. The * Persians durst not consume them with fire, which they esteemed as a God, and therefore feared to feede it with Carrion.

* Neither did the Romanes euer consume their dead to ashes, till the time of Sylla Dictator, who caused his own to be deuoured by that element, fearing the Law called Talionis, or like for like, because himselfe had vntombed the carkasse of Caius Marius after his death. Herl. 3. Plin. l. 6. c. 54. Strab. & Iust. L. 1. Pag. 87. 88. Herl. 3. Sect. 7.

§. III.

The rest of Cambyses his acts.

AFter this victory obtained in Ægypt, Cambyses sent an Armie into Cyprus, and constrained Euelthon King thereof to acknowledge him, who before held that Iland of the Ægyptians.

While Cambyses yet busied himselfe in Ægypt, he so much detested the Idolatry of that Nation, as he caused the Images themselues, with the Temples wherein they were worshipped, to be torne downe and defaced. This done, he directed a part of his Armie into Lybia, to ouer-turne the Temple of Iupiter Ammon; but the Diuell in defence of his Oratorie raised such a tempest of Sand, wherewith the greatest part of that Country is couered, as the Persians were there-with choked and ouer-whelmed.

Notwithstanding which misaduenture, Herodotus and Seneca report, that disdaining to be resisted, he prepared the rest of his Army, which himselfe meant to conduct into those parts, but that finding a beginning of those incommodities, which his first-sent troupe had tried, he changed his purpose. For though conquering Kings haue power ouer men, yet the Elements doe not obey them, according to that old English prouerbe, Goe, saith the King, Stay, saith the Tide.

After

After his returne from the attempt of Æthiopia, hee caused Apis the Ægyptian Bull, worshipped by that Nation as God, to be slaine: a deed very commendable, had it proceeded from true zeale, and beene executed as in seruice of him that onely is, and liueth. But soon afterwards, when in a dreame it seemed vnto him that Smerdis did sit in the royall Throne of Persia (which apparition was verified in Smerdis the Magus) he gaue it in charge to his fauourite Praxaspes, to murther Smerdis his brother. And hauing maried his owne sisters, contrary to the Persian Lawes, he committed a most causelesse and most detestable murder vpon the one of them, called Meroe, then by himselfe with childe, because she bewailed the death of her brother Smerdis. I finde it written of this Cambises, Her. p. 89. 90. That because his predecessors obserued religiously the ordinances of their Empire, hee assembled his Iudges, and enquired of them, whether there were any law among the Persians that did permit the brother to marry his owne sister: it being his owne intent so to doe. The Iudges (who had alwaies either lawes or distinctions in store to satisfie Kings and times) made answere, that there was not any thing written allowing any such coniunction, but they notwithstanding found it in their customes, that it was alwaies left to the will of the Persian Kings to doe what best pleased themselues; and so, as Nauclerus termes it, inuenerunt occasionem: That is as much to say, as the Iudges found a shift to please the King, and to secure themselues. And yet, where it concerned not the Kings priuate satisfaction, hee caused Sisamnus one of his Iudges, and perchance one of those which fauoured his incestuous match, to be flayed a-liue, for an vniust judgement giuen, and the same his hide to be hung vp ouer the iudgement seate. After which bestowing the fathers Office on his sonne, hee willed him to remember, that the same partialitie deserued the same punishment.

Among other his cruelties, that which hee exercised against the sonne of his beloued Praxaspes was very strange and vngratefull. For when hee desired to be truly informed by him what the Persians thought of his conditions, Praxaspes answered, That his vertues were followed with abundant praise from all men; onely it was by many obserued, that he tooke more than vsuall delight in the taste of Wine. With which taxation inflamed, he vsed this replication: And are the Persians double-tongued, who also tell mee that I haue in all things excelled my Father Cyrus? thou Praxaspes shalt then witnesse, whether in this report they haue done me right: for if at the first shot I pierce thy sonnes heart with an arrow, then is it false that hath beene spoken; but if I misse the marke, I am then pleased that the fame be accounted true, and my subiects beleeued. This being spoken, hee immediately directed an arrow towards the innocent childe, who falling downe dead with the stroke, Cambyses commanded his body to be opened, and his heart being broched on the arrow, this monstrous Tyrant greatly reioycing, shewed it to the Father with this saying in stead of an Epitaph: Now Praxaspes, thou maist resolue thy selfe that I haue not lost my wittes with Wine, but the Persians theirs, who make such report.

Many other barbarous cruelties he exercised, till at the last, according to the phrase of our Law, he became felon de soy. For when he was informed that Patizites, and Smerdis the Magi, (Gedrenus writeth them Sphendanes and Cimerdius) Ministers of his domesticall affaires, taking aduantage of the great resemblance betweene Smerdis the Kings brother, and Smerdis the Magus, possest themselues of the Empire, he made all haste towards Persia, and in mounting hastily on horsebacke, his sword dis-sheathling, pierced his owne thigh, where-with deadly wounded, falling into an ouer-late and remedilesse repentance of the slaughter which he had executed vpon his owne brother, he soone after gaue vp his wicked ghost, when he had reigned eight yeeres, adiourning therein those seuen Moneths in which the Magi gouerned, whilst he was absent.

In Cambyses the Male line of Cyrus failed. For he had no issue either by Atossa or Meroe: yet Zonaras out of Hierome giues him a Daughter called Pantaptes, and a son called Orontes, who being drowned in the Riuer Ophites by Antioch, the same was afterward in memorie of the Princes death called Orontes. Zonaras Com. 2. p. 117.

He built the Citie of Babylon in Ægypt, in the place where Latopolis was formerly seated, and that of Meroe in the Iland of Nilus, calling it by the name of his sister Meroe.

§. IIII.

Of the inter-regnum betweene Cambyſes and Darius.

CYrus and his two ſonnes being now dead, and the Kingdome in the poſſeſſion of one of the Magi, the counterfait of Smerdis, the Princes, or Satrapes, or Pro-uinciall Gouernours of the Empire (to wit, Otanes, Intaphernes, Gobrias, Megabyſus, Aſphatines, Hidarnes, and Darius, who were all deſcended from Achæmenes the firſt Perſian King,) hauing diſcouered the fraud of this impoſture, ioyned their forces together, ſurpriſed and rooted out the Conſpirator with his Companions, and aſſiſtants. In which action (ſaith Iuſtine) Intaphernes and Aſphalines were ſlaine; but Herodotus otherwiſe, that they were onely wounded, for he auoweth, that all the ſeuen Princes were preſent at the election following.

For the Empire being now without a Gouernour, theſe Princes grew into conſultation how the ſame might be ordered from thence-forth. Otanes one of the ſeuen did not fancie any election of Kings, but that the Nobilitie and Cities ſhould confederate, and by iuſt lawes defend their liberty in equalitie, giuing diuers reaſons for his opinion, being as it ſeemed greatly terrified, by the cruelties of Cambyſes; As firſt, that it was not ſafe to giue all power to any one, ſeeing greatneſſe it ſelfe, euen in good men, doth often infect the minde with many vices, and the libertie and freedome in all things is moſt apt to inſult, and to commit all manner of wicked outrage. Againe, that tyrants doe commonly vſe the ſeruices of wicked men, and fauour them moſt; they vſurp vpon the lawes of their Countrey; take other mens wiues by force, and deſtroy whom they pleaſe without iudgement.

Megabyſus was of another opinion, affirming that the tyrannie of a multitude was thrice more intollerable, than that of one. For the multitude doe all things without iudgement, runne into buſineſſe and affaires with precipitation, like raging and ouer-bearing flouds.

He therefore thought it ſafeſt to make election of a few, and thoſe of the beſt, wiſeſt, and moſt vertuous; becauſe it is euer found, that excellent Counſailes are euer had from excellent men.

Darius gaue the third iudgement, who perſwaded the creation of a King, becauſe euen among few diuturnitie of concord is ſeldome found, and in great Empires it doth euer happen that the diſcord of many Rulers hath inforſt the election of one Supreme. It were therefore, ſaith Darius, farre ſafer to obſerue the lawes of our Countrie, by which Kingly gouernment hath beene ordained.

The other foure Princes adhered to Darius, and agreed to continue the ſame Imperiall gouernment by God eſtabliſhed, and made proſperous. And to auoid partialitie, it was accorded, that the morning following theſe ſeuen Princes ſhould mount on Horſ-backe, and on him the Kingdome ſhould be conferred, whoſe horſe after the Sun-riſing ſhould first ney or bray. In the euening after this appointment was made, it is ſaid that Darius conſulted with the Maſter of his horſe Oebarus, who in the Suburbs of the Citie where the election was reſolued of, cauſed the ſame Horſe, whereon in the morning Darius was mounted, to couer a Mare, who as ſoone as hee came into the ſame place was the firſt horſe that brayed. Whereupon the other ſixe Princes deſcended from their horſes, and acknowledged Darius for their Lord and King.

Herl. 3. p. 100. 101.

Plato in the third of his Lawes affirmeth, that in memorie of the ſeuen Princes, whereof Darius himſelfe was one, that deliuered the Empire from the vſurpation of the Magi, he diuided the whole into ſeuen gouernments; Herodotus ſaith, into twenty Satrapies.

CHAP. V.

Of Darius the sonne of Hystaspes.

§. I.
Of Darius his Linage.

DArius was descended of the ancient Persian Kings, to wit, of the Achamenida, of which, Cyrus the Great was the lineall Successor. For in this sort Herodotus deriues him as before.

Cyrus the first, who had Teispius, who begat
Ariaramnes, who was father of Arsamnes, the father of Hystaspes, the father of Darius, surnamed Celes, the father of Xerxes. Curt. l. 4.

Hystaspes accompanied Cyrus the Great, in the warres against the Scythians, at which time Cyrus being made iealous of Darius by a dreame of his owne, caused him to be sent into Persia, others say to be imprisoned, from whence by the death of Cyrus he was deliuered, and made Gouernor of the Persian Magi. He afterward followed Cambyses into Egypt; he then ioyned with the rest of the Princes against the Magi, and either by the neying of his horse, or, as others affirme, by strong hand he obtained the Empire, which he the more assured to himselfe by taking two of Cyrus Daughters, and as many of his Neeces for his wiues. Her. l. 3. & 3.

Hystaspes, according to * Herodotus, had besides Darius these three sonnes, who were great Commanders in the warre which Darius made in Asia the lesse, Thrace, Macedon, and Greece; Atarnes, Artaphernes, and Artabanus, who dissuaded Xerxes from the second Grecian warre. Hystaspes had also a Daughter married to Gobryas the Father of Mardonius, who commanded the Armie of Darius in Macedon, and married the Daughter of Darius, Artozostre his Cosen germaine.

Reineccius giues to Hystaspes fiue sonnes, Darius who succeeded Cambyses, Artabanus, Artaphernes, Otanes, and Atarnes, with two daughters.

§. II.
Of Darius his Gouernment, and suppressing the rebellion of Babylon.

DArius deuised equall lawes whereby his subiects might be gouerned, the same being formerly promised by Cyrus. He gaue accesse to all his subiects, and behaued himselfe so mildly to all men, that many Nations desired and offered themselues to become his Vassals: Onely he layed diuers payments and taxes on the people, which had not beene accustomed in Cyrus time, to the value of foureteene thousand fiue hundred and threescore talents, saith Herodotus.

The warre which Cambyses made a farre off in Egypt, and the contention betweene the Magi, and the Princes of Persia, for the Empire, gaue heart to the Babylonians to recouer their libertie, and to shake off the Persian yoake; whereof Darius being aduertised, he prepared an Armie to recouer that Citie and State reuolted. But finding the same a difficult worke, he vsed the seruice of Zopirus, who for the loue he bare Darius, did cut off his owne Eares and Nose, and with other wounds yet fresh bleeding, he seemed to flye to the Babylonians for succour, to whom he accused the cruelty of Darius: who, for hauing giuen him aduice to giue ouer the siege of their Citie, had in this sort dismembred and deformed him; whereupon the Babylonians gaue him that credit, as they trusted him with the disposition and commandement of their greatest forces: which when Zopirus had obtained, after some small colourable ouer-throwes giuen to the Persians vpon sallies, hee deliuered the Citie into Darius his hands, who had lyen before it twentie Moneths. Her. l. 3.

§ III. Of

§ III.

Of Darius his fauour to the Iewes in building the Temple.

IN the second yeere of Darius, he gaue order that the building of the Temple at Hierusalem should goe on, and commanded that the same should be finished at his owne charge, and out of the reuenues of the Crowne. And whereas the Gouernours of those Prouinces which are situate betweene Euphrates, and the Phœnician, and mid-land Sea, (whom Ezra calleth the Captaines beyond the Riuer) had hindred the worke in Cambyses his time, Darius gaue commandement that they should not thence-forth come neere vnto Ierusalem, to giue any impediment to the building, but that they should with-draw themselues, aand get them farre off till all were finished and at an end. In the old Latine it is written, Procul recedite ab illis; with-draw your selues farre from them; In our English, Be ye farre from thence, to wit, from the Citie, and Temple, now in building.

Ezra.c.6.

Ezr.6.11. He also made a decree, which concerned his owne Subiects, That whosoeuer should thenceforth hinder the setting vp of the Temple of God, that his house should be torne downe, and the disturber hanged on a Gallowes made of the timber thereof. He also in the same decree maketh inuocation to God, That hath caused his name to dwell there (to) destroy all Kings and People that put their hands to alter, and to destroy this house of God which is in Ierusalem, &c. In foure yeeres after which decree (the Iewes being really furnished with money and all things necessary from Darius) the Temple was in all finished, to wit, Ezr.6. in the beginning of the Spring, in the sixth yeere of Darius Histaspes, and in the two and fortieth after their first returne.

Of Darius his Scythian Warre.

Her.l.4. Iust.l.2. AFter the recouery of Babylon he inuaded the Scythians, whose King Iustine calleth Lauthinus; and saith, that Darius vnder-tooke this warre against him, because he refused him his Daughter in marriage. The better to conuoy his Armie into Scythia, he built a Bridge of small Vessels ouer the Riuer Ister or Danubius, and gaue the custody of the same in charge (among others of Asia the lesse) to the Ionians, and Æolians, among whom was Miltiades, who perswaded the Asian Gracians to breake downe the bridge, to the end Darius might not returne thereby, and if by any other way, then not without great difficultie; but the same was resisted by Histiæus Prince of Milet, a Citie of Ionia, which Nation being a Colonie of the Grakes, Diodorus calleth Traitors to their Diod.l.11. Countrey, because they ioyned themselues to Darius. But the Scythians more elegantly tearmed them good slaues, for as much as they would not run away from their Master, but were more mindefull of doing their duties, than of shaking off their bondage, when they were presented with as faire an occasion of liberty as could haue beene desired. For the great Armie of Darius entring the desart Countrie called Bessarabia, found in it neither people to resist them, nor any sustenance to relieue them. For the Scythians were then, as are the Chrim Tartars, their posteritie, at this day, all horse-men, vsing the Bow and Sword. They were not Plough-men, but Graziers, driuing their Heards from one place to another, as opportunitie of pasture led them. Standing Townes they had none, but vsed for Houses the Waggons wherein they carried their wiues and children. These Waggons they place at euery Station in very good order, making Streetes and Lanes in the manner of a great Towne, remoueable at their pleasure. Neither hath the Emperour himselfe, called now the great Chrim, any other Citie than such as Agora, (as they name it) or Towne of Carts. When as therefore Darius had wearied himselfe, and wasted his prouision in those desolate Regions, wherein he found neither wayes to direct him, victuals to refresh him, nor any houses, fruitfull trees, or liuing creatures, nor any thing at all, which either he himselfe might make vse of, or by destroying it might grieue his enemies; he began to perceiue his owne folly, and the danger into which he had brought him. Yet setting a good face vpon a bad game, he sent braue messages to the Scythian, bidding him to cease his flight, and either to make triall of his valour and fortune in plaine battaile: Or if he acknowledged himselfe the weaker, then to yeelde by by faire meanes, and become his Subiect, giuing him Earth and Water, which the Persians vsed to demand as a signe, that all was yeelded vnto them. To this challenge the Scythian returned an Hieroglyphicall answere; sending a Bird, a Frog; a Mouse; and fiue Arrowes: which dumbe shew Darius interpreting by his owne wish, thought that he did yeelde all the Elements wherein those creatures liue, and his weapons withall into his hands. But Gobryas, one of the seauen Princes, who had slaine the Magi, construed their meaning a-right, which was thus; O ye Persians, get ye wings like Birds, or liue vnder the water, or creepe into holes in the earth, for else ye shall not escape our arrowes. And this interpretation was soone verified by the Scythians themselues, who assailed the Persian campe, draue the horse-men into the trenches, and vexed the Armie with continuall Alarums day and night; were so fearelesse of this great Monarch, and so little regarded him, that within his hearing, and euen in his sight, they did not forbeare the pastime of coursing a Hare, which they had started by chance. By this boldnesse of theirs, Darius was so discouraged, that he forsooke his Campe by night, making many fires, and leauing all that were sicke and weake behinde him, and so with all speede marched away towards the Riuer Ister. He was pursued hardly by the Scythians who mist him, yet arriuing at the Bridge before him, perswaded the Ionians to depart, assuring them that the Persian King should neuer more be able to doe them either good or harme. Which words had certainly beene proued true, had not Hystiaus the Milesian preuailed with his people, to attend the comming of Darius, whom the Scythians did likewise faile to meete, when they returned from Ister to seeke him out.

§. V.

Some actions of the Persians in Europe, after the Scythian Warre.

Darius hauing thus escaped out of Scythia, determined the inuasion of Thrace and Macedon, in which Warre he imployed Megabasus, who mastered the Paonians, and transplanted them, and possest Perinthus, Chalcedon, Bizantium, and other places, being also soone after subiected, and added to the Persian Empire by Otanes, the sonne of Syssamnes, whom Cambyses had excoriated for false iudgement. So were the Cities of * Selybria and a Cardia likewise taken in for the Persian, who hauing now reduced vnder his obeysance the best part of Thrace, did send his Embassadours to Amintas King of Macedon adioyning, demanding of him by the Earth and Water, the Soueraignty ouer that Kingdome. Amintas doubting his owne strength, entertained the Embassadours with gentle words, and afterward inuited them to a solemne and magnificent feast, the Persians greatly desired that the Macedonian Ladies might be present: which being granted, the Embassadours who were well filled with wine, and presumed vpon their greatnesse, and many victories, began to vse such imbracings, and other lasciuious behauiour towards those Noble Ladies, as Alexander the Kings Sonne, great Grand-father to Alexander the Great, disdaining the Persians barbarous presumption, besought his father to withdraw himselfe from the assembly, continuing notwithstanding all honourable respect towards the Embassadours, whom withall he entreated that the Ladies might refresh themselues for a while; promising their speedy returne. This being obtained, Alexander caused the like number of well-fauoured yong men to clothe themselues in the same garments, and to vse the same attires which the Ladies had worne at the feast, giuing them in charge, That when the Persians offered to abuse them, they should forthwith transpierce them with their long knines, of which they were prouided for that purpose, which was accordingly performed. Charge was soone after giuen by Darius for a seuere reuenge of this murder. But Alexander, somewhat before the death of Amintas, gaue his sister Gygea in marriage to Bubaris, a principall Commander of Darius forces on that side, who perswading her husband how helpefull the Alliance of Macedon would proue for the inuasion of Attica intended, so preuailed, as Alexander escaped that tempest, which threatned to fall vpon him very suddenly; the warre of Asia the lesse, called Ionick, falling out at the same time.

§. VI.

The first occasion of the warre which Darius made vpon Greece, with a rehearsall of the gouernment in Athens, whence the quarrell grew.

NOw the better to vnderstand the reason and motiues of that great Warre, which followed soone after, betweene the Persians and Græcians, it is necessary to make a short repetition of the state of Athens, which Citie endured the hardest and worst brunt of Darius inuasion on that side the Sea with admirable successe. Neither doe I hold it any impertinency, to be large in vnfolding euery circumstance of so great a businesse as gaue fire to those wars, which neuer could be throughly quenched, vntill in the ruine of this great Persian Monarchie, Persepolis the capitall Citie of the Empire, was at the request of an Athenian Harlot consumed with a flame, as dreadfull as in the pride of their greatnesse, the Persians had raised in Athens.

Now therefore as out of the former bookes it may be gathered, how Athens, and other parts of Greece, were anciently gouerned, the same being already set downe, though scatteringly, & in seuerall times, among other the Contemporarie occurrents of the Easterne Emperors, and the Kings of Iudæa; so I thought it very pertinent in this place to remember againe the two last changes in the State of Athens. As for the Lacedæmonians, they maintained still their ancient policie vnder Kings, though these also after some fifteene descents bridled by the Ephori.

Codrus King of the Athenians in the former bookes remembred, who willingly died for the safetie of his people, was therefore so honored by them, as (thinking none worthy to succeede him) they changed their former gouernement from Monarchicall to Princes for tearme of life, of which Medon the sonne of Codrus was the first, after whom they were called Medontidæ; and of these there were twelue Generations besides Medon, to wit.

This Solon being a man of excellent wisedome, gaue lawes to the Athenians, which were published according to Gellius, in the three and thirtieth yeere of Tarquinius Priscus, and were in after-ages deriued vnto the Romanes, and by the Decemviri (Magistrates in Rome created for that purpose) reduced into twelue Tables, which were the ground of the Romane lawes. But these goodly ordinances of Solon, were in his owne dayes violated, and for a while almost quite extinguished. For whereas they were framed vnto the practice practice and maintenance of a popular gouernment; the eſtate of Athens was very ſoone changed into a Monarchie by Piſiſtratus the ſonne of Hippocrates: who finding the Citizens diſtracted into two factions, whereof Megacles and Lycurgus two Citizens of noble Families were become the heads, tooke occaſion by their contention and inſolencie to raiſe a third faction more powerfull than the other two, and more plauſible, for that he ſeemed a Protector of the Citizens in generall. Hauing by this meanes obtained loue and credit, he wounded himſelfe, and fained that by malice of his enemies he had like to haue beene ſlaine for his loue to the good Citizens; he procured a guard for his defence, and with that band of men ſurpriſing the State-houſe, or Cittadell of Athens, he made himſelfe Lord of the Towne; Hegeſiſtratus being then Gouernour. But the Citizens, who in euery change of gouernment had ſought to remoue themſelues further and further from the forme of a Monarchie, could ſo ill brooke this vſurpation of Piſiſtratus, that he was driuen for lacke of helpe to flye the Towne, as ſoone as Megacles and Lycurgus ioyning their forces attempted his expulſion. Yet as the building of his tyranny founded vpon the diſſenſion of the Citizens, was ruined by their good agreement; ſo was it ſoone after wel reedified by the new breaking out of the old factions. For when Megacles found the power of Lycurgus to grow greater than his owne, he did (as is the vſuall practice of the weaker ſide) call in the common enemy Piſiſtratus, to whom he gaue his Daughter in marriage; by which alliance the Family of the Alcmæonidæ, whereof Megacles was chiefe, became very powerfull, yet ſo that Piſiſtratus by their power was made Maſter both of them and all the reſt. But this agreement held not long; the Alcmæonidæ, and eſpecially Megacles being incenſed againſt Piſiſtratus for his miſdemeanor towards his Wife. Wherefore they practiſed with the Souldiers of the Towne, proceeding in their treaſon ſo ſecretly, and ſo farre, that Piſiſtratus vpon the firſt diſcouery of their intent, perceiued no other remedy for his affaires, than to with-draw himſelfe to Eretria, where he remained eleauen yeeres. Which time being expired, hauing hired Souldiers out of many parts of Greece, he againe recouered the principality of Athens: after which third obtaining his eſtate, he gouerned Athens ſeauenteene yeeres, according to Ariſtotle, and reigned in all thirty and three yeeres, ſaith Elianus, but ss Iuſtine hath it, foure and thirty, accounting the time belike as well before as after his ſeuerall expulſions. Herodotus giues the Father and Sonne ſixe and thirtie yeeres; Ariſtotle fiue and thirty. But Thucidides affirmeth, that he died very old, leauing for his Succeſſours his two Sonnes Hippias and Hipparchus, who gouerned the Athenians with ſuch moderation, as they rather ſeemed the Lineall ſucceſſors of a naturall Prince than of a Tyrant. But in the end, and ſome three yeeres before Hippias was expelled out of Athens, his brother Hipparchus was murdered by Harmodius and Ariſtogiton. The cauſe why, and the manner how performed, Thucidides hath written at large. And though Hipparchus were charged with vnnaturall luſt after Harmodius, yet Plato in his Dialogue, intituled Hipparchus, doth greatly magnifie him, affirming that he was a Prince of as many eminent vertues as that Age had any, altogether condemning the murderers and authors of that ſcandall. Hippias fearing that this enterpriſe vpon his brother had more and deeper rootes than were apparent, firſt ſought to diſcouer the further intents of Harmodius and Ariſtogiton, by a Harlot of theirs called Lemnia: who becauſe ſhe would not reueale her Companions, did cut out her owne tongue. Then did Hippias, the better to ſtrengthen himſelfe, enter into a ſtrait amity with Æantides, Tyrant of the Citie Lampſacus, whom he knew to be greatly fauoured by Darius, to whoſe ſonne Hypoclus he gaue one of his Daughters in marriage. But ſome three yeeres after the death of his brother, doubting I know not what ſtrong practice againſt himſelfe, he began to vſe the Citizens with great ſeuerity, which neither Piſiſtratus the Father, nor Hippias himſelfe had euer exerciſed, during their vſurpation till this time. And therefore the Athenians fearing leſt that this diſeaſe might rather increaſe, than diminiſh in Hippias, they ſtirred vp Cliſthines one of the nobleſt and beſt able of their Citie, to practice their deliuery: who calling to his aſſiſtance the baniſhed Alcmanidæ, together with an Armie of the Lacedæmonians, led by Cleomenes their King, ſo affrighted Hippias, as by compoſition he gaue ouer his eſtate, and the poſſeſſion of Athens, and from thence imbarked himſelfe, tooke land at * Sigeum, whence he went to Lampſacus in Myſia gouerned by Æantides, who preſented him to Darius. He was depriued of his eſtate, as Herodotus and Thucidides agree, twenty yeeres before the battell of Marathon: all which time he continued, partly with Æantides, at other times with Artaphernes Lieutenant for Darius

Thus farre I haue digreſſed from Darius, to the end the Reader may conceiue the better the cauſes and motiues of this warre: whereof the hope that Hippias had to be reſtored to Athens by the helpe of Darius, which made him ſolicite and perſwade the Perſians to conquer Greece, was one; but not the moſt vrgent.

Of the Ionian Rebellion, which was the principall cauſe of the warres enſuing betweene Greece and Perſia.

ANother, and a ſtrong motiue to this expedition, was the Ionick warre, breaking out in Aſia about the ſame time. The Colonies tranſported out of Greece into Aſia, which occupied the greateſt part of the Sea-coaſt, hauing enioyed their libertie about 500. yeeres, euen from the Ionick migration, to the time of Cræſus, were by this Lydian King made Tributaries, and afterwards as parcell of his Dominions, were taken in by Cyrus, and left as hereditary Seruants to the Crowne of Perſia.

But as it is the cuſtome of Nations halfe conquered (witneſſe Ireland) to rebell againe vpon euery aduantage and opportunity: ſo did the Ionians, and other Græcians, both in Cyrus his life, and after him, ſeeke by all meanes poſſible to free themſelues.

At this time they found ſuch men ready to ſpurre them into Rebellion, as had by the Perſian beene giuen vnto them for bridles to hold them in ſubiection. Euery one of thoſe Townes had a Lord to rule it, whom they (abhorring the gouernment of one man) called their Tyrants. Theſe Lords were very true to the Perſian, by whoſe onely might they held the people in ſubiection. And this their dutifull affection they had well declared, when, Darius being in great extremity, they vſed all meanes to deliuer him and his Armie (that otherwiſe had beene loſt) out of the Scythians hand. Of this great piece of ſeruice Hiſtiæus the tyrant of Miletus expected the chiefe thankes, as hauing beene chiefe Author of their expecting Darius, when the reſt, either perſwaded by the Scythians, or carried away with their owne deſires, were ready to haue abandoned him. But it came ſo to paſſe, that Darius being more fearefull of the harme that Hiſtiæus (being powerfull and crafty) might doe to him in the future, than mindefull of the good which he had already receiued at his hand, found meanes to carry him a-long to Suſa, where he detained him with all kinde vſage of a friend, yet kept ſuch good eſpiall vpon him, as an enemie, he could not ſtart away. Hiſtiæus had ſubtilty enough to diſcouer the Kings purpoſe; which ill agreed with his owne deſires. For he thought it more pleaſant, and more honourable to rule as Prince in one faire Citie, hauing a ſmall Territory, than to ſit and feaſt at the great Kings table, and heare the counſailes by which a large Empire was managed; being himſelfe an idle beholder, and enioying with much reſtraint of liberty, none other pleaſures than a priuate man might beſtow vpon himſelfe.

Wherefore he bethought himſelfe of raiſing of ſome tumults in the lower Aſia, to pacifie which if he might be ſent, as one that had great experience and authoritie in thoſe quarters, it would afterwards be in his power to ſtay at home, and either ſatisfie the King with excuſes, or deale as occaſion ſhall require. Reſoluing vpon this courſe, he ſent very ſecret inſtructions to Ariſtagoras his kinſman, whom he had left his Deputie at Miletus, aduiſing him to ſtirre vp ſome Rebellion. Theſe directions came ſeaſonably to Ariſtagoras, who hauing failed in an enterpriſe vpon the Iſle of Naxos, through the falſe dealing of a Perſian his Aſſociate, ſtood in feare of diſgrace, if not of ſome further ill that might befall him, as one that that had waſted the Kings treaſures to no good purpoſe.

Therefore he readily embraced the counſaile: and the better to draw the whole Countrie of Ionia into the ſame courſe which he determined to run, he abandoned his tyrannie, and did ſet Miletus at liberty. This plauſible beginning wan vnto him the hearts of the Mileſians: and his proceeding with other Ionian Tyrants (of whom ſome he tooke and ſold as ſlaues to their Citizens, others he chaſed away) cauſed the whole Nation to be at his command. The Perſian fleet, whereof he lately had beene Admirall in the enterpriſe of Naxos, he had ſurpriſed in his firſt breaking out, together with the principall Officers, Officers, and Captaines, ſo that now hee thought himſelfe able to deale with the great Kings forces, lying thereabout, either by Land or Sea. But likely it was that the power of all Aſia would ſhortly be vpon his necke, and cruſh both him and his aſſiſtants to pieces, vnleſſe hee were able to raiſe an Armie that might hold the field, which the Ionians alone were inſufficient to performe. Therefore he tooke a iourney to Sparta, where hauing aſſayed in vaine with many arguments, and the offer of fiftie talents, to win to his party Cleomenes King of the Lacedæmonians: hee went from thence to Athens, and with better ſucceſſe beſought the people to lend him their aſſiſtance. The Athenian Embaſſadors which had beene ſent to the Perſian Kings Lieutenants in the lower Aſia, deſiring them not to giue countenance to Hippias, now a baniſhed man, and lately their Tyrant, were a while before this returned with ill anſwers, hauing found very churliſh entertainment. So that the euill which they were to expect in all likelyhood from the Perſian, made them willing to begin with him. To which purpoſe, their conſanguinitie with the Ionians, and the perſwaſions of Ariſtagoras, drew them on apace, if perhaps his treaſure were not helping. Twenty ſhips the Athenians furniſhed for this voyage; to which the Eretrians furniſhed fiue more, in regard of the ancient kindneſſe that had paſſed between the Ionians and them. With theſe and their owne forces ioyned, the Ionians entered the Riuer Caiſtrus, which falleth into the Sea by Epheſus: by which aduantage they ſurpriſed Sardis when no enemie was heard of or ſuſpected; inſomuch, as Artaphernes, who ruled as Vice-roy in thoſe parts, had no other hope of ſafetie, than by retreating himſelfe into the Caſtle; which the Græcians could not force: from whence he beheld the ſlaughter of the Citizens, and the Citie flaming.

The Perſians at length, mixt with the Burgers, began to encourage them to defence, and recouered the Market place, ſtrengthened by the riuer Pactolus, which ran through it; and borrowing courage from deſperation, they both defended themſelues, and charged their enemies; who well aduiſing themſelues, made all the haſte they could toward the Sea ſide. But Artaphernes hauing gathered all the ſtrength he could, purſued the Græcians, and found them neere Epheſus; where ſetting reſoluedly vpon them, hee ſlaughtered a great part of their Armie; the reſt ſauing themſelues in Epheſus. In this fight Euaſcides, Captaine of the Eretrians periſhed: but his fame and memorie was by that excellent Poet Simonides preſerued. After this ouerthrow, the Athenians, which were before ſent vnto Ariſtagoras and to the Ionians, could by no arguments of theirs, no not by their teares, bee perſwaded to make any ſecond triall of their fortunes on that ſide the Sea.

Yet the burning of Sardis made a greater noyſe in the world, than the late good ſucceſſe which the Perſians had in one or two skirmiſhes, could rayſe. Wherefore the Ionians brauely proceeding, won a great part of Caria; and ſending their Fleete into the Helleſpont, got Bizantium and other Townes into their hands. Yea, the Cyprians, lately ſubdued by Cambyſes, beganne heereupon to take heart; and entring into confederacie with the Ionians, who were able to giue them ayd by Sea, rebelled againſt the Perſians.

Theſe newes comming to the eare of Darius, filled him with great indignation, and with an extreame hatred of the Athenians, vpon whom he vowed to take ſharpe reuenge. As for the Ionians, his contempt of them, and their knowledge of his power, made him to thinke, that they would not haue dared to attempt ſuch things, but by the inſtigation of thoſe, to whom the ignorance of his great might had afforded the courage to prouoke him. This was the maine ground of the Warre commenced by Darius, and purſued by Xerxes againſt Athens: To which, the ſolicitation of Hippias, before remembred, gaue onely ſome forme and aſſiſtance: the buſineſſe, when once it was thus farre on foot, being like ynough to haue proceeded, though hee had periſhed ere it were aduanced any further.

Some other occurrents in this Ionian commotion extended the quarrell of Darius againſt many of the Ilanders, if not againſt the whole Nation of the Greekes; for all of them gaue to his Rebels free harbour: the Ilanders moreouer did helpe to furniſh out a Nauie of three hundred and ſixtie ſaile againſt him. Theſe prouocations did rather breede in him a deſire to abate their pride, than any feare of harme that they were like to doe him. For what they had done at Sardis, was but by ſurprize. In euery fight they were beaten by the Perſians, who had not yet loſt the fruits of their diſcipline, wherein Cyrus had trained them, nor all their ancient Captaines. In one sea-fight by the Isle of Cyprus, the Ionians indeede had the vpper hand; but they were Phœnicians, Ægyptians, and Cilicians, whom they vanquished: neither was that victory of any vse to them; the Cyprians, in whose aide they came, being vtterly beaten by the Persian Armie at Land, and reduced into their old subiection. So had the Persians likewise by open warre and faire force ouerthrowne the Carians in two battailes, and reclaimed that Nation; as also they had recouered the Townes vpon Hellespont, with some Æolian and Ionian Cities: when Aristagoras with his friends quitting Miletus, fled into Thrace, desirous to seat himselfe in Amphipolis, a Colonie of the Athenians. But the Edonians, on whose Territorie belike he landed, ouerthrew him, & cut his troupes in pieces.

About the same time, Histiæus the first mouer of this insurrection came downe into those quarters; who hauing vndertaken the performance of great matters to Darius, was glad to flye from his Lieutenants, by whom his double dealing was detected.

But this euasion preserued him not long. For after many vaine attempts that he made, he was taken in fight by the Persians, and hastily beheaded, lest the King should pardon him vpon remembrance of old good turnes; as it seemes that he would haue done, by the buriall which he commanded to be giuen to his dead body that was crucified, and by his heauie taking of his death.

Histiæus had sought to put himselfe into Miletus; but the Citizens doubting his conditions, chose rather to keepe him out, and make shift for themselues, without his helpe. The strength of their Citie by land, which had in old time withstood the Lydian Kings, and their good Fleet which promised vnto them the liberty of an open Sea, emboldened them to try the vttermost, when very few friends were left vpon that Continent to take their part. But their Nauie was broken as much by threatnings as by force; many of their companions and fellow-rebels forsaking him vpon hope of pardon; and many being danted with the causelesse flight of those that should haue assisted them. Neither was it long before the Towne it selfe being assaulted both by Land and Sea, was taken by force, the Citizens slaine, their wiues and children made slaues, and their goods a bootie to the Persians, whom for sixe yeeres space they had put to so much trouble.

§. VIII.

The Warre which Darius made vpon Greece, with the battaile of Marathon, and Darius his death.

THis Warre with good successe finished by the Persians, and some attempts made on Europe side with variable successe: Darius obstinate in the enterprise and conquest of Greece (though at first hee pretended to make the Warre but against the Athenians and Eritræans, who ioyntly assisted the Ionians against him, and burnt Sardis in Lydia) did now by his embassadours demand an acknowledgement from them all: among whom, some of them not so well resolued as the rest, submitted themselues; as the Æginets and others. Against these, the Athenians being inflamed, (by the assistance of the Lacedæmonians) after diuers encounters forst them to giue pledges, and to relinquish the party of the Persians. Cleomenes led the Lacedæmonians in this warre, and caused his companion-King Demantus to be deposed: who thereupon fled to Darius; farre the more confident of victorie, by reason of these discords, alienations, and ciuill warres among the Greekes. He therefore gaue order to Hippagoras to prepare a Fleete of shippes fit to transport his Armie ouer the Hellespont: the same consisting of an hundred thousand foot, and ten thousand horse. The charge in chiefe of his Armie he committed to Datis, accompanied and assisted by Hippias, the sonne of Pisistratus, expelled out of Athens twenty yeeres before, and by Artaphernes his brother, Gouernour of Sardis, and the Sea-coast of Asia the lesse. These Commanders hauing their Companies brought downe to the Sea-side, imbarked

Herod lib. 6. Whether this Citie or People were of Peloponesus in Sycyonia, or of Aegas, between Thessalia and Macedon, I doe not know: but those borderers, and next the enemy, were more likely to compound than the rest farre off. There is also a Citie called AEginum, not farre from Aegea. Liuie 31. 33. 46.

imbarked themſelues in ſixe hundred Gallies and other Veſſels; and firſt of all attempted the Iſlands called Cyclades, which lay in the mid-way betweene Aſia the leſſe, and Greece. For (obtaining thoſe places) the Perſians had then nothing to hinder the tranſportation of their forces ouer the Ægean Sea; but on the contrary they might alwayes both relieue themſelues in their paſſage, and ſhrowd themſelues from all ſuddaine tempeſts and outrage.

To this end they firſt poſſeſt themſelues of Samos, ſecondly, they attempted Naxos: Which Iſland, the inhabitants deſpairing of their owne forces, abandoned. So did the people of Delos, of which Apollo was natiue: Which Iſland Darius did not onely forbeare to ſacke, but recalling the inhabitants, he gaue order to beautifie the places and Altars of Sacrifice, to Apollo erected. And hauing recouered theſe and other Iſlands, the Perſians directed their courſe for Eretria in Eubœa: for that Citie, (as already hath beene ſhewed) lib. Herod. had aſſiſted the Ionians at the taking and firing of Sardis. In this Iſland the Perſians tooke ground, and beſieged Eretria very ſtraitly, and after ſixe dayes aſſault, partly by force, and in part by the treaſon of Euphabus and Philagius; they tooke it, ſackt it, and burnt it to the ground. Thus farre the winds of proſperous fortune filled their ſayles. From Eubœa the Perſians paſt their Armie into Attica, conducted and guided by Hippias, late Prince of Athens, and marching towards it, they encamped at Marathon, in the way from the Sea, where they landed, towards Athens.

The Athenians finding the time arriued, wherein they were to diſpute with their owne vertues againſt Fortune, and to caſt lots for their liberty, for their wiues, their children, and their liues, put themſelues in the beſt order they could to make reſiſtance, and withall ſent away with ſpeede to the Lacedæmonians for ſuccour, imploying in that Negotiation one Phidippides; who paſſing through Arcadia, encountred in the way a familiar Diuell, which he ſuppoſed to be Pan, who willed him to aſſure the Athenians of victory, promiſing that ſome one of the gods ſhould be preſent at the battaile to aſſiſt them and defend them againſt the multitude of their enemies. Phidippides at his returne ſeeing he could not bring with him any preſent ſuccours from Sparta, yet he thought it greatly auailing to bring newes from the gods, and promiſe of aſſiſtance from Heauen, which no doubt (though the deuice was ſomowhat likely to be his owne) yet it greatly encouraged the multitude and common people, who in all ages haue beene more ſtirred vp with fond Prophecies and other like ſuperſtitious fooleries, than by any iuſt cauſe or ſolid reaſon.

The Athenians being now left to themſelues, with one thouſand onely of the Plateans (who hauing beene formerly defended by the Athenians againſt the Thebans, did in this extremity witneſſe their thankefulneſſe and gratefull diſpoſition) began to diſpute, Whether it were moſt for their aduantage to defend the walles of Athens, or to put themſelues into the field with ſuch forces as they had, the ſame conſiſting of tenne thouſand Athenians, and one thouſand of the Plateans. In the end, and after great diuerſity of opinions, Miltiades, who perſwaded the triall by battell, preuailed.

The Armies being now in view, and within a mile of each other, the Athenians diſpoſed themſelues into three troopes: two wings or hornes, as they tearme them, and the body of a battaile. The Perſians when they perceiued ſo ſmall a troope aduancing towards them, thought the Athenians rather diſpoſſeſt of their vnderſtanding, than poſſeſt with the reſolution whereof they made ſhew. So inuincible and reſiſtleſſe the Perſians eſteemed their owne numbers to be, and that ſmall troope of their enemies then in view, rather to be deſpiſed than to be fought withall: But in concluſion, the victory being doubtfully ballanced for a while, ſometime the vertue of the Grecians, and ſometimes the number of the Perſians preuailed, the Grecians fighting for all that they had, the Perſians for that they needed not, theſe great forces of Darius were diſordered and put in rout; the Athenians following their victory euen to the Sea-ſhore; where the Perſians, ſo many of them as loſt not their wits with their courage, ſaued themſelues in their ſhips.

The Perſian Armie conſiſted of an hundred thouſand foot and ten thouſand horſe; of which there were ſlaine in the place ſixe thouſand three hundred, and of the Grecians an hundred foureſcore and twelue. For howſoeuer it came to paſſe, either by ſtrange viſions, which were afterward called Panici terrores, or by ſome other affright, it seemeth, that the inuading Armie, after the first encounter, fought with their backes towards their enemy, and lost that number, by Herodotus set downe, in their disorderly retreat, or rather in their flat running away. As for Iustines report, That two hundred thousand of the Persian Armie were slaine, the same hath no apparance nor possibilitie of truth. In this fight Hippias the perswader of the enterprise was slaine, saith Iustine and Cicero; but Suidas tels vs, That he escaped, and died most miserably in Lemnos.

Ad Att.

The greatest honour of this victory was cast vpon Miltiades, who both perswaded the triall by battaile, and behaued himselfe therein answerably to the counsell which he gaue. Themistocles had his first reputation in this fight, being but yong and of the first beard. Those of the Graecians, of marke and commandement, that fell in the first encounter, were Callimachus and Stesileus. It is also said, That Cynegyrus following the Persians to their embarking, laid hands on one of their Gallies, to haue held it from putting off the shore, and hauing his right hand cut off, he yet offered to arrest it with his left; of which also being depriued, he tooke hold of it with his teeth. This encounter happened in the first yeere of the threescore and twelfth Olympiad, about the time of the War made by Coriolanus against his fellow-Romans: Alexander the sonne of Amintas being then King of Macedon, and Phanippus then Gouernor of Athens, according to Plutarch; or Hyllides, after Halycarnasseus.

In vita Arist.

This great fray thus parted, and the Persians returned backe into the lesser Asia, Miltiades sought and obtained an imployment against the Ilanders of Paros, one of the Cyclades, and passing ouer his Companies in threescore and ten Gallies, after sixe and twentie dayes assault he brake his thigh, in seeking to enter it by the Temple of Ceres, wherewith himselfe being made vnable, and his companies discouraged, he returned to Athens; where those vngratefull Citizens forgetting all his seruices past, and that of all other the most renowned at the battaile of Marathon, did by the perswasion of Xantippus, the father of Pericles (who enuied his fame) cast him into prison, and set on him a fine of fiftie Talents; where his weake and wounded body being not able to endure the one, nor his estate to pay the other, he after a few dayes ended his life.

Which enuie of the better sort to each other, with their priuate Factions, assisted by the vnthankfull and witlesse people, brought them, not many yeeres after, from a victorious and famous Nation, to base subiection and slauery. Miltiades left behinde him one sonne called Cymon, begotten on Hegisipila, daughter of Olorus King of Thrace, who (saith Plutarch) was neither inferior to his father in valour, nor to Themistocles in vnderstanding, but exceeded them both in iustice and good gouernment.

Now Darius taking greater care how to recouer his honour, than sorrow for the losse receiued in Greece, gaue order for new leuies of men, and all other warlike prouisions. But the Ægyptians reuolting from his obedience (a Kingdome of great strength and reuenue) greatly distracted his resolution for the reinuasion of Greece. The dissension also among his sonnes, of whom, the yonger being borne after he was King, and by so great a mother as Atossa, disdained to giue place to his elder brother, borne before Darius obtained the Empire, greatly vexed him. And lastly, death, who hath no respect of any mans affaires, gaue end to all his consultations and enterprises, and ioyned him to the earth of his ancestors, about a yeere after the battaile of Marathon, and after that he had reigned sixe and thirty yeeres. He left behinde him fiue sonnes, namely Artabasanes, borne before he obtained the kingdome, Xerxes who succeeded him, Achemenes gouernor of Ægypt, Masistes and Anabignes.

Chap. VI.

Of Xerxes.

§. I.

The preparation of Xerxes against Greece.

Xerxes receiued from his father, as hereditarie, a double Warre; one to be made against the Ægyptians, which he finished so speedily, that there is nothing remaining in writing how the same was performed: the other against the Gracians; of which it is hard to iudge, whether the preparations were more terrible, or the successe ridiculous. In the consultation for the prosecution of this Warre, which was chiefely bent against the Athenians, the Princes of Persia were diuided in opinion. Mardonius, who had formerly commanded in Thrace and Macedon, vnder Darius, and had also Hystaspes for his grandfather, as Xerxes had, and married Xerxes his sister Artozostres, perswaded by many arguments the Europaan warre. But Artabanus, brother to the late Darius, and vncle to Xerxes, maintained the contrary counsell, laying before Xerxes the lamentable and ridiculous successe of the two late inuasions, which Darius had made contrary to his counsell: The one in person vpon the Scythians, the other by his Lieutenants vpon the Greeks; in each of which Darius left to his enemies both his Armie and his honour.

He therefore besought Xerxes to be right well aduised before he did too farre imbarke himselfe in this businesse. For whatsoeuer vndertaking hath deliberate and sound counsell for conductor, though the successe doe not alwayes answere the probability, yet hath Fortune nothing else thereof to vaunt, than the variablenesse of his owne nature, which onely the diuine Prouidence, and not any humane power, can constraine.

But so obstinate was the resolution of Xerxes in prosecution of his former intent, that Artabanus, whether terrified by Visions (as it is written of him) or fearing the Kings hatred, which he made knowne to all those that opposed his desire to this Warre (changing opinion and counsell) assisted the Gracian Expedition with all the power he had.

After the Warre of Ægypt was ended, foure yeeres were consumed in describing and gathering an Armie for this inuasion: which being compounded of all Nations subiect to the Persian Empire, consisted of seauenteene hundred thousand foot, and eighty thousand horsemen, besides Chariots, Camels, and other Beasts for Carriage, if we may beleeue Herodotus: for of this multitude, Trogus findes the number lesse by seuen hundred thousand footmen. Her. l. 7.

The Commanders of the seuerall Nations were the Princes of the bloud of Persia, either by marriage in the Kings house, or otherwise: for to these were all commandements of this nature giuen, some few people excepted, who had of their owne leaders.

The charge of the whole Armie was bestowed on Mardonius, the sonne of Gobryas by a sister of Darius, to whom were ioyned some others of Xerxes his neerest kindred, as Generals ouer all; sauing that the charge of ten thousand select Persians, called the immortall Regiment (because if any one of the whole number died, or were slaine, there was another presently chosen in his stead) was giuen to Hydarnes; the eighty thousand horsemen were led by the sonnes of Datis, who commanded the late Armie of Darius in Greece.

The Fleete of Gallies were 2200. and eight, furnished by the Phœnicians, who had Commanders of their owne Nation, and by the Cypriotes, Cilicians, Pamphilians, Lycians, Dorians, Carians, Ionians, Æolians, and Hellespontines; who were trusted with the furnishing of their owne Vessels, though commanded by the Princes of Persia, as by Ariabignes the sonne of Darius, and others. The rest of the Vessels for transportation were three thousand, There were also certaine Gallies furnished by Artemisia, the daughter of Lygdames, Princesse of Halycarnassus, and the Islands adioyning, which her selfe commanded. Those Gallies by her prepared and furnished, exceeded all the reſt of the Fleet, excepting thoſe of Zidon, in which Xerxes himſelfe was imbarked.

§. II.

Xerxes Armie entertained by Pythius: his cutting off Mount Athos from the Continent: his bridge of Boates ouer the Helleſpont: and the diſcourſe betweene him and Artabanus vpon the view of the Armie.

WHen this world of an Armie was throughly furniſhed, he cauſed all the Nations of which it was compounded, to make their Rendez-vous and repaire at Sardis in Lydia. And when he had aſſembled to the number of ſeuenteene hundred thouſand foot, as he entred the body of Celænas, he was by one Pythius the Lydian entertained, who out of his Flocks and Heards of Cattell gaue food to Xerxes and his whole Armie. The Feaſt ended, he alſo preſented him with two thouſand Talents of ſiluer, and in Gold foure Millions, wanting ſeauen thouſand of the Perſian Darici, which make ſo many of our markes.

The King ouercome with the exceeding liberality of Pythius, did not onely refuſe his treaſure offered, but commanded that ſeuen thouſand Darici ſhould be giuen him to make vp his foure Millions; of which, ſo many thouſands were wanting when he made the preſent. But ſoone after, when Pythius beſought him to ſpare one of his fiue ſonnes from his attendance into Greece (becauſe himſelfe was old, and had none whom he could ſo well truſt as his owne ſonne) Xerxes moſt barbarouſly cauſed the young man, for whom his father ſought exemption, to be ſundered into two parts, commanding, that the one halfe of his carkaſſe ſhould be layed on the right, and the other halfe on the left hand of the common way by which the Armie marched.

Two things he commanded to be done before he came to the Sea-ſide. The one was a paſſage for Gallies to be cut behinde Mount Athos, making the ſame (with the halfe Iſland or Headland, whereon it ſtood) to be an entire Iſland, ſundring thereby from the Continent of Thrace fiue Cities, beſides the Mountaine and the Cherſoneſus or Necke of Land it ſelfe: a worke of more oſtentation than of vſe, and yet an enterpriſe of no great wonder, the Valley which held it to the Continent hauing but twelue furlongs (which make about a mile and halfe) to cut through, and the ditch being broad enough onely for two Gallies to paſſe in front. The Cities ſo ſeuered from the maine, were Dion, Olophyxus, Acrothoon, Thyſus, and Cleona.

He alſo gaue order, that a Bridge vpon Boats ſhould be made ouer the Helleſpont betweene Abidus and Seſtos, the Sea there hauing a myle of breadth, wanting an eight part; which after the finiſhing, was by a Tempeſt torne aſunder and diſſeuered: wherewith Xerxes being more enraged than diſcouraged, commanded thoſe to be ſlaine that were maſters of the worke, and cauſed ſixe hundred threeſcore and foureteene Gallies to be coupled together, thereon to frame a new Bridge; which by the art and induſtrie of the Phœnicians was ſo well anchored to reſiſt both windes blowing into and from the Euxine Sea, as the ſame being well boorded and rayled, the whole Armie of ſeuenteene hundred thouſand foot, and foureſcore thouſand Horſe, with all the Moyles and Carriages, paſt ouer it into Europe in ſeuen dayes and ſeuen nights, without intermiſſion. This tranſportation of Armies did Cæſar afterward vſe. And Caligula that mad Emperour, in imitation of Xerxes his Bridge, did build the like.

The Bridge finiſhed, and the Armie brought neere to the Sea-ſide, Xerxes tooke a view of all his Troupes, aſſembled in the Plaines of Abidus, being carried vp, and ſeated on a place ouer-topping the Land round about it, and the Sea adioyning: and after he had gloried in his owne happineſſe, to behold and command ſo many Nations, and ſo powerfull an Armie and Fleet, he ſuddenly (notwithſtanding) burſt out into teares, moued with this contemplation, That in one hundred yeeres there ſhould not any one ſuruiue of that maruellous multitude: the cauſe of which ſudden change of paſſion when he vttered to Artabanus his vncle, Artabanus ſpake to the King to this effect: That which is more lamentable than the diſſolution of this great Troupe within that number of yeeres by the King remembred, is, That the life it ſelfe which we enioy is yet more miſerable than the end thereof: for in thoſe few dayes giuen vs in the world, there is no man among all theſe, nor elſewhere, that euer found himſelfe ſo accompanied with happineſſe, but that he oftentimes pleaſed himſelfe better with the deſire and hope of death, than of liuing; the incident calamities, diſeaſes, and ſorrowes whereto mankinde is ſubiect, being ſo many and ineuitable, that the ſhorteſt life doth oftentimes appeare vnto vs ouer-long; to auoid all which, there is neither refuge nor reſt, but in deſired death alone.

With this melancholy diſcourſe, Xerxes being not much pleaſed, prayed Artabanus not to ouer-caſt thoſe ioyes which they had now in purſuit with ſad remembrances. And holding ſtill a doubtfull conceit, that Artabanus vtterly condemned the inuaſion of Greece, againſt which he had formerly giuen many ſtrong reaſons, deſired him to deale freely with him, Whether he were returned to his firſt reſolution, that the enterpriſe of Greece could not be proſperous? Or whether, according to the change of minde put into him by his late Viſion, he was confident of good ſucceſſe? Artabanus, notwithſtanding that hee aſſured himſelfe of the Kings reſolution to goe on, and dared not by any new Arguments to batter the great purpoſe it ſelfe, yet hee told the King, That there were two things which maruellouſly affrighted him, and which the King ſhould finde, as he feared, to be moſt aduerſe; to wit, the Sea and the Land: The Sea, becauſe it had no where in that part of the world any Port capable of ſo great a Fleet: inſomuch, as if any tempeſt ſhould ariſe, all the Continent of Greece could hardly receiue them, nor all the Hauens thereof afford them any ſafety: and therefore when any ſuch ſhelter ſhall bee wanting vnto them, he prayed him to vnderſtand, that in ſuch a caſe of extremity, men are left to the will and diſpoſition of Fortune, and not Fortune to the will and diſpoſition of men. The Land, beſides other incommodities, will be found by ſo much the more an enemie, by how much the vnſatiate deſire of man to obtaine more and more thereof, doth leade him forward: for were there no man found to giue reſiſtance, yet the want of meanes to feede ſuch an Army, and the Famine, which cannot be preuented, will without any other violence offered diſ-inable and conſume it. By theſe Arguments Artabanus hoped to haue diuerted Xerxes, not daring perchance to vtter what indeed hee moſt feared; to wit, the ouerthrow of the Armie it ſelfe both by Sea and Land, which ſoone after followed. Theſe Cautions were exceeding weightie, if Xerxes his obſtinacie had not miſ-priſed them. For to inuade by Sea vpon a perillous Coaſt, being neither in poſſeſſion of any Port, nor ſuccoured by any party, may better fit a Prince preſuming on his fortune, than enriched with vnderſtanding. Such was the enterpriſe of Philip the ſecond vpon England in the yeere 1588. who had belike neuer heard of this Counſell of Artabanus to Xerxes, or forgotten it.

Now concerning the ſecond point, it was very likely, that Xerxes his Armie, which could not haue in it leſſe then two millions of Soules, beſides his beaſts for Seruice and Carriage, ſhould after a few daies ſuffer famine, and vſing Machiauels words, Mourire ſans confeſſo; die without a knife. For it was impoſſible for Greece, being a ragged, ſtrait and mountainous Countrey, to yeeld food (beſides what ſerued themſelues) for twenty hundred thouſand ſtrangers, whom they neuer meant to entertaine, but with the ſharpened points of their weapons, deſtroying withall whatſoeuer they could not well incloſe and defend. Nay, if we may beleeue Herodotus, the Armie of Xerxes, being reuiewed at Thermopylæ, conſiſted of fiue millions, two hundred eighty three thouſand, two hundred twentie men, beſides Laundreſſes, Harlots and Horſes, and was therefore likely to endure a ſpeedy famine.

The effect of Xerxes his anſwere was, That it was impoſſible to prouide for all things; and that whoſoeuer ſhould enterpriſe any great matter, if hee gaue the hearing to all that could be obiected of accidentall inconueniences, hee ſhould neuer purſue the ſame farther, then the diſpute and conſultation: which if his Predeceſſors, the Perſian Kings, had done, they had neuer growne to that greatneſſe, or poſſeſt ſo many Kingdomes and Nations as now they did; and therefore concluded, That great enterpriſes were neuer vndertaken without great perils. Which reſolution of Xerxes was not to bee condemned, if any neceſſity had enforſt him to that warre. But ſeeing the many Nations newlie conquered, which he already commanded, were more than could bee conſtrained to obedience any longer than the powerfull proſperity of the Perſians endured, and that Greece was ſeparated by the Sea from the reſt of Xerxes Dominions (of whoſe reſolution his Father Darius had made a deare experience) the fruit of this warre was answerable to the plantation, and the successe and end agreeable to the weake counsell whereon it was grounded. Furthermore, those millions of men which he transported, and yet in his owne iudgement not sufficient, (for he gathered in marching on, all the strength of Thrace and Macedon) were an argument, that he rather hoped to feare the Greekes by the fame of his numbers, than that he had any confidence in their valour and resolution, whom he conducted. For it is wisely said of those vncountable multitudes: Nonvires habẽt sed pondus, & impedimenta potiùs sunt quàm auxilium; They are great in bulke, but weake in forces, and rather a luggage than an aide.

Besides, as it was impossible to marshall such a world of men in one Armie, so the diuers Nations, speaking diuers languages, bred the same confusion among the Persian commanders when they came to fight, as it did to the builders of Babel, when they came to worke. Whereas if Xerxes had of his fiue millions compounded ten Armies of fiftie thousand chosen souldiors in each, and sent them yeerely into Greece well victualled and furnished, he had either preuailed by the sword, or forced them to forsake their territorie, or brought them into obedience by necessitie and famine, which cannot be resisted. But while Xerxes, resolued to cut downe the bankes of Greece, and to let in a sea of men vpon them, he was deceiued both of his owne hopes, and in their hearts whom he imployed, and beaten by the Greekes, both by Land and Sea; yea, hee himselfe, conducted by his feare, fled shamefully into Asia. A great part of his Armie was buried in Greece: the remainder whereof, which wintred in Thessalie, and led by Mardonius, who perswaded the enterprise, was in the Summer following vtterly defeated, and himselfe slaine.

§. III.

Of the fights at Thermopylæ and Artemisium.

AFter such time as Xerxes had transported the Armie ouer the Hellespont, and landed in Thrace, (leauing the description of his passage alongst that Coast, and how the Riuer of Lissus was drunke drie by his multitudes, and the Lake neere to Pissyrus by his cattell, with other accidents in his marches towards Greece) I will speake of the encounters he had, and the shamfull and incredible ouerthrowes which he receiued. As first at Thermopylæ, a narrow passage of halfe an acre of ground, lying betweene the Mountaines which diuide Thessalie from Greece, where sometime the Phocians had raised a wall with gates, which was then for the most part ruined. At this entrance Leonidas, one of the Kings of Sparta, with three hundred Lacedæmonians, assisted with one thousand Tegeatæ and Mantineans, one thousand Arcadians, and other Peloponnesians, to the number of three thousand one hundred in the whole; besides one thousand Phocians, foure hundred Thebans, seuen hundred Thespians, and all the forces (such as as they were) of the bordering Locrians; defended the passage two whole dayes together against that huge Armie of the Persians. The valour of the Greekes appeared so excellent in this defence, that in the first dayes fight, Xerxes is said to haue three times leaped out of his Throne, fearing the destruction of his Armie by one handfull of those men, whom not long before he had vtterly despised: and when the second dayes attempt vpon the Greekes had proued vaine, he was altogether ignorant how to proceede further, and so might haue continued, had not a run-agate Grecian taught him a secret way, by which part of his Armie might ascend the ledge of Mountaines, and set vpon the backs of those who kept the Straits. But when the most valiant of the Persian Armie had almost inclosed the small forces of the Greekes, then did Leonidas, King of the Lacedæmonians, with his three hundred, and seuen hundred Thespians, which were all that abode by him, refuse to quit the place which they had vndertaken to make good, and with admirable courage not onely resist that world of men which charged them on all sides; but issuing out of their strength, made so great a slaughter of their enemies, that they might well be called vanquishers, though all of them were slaine vpon the place. Xerxes hauing lost in this last fight, together with twenty thousand other Souldiers and Captaines, two of his own brethren, began to doubt what inconuenience might befall him by the vertue of such as had not beene present at these battailes, with whom he knew that he shortly was to deale. Especially of the Spartans he stood in great feare, whose manhood had appeared singular in this tryall, which caused him very carefully to enquire what numbers they could bring bring into the field. It is reported of Dieneces the Spartan, that when one thought to haue terrified him by ſaying, That the flight of the Perſian arrowes was ſo thicke as would hide the Sunne: he anſwered thus; It is very good newes: for then ſhall we fight in the coole ſhade.

Such notable reſolution hauing as freely beene expreſſed in deedes, as it was vttered in words, cauſed the Perſian to ſtand in great doubt, when he heard that the Citie of Sparta could arme well-nigh eight thouſand men of the like temper, and that the other Lacedæmonians, though inferior to thoſe, were very valiant men. Wherefore he asked counſell of Demaratus, a baniſhed King of the Spartans, who had alwayes well aduiſed and inſtructed him in the things of Greece, what courſe were fitteſt to be taken in his further proceedings. The opinion of Demaratus was, That all the Land-forces would aſſemble together to defend the Iſthmus, that ſtreight necke of ground which ioyneth Peloponneſus to the Continent. For which cauſe he aduiſed, That three hundred ſhips well manned ſhould be ſent vnto the Coaſt of Laconia, to ſpoyle the Countrie, and to hold the Lacedæmonians and their neighbours buſied at home; whileſt Xerxes at his leaſure hauing ſubdued the reſt, might afterward bring his whole power vpon them, who remaining deſtitute of ſuccour, would be too weake alone to make reſiſtance. To this purpoſe alſo the ſame Demaratus further aduiſed, that the ſaid Fleet of three hundred ſhips ſhould ſeize vpon the Iland then called Cythera, now Cerigo, which lying neere to the Coaſt of Laconia, might ſerue as a fit place of Rendez-vous vpon all occaſions, either of their owne defence, or endamaging the enemy: whereby that ancient ſpeech of Chilon the Lacedæmonian ſhould be verified, that it were better for his Country-men to haue that Ile drowned in the ſea, than ſtand ſo inconueniently as for them it did. What effect this counſell might haue taken, had it beene followed, it is not eaſie to gueſſe. But a contrary opinion of Achæmenes brother to King Xerxes was preferred as the ſafer. For the Perſian fleet had bin ſorely vexed with a grieuous tempeſt which continued three whole dayes together, wherein were loſt vpon the coaſt of Magneſia foure hundred ſhips of war, beſides other veſſels innumerable, accordingly as Artabanus had foreſeene, that if any ſuch calamity ſhould ouertake them, there would not be found any Harbor wide enough to giue them ſuccour. Therefore Achæmenes perſwaded his brother not to diſperſe his fleet; for if (ſaid he) after the loſſe of foure hundred ſhips we ſhall ſend away other three hundred to ſeeke aduentures, then will the Greekes be ſtrong enough by ſea to encounter the reſt of the Nauie, which holding altogether is inuincible. To this counſell Xerxes yeelded, hoping that his Land-armie and fleet ſhould each of them ſtand the other in good ſtead, whileſt both held one courſe, and lay not farre aſunder. But herein he was farre deceiued; for about the ſame time that his armie had felt the valour of the Greekes by Land, his Nauie likewiſe made a ſorrowfull proofe of their skill and courage at Sea. The Gracians fleet lay at that time at Artemiſium in the ſtraits of Eubœa, where the Perſians thinking to incompaſſe them, ſent two hundred ſayle about the Iland to fall vpon them behinde, vſing a like ſtratagem to that which their King did practiſe againſt Leonidas in a caſe not vnlike, but with farre different ſucceſſe. For that narrow channell of the ſea which diuideth Eubœa from the maine, was in the ſame ſort held by a Nauy of two hundred threeſcore and eleuen ſaile againſt the huge Perſian Armada, as the ſtraits of Thermopyle had formerly beene maintained by Leonidas, till he was circumuented, as this Nauie might haue beene, but was not. The departure of thoſe two hundred ſhips that were ſent about the Iland, and the cauſe of their voyage, was too well knowne in the Perſian fleet, and ſoone enough diſcloſed to the Greekes, who ſetting ſaile by night, met them with a counter-ſurpriſe, taking and ſinking thirty veſſels, inforcing the reſt to take the Sea, where being ouertaken with foule weather, they were driuen vpon the rockes and caſt all away. Contrariwiſe, the Nauie of the Greekes was increaſed by the arriuall of fiftie three Athenian ſhips, and one Lemnian, which came to their party in the laſt fight. As theſe new forces incouraged the one ſide: ſo the feare of Xerxes his diſpleaſure ſtirred vp the other to redeeme their loſſe with ſome notable exploit. Wherefore ſetting aſide their vnfortunate policy, they reſolued in plaine fight to repaire their honour, & caſting themſelues into the forme of a Creſcent, thought ſo to incloſe the Greekes, who readily did preſent them battell at Artemiſium.

The fight endured from noone till night, and ended with equall loſſe to both parts. For though more of the Perſian ſhips were ſunke and taken, yet the leſſer loſſe fell altogether gether as heauy vpon the Greekish fleet, which being small could worse beare it. Herein only the Barbarians may seeme to haue had the worse, that they forsook the place of fight, leauing the wracke and spoyles to the enemy, who neuertheless were faine to abandon presently euen the passage which they had vndertaken to defend, both for that many of their ships were sorely crusht in the battaile, and especially because they had receiued aduertisement of the death of Leonidas at Thermopylæ. Before they wayed anchors, Themistocles Generall of the Athenians engraued vpon stone at the watering place an exhortation to the Ionians, that either they should reuolt vnto the Greekes, or stand neutrall; which perswasion, he hoped would either take some place with them, or at the least make them suspected by the Persians.

§ IIII.

WHen Xerxes had passed the straits of Thermopylæ, he wasted the countrey of the Phocians, and the regions adioyning: as for the inhabitants, they chose rather to flye, and reserue themselues to a day of battell, than to aduenture their liues into his hands, vpon hope of sauing their wealth, by making proffer vnto him of their seruice. Part of his armie he sent to spoyle the Temple of Delphi; which was exceeding rich by meanes of many offerings that had there beene made by diuers Kings and great personages; of all which riches it was thought that Xerxes had a better Inuentorie than of the goods left in his owne Palace. To make relation of a great astonishment that fell vpon the companies which ariued at the Temple to haue sacked it, and of two Rockes, that breaking from the mount Parnassus, ouerwhelmed many of the Barbarians, it were peraduenture somewhat superstitious. Yet Herodotus, who liued not long after, saith, That the broken Rockes remained euen to his memory in the Temple of Minerua, whither they rowled in their fall. And surely this attempt of Xerxes was impious; for seeing he beleeued that Apollo was a god, he should not haue dared to entertaine a couetous desire of inriching himselfe by committing sacriledge vpon his Temple. Wherefore it may possibly be true, that licence to chastise his impietie, in such manner as is reported, was granted vnto the Diuell, by that Holy one, who saith, Will a man spoyle his gods? and elsewhere; Hath any nation changed their gods, which yet are no gods? Goe to the Iles of Kittim, and behold, and send to Kedar, and take diligent heede, and see whether there be any such things. Now this impietie of Xerxes was the more inexcusable, for that the Persians alleadged the burning of Cybeles Temple by the Athenians, when they set fire on the Citie of Sardis in Asia, to be the ground and cause of the waste which they made in burning of Cities and Temples in Greece. Whereas indeede, in the enterprise against Delphos, this Vizzor of holy and zealous reuenge falling off, discouered the face of couetousnesse so much the more vglie, by how much the more themselues had professed a detestation of the offence which the Athenians had committed in that kinde by meere mischance.

Malac.c.3.v.8. Ierem.c.2.v.9. & 10.

The remainder of that which Xerxes did, may be expressed briefely thus: He came to Athens, which finding forsaken, he tooke and burnt the Cittadel and temple which was therein. The Cittadel indeede was defended a while by some of more courage than wisedome, who litterally interpreting Apolloes Oracle; that Athens should be safe in wooden wals, had fortified that place with boords and Palissadoes: too weake to hold out long, though by their desperate valour so well maintained at the first assault, that they might haue yeelded it vpon tolerable conditions, had they not vainely relied vpon the prophecie: whereof (being somewhat obscure) it was wisely done of Themistocles, to make discretion the interpreter, applying rather the words to the present neede, than fashioning the businesse to words.

§. V.

How Themistocles the Athenian drew the Greekes to fight at Salamis.

THe Athenians had, before the comming of Xerxes, remoued their wiues and children into Træzene, Ægina, and Salamis, not so highly prizing their houses and lands, as their freedome, and the common liberty of Greece. Neuertheless, this great great zeale, which the Athenians did ſhew for the generall good of their Countrie, was ill requited by the other Greekes, who with much labour were hardly intreated to ſtay for them at Salamis, whileſt they remooued their wiues and children out of the Citie. But when the City of Athens was taken, it was preſently reſolued vpon, that they ſhould forſake the Ile of Salamis, and withdraw the fleet to Iſtumus: which necke of land they did purpoſe to fortifie againſt the Perſians, & ſo to defend Peloponneſus by Land, and Sea, leauing the reſt of Greece as indefenſible, to the furie of the enemie. So ſhould the Ilands of Salamis and Ægina haue beene abandoned, and the Families of the Athenians (which were there beſtowed as in places of ſecuritie) haue beene giuen ouer into mercileſſe bondage. Againſt this reſolution Themiſtocles, Admirall of the Athenian fleet, very ſtrongly made oppoſition; but in vaine. For the Peloponneſians were ſo poſſeſſed with feare of loſing their owne, which they would not hazard, that no perſwaſions could obtaine of them, to regard the eſtate of their diſtreſſed friends and Allies. Many remonſtrances Themiſtocles made vnto them, to allure them to abide the enemie at Salamis; As firſt in priuate vnto Eurybiades the Lacedæmonian, Admirall of the whole fleet; That the ſelfe-ſame feare which made them forſake thoſe coaſts of Greece, vpon which they then anchored, would afterward (if it found no checke at the firſt) cauſe them alſo to diſſeuer the fleet, and euery one of the Confederates to with-draw himſelfe to the defence of his owne Citie and eſtate: Then to the Councell of Warre which Eurybiades vpon this motion did call together (forbearing to obiect what want of courage might worke in them hereafter) he ſhewed that the fight at Iſthmus would be in an open Sea, whereas it was more expedient for them, hauing the fewer ſhips, to determine the matter in the ſtreights; and that, beſides the ſafeguard of Ægina, Megara, and Salamis, they ſhould by abiding, where they then were, ſufficiently defend Iſthmus, which the Barbarians ſhould not ſo much as once looke vpon, if the Greekes obtained victorie by ſea; which they could not ſo well hope for elſewhere, as in that preſent place which gaue him ſo good aduantage. All this would not ſerue to retaine the Peloponneſians, of whom one, vnworthy of memorie, vpbraided Themiſtocles with the loſſe of Athens, blaming Eurybiades for ſuffering one to ſpeake in the Councell, that had no Countrie of his own to inhabite. A baſe and ſhamefull obiection it was, to lay as a reproach that loſſe, which being voluntarily ſuſtained for the common good, was in true eſtimation by ſo much the more honourable, by how much it was the greater. But this indignitie did exaſperate Themiſtocles, and put into his mouth a reply ſo ſharpe, as auailed more then all his former perſwaſions. Hee told them all plainely, That the Athenians wanted not a fairer Citie, than any Nation of Greece could boaſt of; hauing well-neere two hundred good ſhippes of Warre, the better part of the Gracian fleet, with which it was eaſie for them to tranſport their Families and ſubſtance into any part of the World, and ſettle themſelues in a more ſecure habitation, leauing thoſe to ſhift as well as they might, who in their extremitie had refuſed to ſtand by them. Herewithall he mentioned a towne in Italie belonging of olde to the State of Athens, of which towne hee ſaid an Oracle had foretold, That the Athenians in proceſſe of time ſhould build it a-new, and there (quoth hee) will we plant our ſelues, leauing vnto you a ſorrowfull remembrance of my words, and of your owne vnthankefulneſſe. The Peloponneſians hearing thus much, began to enter into better conſideration of the Athenians, whoſe affaires depended not, as they well perceiued, vpon ſo weake termes, that they ſhould be driuen to crouch to others; but rather were ſuch, as might inforce the reſt to yeeld to them, and condeſcend euen to the vttermoſt of their owne demands.

For the Athenians, when they firſt embraced that Heroicall reſolution of leauing their grounds and houſes to fire and ruine, if neceſſity ſhould inforce them ſo farre, for the preſeruation of their liberty; did imploy the moſt of their priuate wealth, and all the common treaſure, in building a great Nauie. By theſe meanes they hoped (which accordingly fell out) that no ſuch calamity ſhould befall them by Land, as might not well be counterpoiſed by great aduantages at ſea: Knowing well, that a ſtrong fleet would either procure victorie at home, or a ſecure paſſage to any other Countrie. The other States of Greece held it ſufficient, if building a few new ſhips, they did ſomewhat amend their Nauie. Wherby it came to paſſe, that, had they been vanquiſhed, they could not haue expected any other fortune than either preſent death, or perpetual ſlauerie; neither could they hope to be victorious without the aſſiſtance of the Athenians, whoſe forces by ſea sea did equall all theirs together; the whole consisting of more than three hundred and fourescore bottomes. Wherefore these Peloponnesians beginning to suspect their owne condition, which would haue stood vpon desperate points, if the fleet of Athens had forsaken them; were soone perswaded, by the greater feare of such a bad euent, to forget the lesser, which they had conceiued of the Persians: and laying aside their insolent braverie, they yeelded to that most profitable counsaile of abiding at Salamis.

§. VI.

How the Persians consulted about giuing battaile: and how Themistocles by policie held the Greekes to their resolution; with the victorie at Salamis thereupon ensuing.

IN the meane season the Persians had entred into consultation, whether it were conuenient to offer battell to the Greekes, or no. The rest of the Captaines giuing such aduice as they thought would best please the King their Master, had soone agreed vpon the fight: but Artemisia Queen of Halicarnassus, who followed Xerxes to this warre in person, was of contrary opinion, Her counsell was, that the King himselfe directly should march toward Peloponnesus, whereby it would come to passe, that the Greeke Nauie (vnable otherwise to continue long at Salamis for want of prouision) should presently be discouered, and euery one seeking to preserue his owne Citie and goods, they should, being diuided, proue vnable to resist him, who had won so far vpon them when they held together. And as the profit will be great in forbearing to giue battell; so on the other side, the danger will be more (said she) which wee shall vndergoe, than any need requireth vs to aduenture vpon; and the losse in case it fall vpon vs, greater than the profit of the victory which we desire. For if we compell the enemies to flie, it is more than they would haue done, wee sitting still: but if they, as better Sea-men than ours, put vs to the worst, the iourney to Peloponnesus is vtterly dasht, and many that now declare for vs, will soone reuolt vnto the Greekes. Mardonius, whom Xerxes had sent for that purpose to the fleet, related vnto his Master the common consent of the other Captaines, and withall this disagreeing opinion of Artemisia. The King well pleased with her aduice, yet resolued vpon following the more generall, but farre-worse counsaile of the rest; which would questionlesse haue beene the same which Aremisia gaue, had not feare and flatterie made all the Captaines vtter that, as out of their owne iudgement, which they thought to bee most conformable to their Princes determination. So it was indeede that Xerxes had entertained a vaine perswasion of much good, that his owne presence vpon the shore to behold the conflict, would worke among the Souldiers. Therefore hee incamped vpon the Sea-side, pitching his owne Tent on the mount Ægaleus; which is opposite vnto the Ile of Salamis, whence at ease he might safely view all which might happen in that action, hauing Scribes about him to write downe the acts and behauiour of euery Captaine. The neere approach of the Barbarians, together with the newes of that timorous diligence, which their Countrimen shewed in fortifying the Isthmus, and of a Persian Armie, marching a-pace thither; did now againe so terrifie and amaze the Peloponnesians, that no intreatie, nor contestation would suffice to hold them together. For they thought it meere madnesse to fight for a Countrey already lost, when they rather should endeuour to saue that which remained vnconquered; propounding chiefly to themselues what misery would befall them, if losing the victory, they should be driuen into Salamis, there to be shut vp, and besieged round in a poore desolate Iland.

Hereupon they resolued forth-with to set saile for Isthmus: which had presently beene done, if the wisedome of Themistocles had not preuented it. For he perceiuing what a violent feare had stopt vp their eares against all good counsaile, did practise another course, and forth-with labour to preuent the execution of this vnwholesome decree; not suffering the very houre of performance to finde him busie in wrangling alteration. As soone as the Councell brake vp, he dispatched secretly a trustie Gentleman to the Persian Captaines, informing them truely of the intended flight, and exhorting them to send part of their Nauie about the Iland, which incompassing the Greekes, might preuent their escape; giuing them withall a false hope of his assistance. The Persians no sooner heard than beleeued these good newes, well knowing that the victorie was their owne assured, aſſured, if the Athenian fleet ioyned with them; which they might eaſily hope, conſidering what abilitie their Maſter had to recompence for ſo doing, both the Captaines with rich rewards, and the People with reſtitution of their Citie, and Territories. By theſe meanes it fell out, that when the Grekes very early in the morning were about to waigh Anchor, they found themſelues incloſed round with Perſians, who had laboured hard all that night, ſending many of their ſhips about the Iſle of Salamis, to charge the enemie in reare, and landing many of their men in the Iſle of Pſyttalea, which lyeth ouer-againſt Salamis, to ſaue ſuch of their owne, and kill ſuch of the Gracian partie, as by any misfortune, ſhould be caſt vpon the ſhore. Thus did meere neceſſitie enforce the Grecians to vndertake the battaile in the Straights of Salamis, where they obtained a memorable victorie, ſtemming the formoſt of their enemies, and chaſing the reſt, who falling foule one vpon another, could neither conueniently fight nor flie. I doe not finde any particular occurrences in this great battaile to be much remarkeable. Sure it is, that the Scribes of Xerxes had a wearieſome taske of writing downe many diſaſters that befell the Perſian fleet, which ill acquitted it ſelfe that day, doing no one piece of ſeruice worthy the preſence of their King, or the regiſtring of his Notaries. As for the Greekes, they might well ſeeme to haue wrought out that victorie with equall courage, were it not that the principall honour of that day was aſcribed to thoſe of Ægina, and to the Athenians, of whom it is recorded, That when the Barbarians did flie towards Phalerus, where the Land-armie of Xerxes lay, the ſhips of Ægina hauing poſſeſſed the Straights, did ſinke or take them, whileſt the Athenians did valiantly giue charge vpon thoſe that kept the Sea, and made any countenance of reſiſting.

Of things following after the battaile of Salamis: and of the flight of Xerxes.

After this victory, the Greekes intending by way of ſcrutinie, to determine which of the Captaines had beſt merited of them, in all this great ſeruice; euery Captaine, being ambitious of that honour, did in the firſt place write downe his owne name, but in the ſecond place as beſt deſeruing next vnto himſelfe, almoſt euery Suffrage did concur vpon Themiſtocles. Thus priuate affection yeelded vnto vertue, as ſoone as her owne turne was ſerued. The Perſian King, as not amazed with this calamitie, began to make new preparation for continuance of warre; but in ſuch faſhion, that they which were beſt acquainted with his temper, might eaſily diſcerne his faint heart, through his painted lookes. Eſpecially Mardonius, Author of the Warre, beganne to caſt a warie eye vpon his Maſter, fearing leſt his counſell ſhould be rewarded according to the euent. Wherefore purpoſing rather to aduenture his life in purſuite of the victorie, than to caſt it away by vnder-going his Princes indignation; hee aduiſed the King to leaue vnto him three hundred thouſand men, with which forces hee promiſed to reduce all Greece vnder the ſubiection of the Perſian Scepter. Heerewithall he forgot not to ſooth Xerxes with many faire words; telling him, that the cowardiſe of thoſe Ægyptians, Phœnicians, and Cilicians, with others of the like mettall, nothing better than ſlaues, who had ſo ill behaued themſelues in the late Sea-ſeruice, did not concerne his honour, who had alwaies beene victorious, and had alreadie ſubdued the better part of Greece, yea taken Athens it ſelfe, againſt which the Warre was principally intended. Theſe words found very good acceptance in the Kings eare, who preſently betooke himſelfe to his iourney homewards, making the more haſte, for that he vnderſtood, how the Greeks had a purpoſe to ſaile to Helleſpont, and there to breake downe his bridge, and intercept his paſſage. True it was that the Greekes had no ſuch intent, but rather wiſhed his haſty departure, knowing that hee would leaue his Armie not ſo ſtrong, as it ſhould haue beene, had he in perſon remained with it. And for this cauſe did Eurybiades giue counſell, that by no meanes they ſhould attempt the breaking of that bridge, leſt neceſſitie ſhould inforce the Perſians to take more courage, and rather to fight like men, than die like beaſts. Wherefore Themiſtocles did, vnder pretence of friendſhip, ſend a falſe aduertiſement vnto this timerous Prince, aduiſing him to conuay himſelfe into Aſia with all ſpeed, before his bridge were diſſolued: which counſell Xerxes took very kindly, and haſtily followed, as before is ſhewed. Whether it were ſo that he found the bridge whole, and thereby repaſſed into Aſia; or whether it were torne in ſunder by tempeſts, and he thereby driuen to imbarke himselfe in some obscure vessell, it is not greatly materiall; though the Greekes did most willingly imbrace the later of these reports. Howsoeuer it were, this flight of his did well ease the Countrie; that was thereby disburdened of that huge throng of people, which, as Locusts, had before ouerwhelmed it.

§. VIII.

The negotiations betweene Mardonius and the Athenians, as also betweene the Athenians and Lacedæmonians; after the flight of Xerxes.

Mardonius with his three hundred thousand had withdrawne himselfe into Thessalie, whence he sent Alexander, the sonne of Amyntas King of Macedon, as Embassador to the Athenians, with promise of large amends for all their losses receiued; and of extending their Territories as farre as their owne desires; allowing them to retaine their libertie and lawes, if they would make peace with Xerxes, and assist him in that Warre.

The Athenians had now reentred their Citie, but not as yet brought backe their wiues and children; for as much as they well perceiued that the place could not be secure, till the Armie of Mardonius were broken and defeated. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians, vnderstanding what faire conditions this Embassador would propound, were perplexed with very great feare, lest he should finde good and ready acceptance. Hereupon, they likewise very speedily dispatched their Embassadors for Athens, who arriuing before the Macedonian had audience, vsed the best of their perswasion to retaine the Athenians firm. They alleadged, that neither Xerxes nor Darius had any pretence of Warre against the rest of Greece, but had onely threatned the subversion of Athens, till they and all their Confederates arming themselues in defence of that Citie, were drawne into the quarrell, wherein the Athenians without much crueltie of injustice could not leaue them. Wee know, said they, that yee haue endured great calamities, losing the fruit of the grounds, and being driuen to forsake the Towne, the houses whereof be ruined, and vnfit for your habitation; in regard whereof, we vndertake to maintaine as our owne, your wiues and children amongst vs, as long as the warre shall continue, hoping that yee, who haue alwaies procured libertie to others, will not now goe about to bring all Greece into slauery and bondage. As for the Barbarians, their promises are large, but their words and oathes are of no assurance. It was needlesse to vse many arguments to the Athenians, who gaue answere to Alexander in presence of the Spartan Embassadors; That whilest the Sunne continued his course, they would be enemies to Xerxes, regarding neither gold nor any riches, with which hee might seeke to make purchase of their libertie. Concerning the maintenance of their wiues and children, it was a burden which they promised to sustaine themselues, onely desiring the Lacedæmonians, that with all speed they would cause their Armie to march, for as much as it was not likelie, that Mardonius would long sit still in Thessalie, hauing once receiued such a peremptorie answere. In this their opinion of Mardonius his readinesse to inuade Attica, they found themselues nothing deceiued. For hee, as soone as Alexander had returned their obstinate purpose of resistance, did forthwith leade his Armie towards them, and their Citie: they hauing now the second time quitted it, and conueyed themselues into places of more securitie abroad in the Countrie, where they expected the arriuall of their confederates. From Athens he sent his Agent vnto them with instructions, not only to perswade them to acceptance of the conditions before to them propounded, but with great promises to allure the principall of them to his partie. His hope was that either the people, wearied with forsaking their houses so often, would be desirous to preserue them from fire, & to haue those which were already laid waste, reedified at the Kings charges: Or if this affection tooke no place with them, but that needs they would relie vpon their old Confederates, whose succors did very slowly aduance forwards, yet perhaps the Leaders might be wonne with great rewards, to draw them to this purpose; all which projects if they should faile, the destruction of Athens would be a good meane to please his Master, King Xerxes, who must thereby needes vnderstand that Mardonius kept his ground, and feared not to confront the whole power of Greece, in the strongest part of their owne Countrie. But his expectation was beguiled in all these. For the Athenians so little regarded his offers, that when one Lycidas, or (as Demosthenes calls him)

Cyrcilus, aduiſed the Senate to accept the conditions, and propounded them to the people; all the Senators, & as many as abiding without the Counſaile-house heard what hee had ſaid, immediately ſet vpon him, and ſtoned him to death; not examining whether it were feare or money, that had moued him to vtter ſuch a vile ſentence. Yea, the women of Athens, in the Ile of Salamis, hearing of his bad counſaile, and bad end, aſſembling together, did enter his house there, and put his wife and children to the like execution. All this brauerie notwithſtanding, when they perceyued the ſlacknesse of the Peloponneſians in giuing them aide, they were faine to betake themſelues to Salamis againe, the old place of their ſecuritie. Remaining there, and ſeeing little forwardnes in thoſe whom it moſt concerned to aſſiſt them, they ſent very ſeuere meſſages to Sparta, complaining of their ſlacknes, & threatning withal, to take ſuch courſe as might ſtand beſt with their own good, ſeeing that the common eſtate of all was ſo little regarded. Theſe meſſengers were at the firſt entertained with dilatorie anſwers, which euery day grew colder, when as the Peloponneſian Wall, builded a-thwart the Iſthmus, was almoſt finiſhed. But as the Lacedæmonians waxed carelesse & dull, ſo the Athenians hotely preſſed them to a quick reſolution, giuing them plainly to vnderſtand, that if they ſhould hold on in thoſe dilatory courſes, it would not be long ere the city of Athens took a new courſe, that ſhould little pleaſe them. All this while the Perſian fleet lay vpon the coaſt of Aſia, not daring to draw neere vnto Greece, as being now too weake at Sea. Likewiſe the Greekiſh Nauie contained it ſelfe within the Harbours vpon Europe ſide; both to doe ſeruice where need ſhould require at home; and withall to ſhunne the danger which might haue befallen any part of it, that being diſtracted from the reſt, had aduentured ouer-farre. So mutuall feare preſerued in quiet the Ilands lying in the midſt of the Ægean Seas. But it was well and ſeaſonably obſerued by a Counſellor of Sparta, that the wall vpon Iſthmus would ſerue to little purpoſe for the defence of Peloponneſus, if once the Athenians gaue eare to Mardonius: conſidering that many dores would be opened into that Demie-Iland, as ſoone as the Enemie ſhould by winning the friendſhip of Athens, become the Maſter of the Seas about it. The Lacedæmonians vpon this admonition, making better peruſall of their owne dangers, were very carefull to giue ſatisfaction to the Athenian Embaſſadors, who not brooking their dalaies, were vpon point of taking leaue, yea as it ſeemed, of renouncing their alliance. Wherfore diſpatching away fiue thouſand Spartans in the euening, vnder conduct of Pauſanias; they gaue audience the next day to the Embaſſadors, whoſe complaints they anſwered with vehement proteſtations of their readineſſe; deeply ſwearing that the Armie of Sparta was already farre vpon the iourney; and giuing them leaue to take vp other fiue thouſand Lacedæmonians, out of the Region adioyning, to follow after them.

The Athenians, though diſtaſting ſuch want of grauitie, in a matter ſo important, were neuertheleſſe contented with the finall concluſion; and leuying the number appointed of Lacedæmonian Souldiers, made what haſte they could to incampe in Attica. The other Gracians were nothing ſlacke in ſending forth Companies, whoſe neere approach cauſed Mardonius to forſake Attica as a rough Country, and therefore of much diſaduantage to Horſe, wherein conſiſted the beſt of his power. Before his departure hee burnt the Citie of Athens, beating downe the walls of it, and ruining all that had formerly eſcaped the fury of Warre.

The great battaile of Platea.

IT were too long a rehearſall to ſhew all that happened in many skirmiſhes betweene the Greekes and him, in the Countrie of Bœotia, which Mardonius had choſen to be the ſeate of that Warre. Much time was ſpent before the quarrell was decided by the triall of one maine battell: for both parties did ſtand vpon their guard, each expecting when the other ſhould aſſaile them.

The Army of Mardonius contained about three hundred thouſand, which were by him choſen out of Xerxes his Armie; to whom were adioyned the forces of Thebes, Macedonie, Theſſalie, and other parts of Greece, that now ſiding with the Perſian, furniſhed his Campe with fiftie thouſand men. Againſt theſe the Lacedæmonians, Athenians, and their Confederates, had leauied an Armie of one hundred and tenne thouſand, of which forty thou-and were weightily armed, the rest were onely assistants to these forty thousand, being armed more slightly, as rather to make excursions and giue chase, than to sustaine any strong charges.

These two Armies hauing eleuen daies confronted one the other, without performing any memorable piece of seruice; Mardonius, whose victualls beganne to faile, resolued to begin the fray. The Greekes were promised victorie by an Oracle, if they fought in the Land of the Athenians, and in the plaine of Ceres and Proserpina, making praiers vnto certaine gods, Demi-gods, and Nymphes. But it was hard to find the certaine place which the Oracle designed. For the plaine of Ceres was indeed in the Territorie of Athens; but there was also an olde Temple of Ceres and Proserpina, neere vnto the place where they lay at that time encamped, as likewise the memorialls of those Nymphes, and Demi-gods, were in the same place, vpon Mount Citheron, and the ground serued well for foot-men against horse; onely the Land belonged vnto the Plateans, and not vnto the Athenians.

Whilest the Greekes were perplexed about the interpretation of this doubtfull Oracle; the Plateans, to make all cleere, did freely bestow their land on that side the Towne vpon the Athenians.

This magnificence of the Plateans caused Alexander the Great, many ages after, to redifie their Citie, which was ruined in the Peloponnesian warres.

All things being ready for battaile; the Lacedæmonian Generall thought it most meet, that the Athenians should stand opposite that day to the Medes and Persians, whom they had formerly vanquished at Marathon; and that he, with his Spartans, should entertaine the Thebans and other Greekes which followed Mardonius, as better acquainted with their fight, and hauing beaten them often-times before. This being agreed vpon, the Athenians changed place with the Lacedæmonians; which Mardonius vnderstanding (whether fearing the Athenians, of whose valour the Medes and Persians had felt heauy proofe, or desiring to encounter the Spartans, as thinking them the braueſt Souldiers in Greece) he did also change the order of his battaile, and oppose himselfe to Pausanias. All the Greekes might well perceiue how the Enemie did shift his wings, and Pausanias thereupon returned to his former Station; which Mardonius noting, did also the like. So one whole day was spent in changing to and fro. Some attempt the Persians made that day with their Archers on horse-back, who did so molest the Greekes at their watering place, that they were faine to enter into consulation of retiring; because they could not without much losse to themselues, and none to the enemie, lie neere to that fountaine which did serue all the Campe. Hauing therefore concluded among themselues to dislodge; and part of the Armie being sent away before day-light: Mardonius perceiued their departure in the morning, and thereupon being encouraged by their flight, (which to him seemed to proceed out of meere cowardise) he charged them in the reare with great violence. It may well be recorded as a notable example of patient valour, That the Lacedæmonians being ouer-taken by the enemies horse, and ouer-whelmed with great flights of Arrowes, did quietly sit still, not making any resistance or defence, till the Sacrifices for victory were happily ended, though many of them were hurt and slaine, and some of especiall marke lost, before any signe of good successe appeared in the entrailes.

But as soone as Pausanias had found in the Sacrifice those tokens, which the superstition of that Age and Countrie accounted fortunate; hee gaue the Signall of battaile: and thereupon the Souldiers, who till then did sit vpon the ground, as was their manner, arose altogether, and with excellent courage receiued the charge of the Barbarians, that came thronging vpon them without any feare of such notable resistance. The rest of the Greeke Armie that was in march, being reuoked by Pausanias, came in a-pace to succour the Lacedæmonians: onely that part of the Armie which was led by the Athenians, could not arriue vnto the place of the great battaile, because the Thebans, and other Greekes confederated with the Persians, gaue them checke by the way. Neuertheless, the Spartans with other their Assistants, did so well acquite themselues, that the Persians were vanquished, and Mardonius with many thousands more slaine in the field; the rest fledde into the Campe, which they had fortified with woodden walls, and there defended themselues with such courage as desperate necessity inforced them vnto, holding out the longer, because the Lacedæmonians were not acquainted with the manner of assaulting Fortresse, and Walls. In the meane time the Athenians hauing found strong opposition of the Thebanes and Theſſalians, did with much labor and courage obtaine victorie, which hauing not long purſued, they came to helpe the Lacedæmonians, whom they found wearily buſied in aſſaulting the Campe, with more valour than skill. Wherefore they themſelues vnder-took it, and in ſhort ſpace forced a paſſage through the Wall; at which breach firſt, and then on all ſides, the Greekes entred with ſuch furie, and iuſt deſire of vengeance, that of three hundred thouſand they are ſaid not to haue left three thouſand aliue, excepting thoſe who fledde away with Artabazus, when as the Perſian Armie firſt fell to rout.

If the execution were ſo great, as is reported, an eſpeciall cauſe of it was the fooliſh retrait, or rather flight into the Campe. For though it were ſo, that the place was well fortified, and the number of thoſe who caſt themſelues into it greater than any of the Aſſailants; yet they being of ſeuerall Nations and Languages, and hauing loſt their Generall with other principall Commanders, it was impoſſible that they in ſuch a terrour and aſtoniſhment ſhould make good that peece of ground, lying in the heart of an Enemie Countrie, againſt an Armie of men, farre mor valiant than themſelues, and enflamed with preſent victorie. Therefore the ſame wall which for a few houres had preſerued their liues, by holding out the Enemie, did now impale them, and leaue them to the ſlaughtering furie of vnpittifull Victors. Artabazus fled into Thrace, telling the people of Theſſalie, and other Countries in his way, that he was ſent by Mardonius vpon ſome piece of ſeruice: For he well knew, that had they vnderſtood any thing of that great diſcomfiture, all places would haue beene hoſtile vnto him, and ſought with his ruine to purchaſe fauour of the vanquiſhers. Therefore making ſo large marches, that many of his Soldiers being feeble were left behinde and loſt, he came to Byzantium, whence hee ſhipped his men ouer into Aſia. Such was the end of the vaine-glorious expedition, vndertaken by Xerxes againſt the Greekes, vpon hope of honour, and Conqueſt, though ſorting otherwiſe, accordingly as Artabzaus had fore-ſeene, and rather worſe, for as much as it began the quarrell, which neuer ended, before the ruine of the Perſian Empire was effected by that Nation of the Greekes, deſpiſed and ſought to haue beene brought into ſlauery. Hereby it may ſeeme, that the viſion appearing to Xerxes, was from God himſelfe, who had formerly diſpoſed of thoſe things, ordaining the ſubuerſion of the Perſian Monarchie by the Greekes, who, thus prouoked, entred into greater conſideration of their owne ſtrength, and the weakeneſſe of their Enemies.

The battaile of Mycale, with a ſtrange accident that fell out in the beginning of it: and examples of the like.

THe ſame day on which the battaile was fought at Platea, there was another battaile fought at Mycale, a Promontorie, or Head-land in Aſia, where the Perſian fleet rode.

Leutychides the Spartan, with Xantippus the Athenian, Admirals of the Greeke Nauie, at the requeſt of ſome Ilanders & Ionians, did ſaile into thoſe parts, to deliuer the Samians, & procure the Ionians to reuolt from the Perſian. Xerxes himſelfe at this time lay at Sardis, a Citie in Lydia, not farre from the Sea-ſide, hauing left threeſcore thouſand vnder the command of Tigranes, for defence of Ionia and the Sea-coaſt. Therefore when Artayntes and Ithramitres, Admiralls of the Perſian fleete, vnderſtood that the Greekes bent their courſe towards them; they did forth-with draw their ſhips a-ground, fortifying with Paliſſadoes & otherwiſe, as much ground as was needfull for the encamping of al their Land & Sea-forces. Leutychides at his arriuall, perceiuing that they meant to keepe within their ſtrength, & reſoluing to force them out of it, rowed with his Gally cloſe aboord the ſhore and called vpon the Ionians (who more for feare then good will were encamped among the Perſians) exhorting them in the Greeke tongue to remember liberty, & vſe the faire occaſion which they now had to recouer it. Heerein he did imitate Themiſtocles, who had done the like at Eubœa; truſting that either theſe perſwaſions would preuail, or if the Perſians did happen to vnderſtand them, that it would breed ſome iealouſie in them, cauſing them to fight in feare of their owne companions. It need not ſeeme ſtrange, that this very same stratageme, which little or nothing auailed Themistocles, did now very happily succeede. For Xerxes being in his full strength, it was a matter of much difficultie, to perswade those Inhabitants of Asia to reuolt; who now, in his declining estate, gaue a willing eare to the sweet sound of libertie. The Persians likewise, who in their former braverie, little regarded and lesse feared any treason to be contriued by their subiects, were now so warie, that from the Samians which were amongst them, they tooke away their armes; the Milesians whom they did suspect, but would not seeme to mistrust, they placed farre from them, as it were for defence of the streight passages of Mycale; pretending that these Milesians did best of all others know those places. But these deuices little auailed them. For the Samians perceiuing that they were held as Traitors, took courage to in the heat of the fight, and laying hold vpon such weapons as came to hand, assailed the Persians manfully within the Campe; which example the Ionians presently followed, being very glad to haue found some that durst beginne. It is said that while the Greekes were yet in a march towards the Enemies campe, a rumour suddenly ranne in the Armie, that Mardonius was ouerthrowne in Greece, which (though perhaps it was giuen out by the Captaines to encourage the Souldiers) was very true. For the battaile of Platæa was fought in the morning, and this of Mycale in the euening of the same day.

The like report of that great battaile, wherein Paulus Æmylius ouerthrew Perseus the last king of Macedon, was brought to Rome in foure daies, as Liuie with others doe record. And Plutarch hath many other examples of this kinde. As that of the battaile by the Riuer Sagra in Italie, which was heard of the same day in Peloponnesus: That of the battell against the Tarquinians and the Latines, presently noysed at Rome: And (which is most remarkeable) the victory obtained against Lucius Antonius, who was Rebell to Domitian the Emperour. This Lucius Antonius being Lieutenant of the higher Germanie, had corrupted his Armie with gifts and promises, drawing the barbarous people to follow him, with great hope to make himselfe Emperour; which newes much troubling the Citie of Rome, with feare of a dangerous Warre; it was sodainly reported that Antonius was slaine, and his Armie defeated.

Hereupon many did offer sacrifice to the gods, and shew all manner of publique ioy, as in such cases was accustomed. But when better inquirie was made, and the Author of these tidings could not bee found; the Emperour Domitian betooke himselfe to his iourney against the Rebell; and beeing now with his Armie in march, hee receiued aduertisement by Poste, of the Victorie obtained, and the death of Antonius: whereupon remembring the rumour noised before in Rome, of the selfe-same victorie, hee found that the report and victory were borne vpon one day, though twentie thousand furlongs (which make about fiue and twenty hundred miles) a-sunder. It is truly said of Plutarch, that this last example giues credit vnto many the like. And indeed it were very strange, if among so many rumours, begotten by forgerie or mistakings, and fostered by credulous imagination, there should not bee found (as happens in dreames among many thousand vaine and friuolous) a few precisely true. Howbeit wee may finde, that God himselfe doth sometimes vse to terrifie those who presume vpon their owne strength, by these light meanes of tumultuous noyses; as hee raised the siege of Samaria, by causing a sound of Horses and Chariots to affright the Aramites; and as Esay c. 37. v. 7. hee threatned Senacherib, saying: Behold, I will send a blast vpon him, and hee shall heare a noyse, and returne to his owne Land. Wherefore it may well haue beene true, that God was pleased by such a meane as this, to animate the Greekes; who (as Herodotus notes) went towards the Enemies with heauy hearts, being in great feare, lest their owne aduenture should by no meanes fall out well; considering in what danger they had left their owne Countrie of Greece, which was ready to be subdued by Mardonius whilest they went wandring to seeke out enemies a-farre-off, vpon the coast of Asia. But the fame of the battaile fought at Platæa being noysed among them; euery man desired that his owne valor in the present fight, might be some helpe to work out the full deliuerance of Greece. In this alacritie of spirit, they diuided themselues into two Battalians, whereof the Athenians ledde the one, by the way of the plaine, directly towards the enemies campe; the Lacedæmonians conducted the other, by the Mountaines and streight passages, to winne the higher ground. The Athenians did first set vpon the Campe (ere the Lacedæmonians could arriue on the other part) and being desirous to get all the honor of the day to themſelues, did ſo forcibly aſſault it, that they brake way through the Paliſſadoes and Gabions, and made themſelues Maſters of the place, ſlaying all that could not ſaue themſelues by flight. In this fight the Samians did good ſeruice; as is formerly mentioned.

But the Mileſians, who vpon the like iealouſie, were placed by the Perſians on the tops of Mycale, to defend the paſſages, did now (as if they had been ſet of purpoſe to keep them from running away) put as many to the ſword as fell into their hands, letting none eſcape, except very few, that fled through by-pathes. The Lacedæmonians that day did little ſeruice, for the buſineſſe was diſpatched ere they came in: Onely they broke ſuch companies as retired in whole troopes; making them flie diſperſed in very much diſorder, whereby the Mileſians were enabled to doe the greater execution vpon them. This was the laſt fight of that huge Armie leauied againſt Greece, which was now vtterly broken, and had no meanes left to make offenſiue Warre.

§. XI.

Of the barbarous qualities of Xerxes: with a tranſition from the Perſian affaires to matters of Greece, which from this time grew more worthy of regard.

Xerxes lay at Sardis, not farre from the place of this battaile; but little minde had he to reuenge either this or other his great loſſes, being wholly giuen ouer to the loue of his Brothers Wife: with whom hee could not preuaile by intreatie, nor would obtaine his deſire by force, becauſe he reſpected much his Brother her husband, he thought it beſt to make a match betweene his owne Sonne Darius, and the Daughter of this Woman; hoping by that meanes to finde occaſion of ſuch familiaritie as might worke out his deſire. But whether it were ſo, that the chaſtity of the Mother did ſtill reiect him, or the beauty of her Daughter allure him; he ſoone after fell in loue with his owne Sonnes wife, being a vicious Prince, and as ill able to gouerne himſelfe in peace, as to guide his Armie in War. This yong Lady hauing once deſired the King to giue her the Garment which he then wore, being wrought by his owne Wife; cauſed the Queene thereby to perceiue her husbands conuerſation with her, which ſhe imputed not ſo much to the beauty of her Daughter-in-law, as to the cunning of the Mother, againſt whom thereupon ſhe conceiued extreame hatred. Therefore at a Royall feaſt, wherein the cuſtome was that the King ſhould grant their requeſt, ſhe craued that the Wife of Maſiſtes, her husbands brother, the yong Ladies Mother, might be giuen into her diſpoſition. The barbarous King, who might either haue reformed the abuſe of ſuch a cuſtome, or haue deluded the importunate cruelty of his Wife, by threatning her ſelfe with the like, to whatſoeuer ſhe ſhould inflict vpon the innocent Lady, granted the requeſt; and ſending for his brother, perſwaded him to put away the Wife which he had, and take one of his Daughters in her ſtead. Hereby it ſeemes, that he vnderſtood how villainouſly that poore Lady ſhould be intreated, whom he knew to be vertuous, and whom himſelfe had loued. Maſiſtes refuſed to put her away; alleadging his owne loue, her deſeruing, and their common Children, one of which was married to the Kings Sonne, as reaſons important to moue him to keepe her. But in moſt wicked manner Xerxes reuiled him; ſaying, That he now ſhould neither keepe the Wife which he had, nor haue his Daughter whom he had promiſed vnto him. Maſiſtes was much grieued with theſe words, but much more, when he returned home, he found his Wife moſt butcherly mangled by the Queene Ameſtris, who had cauſed her Noſe, Lips, Eares, and Tongue to be cut off, and her Breſts in like manner, which were caſt vnto Dogs. Maſiſtes enraged with this villany, took his way with his children, and ſome Friends, towards Bactria, of which Prouince he was Gouernor, intending to rebell & auenge himſelfe. But Xerxes vnderſtanding his purpoſe, cauſed an Armie to be leuied, which cut him off by the way, putting him and all his Companie to the ſword. Such was the Tyrannicall condition of the Perſian Gouernment; and ſuch are generally the effects of Luxury, when it is ioyned with abſolute power.

Yet of Xerxes it is noted, that he was a Prince of much vertue. And therefore Alexander the Great, finding an Image of his ouer-throwne, and lying vpon the ground, ſaid, That he doubted, whether in regard of his vertue, he ſhould againe erect it, or, for the the miſchiefe done by him to Greece, ſhould let it lye. But ſurely whatſoeuer his other good qualities were, he was fooliſh, and was a coward, and conſequently mercileſſe.

Therefore we may firmely beleeue, that the vertue of Cyrus was very great, vpon which the foundation of the Perſian Empire was ſo ſurely laid, that all the wickednesſe and vanities of Xerxes, and other worſe Princes, could not ouerthrow it, vntill it was broken by a vertue almoſt equall to that which did eſtabliſh it. In wars againſt the Aegyptians, the fortune of Xerxes did continue, as at the firſt it had beene very good; but againſt the generall eſtate of Greece, neither he, nor any of his poſterity, did euer make offenſiue warre, but receiued many loſſes in Aſia, to which the laſt at Mycale ſerued but as an introduction; teaching the Greekes, and eſpecially the Athenians, that the Perſian was no better Souldier at his owne dores, than in a forraine Countrie: whereof good triall was made forth-with, and much better proofe as ſoone as the affaires of Athens were quietly ſetled and aſſured.

From this time forward I will therefore purſue the Hiſtorie of Greece, taking in the matters of Perſia, as alſo the eſtate of other Countries, collaterally, when the order of time ſhall preſent them. True it is, that the Perſian eſtate continued in her greatneſſe, many ages following, in ſuch wiſe that the knowne parts of the World had no other Kingdome, repreſenting the Maieſtie of a great Empire.

But this greatneſſe depended onely vpon the riches and power that had formerly beene acquired, yeelding few actions or none that were worthy of remembrance, excepting ſome Tragedies of the Court, and examples of that exceſſiue Luxurie, where-with both it, and all, or the moſt of Empires that euer were, haue beene eneruated, made vnweildie, and (as it were) fattened for the hungry ſwords of poore and hardy Enemies. Hereby it came to paſſe, that Xerxes and his ſucceſſours were faine to defend their Crownes with money and baſe policies; very ſeldome or neuer (vnleſſe it were with great aduantage) daring to aduenture the triall of plaine battaile with that little Nation of Greece, which would ſoone haue ruined the foundations laid by Cyrus, had not priuate malice and ielouſie vrged euery Citie to enuie the height of her neighbours wals, and thereby diuerted the ſwords of the Greekes into their owne bowels, which after the departure of Xerxes began very well, and might better haue continued, to hew out the way of conqueſt, on the ſide of Aſia.

CHAP. VII.

Of things that paſſed in Greece from the end of the Perſian Warre, to the beginning of the Peloponneſian.

§. I.

How Athens was rebuilt and fortified.

AFter that the Medes and Perſians had receiued their laſt blow, and were vtterly beaten at Mycale: Leotychides, who then commanded the Gracian Armie, leauing the purſuit of the warre to the Athenians, aſſiſted by the reuolted Iones, returned with the Lacedæmonians and other Peloponneſians to Sparta and other places, out of which they had beene leauied. The Athenians in the meane while beſieged Seſtos, a Citie on the ſtrait of the Helleſpont, betweene which and Abydus, Xerxes had lately faſtned his Bridge of Boats: where the inhabitants, deſperate of ſuccour, did not long diſpute the defence thereof, but quitted it to the Greekes, who entertained themſelues the Winter following on that ſide the Helleſpont. In the Spring they drew homeward, and hauing left their wiues and children, ſince the inuaſion of Attica, and the abandoning of Athens, in diuers Iſlands, and at Troezen, they now found them out, and returned with them to their owne places.

And though the moſt part of all their houſes in Athens were burnt and broken downe, and

and the wals of the Citie ouer-turned, yet they resolued first on their common defence, and to fortifie their City, before they cared to couer themselues, their wiues and children, with any priuate buildings. Whereof the Lacedæmonians being aduertised, and misliking the fortifying of Athens, both in respect that their owne Citie of Sparta was vnwalled, as also because the Athenians were growne more powerfull by Sea, than either themselues, or any other State of Greece, they dispatched messengers to the Athenians to dissuade them; not acknowledging any priuate mislike or iealousie, but pretending, that if the Persians should returne to inuade Greece a third time, the Athenians being in no better state to defend themselues than heretofore, the same would serue to receiue their enemies, and to be made a Seate for the Warre, as Thebes had lately beene. To this the Athenians promised to giue them satisfaction by their own Embassadors very speedily. But being resolued to goe on with their workes by the aduice of Themistocles, they held the Lacedæmonians in hope of the contrary, till they had raised their wals to that height, as they cared not for their mislikes, nor doubted their disturbance; and therefore (to gaine time) they dispatched Themistocles towards Lacedæmon, giuing him for excuse, that hee could not deliuer the Athenians resolutions, till the arriuall of his fellow-Commissioners; who were of purpose retarded. But after a while, the Lacedæmonians expectation being conuerted into iealousie (for by the arriuall of diuers persons out of Attica, they were told for certaine, That the wals of Athens were speedily growne vp beyond expectation) Themistocles prayed them not to beleeue reports and vaine rumors, but that they would be pleased to send some of their owne trustie Citizens to Athens, from whose relation they might resolue themselues, and determine accordingly. Which request being granted, and Commissioners sent, Themistocles dispatched one of his owne, by whom he aduised the Athenians, first to entertaine the Lacedæmonians with some such discourse as might retaine them a few dayes, and in conclusion to hold them among them, till himselfe and the other Athenian Embassadours, then at Sparta, had their liberty also to returne. Which done, and being also assured by his associates and Aristides, that Athens was already defensible on all parts, Themistocles demanding audience, made the Lacedæmonians know, That it was true that the wals of Athens were now raised to that height, as the Athenians doubted not the defence of their Citie; praying the Lacedæmonians to beleeue, That whensoeuer it pleased them to treat with the Athenians, they would know them for such, as right well vnderstood what appertained to a Common-weale and their owne safety, without direction and aduice from any other: That they had in the warre of Xerxes abandoned their Citie, and committed themselues to the woodden wals of their shippes, from the resolution of their owne counsels and courage, and not thereto taught or perswaded by others: and finally, in all that perillous warre against the Persians they found their owne iudgements and the execution thereof in nothing inferior, or lesse fortunate, than that of any other Nation, State, or Commonweale among the Greekes; And therefore concluded, that they determined to be Masters and Iudges of their owne affaires, and thought it good reason, that either all the Cities confedered within Greece should be left open, or else that the wals of Athens should be finished and maintained.

The Lacedæmonians finding the time vnfit for quarrell, dissembled their mislike, both of the fortifying of Athens, and of the diuision, and so suffered the Athenians to depart, and receiued backe from them their owne Embassadors.

The wals of Athens finished, they also fortified the Port Pyreus, by which they might vnder couert imbarke themselues vpon all occasions.

§. II.

The beginning of the Athenian greatnesse, and prosperous warres made by that State vpon the Persian.

THe Athenians hauing setled things in good order at home, prepared thirty Gallies for the pursuit of the warre against the Persians, to which the Lacedæmonians added other twenty, and with this Fleet, strengthened by the rest of the Cities of Greece confederated, they set sayle for Cyprus, vnder the conduct of Pausanias the Lacedæmonian; where after their landing hauing possest themselues of many principall places, they imbarked the Armie againe, and tooke land in Thrace, recouering from the the Persians by force the Citie Bizantium, now Constantinople: from whence Pausanias, behauing himselfe more like a Tyrant than a Captaine, especially towards the Ionians lately reuolted from Xerxes, was called backe by the Councell of Lacedæmon, and not onely accused of many insolent behauiors, but of intelligence with the Medes, and Treason against his Countrey. In his stead they imployed Dorces, who either gaue the same cause of offence; or else the Athenians, who affected the first commandement in that warre, practised the souldiors to complaine; though indeede the wise and vertuous behauior of Aristides, Generall of the Athenian forces, a man of rare and incomparable sincerity, had beene able to make a good Commander seeme ill in comparison of himselfe; and therfore was much more auaileable, in rendring those detested, whose vices afforded little matter of excuse. Howsoeuer it were, the Lacedæmonians being no lesse wearied of the warre, than the Athenians were eagre to pursue it, the one obtained their ease, and the other the execution and honor which they desired: for all the Greekes (those of Peloponnesus excepted) willingly subiected themselues to the commandement of the Athenians, which was both the beginning of their greatnesse in that present age, and of their ruine in the next succeeding. For the charge of the warre being now committed vnto them, they began to rate the confederated Cities, they appointed receiuers and Treasurers, and began to leuie money, according to their discretion, for the maintenance of the generall defence of Greece, and for the recouering of those places on Europe side, in Asia the lesse, and the Islands, from the Persians. This tribute (the first that was euer payed by the Greekes) amounted to foure hundred and threescore Talents; which was raised easily by the honest care of that iust man Aristides, to whose discretion all the confederates referred themselues, and no one man found occasion to complaine of him. But as the vertue of Aristides, and other worthy Citizens, brought vnto the Athenians great commoditie; so the desire which they conceiued of encreasing their commoditie, corrupted their vertue, and robbing them of the generall loue, which had made them powerfull, abandoned their Citie to the defence of her treasure, which with her in the next age perished. For it was not long ere these foure hundred and threescore Talents were raysed to sixe hundred, nor long after that, ere their couetous Tyrannie had conuerted their followers into slaues, and extorted from them yeerely thirteene hundred Talents. The Isle of Delos was at the first appointed for the Treasure-house wherein these summes were layd vp, and where, at the generall Assembly, the Captaines of those forces, sent by the confederates, were for forme sake called to consultation. But the Athenians, who were stronger by sea than all Greece besides, had lockt vp the common treasure in an Island, vnder their owne protection, from whence they might transport it at their pleasure, as afterward they did.

The generall Commander in this Warre was Cimon, the sonne of Miltiades, who first tooke Eiona, vpon the Riuer Strimon; then the Isle of Sciros, inhabited by the Dolopes: they mastered the Caristij, & brought into seruitude the Naxij, contrary to the forme of the confederacy: So did the other the inhabitants of Greece, if at any time they failed of their contribution, or disobeyed their commandements; taking vpon them and vsurping a kinde of soueraigne authority ouer the rest: which they exercised the more assuredly, because they were now become Lords of the Sea, and could not be resisted. For many of the confederated Cities and Nations, wearie of the warre in their owne persons, and giuen vp altogether to their ease, made choise rather to pay their parts in money, than either in men of warre, or in ships; leauing the prouision of both to the Athenians. Hereby the one grew weake in all their Sea-defences, and in the exercise of the Warres; the other greatly strengthened their Nauie and their experiences, being alwayes armed and imployed in honourable Seruices, at the cost of those, who hauing lifted them into their Saddles, were now enforced to become their footmen. Yet was the Tribute-money, leuied vpon these their confederates, employed so well by the Athenians at the first (as ill proceedings are often founded vpon good beginnings) that no great cause of repining was giuen. For they rigged out a great Fleet of Gallies, very well manned, wherewith Cimon the Admirall scouring the Asiaticke Seas, tooke in the Citie of Phaselis; which hauing formerly pretended neutralitie, and refused to relieue, or any way assist the Greekes, were enforced to pay ten Talents for a fine, and so to become followers of the Athenians, paying yeerely contribution.

From thence he set sayle for the Riuer Eurymedon in Pamphylia, where the Persian Fleet

Fleet rode, being of fixe hundred ſayle, or (according to the moſt ſparing report) three hundred and fiftie, and hauing a great Land-Armie, encamped vpon the ſhoare; all which forces hauing beene prouided for aduancing the Kings affaires in Greece, were vtterly defeated in one day, and two hundred ſhips taken by the Athenians, the reſt being broken to pieces, or ſunke, ere euer they had ſwom in the Greekiſh Seas. Cimon hauing in one day obtained two great victories, the one by the Sea, and the other by Land, was very ſoone preſented with a third. For fourſcore ſayle of Phœnicians (who were the beſt of all Sea-men, vnder the Perſian command) thinking to haue ioyned themſelues with the Fleet before deſtroyed, arriued vpon the ſame Coaſt, ignorant of what had paſſed, and fearing nothing leſſe than what enſued. Vpon the firſt notice of their approach, Cimon weighed anchor, and meeting them at an head-Land, called Hydra, did ſo amaze them, that they onely ſought to run themſelues on ground; by which meane preſeruing few of their men, they loſt all their ſhips. Theſe loſſes did ſo breake the courage of the Perſian, that, omitting all hope of preuailing vpon Greece, he condeſcended to whatſoeuer Articles it pleaſed the Athenians to propound, granting liberty vnto all the Greekes inhabiting Aſia; and further couenanting, That none of his ſhips of War ſhould ſayle to the Weſtward of the Iſles, called Cyanea and Chelidonia.

This was the moſt honourable peace that euer the Greekes made; neither did they in effect, after this time, make any warre that redounded to the profit or glory of the whole Nation, till ſuch time as, vnder Alexander, they ouerthrew the Empire of Perſia, in which warre, few, or perhaps none of them, had any place of great command, but ſerued altogether vnder the Macedonians.

§. III.

The death of Xerxes by the treaſon of Artabanus.

BEſides theſe loſſes, which could not eaſily haue beene repaired, the troubles of the Empire were at this time ſuch, as gaue iuſt cauſe to the Perſian of ſeeking peace vpon any tearmes not altogether intolerable. For Artabanus, the vncle of Xerxes, perceiuing, that the King his maſter did eaſily take ſmall occaſions to ſhed the bloud of ſuch, as in kindred or place were neere vnto him, began to repoſe leſſe hope of a ſafetie in remaining faithfull, than of obtaining the Soueraignty, by deſtroying a Prince that was ſo hated for his cruelty, and deſpiſed for his cowardiſe and misfortunes. Hauing conceiued this Treaſon, he found meanes to execute it by Mithridates an Eunuch, in ſuch cloſe manner, that (as if he himſelfe had beene innocent) he accuſed Darius the ſonne of Xerxes, and cauſed him to ſuffer death as a Parricide. Whether it be true, that by this great wickedneſſe he got the Kingdome, and held it ſeauen moneths; or whether intending the like euill to Artaxerxes the ſonne of Xerxes, he was by him preuented and ſurpriſed, it were hard to affirme any certainty. But all Writers agree vpon this, That taken he was, and with his whole familie put to death by extreame torments, according to the ſentence, whereof the truth is more ancient than the Verſe:

Rarò antecedentem ſceleſtum
Deſeruit pede pœna claudo.

Seldome the villaine, though much haſte he make,
Lame-footed Vengeance failes to ouer-take.

§. IIII.

The baniſhment of Themiſtocles. His flight to Artaxerxes newly reigning in Perſia; & his death.

ARtaxerxes being eſtabliſhed in his Kingdome, and hauing ſo compounded with the Athenians, as the preſent neceſſity of his affaires required, began to conceiue new hopes of better fortune againſt the Greekes, than he or his predeceſſors had euer hitherto found. For the people of Athens, when the Perſians were chaſed out of Greece, did ſo highly value their owne merits in that ſeruice, that they not onely thought it fit for themſelues to become the Commanders ouer many Townes and Iſlands of the Greekes, but euen within their owne wals, they would admit none other forme of Gouernment than meerely Democraticall. Herein they were ſo inſolent, that no integritie nor good desert was able to preserue the estate of any such as had borne great office, longer than, by flattering the rascall multitude, he was contented to frame all his words and deeds to their good liking.

This their intolerable demeanour much offended Themistocles; who, though in former times he had layed the foundations of his greatnesse vpon popularitie, yet now presuming vpon his good seruices done to the State, he thought that with great reason they might grant him the liberty to checke their inordinate proceedings. But contrariwise, they were so highly offended with his often rehearsing the benefits which they had receiued from him, that they layed vpon him the punishment of Ostracisme, whereby he was banished for ten yeeres, as a man ouer-burthensome to the Common-wealth.

Before the time of his returne was halfe expired, a new accusation was brought against him by the Lacedæmonians, who charged him of consulting with Pausanias, about betraying the whole Countrey of Greece vnto Xerxes. Hereupon Themistocles finding no place of security against the malice of two such mighty Cities, was driuen, after many troublesome flights, and dangerous remouings, to aduenture himselfe into Persia; where he found Artaxerxes newly setled, & was by him very honourably entertained. But the great hope which Artaxerxes had conceiued of aduancing his affaires by the counsell and assistance of Themistocles, proued altogether fruitlesse. For when the Athenians, in fauour of Inarus the Lybian, (who infested Ægypt, causing it to rebell against the Persian) had sent a Fleet to Sea, landing an Armie in Ægypt, and scowring those Easterne Seas, to the great hinderance of Artaxerxes, and (for ought that I can vnderstand) to the manifest breach of that peace, which to their great honour they had concluded with Xerxes; then did the King send his Letters to Themistocles, requiring him to make good the hopes which he had giuen, of assuring the Persian estate against the Greekes.

But whether Themistocles perceiued much vnlikelinesse of good successe, in leading a great Armie of dastardly Persians against the warlike people of Greece; or else (as in fauour of his vertue it is more commonly reported) the loue of his Countrey would not permit him to seeke honour by the ruine of it: sure it is, that being appointed by Artaxerxes to vndertake the conduct of great forces against the Athenians, he decided the great conflict betweene thankfulnesse to his well-deseruing Prince, and naturall affection to his own ill-deseruing people, by finishing his life with a cup of poyson.

§. V.

How the Athenians, breaking the peace, which to their great honour they had made with the Persian, were shamefully beaten in Ægypt.

WHen was Artaxerxes driuen to vse the seruice of his owne Captaines in the Ægyptian warre, wherein it appeared well, That a iust cause is a good defence against a strong enemy. An Athenian Fleet of two hundred saile strong was sent forth vnder Cimon, to take in the Isle of Cyprus: which conquest seemed easie both to make and to maintaine, the Persian being vtterly broken at Sea, and thereby vnable to relieue the Island. Now although it were so, that a peace had beene concluded, which was likely to haue beene kept sincerely by the Persian, who had made so good proofe of the Græcian valour, that he was nothing desirous to build any ships of Warre (without which the Greekes could receiue no harme from him) whereof if any one should be found saying towards Greece, the peace was immediately broken, and if not, his whole estate; yet all the Sea-coast (no small part of his Dominions) exposed to the waste of an enemy too far ouermatching him. Yet whether the Athenians were in doubt, lest the league which in his own worser fortunes he had made with them, he would breake in theirs; and therefore sought to get such assurance into their hands, as might vtterly disable him from attempting ought against them; or whether the increase of their reuenues & power, by adding that rich and great Iland to their Empire, caused them to measure honour by profit; they thought it the wisest way, to take whilest they might, whatsoeuer they were able to get and hold, and be vnable to defend.

The Ile of Cyprus lying in the bottome of the streights betweene Cilicia, Syria and Ægypt, is very fitly seated for any Prince of State, that being mighty at Sea, doth either seeke to enrich himselfe by trade with those Countries, or to infest one or more of them them when they are his enemies. And this being the purpoſe of the Athenians, their Ambition which had already deuoured, in conceit, this Iland, was on the ſodaine well-nigh choaked with a greater morſell, to ſmatch at which, they let Cyprus alone, which they might eaſily haue ſwallowed and digeſted. For Inarus King of the Lybians confining Ægypt, hauing found how greatly the Countrey was exhauſted by the late warres, and how weakely defended by very ſlender Perſian Garriſons, conceiued rightly, that if ſuch ſmall forces as the Satrapa or Viceroy could make on the ſodaine of his owne Gardes, or leuie out of the ordinary Garriſons, were by him defeated; the naturals of the Countrey, not long ſince oppreſſed by Cambyſes, and after a reuolt very lately ſubdued by Xerxes, would ſoone breake faith with him who had no other title to that kingdome than a good ſword. Further, he perſwaded himſelfe that the people, vnable to defend themſelues againſt the Perſian without his aſſiſtance; would eaſily be drawne to accept him, the author of their deliuerance for King. Neither did this hope deceiue him. For hauing taken and cruelly ſlaine Achæmenes the Viceroy; diuers Cities forwith declared themſelues for him, and proclaiming him King, ſhewed the moſt of their endeuour for proſecution of the warre. But he conſidering his owne weakeneſſe, and that the meanes of the Ægyptians his adherents were not anſwerable to their deſires, perceiued well, that to reſiſt the power of Artaxerxes, farre greater forces than his and theirs were to be procured, at what price ſoeuer he obtained them. Therefore hearing of the great Athenian fleete, and knowing well the vertue of the Souldiers therein embarqued; he inuited the Commanders to ſhare with him the kingdome of Ægypt, as a farre greater reward of their aduenture, than ſuch an addition as that of Cyprus could be to their eſtate. Whether he or they (if things had wholly ſorted according to their expectation) would haue beene contented with an equall ſhare, and not haue fallen out in the partition, were perhaps a diuination vnneceſſary. He was poſſeſſed of the peoples loue, they were of moſt power. But the iſſue of thoſe affaires was ſuch as left them nothing to communicate but misfortunes, which they ſhared ſomewhat equally.

Yet had the beginnings of their enterpriſe very good and hopefull ſucceſſe: For they entred the Land as farre as to Memphis, the principall Citie; and of the Citie it ſelfe they tooke two parts: to the third part, which was called the White wall, they laid ſuch hard ſiege, that neither thoſe forces of the Perſians, which then were in Ægypt, were ſtrong enough to remoue them; neither could Artaxerxes well deuiſe what meanes to vſe for the recouery of that which was loſt, or for the preſeruation of the remainder. The beſt of his hope was by ſetting the Lacedæmonians vpon Athens, to enforce the Athenians to looke homewards to their owne defence. This was the firſt time that the Perſian ſought to procure the aſſiſtance of the Greekes one againſt the other, by ſtirring them vp with gold to the entertainement of priuate quarrels, for the good of their common enemy. To this purpoſe he ſent Megabazus to Sparta with much Treaſure; who, after great expence, finding that the Lacedæmonians were nothing forward in imploying their whole force againſt the Athenians, whom in many conflicts of great importance they had found to be their matches, notwithſtanding the abſence of their Armie in Ægypt; he thought it his wiſeſt way to imploy the reſt of his mony and meanes to their reliefe, who had now the ſpace of ſixe yeeres defended his maſters right in Ægypt. Therefore he haſtily diſpatched another of his name, the ſonne of Zopyrus, who arriuing in Ægypt, was firſt encountred by the reuolted people; ouer whom he obtained victory, which made him maſter of the Countrey, whileſt the Athenians lay buſied about Memphis the great Citie.

It cannot be doubted, that long abode in a ſtrange ayre, and want of ſupply, had much enfeebled the Athenians: ſure it is, that when Megabazus, hauing reduced the Countrey to obedience, attempted the Citie it ſelfe, whether his former ſucceſſe had amended the courage of the Perſians, or want of neceſſaries made the Athenians inferiour to themſelues; he chaſed them out of Memphis, and purſued them ſo neere, as they were forſt to fortifie themſelues in the Iſle of Proſopites, where Megabazus, after eighteene moneths ſiege, turning away one part of the Riuer by diuers Trenches, aſſaulted the Athenians without impediment of waters, tooke their Gallies, and put all to the ſword, ſaue a few that ſaued themſelues by flight into Lybia; the ſame entertainement had fiftie other Gallies which they ſent to the ſuccour of the firſt two hundred.

Proſopites an Hand between the Riuers of Taly & Pharmutiacus, two of the out-lets of Nilus, towards Alexandria.

hundred. For those Athenians hauing heard nothing that their Fleete and Armie was consumed, entred by the branch of Nilus, called Mendesium, and fell vnawares among the Phœnician Gallies and the Persian Armie; so as the Persians recouered all Ægypt, but that part held by Amyrteus, and Inarus the King of Lybia, being by them taken and hanged. This was the end of the Athenians sixe yeeres warre in Ægypt, and the reward of their vanitie and indiscretion to vndertake many enterprises at once.

Mendesius is an Island in the mouth of Nilus, between the out-let called Busiriticus and Diolcos. But the branch of Nilus, called Mendesium, runneth into the Sea by the Citie Panaphysis.

§. VI.

Of other Warres made by the Athienians for the most part with good successe, about the same time.

NOtwithstanding these ouerthrowes in Ægypt, yet the Athenians in their home warres waded through many difficulties, and held the reputation of their forces against the Lacedæmonians, Corinthians, and others, rather to their aduantage than otherwise. For as they were beaten neere vnto Halia by the Corinthians and Epidauriens, so they obtained two great victories soone after; the one ouer the Peloponnesians, neere vnto Cecryphalia; the other ouer the Æginets, neere vnto Ægina; where they sunke and carried away threescore and ten Gallies of their Enemies. Furthermore, they landed their forces on the suddaine, and besieged Ægina, from whence they could not be moued, notwithstanding that the Corinthians, to diuert them, inuaded Megara; where, after a great fight, with equall losse, the Corinthians, when they returned againe to set vp their Trophie, as Victors in the former battaile, were vtterly broken and slaughtered by the Athenian Garrisons and Megarians, to their great losse and dishonour.

Againe, as the Athenians were discomfited neere to Tanagra, by the Lacedæmonians, who returned from the succour of the Dorians against the Phocians (at which time the Thessalian horse-men turned from their Allies the Athenians, and fought against them) so about threescore dayes after, the Athenians entred Bœotia vnder the conduct of Myronides, where beating that Nation, they wan Phocis on the gulfe Oeteus, and euened the wals of Tanagra, to the ground. Finally, they enforced Ægina to render vpon most base conditions; as to beat downe the wals of their Citie, and to giue them hostages for Tribute; the siege whereof they had continued, notwithstanding all their other brabbles and attempts elsewhere. Besides these victories they sackt and spoiled many places vpon the Sea-coast of Peloponnesus, belonging to the Lacedæmonians; wan vpon the Corinthians, and ouerthrew the Sicyonians that came to their succour. These were the vndertakings of the Athenians, and their Allies, during the time of those sixe yeeres that a part of their forces made warre in Ægypt. In the end whereof they attempted Thessalie, perswaded thereunto by Orestes, but were resisted by the King Pharsalus, who had chased Orestes out of his Dominions. They also landed in Sicyonia, and had victory ouer those that resisted, after which they made truce with the Peloponnesians for fiue yeeres, and sent Cimon into Cyprus with two hundred ships; but they were againe allured by Amyrteus one of the race of their former Kings, who held the Marish and Wooddie parts of Ægypt from the Persians, to whom they sent sixtie of their ships. The rest of their Armie failing in their enterprise of Cyprus, and their fortunate and victorious Leader Cimon dying there, as they coasted the Iland, incountred a fleet of the Phœnicians and Cilicians, ouer both which Nations they returned victorious into Greece: as also those returned safe which were sent into Ægypt.

Of Artaxerxes Longimanus, that he was Ahashuerosh the husband of Queene Hester.

THese Ægyptian troubles being ended, the reigne of Artaxerxes continued peaceable, whereof the length is by some restrained into twenty yeeres, but the more and better Authors giue him fortie, some allow vnto him foure and forty. He

He was a Prince of much humanity, and noted for many examples of gentlenesse. His fauour was exceeding great to the Iewes, as appeareth by the Hiſtories of Eſdras and Nehemias, which fell in his time.

To proue that this was the King who gaue countenance and aide to that great worke of building the Temple, it were a needeleſſe trauaile; conſidering that all the late Diuines haue taken very much paine, to ſhew that thoſe two Prophets were licenſed by him, and ſuccoured in that building, in ſuch ſort as appeares in their writings.

This was likewiſe that King Ahaſhueroſh who married Heſter. Whereof if it be needefull to giue proofe, it may ſuffice; That Ahaſhueroſh liued in Suſa, reigning from India to Æthiopia, and therefore muſt haue beene a Perſian; That he liued in peace, as appeares by the circumſtances of the Hiſtorie, and vſed the counſaile of the ſeuen Princes, the authority of which Princes began vnder Darius, the ſonne of Hyſtaſpes; wherefore he could be neither Cyrus nor Cambyſes.

The continuall Warres which exerciſed King Darius the ſonne of Hyſtaſpes, together with the certainety of his marriages with ſundry wiue, from none of whom he was diuorced, but left his firſt wife Atoſſa, the daughter of Cyrus, aliue in great honour, ſhe being mother to Xerxes the ſucceeding King; doe manifeſtly prooue that Heſter was not his. Whereunto is added by Philo the Iew, That at the perſwaſion of Mardochæus, Ioiachim the high Prieſt the ſonne of Ieſua, cauſed the feaſt of Purim to be inſtituted in memory of that deliuerance. Now the time of Ioiachim was in the reigne of Artaxerxes, at the comming of Eſdras, and Nehemias: Ieſua his father dying about the end of Darius.

The ſame continuance of warres, with other his furious and tragicall loues, wherewith Xerxes did conſume ſuch little time, as he had free from warre, are enough to proue, that the ſtorie of Heſter pertained not vnto the time of Xerxes, who liued but one and twentie yeeres, whereas the two and thirtieth of Ahaſuerus or Artaſaſtha is expreſſed by Nehemias. Againe, it is well knowne, that Xerxes in the ſeauenth yeere of his reigne (wherein this marriage muſt haue beene celebrated) came not neere to Suſa. Of the Princes that ſucceeded Artaxerxes Longimanus, to proue that none of them could be Ahaſhueroſh, it is enough to ſay, that Mardochæus hauing beene carried from Hieruſalem captiue, with Iechonia, by Nebuchadnezzar, was vnlikely to haue liued vntill their times.

But of this Artaxerxes it is true, that he liued in Suſa, reigned from India to Æthiopia, liued in peace, was contemporarie with Ioiakim the high Prieſt: and further he had happily by his Lieutenants reclaimed the rebellious Ægyptians in that ſeauenth yeere of his reigne; which good fortune might well giue occaſion to ſuch a Royall feaſt, as is deſcribed in the beginning of Heſter. This is the ſumme of the arguments, brought to proue the age of Heſters ſtorie by the learned and diligent Krentzhemius, who addes the authorities of Ioſephus, affirming the ſame, and of Philo, giuing to Mardochæus eighteene yeeres more than Iſaac the Patriarch liued, namely, one hundred foureſcore and eighteene yeeres in all, which expire in the fiue and thirtieth yeere of this Artaxerxes, if we ſuppoſe him to haue beene carried away captiue, being a Boy of ten yeeres old.

§. VIII.

Of the troubles in Greece, foregoing the Peloponneſian Warre.

BVt it is fit that we now returne to the affaires of the Greekes, who from this time forward, more vehemently proſecuting their ciuill warres, ſuffered the Perſians for many ages to reſt in peace: this Ægyptian expedition being come to nought. Soone after this, the Lacedæmonians vndertooke the warre called, Sacred, recouered the Temple and Ile of Delphos, and deliuered both to the inhabitants; but the Athenians regained the ſame, and gaue it in charge to the Phocians. In the meane while the baniſhed Bœotians reentred their owne Land, and maſtred two of their owne Townes poſſeſt by the Athenians, which they ſoone recouered againe from them; but in their returne towards Athens, the Bœotians, Eubœans, and Locrians, (Nations oppreſt by the Athenians) ſet vpon them with ſuch reſolution, as the Athenians were in that fight all ſlaine or taken, wherby the Bœotians recouered their former liberty, restoring to the Athenians their prisoners. The Ilanders of Eubœa tooke such courage vpon this, that they reuolted wholly from the Athenians, whom when Pericles intended to reconquer, he was aduertised that the Megarians, (who first left the Lacedæmonians, & submitted themselues to Athens) being now weary of their yoke, had slaine the Athenians Garrisons, and ioyned themselues with the Corinthians, Sicyonians, & Epidaurians. These newes hastened Pericles homeward with all possible speede; but ere he could recouer Attica, the Peloponnesians, led by Plistoanax, the sonne of Pausanias, had inuaded it, pillaged, and burnt many parts thereof; after whose returne Pericles went on with his first intent and recouered Eubœa. Finally, the Athenians began to treat of peace with the Peloponnesians, and yeelded to deliuer vp all the places which they held in the Country of Peloponnesus: and this truce was made for thirty yeeres.

After sixe of these yeeres were expired, the Athenians (fauouring the Mylesians against the Samians) inuaded Samos by Pericles, and after many repulses, and some great losses, both by Sea and Land, the Citizens were forc't to yeelde themselues vpon most lamentable conditions; Namely, to deliuer vp all their ships, to breake downe their owne wals, to pay the charge of the war, and to restore whatsoeuer had beene taken by themselues, or by their practice, from the Athenians. In the necke of which followed that long and cruell Peloponnesian Warre, whereof I haue gathered this briefe following: the same contention taking beginning fiftie yeeres after the flight of Xerxes out of Greece. But because there was no Citie thereof, which either in the beginning of this warre, or in the continuance of it, was not drawne into the quarrell: I hold it conuenient now at the first to shew briefly the estate of the Countrie at that time, and especially the condition of those two great Cities, Athens and Sparta, vpon which all the rest had most dependance.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Peloponnesian Warre.

Vpon what tearmes the two principall Cities of Greece, Athens and Sparta, stood, at the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre.

GReece was neuer vnited vnder the gouernement of any one Prince or Estate, vntill Philip of Macedon, and after him Alexander, brought them rather to a Vnion and League against the Persian, whereof they were Captaines, than into any absolute subiection. For euery Estate held their owne, and were gouerned by Lawes farre different, and by their owne Magistrates, notwithstanding the power of the Macedonians, to whom they did yeelde obedience no otherwise than as to such, who were (perforce) their leaders in the Persian warre (deemed the Generall quarrell of Greece) and tooke the profit and honour of the victory, to their owne vse and increase of greatnesse. But the Kings which afterwards reigned in Macedonia, did so farre enlarge their authority, that all Greece was by them brought vnder such obedience, as differed little from seruitude; very few excepted, who could hardly, sometimes with armes, and sometimes with gifts, preserue their liberty; of whom the Lacedæmonians and Athenians were chiefe: which two people deserued best the plague of tyranny, hauing first giuen occasion thereunto, by their great ambition, which wearied and weakened all the Countrie by perpetuall Warre. For vntill these two Cities of Athens and Sparta distracted all Greece, drawing euery State into the quarrell, on the one or other side, and so gaue beginning to the Peloponnesian warre (the effects whereof in true estimation ceased not, before the time that Philip had ouer-mastred all, forasmuch as euery conclusion conclusion of one war afforded henceforth matter of some new distraction of the whole Countrie) the warres, commenced betweene one Citie of Greece and an other, were neither great, nor of long continuance. All controuersies were soone decided, either by the authority of the Amphictiones, who were the generall Councell of Greece; or by the power of the Lacedæmonians, whose aide was commonly held as good as the assurance of victorie.

These Lacedæmonians had liued about foure hundred yeeres vnder one forme of Gouernment, when the Pelaponnesian warre began. Their education was onely to practise feates of Armes; wherein they so excelled, that a very few of them were thought equall to very great numbers of any other people. They were poore, and cared not much for wealth; euery one had an equall portion of the common field, which sufficed to maintaine him in such manner as they vsed. For brauery they had none, and curious building or apparell they regarded not. Their diet was simple, their feasts and ordinary meales being in common Hals, where all fared alike. They vsed money of yron, whereof they could not be couetous nor great hoarders. Briefely, they liued Vtopian-like, saue that they vsed no other occupation than Warre, placing all their felicitie in the glory of their valour. Hereby it came to passe that in all enterprises, whereof they were partakers, the leading and high command was granted to them, and all Greece followed their conduct. But the Athenians were in all points contrary to this. For they sought wealth, and measured the honours of their victories by the profit; they vsed mercenarie Souldiers in their warres, and exacted great tribute of their Subiects, which were for the most part Ilanders, compelled to obey them, because the Athenian fleet was great.

As in forme of policy, and in course of life, so in conditions naturall, the difference betweene these two people was very much. The Athenians were eager and violent, suddaine in their conclusions, and as hastie in the execution: The Lacedæmonians very slow in their deliberations, full of grauitie, but very resolute, and such as would in cold bloud performe what the Athenians did vsually in flagrant. Whereby it came to passe, that the Lacedæmonians had all the Estates of Greece depending vpon them, as on men firme and assured, that sought honor & not riches; whereas the Athenians were followed by such as obeyed them perforce, being held in streight subiection. But the Signorie of the Athenians was nothing large, vntill such time as the Persian Xerxes had inuaded Greece, pretending onely a quarrell to Athens: For then the Citizens perceiuing well, that the Towne of Athens could not be defended against his great Armie of seuenteene hundred thousand men, bestowed all their wealth vpon a Nauie, & (assisted by the other Gracians) ouerthrew the fleet of Xerxes, whose Land-forces were soone after discomfited by them, and the Greekes, who all serued vnder conduct of the Spartans. After these victories, the Athenians being now very mighty in fleet, reduced all the Ilands of the Greekish Seas vnder their obedience; imposing vpon them a hard tribute, for maintenance (as they pretended) of warre against the Persian; though indeede they imployed their forces chiefly, to the conquest of such Ilands, and hauen-Townes, of their owne Countrimen, as stood out against them All which was easily suffered by the Lacedæmonians, who were In-landers, and men that delighted not in expeditions to be made farre from home. But afterwards perceiuing the power of the Athenians to grow great, they held them in much ielousie, and were very apt to quarrell with them; but much more willing to breed contention betweene them and other Estates. Wherefore at such time as the Thebans would haue oppressed the Plataans, when they of Platæa repaired to Sparta for succour, they found there no other aide, than this aduice, That they should seeke helpe at Athens. Hereby it was thought, that the Athenians should be intangled in a long and tedious Warre, with their neighbours of Thebes. But it proued otherwise; for their force was now so great, that all such occasions did onely serue to increase their honour and puissance.

§. II.

How Sparta and Athens entred into warre.

NEuertheless many Estates of Greece were very ill affected to Athens, because that Citie grew very insolent vpon suddaine prosperitie, and maintaining the weaker Townes against the stronger, incroached apace vpon their Neighbours, taking their dependants from them. Especially the Corinthians were much inraged, because the people of the Iland Corcyra, their Colonie which had rebelled against them, and giuen them a great ouerthrow by Sea, was by the Athenians (who desired to increase their fleet by adioyning that of Corcyra vnto it) taken into protection, and the Corinthians thereby impeached of that reuenge which else they would haue taken. Now howsoeuer it were so, that these dealings of the Athenians were not directly against the conditions of peace agreed vpon among the Greekes, yet were the complaints made at Sparta so vehement, that (though with much a-doe) they concluded to redresse by warre the iniuries done to their Allies.

First therefore seeking religious pretences, they required the Athenians to expiate certaine offences committed against the gods; whereto hauing for answere, That they themselues should expiate other the like offences, committed in Sparta; they began to deale plainly, and required that the people of some Townes, oppressed by the estate of Athens, should be set at liberty; and that a decree made against those of Megara, whereby they were forbidden to enter any Port of the Athenians, should be reuersed. This last point they so earnestly presse, that if they might obtaine it, they promised to absist from their purpose of making Warre.

This they desired, not as a matter of any great importance (for it was a trifle) but onely that by seeming to haue obtained somewhat, they might preserue their reputation without entring into a warre, which threatned them with greater difficulties apparent, than they were very willing to vnder-goe.

But the Athenians would yeelde to nothing; for it was their whole desire that all Greece should take notice, how farre they were from feare of any other Citie. Hereupon they prepared on both sides very strongly, all that was needefull to the Warre; wherein the Lacedæmonians were Superiour, both in number and quality, being assisted by most of the Cities in Greece; and hauing the generall fauour, as men that pretended to set at liberty such as were oppressed: but the Athenians did as farre exceede them in all prouisions of Money, Shipping, Engines, and absolute power of command among their Subiects; which they held; and afterward found of greater vse in such neede, than the willing readinesse of friends, who soone grow weary, and are not easily assembled.

§. III.

The beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre.

THe first and second yeeres expedition was very grieuous to the Citie of Athens. For the fields were wasted, the Trees cut downe; the Countrie people driuen to flye, with Wiues, Children, and Cattaile, into the Towne; whereby a most furious pestilence grew in the Citie, such as before they had neuer felt, nor heard of. Hereunto was added the reuolt of the Mytilenians, in the Ile of Lesbos, & the siege of Platea their confederated Citie, which they durst not aduenture to raise, besides some small ouerthrowes receiued. The Lacedæmonians assembling as great forces as they could raise out of Peloponnesus, did in the beginning of Summer enter the Countrie of Attica, and therein abide, vntill victuals began to faile, wasting and destroying all things round about: The Gouernours of the Athenians would not suffer the people to issue into the field against them; for they knew the valour of their Enemies; but vsed to send a fleet into Peloponnesus, which wasted as fast all the Sea-coast of their Enemies, whilest they were making warre in Attica. So the Peloponnesians being the stronger by Land, wan the Towne of Platea, which wanted rescue; the Athenians likewise being more mighty by Sea, did subdue Mytilene which had rebelled, but could not bee succoured from Sparta. By these proceedings in that warre, the Lacedæmonians beganne to perceiue how vnfit they were to deale with such enemies. For after that Attica was throughly wasted, it lay not greatly in their power to doe any offence equall to such harme as they themselues might, and did receiue. Their Confederates beganne to set forward very slowly in their expeditions into Attica; perceiuing well that Athens was plentifully relieued with all necessaries, which came by the Sea from the Ilands that were subiect vnto that Estate; and therefore these inuaders tooke but small pleasure in beholding the walls of that mightie Citie, or in wasting a forsaken field, which was to them a patterne of the calamities, with which their owne Territorie was the whilest afflicted. Wherefore they began began to set their care to build a strong Nauie, wherein they had little good successe, being easily vanquished by the Athenians, who both had more and better ships, and were so skilfull in Sea-fights, that a few Vessels of theirs durst vndertake a great number of the Peloponnesians.

§. IIII.

Of the great losse which the Spartans receiued at Pylus.

AMong other losses which the Spartans had felt by Sea, they receiued at Pylus a verie sore blow, that compelled them to sue for peace. A fleet of Athenian ships bound for Corcyra, wasting in that passage, as their manner was, the coast of Laconia, and all the halfe Ile of Peloponnesus, was by contrarie windes detained at Pylus; which is a ragged Promontorie, ioyning to the maine, by a strange necke of Land. Before it there lies a small barren Iland of lesse than two miles compasse, and within that a creeke, which is a good harbour for ships, the force of weather being borne off by the head-Land and Isle. This Promontorie the Athenians fortified, as well as in haste they might; and what was wanting in their artificiall fortification, was supplied by the naturall strength and site of the place. By holding this piece of ground, and hauen, they in reason expected many aduantages against their enemies. For the Countrie adioyning was inhabited by the Messenians, who in ancient times had held very strong and cruell warre with Sparta; and (though quite subdued) they were held in streight subiection, yet was not the olde hatred so extinguished, that by the neere neighbourhood and assistance of the Athenians, it might not be reuiued. Furthermore it was thought, that many ill-willers to the Lacedemonians, and as many of her bond-slaues as could escape from them, would repaire to Pylus, and from thence make daily excursions into Laconia, which was not farre off: Or if other hopes failed, yet would the benefit of this hauen, lying almost in the mid-way betweene them and Corcyra, make them able to sur-round all Peloponnesus, and waste it at their pleasure. The newes of these doings at Pylus drew the Peloponnesians thither in all haste out of Attica, which they had entred a few daies before with their whole Armie: but now they brought not onely their Land-forces, but all their Nauie, to recouer this peece, which how bad a neighbour it might proue in time, they well foresaw, little fearing the grieuous losse at hand, which they there in few daies receiued. For when they in vaine made a generall assault on all sides, both by Sea and Land; finding that small Garrison which the Athenians had left, very resolute in the defence: they occupied the hauen, placing foure hundred and twenty choice men all of them, Citizens of Sparta, in the Iland before mentioned, at each end whereof is a channell, that leades into the Port; but so narrow, that onely two ships in front could enter betweene the Isle and Pylus; likewise but seuen or eight shippes could enter at once by the further channell, betweene the Iland and the Maine. Hauing thus taken order to shut vp this new Towne by Sea, they sent part of their fleet to fetch wood, and other stuffe, wherewith to fortifie round about, and blocke vp the piece on all sides. But in the meane season, the Athenian fleet, hearing of their danger that were left at Pylus, returned thither, and with great courage entring the hauen, did breake and sinke many of their Enemies vessels; tooke fiue, and so inforced the residue to runne themselues a-ground.

Now was the Towne secure, and the Spartans abiding in the Iland as good as lost. Wherefore the Magistrates were sent from Sparta to the campe (as was their custome in great dangers) to aduise what were best for the publike safety; who when they did perceiue that there was no other way to rescue their Citizens out of the Isle, then by composition with their enemies, they agreed to entreat with the Athenians about peace, taking truce in the meane while with the Captaines at Pylus. The conditions of the truce were, That the Lacedemonians should deliuer vp all the ships which were in the coast, and that they should attempt nothing against the Town, nor the Athenians against the campe: That a certaine quantitie of Bread, Wine, and Flesh, should be daily carried into the Isle, but that no ships should passe into the Iland secretly: That the Athenians should carry the Lacedemonian Embassadors to Athens, there to treat of peace, and should bring them backe, at whose returne the truce should end, which if in the meane time it were broken in any one point, should be held vtterly void in all: That when the truce was expired, the Athenians should restore the Peloponnesian ships, in as good case as they receiued them. The Embassadors comming to Athens, were of opinion, that as they themselues had begun the warre, so might they end it when they pleased. Wherefore they told the Athenians how great an honour it was that the Lacedæmonians did sue to them for peace, aduising them to make an end of warre, whilest with such reputation they might. But they found all contrarie to their expectation: For in stead of concluding vpon euen termes, or desiring of meet recompence for losse sustained; the Athenians demanded certaine Cities to be restored to them, which had beene taken from them by the Lacedæmonians long before this warre beganne, refusing likewise to continue the treaty of peace, vnlesse the Spartans which were in the Isle, were first rendred vnto them as prisoners. Thus were the Embassadors returned without effect; at which time the truce being ended, it was desired from the Athenian Captaines, that they should, according to their couenant, restore the ships, which had beene put into their hands. Whereto answere was made, that the condition of the truce was, That if any one article were broken, all should be held void; now (said the Athenians) yee haue assaulted our Garrisons, and thereby are wee acquited of our promise to restore the ships. This and the like friuolous allegations which they made, were but meere shifts; yet profit so far ouer-weighed honour, that better answere none could be got. Then were the Lacedæmonians driuen to vse many hard meanes, for conueiance of victuals into the Isle; which finally was taken by force; and the men that were in it carried prisoners to Athens, where it was decreed that when the Peloponnesians next inuaded Attica, these prisoners should all be slaine. Whether fearing the death of these men, or with-held by the troubles, which (according to the Athenians hope) fell vpon them; the Lacedæmonians were so farre from wasting Attica, that they suffered their owne Countrie to be continually ouer-runne, both by the Athenians, who landed on all parts of their coast, and by those which issued out of Pylus; which became the Rendeuous of all that were ill-affected vnto them.

Athenians

§. V.

How the Lacedæmonians hardly, and to their great disaduantage, obtained a peace, that was not well kept.

THerefore they indeuoured greatly to obtain peace; which the Athenians would not harken vnto. For they were so puffed vp with continuance of good successe, that hauing sent a few bands of men into Sicilie, to hold vp a faction there, and make what profit they might of the Sicilians quarrels; when afterward they heard that the differences in that Isle were taken away, and their bands returned without eyther gaine or losse, they banished the Captaines, as if it had beene meerely through their default, that the Ile of Sicilie was not conquered; which (besides the longer distance) was in power to offend others, or defend it selfe, no whit inferiour vnto Peloponnesus. Yet was this their ouer-weening much abated shortly after, by some disasters receiued, especially in Thrace, where in a battaile which they lost at Amphipolis, Cleon and Brasidas, Generalls of the Athenian and Lacedæmonian forces, were both slaine; which two had most been aduersaries to the peace. As the Athenians by their losses were taught moderation; so the Lacedæmonians, who not onely felt the like wounds, but through the great Nauie which they had receiued at Pylus, were faine to proceed lamely in the warre, against such as, through commoditie of their good fleet, had all aduantage that could be found in expedition, were feruently desirous to conclude the businesse, ere Fortune by any new fauour should reuiue the insolence, which was at this time well mortified in their Enemies. Neither was it onely a consideration of their present estate, that vrged them to bring the treaty of peace to a good and speedy effect; but other dangers hanging ouer their heads, and ready to fall on them, which vnlesse they compounded with the Athenians, they knew not how to auoid. The estate of Argos, which had ancient enmity with them, was now, after a truce of thirty yeeres well-nigh expired, ready to take the benefit of their present troubles, by ioyning with those who alone found them worke enough. Argos was a rich and strong Citie, which though inferiour to Sparta in valour, yet was not so vnwarlike, nor held such ill correspondence with the neighbouring Estates, that the Lacedæmonians could euer farre preuaile vpon it, when they had little else to doe.

This

This was a thing that in the beginning of this Warre had not beene regarded. For it was then thought, that by waſting the Territorie of Athens with ſword and fire, the quarrell ſhould eaſily and in ſhort time haue beene ended, whereby not onely the Athenians ſhould haue beene brought to good order, but the Corinthians and others, for whoſe ſake the war was vnder-taken, haue been ſo firmly knit to the Lacedæmonians, that they ſhould for loue of them haue abandoned the Argiues, to their own fortunes. But now the vanity of thoſe hopes appeared, in that the Athenians abounding in ready mony, and meanes to raiſe more, were able to ſecure themſelues by a ſtrong fleet from any great harme, thas the Peloponneſians wanting wherewith to maintaine a Nauie, could doe vnto them; yea as Maſters of the Sea, to weary them out, as in effect already they had done. As for the Confederates of Sparta, they could now endure neither warre nor peace; their daily trauailes, and many loſſes had ſo wearied and incenſed them. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians were glad to vſe the occaſion, which the inclination of their enemies did then afford, of making a finall peace, which with much adoe they procured, as ſeemed equall and eaſie; but was indeed impoſſible to be performed, and therefore all their trauaile was little effectuall.

The reſtitution of priſoners and places taken being agreed vpon; it fell out by lot, that the Lacedæmonians ſhould reſtore firſt. Theſe had wonne more townes vpon the continent from the Athenians, than the Athenians had from them; but what they had wonne, they had not wonne abſolutely. For they had reſtored ſome Townes to ſuch of their Allies, from whom the State of Athens had taken them; ſome, and thoſe the moſt, they had ſet at liberty (as reaſon required) which had opened their gates vnto them, as to their friends and deliuerers, and not compelled them to breake in as Enemies. Now concerning the Townes which were not in their owne hands, but had beene rendred vnto their Confederates, the Spartans found meanes to giue ſome ſatisfaction, by permitting the Athenians to retaine others, which they had gotten in the Warre; as for the reſt, they promiſed more then afterwards they could performe. The Cities which they had taken into protection, could not endure to heare of being abandoned, neither would they by any meanes yeeld themſelues into the hands of their old Lords the Athenians, whom they had offended by reuolting, notwithſtanding whatſoeuer articles were drawne, and concluded, for their ſecuritie, and betterance in time to come. This dull performance of conditions on the ſide of the Spartans, made the Athenians become as backeward in doing thoſe things which on their part were required; ſo that reſtoring onely the priſoners which they had, they deferred the reſt, vntill ſuch time as they might receiue the full ſatisfaction, according to the agreement. But before ſuch time as theſe difficulties brake out into matter of open quarrell, the Lacedæmonians entred into a more ſtreight alliance with the Athenians; making a league offenſiue and defenſiue with them. Heereunto they were moued by the backwardneſſe of the Argiues, who being (as they thought) likely to haue ſued for peace at their hands, as ſoone as things were once compounded betweene Athens and Sparta; did ſhew themſelues plainely vnwilling to giue eare to any ſuch motion. Thinking therefore, that by cutting from Argos all hope of Athenian ſuccour, they ſhould make ſure worke, the Spartans regarded not the affections of other States, whom they had either bound vnto them by well-deſeruing in the late warre, or found ſo troubleſome, that their enmitie (if perhaps they durſt let it appeare) was little worſe than friendſhip. It bred great iealouſie in all the Cities of Greece, to perceiue ſuch a coniunction between two ſo powerfull Signiories: eſpecially one clauſe threatning euery one, that was any thing apt to feare, with a ſecret intent that might be harboured in their proud conceits, of ſubduing the whole Countrie, and taking each what they could lay hold on. For beſides the other articles, it was agreed, That they might by mutuall conſent adde new conditions, or alter the old at their owne pleaſures. This impreſſion wrought ſo ſtrongly in the Corinthians, Thebanes, and other ancient Confederates of Sparta, that the hate which they had borne to the Athenians their profeſſed enemies, was violently thrown vpon the Lacedæmonians their vniuſt friends: whereby it came to paſſe, that they who had lately borne chiefe ſway in Greece, might haue beene abandoned to the diſcretion of their Enemies, as already in effect they were, had the Enemies wiſely vſed the aduantage.

§. VI.

Of the negotiations, and practices, held betweene many States of Greece, by occasion of the peace that was concluded.

THe admiration wherein all Greece held the valour of Sparta as vnresistable, and able to make way through all impediments, had been so excessiue, that when by some sinister accidents, that City was compelled to take and seeke peace, vpon termes not sounding very honourable, this common opinion was not onely abated, but (as happens vsually in things extreame) was changed into much contempt. For it was neuer thought that any Lacedæmonian would haue endured to lay downe his weapons, and yeeld himselfe prisoner, nor that any misfortune should haue beene so great, as should haue drawne that Citie to relieue it selfe otherwise then by force of Armes. But when once it had appeared that many of their Citizens, among whom were some of especiall marke, being ouer-laied by enemies, in the Iland before Pylus, had rather chosen to liue in captiuitie, than to die in fight; and that Pylus it selfe, sticking as a thorne in the foot of Laconia, had bred such anguish in that Estate, as vtterly wearying the accustomed Spartan resolution, had made it sit downe, and seeke to refresh it selfe by dishonourable ease: then did not onely the Corinthians and Thebans begin to conceiue basely of those men which were vertuous, though vnfortunate; but other lesser Cities ioyning with these in the same opinion, did cast their eies vpon the rich and great Citie of Argos, of whose abilitie, to do much, they conceiued a strong beleefe, because of long time it had done nothing. Such is the base condition, which through foolish enuie is become almost naturall in the greater part of mankinde. We curiously search into their vices, in whom, had they kept some distance, we should haue discerned only the vertues; and comparing iniuriously our best parts with their worst, are iustly plagued with a false opinion of that good in strangers which we know to be wanting in our selues.

The first that published their dislike of Sparta were the Corinthians, at whose vehement entreaty (though moued rather by enuy at the greatnesse of Athens daily encreasing) the Lacedæmonians had entred into the present Warre. But these Corinthians did onely murmure at the peace, alleadging as grieuances, that some townes of theirs were left in the Athenians hands. The Mantineans, who during the time of Warre, had procured some part of the Arcadians to become their followers, and forsake their dependency vpon the State of Sparta, did more freely and readily discouer themselues; feare of reuenge to come, working more effectually, than indignation at things already past. The Argiues feeling the gale of prosperous Fortune that began to fill their sailes, prepared themselues to take as much of it as they could stand vnder; giuing for that purpose vnto twelue of their Citizens, a full & absolute commission to make alliance between them & any free Cities of Greece (Athens and Sparta excepted) without any further trouble of propounding euery particular businesse to the multiude. When the gates of Argos were set thus open to all commers; the Mantineans began to leade the way, and many Cities of Peloponnesus following them entred into this new confederacy; some incited by priuate respects, others thinking it the wisest way to doe as the most did. What inconuenience might arise vnto them by these courses, the Lacedæmonians easily discerned, and therefore sent Embassadors to stop the matter at Corinth, where they well perceiued that the mischiefe had beene hatched. These Embassadors found in the Corinthians a very rough disposition, with a grauity expressing the opinion which they had conceiued of their present aduantage ouer Sparta. They had caused all Cities which had not entred yet into alliance with Argos, to send their Agents to them, in whose presence they gaue audience to the Lacedæmonians; the purport of whose Embassie was this: That the Corinthians, without breach of their oath, could not forsake the alliance, which they had long since made with Sparta; and that reason did as well binde them to hold themselues contented with the peace lately made, as religion enforced them to continue in their ancient confederacy, forasmuch as it had been agreed between the Spartans and their associates, that the consent of the greater part, (which had yeelded vnto peace with Athens) should binde the lesser number to performe what was concluded, if no Diuine impediment withstood them. Hereunto the Corinthians made answere, that the Spartans had first begun to doe them open wrong, in concluding the warre wherein they had lost many places, without prouision of restitution; and that the very clause, alledged by the Embassadors, did acquite them from any necessity of subscribing to the late peace, forasmuch as they had sworn vnto those people whom they perswaded to rebell against Athens, that they would neuer abandon them, nor willingly suffer them to fall againe into the tyrannous hands of the Athenians. Wherefore they held themselues bound both in reason & religion to vse all meanes of vpholding those, whom by common consent they had taken into protection; for that an oath was no lesse to be accounted a Diuine impediment, than were pestilence, tempest, or any the like accident, hindering the performance of things vndertaken. As for the alliance with Argos, they said that they would doe as they should finde cause. Hauing dismissed the Embassadors with this answere, they made haste to ioyne themselues with Argos, and caused other States to doe the like; so that Sparta & Athens were in a manner left to themselues, the Thebanes and Megarians being also vpon the point to haue entred into this new confederacie. But as the affections were diuers, which caused this hastie confluence of sudden friends to Argos, it so likewise came to passe that the friendship it selfe, such as it was, had much diuersitie both of sinceritie and of continuance. For some there were that hated or feared the Lacedæmonians: as the Mantineans and Eleans: these did firmely betake themselues to the Argiues, in whom they knew the same affection to be inueterate; others did onely hate the peace concluded; and these would rather haue followed the Spartans than the Argiues in war, yet rather the Argiues in war than the Lacedæmonians in peace. Of this number were the Corinthians, who knowing that the Thebans were affected like vnto themselues, dealt with them to enter into the societie of the Argiues, as they had done: but the different formes of gouernment, vsed in Thebes and Argos, caused the Thebans to hold rather with Sparta, that was ruled by the principall men, than to incurre the danger of innouation, by joyning with such as committed the whole rule to the multitude.

This businesse hauing ill succeeded, the Corinthians began to bethinke themselues of their owne danger, who had not so much as any truce with Athens, and yet were vnprepared for warre. They sought therefore to come to some temporary agreement with the Athenians, and hardly obtained it. For the Athenians, who had dealt with all Greece at one time, did not greatly care to come to any appointment with one Citie that had shewed against them more stomacke then force; but gaue them to vnderstand that they might be safe enough from them, if they would claime the benefit of that alliance, which Athens had lately made with Sparta & her dependants, yet finally they granted vnto these Corinthians (which were loth to acknowledge themselues dependants of Sparta) the truce that they desired; but into priuate confederacie they would not admit them, it being an article of the league between them and the Spartans, That the one should not make peace nor warre without the other.

Herein, as in many other passages, may cleerely be seene the great aduantage which absolute Lords haue as well in peace as in warre, ouer such as are serued by voluntaries. We shall hardly finde any Signiorie, that hath beene so constantly followed as Sparta was by so many States, and some of them little inferiour to it selfe, being all as free: whereas contrariwise, the Athenians had lately, and by compulsiue meanes gotten their Dominion, wherein they demeaned themselues as Tyrants. But in performance of conditions agreed vpon, the Athenians were able to make their words good, by excluding any State out of their Confederacie, and giuing vp such places as were agreed vpon: of which the Lacedæmonians could doe neither the one nor the other. For such Townes as their old Allies had gotten by their meanes in the late warre, could not be restored without their consent, which had them in present possession; and particularly the Towne of Panacte, which the Thebans held, could by no meanes be obtained from them by the Lacedæmonians (who earnestly desired it, that by restitution thereof vnto the Athenians, as earnestly demanding it, themselues might recouer Pylus) vnlesse that they would agree to make a priuate alliance with Thebes; which thereupon they were constrained to doe, though knowing it to bee contrarie to the last agreement betweene them and Athens.

The Lacedæmonians hauing broken one article of the league made betweene them and the Athenians, that by so doing they might enable themselues to the performance of another, were shamefully disappointed of their hopes by the Thebanes, who did not giue vp the Towne of Panacte, till first they had vtterly demolished it, and made it of no worth to the Athenians. This was sought to haue beene excused by the Lacedæmonian Embassadours, who comming to Athens (whither they had sent home all prisoners that had been detained at Thebes) hoping with gentle words to salue the matter; saying, That from henceforth no enemie to Athens should nestle in Panacte, for it was destroyed. But these Embassadors had not to deale with tame fooles. For the Athenians told them in plaine termes, That of three principall conditions agreed vpon in their late League, they had not performed any one, but vsed such base collusion as stood not with their honour: hauing made priuate alliance with the Thebanes; hauing destroyed a Towne that they should haue restored; and not hauing forced their dependants by Warre, to make good the Couenants of the late concluded peace. Hereupon they dismissed the Embassadors with rough words, meaning with as rough deeds to anger those that sent them.

There were at that time, both in Athens and Sparta, many that were ill-contented with the peace: among whom were the Ephori, chosen for that yere, in Sparta; and Alcibiades a powerfull yong Gentleman in Athens. But the Ephori, though desiring to renew the warre, yet wished that first they might get from the Athenians as much as was to be rendred to them by Couenant, especially Pylus that had so sorely troubled them. Alcibiades, whose Nobilitie, riches, & fauor, with the people, made him desire warre, as the meanes, whereby himselfe might procure some honourable employment; vsed all meanes to set the quarrell on foot, whilest the Athenians had yet both aduantage enough, as not hauing rendred ought saue their prisoners, and pretence enough to vse that aduantage of breaking the peace, by reason that the Lacedæmonians (though indeed against their wills) had broken all couenants with them. Now the State of Athens had fully determined to retain Pylus, and to performe nothing that the Lacedæmonians should, and might require, vntill they had first, without any longer halting, fulfilled all articles whereto they were bound, euen to the vtmost point. This was enough to make them sweat, who hauing already done the most that they could, had as yet got nothing in recompence, except the deliuery of their Citizens, which were prisoners. But Alcibiades wishing a speedy beginning of open warre, sent priuily to the Argiues, and gaue them to vnderstand how fitly the time serued for them to associate themselues with Athens, which was enough to giue them securitie against all enemies.

The Argiues vpon the first confluence of many Estates vnto their societie, had embraced great hopes of working wonders, as if they should haue had the conduct of all Greece against the Athenians, robbing Sparta of that honour, as hauing ill vsed it, and thereby leauing their old enemies in case of much contempt and disabilitie. But these suddain apprehensions of vaine ioy, were suddainly changed into as vaine feare; which ill agreed with the great opinion that had lately beene conceiued of Argos. For when the Thebans had refused their alliance; when the Corinthians had sought securitie from Athens; and when a false rumour was noysed abroad, Athens, Thebes, and Sparta, were come to a full agreement vpon all points of difference; then began the Argiues to let fall their crests, and sue for peace vnto the Lacedæmonians, who needing it as much as they, or more, yet held their grauity, and were not ouer-hastie to accept it. At this time, and in this perturbation, the message of Alcibiades came very welcome to the Argiues, which were not now consulting how to become the chiefe of all others, but how to saue themselues. Wherefore they sent away presently to Athens, their owne Embassadours, accompanied with the Mantineans and Eleans, to make a league offensiue, and defensiue, betweene their Estates and the Athenians.

Of this businesse the Lacedæmonians knew not what to thinke: for well they saw, that such a combination tended to their great hurt, and therefore were desirous to preuent it; but to keepe the loue of the Athenians, the new Ephori thought that more was alreadie done, than stood with their honour, or profit; others held it the wisest way, hauing done so much, not to sticke vpon a little more, but rather by giuing full satisfaction, to retaine the friendship of that State, which was more to be valued then all the rest of Greece. This resolution preuailing, they sent away such of their Citizens as were best affected to the peace, who comming to Athens, with full commission to make an end of all controuersies, did earnestly labour in the Councell-house, to make the truth of things appeare, saying; that their Confederacie with the Thebanes had tended to none other end than the recouery of Panacte: concerning which Towne, or any other businesse, that it much grieued ued the Lacedæmonians, to see things fall out in such wise as might giue to the Athenians cause of displeasure; but that all should be done which in reason might be required for making matters euen betweene them; to which purpose they shewed that themselues had absolute commission. Wherefore they desired that Pylus might be restored to them, and especially for the present, that the negotiation with the Argiues might be called aside. Fauourable audience was giuen to this proposition, the rather because they which promised amends, had power to make their words good. But all this faire likelihood of good agreement was dasht on the suddaine, by the practice of Alcibiades, who, secretlie dealing with the Lacedæmonian Embassadors, perswaded them well of his friendship towards their Citie, and aduised them to take all care that their absolute power to conclude what they pleased in the name of Sparta, might not be knowne to the Comminalty of Athens, least the insolent multitude should thereupon grow peremptorie and yeeld to nothing, vnlesse they could draw them to vnreasonable conditions. The Embassadors beleeued him, and fashioned their tale in the assembly of the people, as he had aduised them. Hereupon the same Alcibiades taking presently the aduantage, which their double dealing afforded, inueighed openly against them, as men of no sinceritie, that were come to Athens for no other purpose, than to hinder the people from strengthning themselues with friends, meaning to draw the Argiues and their Adherents to their owne alliance, as (contrary to their owne Oath) already they had the Thebanes. The people of Athens, whom a pleasing errand would very hardly haue satisfied, or brought into a good opinion of the Lacedæmonians, (whose honest meanings had so ill beene seconded with good performance) were now so much incensed with the double dealing of the Embassadours, and the strong perswasions of Alcibiades, that little wanted of concluding the league with Argos. Yet for the present so farre did Nicias, an honourable Citizen, and great friend to the peace, preuaile with them, that the businesse was put off, vntill hee himselfe with other Embassadors might fetch a better answere from Sparta.

It may also seeme a great wonder, how so poore a tricke of Alcibiades was able to carrie a matter of so great importance, when the Spartan Embassadours might haue cast the loade vpon his owne shoulders, by discouering the truth: But the grauitie which was vsually found in the Lacedæmonians, hindred them (perhaps) from playing their game handsomely against so nimble a witte; and they might well haue been thought vntrusty men, had they professed themselues such as would say and vn-say for their most aduantage.

Nicias and his Companions had a sowre message to deliuer at Sparta, being peremptorily to require performance of all conditions, and among the rest, that the Lacedæmonians should take the paines to rebuild Panactæ, and should immediately renounce their Alliance made with the Thebanes; letting them vnderstand that otherwise the Athenians, without further delay, would enter into confederacie with the Argiues, and their adherents. The Ephori at Sparta had no minde to forsake the Thebanes, assured friends to their State; but wrought so hard, that the anger of the Athenians was suffered to breake out what way it could, which to mitigate, they would doe no more, than onely (at the request of Nicias their honourable friend, who would not seeme to haue effected nothing) sweare a-new to keepe the Articles of the league betweene him and Athens. Immediately therefore vpon returne of the Embassadours, a new league was made betweene the Athenians, Argiues, Mantineans, and Eleans, with very ample prouision for holding the same common friends and enemies; wherein, though the Lacedæmonians were passed ouer with silence, yet was it manifest that the whole intent of this confederacy did bend it selfe chiefly against them, as in short while after was proued by effect.

At this time the Lacedæmonians were in ill case, who hauing restored all that they could vnto the Athenians, and procured others to doe the like, had themselues recouered nothing of their owne (prisoners excepted) for default of restoring all that they should. But that which did most of all disable them, was the losse of reputation, which they had not more impaired in the late Warre by misfortunes, than in sundrie passages betweene them and the Athenians: to procure and keepe whose Amitie, they had left sundrie of their olde friends to shift for themselues. Contrariwise the Athenians, by the treatie of peace, had recouered the most part of that which they lost in warre, all their gettings they had retained; and were strengthened by the accesse of new Confederates.

How the peace betweene Athens and Sparta was ill kept, though not openly broken.

IT was not long ere the Argiues and their fellowes had found businesse wherewith to set the Athenians on worke, and make vse of this coniunction. For presuming vpon the strength of their side, they began to meddle with the Epidaurians, whom it concerned the State of Sparta to defend. So, many acts of hostilite were committed, wherein Athens and Sparta did (as principals) infest each the other, but came in collaterally, as to the aid of their seuerall friends.

By these occasions the Corinthians, Baotians, Phocians, Locrians, and other people of Greece, began a-new to range themselues vnder the Lacedæmonians, and follow their ensignes. One victorie which the Lacedæmonians obtained by their meere valour in a set battaile, neere to Mantinea, against the Argiue-side, helped well to repaire their decaied reputation, though otherwise it yeelded them no great profit. The ciuill dissension arising shortly after within Argos it selfe, betweene the principall Citizens and the Commons, had almost throwne downe the whole frame of the new combination. For the chiefe Citizens getting the vpper hand, made a league with Sparta, wherein they proceeded so farre as to renounce the amity of the Athenians in expresse words, and forced the Mantineans to the like. But in short space of time the multitude preuailing, reuersed all this, and hauing chased away their ambitious Nobilitie, applied themselues to the Athenians as closely as before.

Beside these vproares in Peloponnesus, many assaies were made to raise vp troubles in all parts of Greece, and likewise in Macedon, to the Athenians; whose forces and readines for execution, preuented some things, reuenged other, and requited all with some prosperous attempts. Finally, the Athenians wanting matter of quarrell; and the Lacedæmonians growing wearie, they began to be quiet, retaining still that enmitie in their hearts, which they had sufficiently discouered in effects, though not yet breaking out into termes of open warre.

§. VIII.

The Athenians sending two Fleetes to sacke Siracuse, are put to flight, and vtterly discomfited.

DVring this intermission of open warre, the Athenians re-entertained their hopes of subduing Sicil, whither they sent a fleet so mighty as neuer was set forth by Greece in any Age before or after.

This fleet was very well manned, and furnished with all necessaries to so great an expedition. All which came to nought; partly by the factions in Athens, whence Alcibiades Author of that voyage, and one of the Generalls of their fleet, was driuen to banish himselfe, for feare of such iudgement, as else he was like to haue vndergone, among the incensed people; partly by the inuasion which the Lacedæmonians made vpon Attica, whilest the forces of that State were so farre from home. Hereunto was added the aid of the King of Persia, who supplied the Peloponnesians with money.

Neyther was the successe of things in Sicilia such, as without helpe from Athens, could giue any likelihood of a good end in that warre. For although in the beginning, the enterprise had so well succeeded, that they besieged Siracuse, the chiefe Citie of all the Iland, and one of the faireſt Townes which the Greekes inhabited, obtayning the better in sundry battailes by Land and Sea; yet when the Towne was relieued with strong aide from Peloponnesus, it came to passe that the Athenians were put to the worse on all sides, in such wise that their fleet was shut vp into the hauen of Siracuse, and could not issue out.

As the Athenian affairs went very ill in Sicil, so did they at home stand vpon hard terms, for that the Lacedæmonians, who had beene formerly accustomed to make wearisome yeerely iournies into Attica, which hauing pilled and forraged, they returned home; did now by counsell of Alcibiades, (who seeking reuenge vpon his owne Citizens was fled vnto them) fortifie the Towne of Decelea, which was neere to Athens, whence they ceased not with daily excursions to harrie all the Countrie round about, and sometimes giue alarme vnto the Citie it selfe. In these extremities, the peruerse obstinacie of the Athenians was very strange; who leauing at their backes, and at their owne dores, an enemie little lesse mighty than themselues, did yet send forth another fleet into Sicil, in inuade a people no lesse puissant, which had neuer offended them.

It often happens, that prosperous euent makes foolish counsaile seem wiser than it was; which came to passe many times among the Athenians, whose vaine conceits Pallas was said to turne vnto the best. But where vnsound aduice, finding badde proofe, is obstinately pursued, neither Pallas nor Fortune can be iustly blamed for a miserable issue. This second fleet of the Athenians, which better might haue serued to conuey home the former that was defeated; after some attempts made to small purpose against the Siracusans, was finally (together with the other part of the Nauie, which was there before) quite vanquished, and bard vp into the hauen of Siracuse, wherby the campe of the Athenians, vtterly depriued of all benefit by Sea, either for succour or departure, was driuen to breake vp, and flie away by Land; in which flight they were ouer-taken, routed, and quite ouerthrown in such wise that scarce any man escaped.

This mischiefe well deserued fell vpon the Athenians, who had wickedly condemned into exile Sophocles and Pthiodorus Generalls, formerly sent into that Ile, pretending that they had taken mony for making peace in Sicil, whereas indeed there was not any meanes or possibilitie to haue made warre. Heereby it came to passe, that Nicias, who had the chiefe command in this vnhappie enterprise, did rather choose to hazard the ruine of his Countrie by the losse of that Armie, wherein consisted little lesse then all the power of Athens; than to aduenture his owne estate, his life, and his honour vpon the tongues of shamelesse accusers, and the sentence of Iudges before his triall resolued to condemne him, by retiring from Syracuse, when wisdome and necessitie required it. For (said hee) they shall giue sentence vpon vs, who know not the reason of our doings, nor would giue eare to any that would speake in our behalfe, but altogether harken to suspicious and vaine rumors that shall be brought against vs; yea these our Souldiers who now are so desirous to returne in safetie, will in our danger be well contented to frame their tales to the pleasure of the lewd and insolent multitude.

This resolution of Nicias, though it cannot be commended (for it is the part of an honest and valiant man to doe what reason willeth, not what opinion expecteth; & to measure honour or dishonour by the assurance of his well-informed conscience, rather than by the malicious report & censure of others) yet it may be excused; since he had before his eyes the iniustice of his people, and had well vnderstood that a wicked sentence is infinitely worse than a wicked fact, as being held a president and patterne, whereby oppression beginning vpon one, is extended as warrantable vpon all. Therefore his feare of wrongfull condemnation was such, as a constant man could not easily haue ouer-mastered; but when afterwards the Armie, hauing no other expectation of safetie than the faint hope of a secret flight; he was so terrified with an Eclipse of the Moone, happening when they were about to dislodge, that he would not consent to haue the campe break vp till seuen and twentie daies were past. His timorousnesse was euen as foolish and ridiculous, as the issue of it was lamentable. For he should not haue thought that the power of the Heauens, and the course of Nature, would be as vniust as his Athenians, or might pretend lesse euill to the slothfull, than to such as did their best. Neither doe I thinke that any Astrologer can alleage this Eclipse, as either a cause or prognostication of that Armies destruction, otherwise than as the follie of men did, by application, turne it to their owne confusion. Had C. Cassius the Roman, he, who slew Iulius Cæsar, imitated this superstition of Nicias, he had surely found the same fortune in a case very like. But when, hee retyring, the broken remainder of Crassus his Armie defeated by the Parthian Archers, was aduised, vpon such an accident as this, to continue where he then was, till the Sunne were past the signe of Scorpio; he made answere that hee stood not in such feare of Scorpio, as of Sagittarius. So aduenturing rather to abide the frowning of the Heauens, than the neerer danger of Enemies vpon earth, he made such a safe and honourable retrait, as did both shew his noble resolution, and giue a faire example to that good rule,

Thus we see that God, who ordinarily workes by a concatenation of meanes, depriues the Gouernours of vnderstanding, when he intends euill to the multitude; and that the wickednesse of vniust men is the readie meane to weaken the vertue of those who might haue done them good.

Of the troubles where-into the State of Athens fell, after the great losse of the Fleet, and Army, in Sicilia.

THe losse of this Armie was the ruine of the Athenian Dominion, and may bee well accompted a very little lesse calamitie to that Estate, than was the subuersion of the walls, when the Citie about seuen yeeres after was taken by Lysander. For now began the subiects of the Athenian Estate to rebell, of whom, some they reduced vnder their obedience; others held out; some for feare of greater inconuenience were set at libertie, promising onely to be their good friends, as formerly they had been their Subiects; others hauing a kinde of libertie offered by the Athenians, were not therewith contented, but obtained a true and perfect libertie by force. Among these troubles it fell out very vnseasonably, that the principall men of Athens being wearied with the peoples insolencie, tooke vpon them to change the forme of that Estate, and bring the gouernment into the hands of a few. To which purpose conspiring with the Captaines which were abroad, they caused them to set vp the forme of an Aristocratie in the Townes of their Confederates; and in the meane time, some that were most likelie to withstand this innouation, being slaine at Athens, the Commonaltie were so dismaid, that none durst speake against the Conspirators, whose number they knew not, but euerie man was afraid of his neighbour, lest he should be a member of the league. In this generall feare the Maiestie of Athens was vsurped by foure hundred men, who obseruing in shew the ancient forme of proceeding, did cause all matters to be propounded vnto the people, and concluded vpon by the greater part of voices: but the things propounded were onely such as were first allowed in priuate among themselues; neither had the Commonaltie any other libertie, than onely to approue and giue consent: for whosoeuer presumed any further, was quickly dispatched out of the way, and no inquirie made of the murther. By these meanes were many Decrees made, all tending to the establishment of this new Authoritie, which neuertheless endured not long. For the Fleet and Armie which then was in the Isle of Samos, did altogether detest these dealings of the foure hundred vsurpers, and held them as Enemies; whereupon they reuoked Alcibiades out of banishment, and by his assistance procured that the supplies which the Persian King had promised to the Lacedæmonians, were by Tissophernes his Lieutenant, made vnprofitable, through the slow and bad performance. Alcibiades had at the first beene very well entertained in Sparta, whilest his seruice done vnto that State was not growne to be the obiect of enuie. But when it appeared that in Counsaile and good performance he so farre excelled all the Lacedæmonians, that all their good successe was ascribed to his wit and valour, then were all the principall Citizens wearie of his vertue; especially Agis one of their Kings, whose wife had so farre yeelded her selfe to the loue of this Athenian, that among her inward friends she could not forbeare to call her yong childe by his name. Hereupon order was taken, that Alcibiades should be killed out of the way. But he discouering the Spartan trechery, conueighed himselfe vnto Tissophernes, whom he so bewitched with his great beauty, sweet conuersation, and sound wit, that he soone became the Master of that barbarous Vice-roies affections, who had free power to dispose the great Kings Treasures and forces in those parts. Then began he to aduise Tissaphernes, not so farre forth to assist the Lacedæmonians, that they should quite ouerthrow the State of Athens, but rather to helpe the weaker side, and let them one consume another, whereby all should fall at length into the hands of the Persian. By this counsaile he made way to other practices, wherein by strength of his reputation (as the onely fauourite of so great a Potentate) he played his owne game, procuring his restitution. At length his banishment being repealed by the Armie, but not by the Citizens (who then were oppressed by the foure hundred) hee laboured greatly to reconcile reconcile the Souldiers to the Gouernours; or at leaſt to diuert their heat another way, and turne it vpon the common Enemie. Some of the foure hundred approued his motion, as being wearie of the tyrannie wherof they were partakers, partly becauſe they ſaw it could not long endure; and partly for that themſelues, being leſſe regarded by the reſt of their companions, than ſtood with their good liking, ſought to acquit themſelues of it as honeſtly as they might. But the moſt of that Faction laboured to obtaine peace of the Lacedæmonians, deſiring chiefly to maintaine both their owne authoritie & the greatneſſe of their Citie, if they might: but if this could not be, they did rather wiſh to preſerue their owne power, or ſafetie at leaſt, than the good Eſtate of the Common-wealth. Therefore they made ſundry ouertures of peace to the Lacedæmonians, deſiring to compound in as good termes as they might, and affirming that they were fitter to be truſted than the wauering multitude; eſpecially conſidering that the Citie of Sparta was gouerned by an Ariſtocratie, to which forme they had now reduced Athens. All theſe paſſages betweene the foure hundred (or the moſt and chiefe of them) and the Lacedæmonians, were kept as ſecret as might be. For the City of Athens, hoping, without any great cauſe, to repaire their loſſes, was not inclined to make compoſition, from which vpon iuſter ground the enemie was much more auerſe, truſting well that the diſcord of the Athenians (not vnknowne abroad) might yeeld ſome faire opportunitie to the deſtruction of it ſelfe, which in effect (though not then preſently) came to paſſe. And vpon this hope King Agis did ſometimes bring his forces from Decelea to Athens, where doing no good, he receiued ſome ſmall loſſes. Likewiſe the Nauie of Peloponneſus made ſhew of attempting the Citie, bnt ſeeing no likelihood of ſucceſſe, they bent their courſe from thence to other places, where they obtained victories, which in the better Fortune of the Athenians might more lightly haue beene regarded, than in this their decaied eſtate. Yet it ſeemes, without any diſparagement to their wiſedome, they ſhould rather haue forborne to preſent vnto the Citie, or to the Countries neere adioyning, any terrour of the warre. For the diſſenſion within the walls might ſoon haue done more good than could be receiued from the Fleet or Armie without, which indeed gaue occaſion to ſet the Citizens at vnitie, though it laſted not very long. The foure hundred, by meanes of theſe troubles, were faine to reſigne their authoritie, which they could not now hold, when the people hauing taken armes to repell forraigne enemies, would not lay them downe, till they had freed themſelues from ſuch as oppreſſed the State at home. Yet was not this alteration of gouernment a full reſtitution of the ſoueraigne command vnto the people, or whole body of the Citie, but onely to fiue thouſand; which company the foure hundred (when their authoritie beganne) had pretended to take vnto them as aſſiſtants: herein ſeeming to doe little wrong or none to the Commonalty, who ſeldome aſſembled in greater number. But now when the higheſt power was come indeed into the hands of ſo many, it was ſoon agreed that Alcibiades and his Companions ſhould be recalled from exile, and that the Armie at Samos ſhould be requeſted to vndertake the gouernment: which was forthwith reformed according to the Souldiers deſire.

How Alcibiades wonne many important victories for the Athenians; was recalled from exile; made their Generall, and againe depoſed.

THis eſtabliſhment of things in the Citie, was accompanied with ſome good ſucceſſe in the warres. For the Lacedæmonians were about the ſame time ouerthrowne at Sea, in a great battaile, by the Athenian fleet, which had remained at Samos, to which Alcibiades afterwards ioyning ſuch forces as he could raiſe, obtained many victories. Before the Towne of Abydus, his arriuall with eighteene ſhippes, gaue the honour of a great battaile to the Athenians; he ouerthrew and vtterly deſtroyed the fleet of the Lacedæmonians, commanded by Mindarus; tooke the Townes of Cyzicus, and Perinthus, made the Selymbrians ranſome their Citie, and fortified Chryſopolis. Hereupon letters were ſent to Sparta, which the Athenians, intercepting, found to containe the diſtreſſe of the Armie in theſe few words: All is loſt; Mindarus is ſlaine; the Souldiers want victuals; we know not what to doe.

Shortly after this, Alcibiades ouerthrew the Lacedæmonians in fight by Land at Chalcedon, took Selymbria, beſieged and won Byzantium, now called Conſtantinople, which euen in those dayes was a goodly, rich, and very strong Citie. Hereupon he returned home with very great welcome, and was made high Admirall of all the Nauie.

But this his honour continued not long; for it was taken from him, and hee driuen to banish himselfe againe; onely because his Lieutenant, contrary to the expresse command of Alcibiades, fighting with the enemies in his absence, had lost a great part of the fleete.

The second banishment of Alcibiades was to the Athenians more harmefull than the first; and the losse which thereupon they receiued, was (though more heauie to them, yet) lesse to be pittied of others, than that which ensued vpon his former exile. For whereas at the first, hee had sought reuenge vpon his owne Citie; now, as inured to aduersities, he rather pittied their furie, who in time of such danger had cast out him that should haue repaired their weake estate, than sought by procuring or beholding the calamitie of his people, to comfort himselfe after injurie receiued. Before they, who were instituted in the place of Alcibiades, arriued at the fleete, he presented battaile to Lysander the Lacedæmonian Admirall, who, was not so confident vpon his former victorie, as to vndertake Alcibiades himselfe, bringing ships more in number (notwithstanding the former losse of fifteene) than his enemies had, and better ordered than they had beene vnder his Lieutenant. But when the decree of the people was published in the Nauie, then did Alcibiades with-draw himselfe to a Towne vpon Hellespont, called Bizanthe, where he had built a Castle.

§. XI.

The battaile at Arginusæ, and condemnation of the victorious Athenian Captaines by the people.

After this time, the Athenians receiuing many losses and discomfitures, were driuen to flie into the Hauen of Mytelene, where they were streightly besieged both by Land and Sea. For the raising of this siege necessity inforced them to man all their Vessells, and to put the vttermost of their forces into the hazzard of one battaile. This battaile was fought at Arginusæ, where Callicraditas, Admirall of the Lacedæmonians, losing the honour of the day, preserued his owne reputation by dying valiantly in the fight. It might well haue beene expected, that the tenne Captaines, who ioyntly had command in chiefe ouer the Athenian fleet, should for that good daies seruice, and so happie a victorie, haue receiued great honour of their Citizens. But contrariwise they were forth-with called home, and accused, as if wilfully they had suffered many of the Citizens, whose ships were broken and sunke, to be cast away, when by appointing some Vessels to take them vp, they might haue saued them from being drowned. Hereto the Captaines readily made a very iust answere, That they pursuing the victory, had left part of the fleet, vnder sufficient men, to saue those that were wrackt; which if it were not well accomplished, it was, because a tempest arising about the end of the fight, had hindred the performance of that, and other their intendments. This excuse auailed not: For a lewd fellow was brought forth, who said, That hee himselfe escaping in a meale-tubbe, had beene intreated by those who were in perill of drowning, to desire of the people reuenge of their deaths vpon the Captaines. It was very strange, that vpon such an accusation maintained with so slender euidence, men that had well deserued of their Countrie should be ouerthrowne. But their enemies had so incensed the rascall multitude, that no man durst absolue them, saue onely Socrates the wise and vertuous Philosopher, whose voice in this iudgement was not regarded. Sixe of them were put to death, of whom one had hardly escaped drowning, and was with much a-doe relieued by other vessels in the storme: but the Captaines which were absent escaped; for so when the furie of the people was ouer-past, this judgement was reuersed, and the accusers called into question for hauing deceiued and peruerted the Citizens. Thus the Athenians went about to free themselues from the infamie of injustice; but the diuine iustice was not a-sleepe, nor would be so deluded.

§. XII.

The battaile at Ægos-Potamos, wherein the whole State of Athens was ruined; with the end of the Peloponnesian warre.

THe Peloponnesian fleet vnder Lysander, the yeere next following, hauing scowred the Ægean Seas, entred Hellespont, where (landing Souldiers) it besieged and tooke the Town of Lampsacus. Hereupon all the Nauie of Athens, being an hundred and fourescore saile, made thither in haste, but finding Lampsacus taken before their comming, they put in at Sestos, where hauing refreshed themselues, they sailed to the Riuer called, Ægos-Potamos, which is (as we might name it) Goates-Brooke, or the Riuer of the Goate, being on the Continent, opposite to Lampsacus: & there they cast Anchors, not one whole league off from Lysander, who rode at Lampsacus in the harbour. The next day after their arriuall they presented fight vnto the Peloponnesians, who refused it, whereupon the Athenians returned again to Ægos-Potamos, & thus they continued fiue daies, braving euery day the Enemy, and returning to their owne harbour when it drew towards euening.

The Castle of Alcibiades was not far from the Nauie, and his power in those places was such as might haue greatly auailed his Countrimen, if they could haue made vse of it. For he had waged Mercenaries, and making warre in his owne name vpon some people of the Thracians, had gathered much wealth, and obtained much reputation among them. He perceiuing the disorderly course of the Athenian Commanders, repaired vnto them, and shewed what great inconuenience might grow, if they did not soone fore-see and preuent it. For they lay in a roade subiect to euery weather, neither neere enough to any Towne where they might furnish themselues with necessaries, nor so farre off as had beene more expedient. Sestus was the next Market-Towne; thither both Souldiers and Marriners resorted, flocking away from the Nauie euery day, as soone as they were returned from braving the Enemy. Therefore Alcibiades willed them either to lie at Sestus, which was not farre off, or at least to consider how neere their enemie was, whose feare proceeded rather from obedience to their Generall, than from any cowardise. This admonition was so farre despised, that some of the Commanders willed him to meddle with his owne matters, and to remember that his authoritie was out of date. Had it not been for these opprobrious words, he could (as he told his familiars) haue compelled the Lacedæmonians, either to fight vpon vnequall termes, or vtterly to quit their Fleet. And like enough it was that he might so haue done by transporting the light-armed Thracians his Confederates, and others his Followers ouer the Streights, who assaulting the Peloponnesians by Land, would either haue compelled them to put to Sea, or else to leaue their ships to the mercy of the Athenians. But finding their acceptance of his good counsaile no better than hath beene rehearsed, he left them to their fortune, which how euill it would be he did prognosticate.

Lysander all this while defending himselfe by the aduantage of his Hauen, was not careless in looking into the demeanour of the Athenians. When they departed, his manner was to send forth some of his swiftest Vessels after them, who obseruing their doings, related vnto him what they had seene. Therefore vnderstanding in what careless fashion they romed vp & downe the Countrie, he kept all his men a-boord after their departure, & the fift day gaue especiall charge to his Scouts, That when they perceiued the Athenians, disembarking, as their custome was, and walking towards Sestos, they should forthwith returne, and hang vp a brazen shield in the Prow, as a token for him to weigh Anchor.

The Scouts performed their charge, and Lysander being in a readinesse, made all speede that strength of Oares could giue, to Ægos-Potamos, where he found very few of his enemies a-boord their Ships, not many neere them, and all in great confusion vpon the news of his approach.

Insomuch that the greatest industry which the Athenians then shewed, was in the escape of eight or nine ships, which knowing how much that losse imported, gaue ouer Athens as desperate, and made a long flight vnto the Ile of Cyprus; all the rest were taken, and such of the Souldiers as came in to the rescue cut in pieces. Thus was the war which had lasted seuen and twenty yeers, with variable successe concluded in one houre, & the glory of Athens in such wise eclipsed, that she neuer afterward shone in her perfect light.

Immediately vpon this victory Lysander, hauing taken such Townes as readily did yeeld yeelde vpon the first fame of his exploit, set sayle for Athens, and ioyning his forces with those of Agis & Pausanias, Kings of Sparta, summoned the Citie; which finding too stubborne to yeeld, and too strong to be won on the sudden, he put forth againe to Sea, and rather by terrour than violence, compelling all the Ilands, and such Townes of the Ionians, as had formerly held of the Athenians, to submit themselues to Sparta, he did thereby cut off all prouision of victuals, and other necessaries, from the Citie, & inforced the people by meere famine to yeeld to these conditions: That the long wals, leading from the Town to the Port, should be thrown down; That all Cities subiect to their Estate, should be set at liberty; That the Athenians should be Masters onely of their owne Territories, and the fields adioyning to their Towne; And that they should keep no more than twelue Ships; That they should hold as Friends or Enemies, the same, whom the Lacedæmonians did, and follow the Lacedæmonians as Leaders in the Warres.

These articles being agreed vpon, the wals were throwne downe with great reioycing of those who had borne displeasure to Athens; and not without some consultation of destroying the Citie, and laying waste the Land about it. Which rudiee, although it was not entertained, yet were thirty Gouernors, or rather cruell Tyrants, appointed ouer the people, who recompensed their former insolency and iniustice ouer their Captaines, by oppressing them with all base and intolerable slauery.

The onely small hope then remaining to the Athenians, was, that Alcibiades might perhaps repaire what their owne folly had ruined. But the thirty Tyrants perceiuing this, aduertised the Lacedæmonians thereof, who contriued (and (as now domineering in euery quarter) soone effected his suddaine death.

Such end had the Peloponnesian Warre. After which the Lacedæmonians abusing their reputation, and great power, which therein they had obtained, grew very odious to Greece, and by Combination of many Cities against them, were dispossessed of their high authority, euen in that very Age, in which they had subdued Athens. The greatest foile that they tooke was of the Thebans, led by Epaminondas, vnder whom Philip of Macedon, father to Alexander the Great, had the best of his education. By these Thebans, the Citie of Sparta (besides other great losses receiued) was sundry times in danger of being taken. But these haughty attempts of the Thebans came finally to nothing, for the seuerall Estates and Signories of Greece, were growne so iealous one of anothers greatnesse, that the Lacedæmonians, Athenians, Argiues, and Thebans, which were the mightiest, associating themselues with the weaker party, did so counterpoize the stronger, that no one Citie could extend the limits of her iurisdiction so farre as might make her terrible to her Neigbours. And thus all parts of the Countrie remained rather euenly ballanced, than well agreeing, till such time as Philip, and after him Alexander, Kings of Macedon, (whose forefathers had beene dependants, and followers, yea almost meere Vassals to the Estates of Athens and Sparta) found meanes, by making vse of their factions, to bring them all into seruitude, from which they neuer could be free, till the Romanes presenting them with a shew of liberty, did themselues indeede become their Masters.

CHAP. IX.

Of matters concurring with the Peloponnesian Warre, or shortly following it.

§. I.

How the affaires of Persia stood in these times.

DVring the times of this Peloponnesian Warre, and those other lesse expeditions foregoing it, Artaxerxes Longimanus, hauing peaceably enioyed a long reigne ouer the Persians, left it by his death either to Darius, who was called Darius Nothus, or the Bastard, whom the Greeke Historians (lightly passing ouer Xerxes the second, and Sogdianus, as Vsurpers, and for their short reigne little to be regarded) place next vnto them, or to Xerxes the second; who, and his brother Sogdianus after him (seeming to haue beene the the ſonnes of Heſter) held the Kingdome but one yeere betweene them, the yonger ſucceeding his elder brother. It is not my purpoſe (as I haue ſaid before) to purſue the Hiſtorie of the Perſians from henceforth, by rehearſall of all the particulars, otherwiſe than as they ſhall be incident to the affaires of Greece. It may therefore ſuffice to ſay, That Xerxes the ſecond, being a vicious Prince, did periſh after a moneth or two, if not by ſurfeit, then by treachery of his as riotous brother Sogdianus. Likewiſe of Sogdianus it is found, that being as ill as his brother, and more cruell, he ſlew vniuſtly Bagorazus a principall Eunuch, and would haue done as much to his brother Darius the Baſtard, had not he foreſeene it, and by raiſing a ſtronger Armie than this hated King Sogdianus could leuie, ſeized at once vpon the King and Kingdome. Darius hauing ſlaine his brother, held the Empire nineteene yeeres. Amyrtæus of Sais an Ægyptian rebelled againſt him, and hauing partly ſlaine, partly chaſed out of the Land the Perſian Garriſons, allied himſelfe ſo firmely with the Greekes, that by their aide he maintained the Kingdome, and deliuered it ouer to his poſterity, who (notwithſtanding the furie of their ciuill Warres) maintained it againſt the Perſian, all the dayes of this Darius, and of his ſon Artaxerxes Mnemon. Likewiſe Amorges, a ſubiect of his owne and of the Royall bloud, being Lieutenant of Caria, rebelled againſt him; confederating himſelfe with the Athenians. But the great calamity, before ſpoken of, which fell vpon the Athenians in Sicil, hauing put new life into the Spartans, and giuen courage to the Ilanders and others, ſubiect to the State of Athens, to ſhake off the yoke of their long continued bondage: It fell out well for Darius, that the Lacedæmonians being deſtitute of money, wherewith to defray the charge of a great Nauie, without which it was impoſſible to aduance the warre againſt the State of Athens, that remained powerful by Sea, were driuen to craue his aſſiſtance, which he granted vnto them, firſt vpon what conditions beſt pleaſed himſelfe, though afterwards the articles of the league betweene him and them were ſet downe in more preciſe tearmes; wherein it was concluded, That he and they ſhould make warre ioyntly vpon the Athenians, and vpon all that ſhould rebell from either of them, and (which was highly to the Kings honour and profit) that all the Cities of Aſia, which had formerly beene his, or his Predeceſſours, ſhould returne to his obedience. By this Treatie, and the warre enſuing (of which I haue already ſpoken) he recouered all that his Grand-father and Father had loſt in Aſia. Likewiſe by aſſiſtance of the Lacedæmonians he got Amorges a-liue into his hands, who was taken in the Citie of Iaſus; the Athenians wanting either force or courage to ſuccour him Neuertheleſſe Ægypt ſtill held out againſt him; the cauſe whereof cannot be the employment of the Perſian forces on the parts of Greece: for he abounded in men, of whom he had enough for all occaſions, but they wanted manhood, which cauſed him to fight with gold, which effected for him by Souldiers of other Nations, and his naturall enemies, what the valour of his owne Subiects was inſufficient to performe. Darius had in marriage Paryſatis his owne ſiſter, who bare vnto him (beſides other children) Artaxerxes called Mnemon, that is to ſay, the Mindefull, or the Rememberer, who ſucceeded him in the Kingdome; and Cyrus the yonger, a Prince of ſingular vertue, and accounted by all that knew him, the moſt excellent man that euer Perſia bred after Cyrus the Great. But the old King Darius, intending to leaue vnto his elder ſonne Artaxerxes the inheritance of that great Empire, did caſt a iealous eye vpon the doings of yong Cyrus, who being Lieutenant of the lower Aſia, tooke more vpon him than befitted a Subiect: for which cauſe his father ſent for him, with intent to haue taken ſome very ſharpe courſe with him, had not his owne death preuented the comming of his yonger ſonne, and placed the elder in his Throne. Of the warre betweene theſe brethren, and ſummarily of Artaxerxes, we ſhall haue occaſion to ſpeake ſomewhat in more conuenient place.

§. II.

How the thirty Tyrants got their Dominion in Athens.

WHold it in this place very conuenient to ſhew the proceedings of the Greekes, after the ſubuerſion of the wals of Athens, which gaue end to that war called the Peloponneſian warre, but could not free the vnhappy Countrie of Greece from ciuill broiles. The thirtie Gouernours, commonly called the thirtie Tyrants of Athens, were choſen at the firſt by the people to compile a body of their Law, and make a collection of

ſuch ancient Statutes, as were meete to be put in practice: the condition of the Citie ſtanding as it did in that ſo ſodaine alteration. To this charge was annexed the ſupreame authority, either as a recompence of their labours, or becauſe the neceſſity of the times did ſo require it, wherein the Law being vncertain, it was fit that ſuch men ſhould giue iudgement in particular cauſes, to whoſe iudgement the Lawes themſelues, by which the Citie was to be ordered, were become ſubiect. But theſe thirty hauing ſo great power in their hands, were more carefull to hold it, than to deſerue it, by faithfull execution of that which was committed to them in truſt.

Therefore apprehending ſuch troubleſome fellowes, as were odious to the Citie, though not puniſhable therefore by law, they condemned them to death; which proceeding was by all men highly approued, who conſidered their lewd conditions, but did not withall bethinke themſelues, how eaſie a thing it would be vnto theſe thirty men, to take away the liues of Innocents, by calling them perturbers of the peace, or what elſe they liſted, when condemnation without due triall and proofe had beene once well allowed. Hauing thus plauſibly entred into a wicked courſe of gouernment, they thought it beſt to fortifie themſelues with a ſure guard, ere they brake out into thoſe diſorders, which they muſt needes commit for the eſtabliſhing of their authority. Wherefore diſpatching two of their owne company to Sparta, they informed the Lacedæmonians, that it was the full intent of the thirty, to keepe the City free from all rebellious motions, to which purpoſe it behooued them to cut off ſuch as were ſeditious; and therefore deſired the Lacedæmonians to ſend them a Garriſon, which they promiſed at their owne coſt to maintaine. This motion was well approued, and a guard ſent, the Captaine of which was ſo well entertained by the thirty, that none of their miſdeedes could want his high commendations at Sparta. Hereupon the Tyrants began to take heart, and looking no more after baſe and deteſted perſons, inuaded the principall men of the Citie, ſending armed men from Houſe to Houſe, who drew out ſuch as were of great reputation, and likely, or able to make any head againſt this wicked forme of gouernment: whereby there was ſuch effuſion of bloud, as to Theramenes (one of the thirty) ſeemed very horrible, and vnable to eſcape vengeance. His diſlike of their proceedings being openly diſcouered, cauſed his fellowes to bethinke themſelues, and prouide for their owne ſecurity, and his deſtruction, leſt he ſhould make himſelfe a Captaine of the diſcontented (which were almoſt the whole Citie) and redeeme his owne peace with their ruine. Wherefore they ſelected three thouſand of the Citizens, whom they thought meeteſt, and gaue vnto them ſome part of publike authority, the reſt they diſarmed; and hauing thus increaſed their owne ſtrength, and weakened their oppoſites, they began a-freſh to ſhead the bloud, not onely of their priuate enemies, but of ſuch whoſe money, or goods, might inrich them, and enable them for the paiment of their guard. And to this purpoſe they concluded, that euery one of them ſhould name one man, vpon whoſe goods he ſhould ſeize, putting the owner to death. But when Theramenes vttered his deteſtation of ſo wicked intent; then did Critias, who of all the thirty was moſt tyrannicall, accuſe him to the Councell, as a treacherous man, and (whereas one maine priuiledge of the three thouſand was, that none of them ſhould ſuffer death at the appointment of the thirty, but haue the accuſtomed triall) he took vpon him to ſtrike out of that number the name of Theramenes, and ſo reduced him vnder the triall and ſentence of that order. It was well alleadged by Theramenes, that his name was not more eaſie to be blotted out of the Catalogue, than any other mans; vpon which conſideration, he aduiſed them all to conceiue no otherwiſe of his caſe, than as of their owne, who were liable to the ſame forme of proceeding: but euery man chooſing rather to preſerue his owne life by ſilence, than preſently to draw vpon himſelfe the danger, which as yet concerned him little, and perhaps would neuer come neere him) the Tyrants interpreting ſilence as conſent, condemned him forthwith, and compelled him to drinke poyſon.

§. III.

The conſpiracie againſt the thirty Tyrants, and their depoſing.

AFter the death of Theramenes, the thirty began to vſe ſuch outrage, as excelled their former villanies. For hauing three thouſand (as they thought) firme vnto them, they robbed all others without feare or ſhame, deſpoiling them of lands and and goods, and cauſed them to flye into baniſhment, for ſafeguard of their liues. This flight of the Citizens procured their liberty, and the generall good of the City. For the baniſhed Citizens, who were fled to Thebes, entred into conſultation, and reſolued to hazard their liues in ſetting free the Citie of Athens. The very thought of ſuch a practice had beene treaſon at home, which had no other danger abroad, than might be found in the execution. Seuentie men, or thereabout, were the firſt vndertakers, who with their Captaine Thraſybulus tooke Phyla, a place of ſtrength in the Territorie of Athens. No ſooner did the thirty heare of their exploit, than ſeeke meanes to preuent further danger; aſſembling the three thouſand, and their Lacedæmonian guard, with which force they attempted Phyla, but were with ſome loſſe of their men repelled. Finding the place too ſtrong to be taken by aſſault, they intended to beſiege it; which purpoſe came to nought by meanes of ſhow that fell, and other ſtormie weather, againſt which they had not made prouiſion. Retiring therefore to the Citie, which aboue all they were to make good, they left the moſt of their guard, and two companies of Horſe, to wearie out them which lay in Phyla, with a flying ſiege. But it was not long ere the followers of Thraſybulus were encreaſed from ſeuenty to ſeuen hundred, which aduentured to giue charge vpon thoſe guards, of whom they cut off aboue an hundred and twenty. Theſe ſmall, but proſperous beginnings, added more to the number of thoſe in Phyla, who now with a thouſand men got entrance into Piræus, the ſuburbe of Athens, lying on the Port. Before their comming, the thirty had reſolued to fortifie the Towne of Eleuſine, to their owne vſe, whereinto they might make an eaſie retrait, and ſaue themſelues from any ſudden perill. It may well ſeeme ſtrange, that whereas their barbarous manner of gouernement had brought them into ſuch danger, they were ſo far from ſeeking to obtaine mens good will, that contrariwiſe, to aſſure themſelues of Eleuſine, they got all of the place who could beare armes into their hands by a traine, and wickedly (though vnder forme of iuſtice) murthered them all. But, Sceleribus tutum per ſcelera eſt iter, the miſchiefes which they had already done were ſuch, as left them no hope of going backward, nor any other apparant likelihood of ſafety, than by extending their cruelty vnto all, ſeeing few or none were left, whom they could truſt. When Thraſybulus and his fellowes, who as yet were tearmed conſpirators, had taken the Piræus, then were the three thouſand armed againe by the Tyrants, and brought to aſſault it; but in this enterpriſe Thraſybulus had the better, and repelled his enemies, of whom although there were ſlaine to the number of ſeuenty onely, yet the victory ſeemed the greater, becauſe Critias, and one other of the thirty, periſhed in that fight. The death of Critias, and the ſtout defence of Piræus, together with ſome exhortations vſed by Thraſybulus to the Citizens, wrought ſuch effect, that the thirty were depoſed. Neuertheleſſe there were ſo many of the three thouſand, who hauing communicated with the thirty in their miſdeeds, feared to be called to a ſharpe account, that no peace, nor quiet forme of gouernement could be eſtabliſhed. For Embaſſadors were ſent to Sparta, who crauing aide againſt Thraſybulus, and his followers, had fauourable audience, and a power ſent to their aſſiſtance, both by Land and Sea, vnder the conduct of Lyſander, and his Brother; whom Pauſanias the Spartan King did follow, raiſing an Armie of the Cities confederate with the Lacedæmonians. And here appeared firſt the icalouſie, wherein ſome people held the State of Sparta. The Bœotians, and Corinthians, who in the late warres had beene the moſt bitter enemies to Athens, refuſed to follow Pauſanias in this expedition; alleaging that it ſtood not with their oathes, to make war againſt that people, who had not hitherto broken any one article of the league: but fearing, indeede, leſt the Lacedæmonians ſhould annexe the Territory of Athens to their owne Demaines. It is not to be doubted, that Pauſanias tooke this anſwere in good part. For it was not his purpoſe to deſtroy thoſe againſt whom he went, but onely to croſſe the proceedings of Lyſander, whom he enuied. Therefore hauing in ſome ſmall skirmiſhes againſt them of Thraſybulus his party, made a ſhew of war, finally wrought ſuch meanes, that all things were compoũded quietly: the thirty men, & ſuch others, as were like to giue cauſe of tumults, being ſent to Sparta. The remainder of that tyrannicall faction, hauing withdrawn themſelues to Eleuſine, were ſhortly after found to attempt ſome innouation, whereupon the whole City riſing againſt them, tooke their Captains, as they were comming to Parlie, & ſlew them: which done, to auoid further inconuenience, a law was made, that all iniuries paſt ſhould be forgotté, & no man called into queſtion for wrongs committed. By which order, wiſely made, & carefully obſerued, the City returned to her former quietnes.

CHAP. X.

Of the expedition of Cyrus the yonger.

The grounds of Cyrus his attempt against his brother.

THE matters of Greece standing vpon such tearmes, that no one te Estate durst oppose it selfe against that of Lacedamon; young Cyrus, brother to Artaxerxes, King of Persia, hauing in his fathers life time very carefully prosecuted the warre against Athens, did send his messengers to Sparta, requesting that their loue might appeare no lesse to him, than that which hee had shewed towards them in their dangerous war against the Athenians. To this request, being generall, the Lacedamonians gaue a suitable answere, commanding their Admirall to performe vnto Cyrus all seruice that he should require of him. If Cyrus had plainely discouered himselfe, and the Lacedamonians bent their whole power to his assistance, very like it is, that either the Kingdome of Persia should haue beene the recompence of his deserts; or that he perishing in battaile, as after he did, the subuersion of that Empire had forthwith ensued. But it pleased God, rather to shew vnto the Greekes the wayes, which vnder the Macedonian Ensignes, the victorious foot-steps of their posterity should measure; and opening vnto them the riches, and withall the weakenesse of the Persian, to kindle in them both desire and hope of that conquest, which he reserued to another generation; than to giue into their hands that mighty Kingdome, whose houre was not yet come. The loue which Paryſatis, the Queen-Mother of Persia bare vnto Cyrus her yonger sonne, being seconded by the earnest fauour of the people, and ready desires of many principall men, had moued this yong Prince, in his fathers old age, to aspire after the succession. But being sent for by his Father (as hath before beene shewed) whose meaning was to curbe this ambitious youth; he found his elder brother Artaxerxes established so surely by the old Kings fauor, that it were not safe to attempt any meanes of displanting him, by whose disfauour, himselfe might easily lose the place of a Viceroy, which he held in Asia the lesse, and hardly be able to maintaine his owne life. The neerest neighbour to Cyrus of all the Kings Deputies in the lower Asia, was Tissaphernes, a man compounded of cowardise, trechery, craft, and all vices which accustomably branch out of these. This man accompanied Cyrus to his Father, vsing by the way all faire shewes of friendship, as to a Prince, for whom it might well be thought, that Queene Paryſatis had obtained the inheritance of that mighty Empire. And it was very true, that Paryſatis had vsed the best of her endeuour to that purpose, alleadging that (which in former ages had bin much auaileable to Xerxes, in the like disceptation with his elder brother) Artaxerxes was borne whilest his father was a priuate man, but Cyrus, when he was a crowned King. All which not sufficing; when the most that could be obtained for Cyrus, was the pardon of some presumptuous demeanour, and confirmation of his place in Lydia, and the parts adioyning: then did this Tissaphernes discouer his nature, and accuse his friend Cyrus to the new King Artaxerxes, of a dangerous treason intended against his person. Vpon this accusation, whether true or false, very easily beleeued, Cyrus was arrested, and by the most vehement intreaty of his Mother very hardly deliuered, and sent backe into his owne Prouince.

§. II.

The preparations of Cyrus, and his first entrie into the warre.

THE forme of gouernement which the Persian Lieutenants vsed in their seuerall Prouinces, was in many points almost Regall. For they made War and Peace, as they thought it meete, not onely for the Kings behoofe, but for their owne reputation; vsually indeede with the Kings enemies, yet sometimes one with another: which was the more easily tolerated, because their owne heads were held onely

at the Kings pleaſure, which cauſed them to frame all their doings to his will, whatſoeuer it were, or they could coniecture it to be. Cyrus therefore being ſetled in Lydia, began to conſider with himſelfe, the intereſt that he had in the Kingdome; the ſmall aſſurance of his brothers loue, held onely by his Mothers interceſſion; the diſgrace endured by his late impriſonment; and the meanes which he had by loue of his owne people, and that good neighbourhood of the Lacedæmonians, whom he had bound vnto him, to obtaine the Crowne for himſelfe. Neither was it expedient that he ſhould long ſit idle, as waighting till occaſion ſhould preſent it ſelfe: but rather enterpriſe ſomewhat whileſt yet his Mother liued, who could procure a good interpretation to all his actions, if they were no worſe than onely queſtionable. Hereupon he firſt began to quarrell with Tiſſaphernes, and ſeized vpon many Townes of his iuriſdiction, annexing them to his owne Prouince; which diſpleaſed not Artaxerxes at all, who (beſides that he was of condition ſomewhat ſimple) being truely paid by Cyrus the accuſtomable Tributes out of thoſe places, was well contented to ſee his brothers hot ſpirit exerciſed in priuate quarrels. But Tiſſaphernes, whoſe baſe conditions were hated, and cowardize deſpiſed, although he durſt not aduenture to take armes againſt Cyrus, yet perceiuing that the Mileſians were about to giue vp themſelues into the hands of that young Prince, as many other Townes of the Ionians had done, thought by terrour to preſerue his reputation, and keepe the Towne in his owne hands. Wherefore he ſlew many, and many he baniſhed, who flying to Cyrus, were gently entertained, as bringing faire occaſion to take armes, which was no ſmall part of his deſire. In leuying Souldiers he vſed great policie; for he tooke not onely the men of his owne Prouince, or of the Countries adioyning, whoſe liues were ready at his will; but ſecretly he furniſhed ſome Grecian Captaines with money, who being very good men of warre, entertained Souldiers therewith, ſome of them warring in Thrace, others in Theſſalie, others elſewhere in Greece; but all of them ready to croſſe the Seas, at the firſt call of Cyrus, till which time they had ſecret inſtructions to prolong their ſeuerall warres, that the Souldiers might be held in continuall exerciſe, and ready in armes vpon the ſudden. Cyrus hauing ſent a power of men to beſiege Miletus, forthwith ſummoned theſe bands of the Greekes, who very readily came ouer to his aſſiſtance, being thirteene thouſand very firme Souldiers, and able to make head (which is almoſt incredible) againſt the whole power of Artaxerxes. With this Armie, and that which he had leuied before, he could very eaſily haue forced Miletus, and chaſed away Tiſſaphernes out of Aſia the leſſe: but his purpoſe was not ſo to loſe time in ſmall matters, that was to be imployed in the accompliſhment of higher deſignes. Pretending therefore that the Piſidians, a people of Aſia the leſſe, not ſubiect to the Perſian, had inuaded his Territorie, he raiſed the ſiege of Miletus, and with all ſpeede marched Eaſtward, leauing Tiſſaphernes much amazed, who had no leiſure to reioyce that Cyrus had left him to himſelfe, when he conſidered, that ſo great an Army, and ſo ſtrong, was neuer leuied againſt the Rouers of Piſidia, but rather againſt the great King his Maſter. For which cauſe taking a band of fiue hundred horſe, he poſted away to carry tidings to the Court, of this great preparation.

§. III.

How Cyrus tooke his iourney into the higher Aſia, and came vp cloſe to his Brother.

THe tumult which his comming brought was very great, and great the exclamations of the Queene Statira, againſt Paryſatis, the Queen-Mother, whom ſhe called the Author and occaſioner of the war. But whileſt the King in great feare was arming the high Countries in his defence, the danger haſted vpon him very faſt. For Cyrus made great marches, hauing his number much increaſed, by the repaire of his Countrimen, though moſt ſtrengthned by the acceſſe of ſeuen hundred Greeks, and of other foure hundred of the ſame Nation, who reuolted vnto him from the King. How terrible the Greeks were to the Barbarians, he found by triall in a Muſter, which (to pleaſe the Queene of Cilicia, who had brought him aide) he made in Phrygia; where the Greeks by his direction making offer of a charge vpon the reſt of his Armie, which contained a hundred thouſand men, the whole Campe (not perceiuing that this was but a brauery) fled a-maine, the victuallers and baggagers forſaking their cabbins, and running all away for very feare. This was to Cyrus a ioyfull ſpectacle, who knew very well, that his brother was followed by men of the ſame temper, and the more vnlikely to make reſiſtance, becauſe they were preſt to the warre againſt their will and diſpoſitions, whereas his Armie was drawne along by meere affection and good will. Neuertheleſſe he found it a very hard matter to perſwade the Greekes to paſſe the Riuer of Euphrates. For the very length of the way which they had troden, wearied them with the conceit of the tedious returne. Therefore he was driuen, being yet in Cilicia, to ſeeke excuſes, telling them, that Abrocomas, one of the Kings principall Captaines, & his owne great enemy, lay by the Riuer, againſt whom he requeſted them to aſſiſt him. By ſuch deuices, and exceſſiue promiſe of reward, he brought them to Euphrates, where ſome of the Greekes conſidering, That who ſo paſſed the Riuer firſt, ſhould haue the moſt thankes, and might ſafely returne if the reſt ſhould refuſe to follow them; they entred the Foords, whereby were all finally perſwaded to doe as ſome had begun, and being allured by great hopes, they reſolued to ſeeke out Artaxerxes, whereſoeuer he was to be found. The King in the meane time hauing raiſed an armie of nine hundred thouſand men, was not ſo confident vpon this huge multitude, as to aduenture them in triall of a plaine battaile. Abrocomas, who with three hundred thouſand men, had vnder-taken to make good the Streights of Syria, which were very narrow, and fortified with a ſtrong wall, and other defences of nature, and art, which made the place to ſeeme impregnable, had quitted the paſſage, and retired himſelfe toward the Kings forces, not daring to looke Cyrus in the face, who deſpairing to finde any way by Land, had procured the Lacedæmonian fleete, by the benefit whereof to haue tranſported his Armie. I doe not finde that this cowardiſe of Abrocomas, or of his Souldiers, who arriued not at the Campe, till fiue dayes were paſt after the battaile, receiued either puniſhment, or diſgrace; for they, toward whom he with-drew himſelfe, were all made of the ſame mettall.

Therefore Artaxerxes was vpon the point of retiring to the vttermoſt bounds of his Kingdome, vntill by Teribazus, one of his Captaines, he was perſwaded not to abandon ſo many goodly Prouinces to the Enemy, who would thereby haue gathered addition of ſtrength, and (which in the ſharpe diſputation of Title to a Kingdome is moſt auaileable) would haue growne ſuperior in reputation. By ſuch aduice, the King reſolued vpon meeting with his brother, who now began to be ſecure, being fully perſwaded, that Artaxerxes would neuer dare to abide him in the field. For the King hauing caſt vp a Trench of almoſt fortie miles in length, about thirtie foote broad, and eighteene foote deepe, intended there to haue encamped: but his courage failing him, he abandoned that place, thinking nothing ſo ſafe, as to be farre diſtant from his enemies.

§. IIII.

The battaile betweene Cyrus and Artaxerexes.

THe Armie of Cyrus hauing ouercome many difficulties of euill wayes, and ſcarcitie of victuals, was much encouraged by perceiuing this great feare of Artaxerxes; and being paſt this trench, marched careleſly in great diſorder, hauing beſtowed their Armes in Carts, and vpon Beaſts of carriage; when on the ſudden one of their Vaunt-currors, brought newes of the Kings approach. Hereupon with great tumult they armed themſelues, and had ranged their battailes in good order vpon the ſide of the Riuer Euphrates, where they waited for the comming of their enemies, whom they ſaw not till it was after-noone. But when they ſaw the cloud of duſt raiſed by the feet of that huge multitude, which the King drew after him, and perceiued by their neere approach how well they were marſhalled, comming on very orderly in ſilence, whereas it had beene expected, that ruſhing violently with loud clamours, they ſhould haue ſpent all their force vpon the firſt brunt; and when it appeared that the fronts of the two Armies were ſo vnequall in diſtent, being all embattailed in one body and ſquare, that Cyrus taking his place (as was the Perſian manner) in the middeſt of his owne, did not with the corner, and vtmoſt point thereof, reach to the halfe breadth of Artaxerxes his battaile, who carried a front proportionable to his number, exceeding nine times that of Cyrus: then did the Greekes begin to diſtruſt their owne manhood, which was not accuſtomed to make proofe of it ſelfe, vpon ſuch exceſſiue oddes. It was almoſt incredible, that ſo great an Armie ſhould be ſo eaſily chaſed. Neuertheleſſe, it quickely appeared, that theſe Perſians, hauing learned (contrary to their cuſtome) to giue charge vpon their their enemies with ſilence, had not learned (for it was contrary to their nature) to receiue a ſtrong charge with courage. Vpon the very firſt offer of on-ſet, made by the Greekes, all that beaſtly rabble of cowards fled amaine, without abiding the ſtroke, or ſtaying till they were within reach of a Dart. The Chariots armed with hookes and ſithes (whereof Artaxerxes had two hundred, and Cyrus, not twenty) did ſmall hurt that day, becauſe the driuers of them leaping downe, fled away on foot. This baſe demeanour of his enemies gaue ſo much confidence to Cyrus, and his Followers, that ſuch as were about him forth-with adored him as King. And certainely, the Title had beene aſſured vnto him that day, had not he ſought how to declare himſelfe worthy of it, ere yet he had obtained it. For, perceiuing that Artaxerxes, who found that part of the field which lay before him voide, was about to encompaſſe the Greekes, and to ſet vpon them in the reare, he aduanced with ſixe hundred Horſe, and gaue ſo valiant a charge vpon a ſquadron of ſixe thouſand, which lay before the King, that he brake it, ſlaying the Captaine thereof, Artagerſes, with his owne hands, and putting all the reſt to flight. Hereupon his whole company, of ſixe hundred, very few excepted, began to follow the chaſe, leauing Cyrus too ill attended, who perceiuing where the King ſtood in troupe, vncertaine whether to fight, or leaue the field, could not containe himſelfe, but ſaid; I ſee the man: and preſently with a ſmall handfull of men about him ran vpon his brother, whom he ſtrake through the Curace, and wounded in the breſt. Hauing giuen this ſtroake, which was his laſt, he receiued immediately the fatall blow, which gaue period at once to his ambition and life, being wounded vnder the eye with a dart, throwne by a baſe fellow; wherewith aſtonied, he fell dead from his horſe, or ſo hurt, that it was vnpoſſible to haue recouered him, though all which were with him, did their beſt for his ſafetie; not caring afterwards for their owne liues, when once they perceiued that Cyrus their Maſter was ſlaine. Artaxerxes cauſed the head and right hand of his brother to be forthwith ſtricken off, and ſhewed to his people, who now purſuing them, fled apace, calling vpon the name of Cyrus, and deſiring him to pardon them. But when this great accident had breathed new courage into the Kings troupes, and vtterly diſmaied ſuch Perſian Captaines, as were now, euen in their owne eyes, no better than rebels; it was not long ere the Campe of Cyrus was taken, being quite abandoned, from whence Artaxerxes making all ſpeede, arriued quickly at the quarter of the Greekes, which was about three miles from the place where Cyrus fell. There he met with Tiſſaphernes, who hauing made way through the battaile of the Greekes, was ready now to ioyne with his Maſter in ſpoiling their Tents. Had not the newes, which Artaxerxes brought with him of his brothers death, beene ſufficient to counteruaile all diſaſters receiued, the exploit of Tiſſaphernes in breaking through the Greekes would haue yeelded little comfort. For Tiſſaphernes had not ſlaine any one man of the Greekes, but contrariwiſe, when he gaue vpon them, they opening their battaile, draue him with great ſlaughter through them, in ſuch wiſe, that he rather eſcaped as out of an hard paſſage, than forced his way through the ſquadron of the Greekes. Hereof the King being informed by him, and that the Greekes, as Maſters of the field, gaue chaſe to all that came in their ſight; they ranged their Companies into good order, and followed after theſe Greekes, intending to ſet vpon them in the reare. But theſe good Souldiers perceiuing the Kings approach, turned their faces, and made head againſt him; who not intending to ſeeke honour with danger of his life, wheeled about and fled, being purſued vnto a certaine Village, that lay vnder a Hill, on the top whereof he made a ſtand, rather in a bravery, than with purpoſe to attempt vpon theſe bold fellowes any further. For he knew well that his brothers death had ſecured his eſtate, whom he would ſeeme to haue ſlaine with his owne hand, thinking that fact alone ſufficient to giue reputation to his valour; and this reputation he thought that he might now preſerue well enough, ſhewing a manly looke, halfe a mile off. On the top of this Hill therefore he aduanced his Standard, a golden Eagle diſplaied on the top of a Speare. This enſigne might haue encouraged his people, had not ſome of the Greekes eſpied it, who not meaning that he ſhould abide ſo neere them, with all their power marched toward him. The King diſcouering their approach, fled vpon the ſpurre; ſo that none remained in the place of battaile, ſaue onely the Greekes, who had loſt that day not one man, nor taken any other harme, than that one of them was hurt with an arrow. Much they wondred that they heard no newes of Cyrus, but thinking that he was purſuing the Armie, they thought it was fitteſt for them, hauing that day done enough, to returne to their quarter, and take their Supper, to which they had good appetite, because the expectation of the Kings comming had giuen them no leisure to dine.

§. V.

The hard estate of the Greekes after the fight; and how Artaxerxes in vaine sought to haue made them yeelde vnto him.

IT was now about the setting of the Sunne, and they bringing home darke night with them, found their Campe spoiled, little, or nothing being left, that might seruе for foode: so that wanting victuals to satisfie their hunger, they refreshed their weary bodies with sleepe. In the meane season Artaxerxes returning to his Campe, which he entred by Torch-light, could not enioy the pleasure of his good fortune entire, because he perceiued that the baseneſse of his people, and weakeneſse of his Empire, was now plainely discouered to the Greekes: which gaue him assurance, that if any of these who had beheld the shamefull demeanor of his Armie, should liue to carry tidings home, it would not be long, ere with greater forces they disputed with him for his whole Signorie. Wherefore he resolued, to try all meanes, whereby he might bring them to destruction, and not let one escape to carry tidings of that which he had seene: to which purpose he sent them a braue message the next morning, Charging them to deliuer vp their Armes, and come to his Gates, to awaite there vpon his Mercie. It seemes that he was in good hope to haue found their high courages broken, vpon report of his brothers death: but he was greatly deceiued in that thought. For the Greekes being aduertised that morning from Arieus, a principall Commander vnder Cyrus, that his Master being slaine, he had retired himselfe to the place of their last encamping, about eight miles from them, whence intending to returne into Ionia; his meaning was to dislodge the next day, awaiting for them so long if they would ioyne with him; but resoluing to stay no longer: they sent answere backe to Arieus, that hauing beaten the King out of the field, and finding none that durst resist them, they would place Arieus himselfe in the Kings Throne, if he would ioyne with them, and pursue the victory. Before they receiued any reply to this answere, the Messengers of Artaxerxes arriued at the Campe, whose errand seemed to the Captaines very insolent. One told them, that it was noe for the Vanquishers to yeelde their Weapons; another, that he would dye ere he yeelded to such a motion; a third asked, whether the King, as hauing the victory, required their Weapons; if so, why did he not fetch them? or, whether he desired them in way of friendship; for then would they first know, with what courtesie he meant to requite their kindneſse. To this question Phalinus a Grecian, waiting vpon Tissaphernes, answered; That the King hauing slaine Cyrus, knew no man that could pretend any Title to his Kingdome, in the middest whereof he held them fast encloſed with great Riuers, being able to bring against them such numbers of men, as they wanted strength to kill if they would hold vp their throats; for which cause he accounted them his prisoners. These words, to them, who knew themselues to be free, were nothing pleasant. Therefore, one told Phalinus, that hauing nothing left, but their Armes and Valour, whilest they kept their Armes, their Valour would be seruiceable; but should they yeelde them, it was to be doubted, that their bodies would not long remaine their owne. Hereat Phalinus laughed, saying; This young man did seeme a Philosopher, and made a pretty speech; but that his deepe speculation shewed his wits to be very shallow, if he thought with his Armes and Valour, to preuaile against the great King. It seemes that Phalinus being a Courtier, and imployed in a busineſse of importance, thought himselfe too profound a States-man, to be chekt in his Embassage by a bookish discourser. But his wisedome herein failed him. For whatsoeuer he himselfe was (of whom no more is knowne than that he brought an vnhoneſt message to his owne Countrimen, perswading them basely to surrender their Weapons, and Liues, to the mercileſse Barbarians) this young Scholler by him despised, was that great Xenophon, who, when all the principall Commanders were surprised by treacherie of the Persians, being a priuate Gentleman, and hauing neuer seene the warres before, vnder-tooke the conduct of the Armie, which he brought safe into Greece, freeing it from all those, and from greater dangers than Phalinus could propound. Some there were who promised to be faithfull to the King, as they had beene to Cyrus, offering their their seruice in Aegypt, where they thoaght Artaxerxes might haue vse of them. But the finall answer was, That without Weapons they could neither doe the King good as Friends, nor defend themselues from him as Enemies. Hereupon Phalinus deliuered the Kings further pleasure, which was to grant them Truce, whilest they abode where they then were, denouncing Warre if they stirred thence. Whereunto he required their answere. Clearchus the Generall told him, they liked it. How (saith Phalinus) must I vnderstand you? as choosing peace if we stay, or otherwise warre, said Clearchus. But whether warre or peace? quoth this politique Embassadour. To whom Clearchus (not willing to acquaint him with their purpose,) Let our doings tell you, and so dismissed him, no wiser than he came. All that day the Greekes were faine to feede vpon their Horses, Asses, and other Beasts, which they rosted with arrowes, darts, and woodden targets, throwne away by the Enemies.

§. VI.

How the Greekes began to returne home-wards.

AT night they tooke their way towards Arieus, to whom they came at mid-night; being forsaken by foure hundred foot, and forty horse, all Thracians, who fled ouer to the King, by whom how they were entertained, I doe not finde. Like enough it is that they were cut in pieces; for had they beene kindly vsed, it may well be thought that some of them should haue accompanied Tissaphernes, and serued as Stales to draw in the rest. Arieus being of too base a temper, and birth, to thinke vpon seeking the Kingdome for himselfe, with such assistance as might haue giuen it vnto Cyrus, was very well pleased to make couenant with them for mutuall assistance vnto the last: Whereunto both parts hauing sworne, he aduised them to take another way homeward, which should be somewhat longer, yet safer and fitter to relieue them with victuals, than that by which they came. The next day, hauing made a wearisome march, & tired the Souldiers, they found the Kings Armie which had coasted them, lodged in certaine Villages, where they purposed themselues to haue encamped: towards which Clearchus made directly, because he would not seeme by declining them to shew feare, or weakenesse. That the Kings men were contented to remoue, and giue place to their betters, it cannot be strange to any that hath considered their former behauiour; Nor strange, that the Grecians being weary and hungry, and lying among enemies in an vnknowne Countrie, should be very fearefull: but it is almost past beliefe, that the noise which was heard of these poore men, calling one to another tumultuously, as the present condition inforced them to doe, should make the Persians flie out of their Campe, and so affright the great King, that instead of demanding their Armes, he should craue peace of them. The next day very early, came messengers from Artaxerxes, desiring free accesse for Embassadours, to entreat of peace. Were it not that such particulars doe best open the quality of the persons, by whom things were managed, I should hold it fitter, to run ouer the generall passages of those times, than to dwell among circumstances. But surely it is a point very remarkeable, That when Clearchus had willed the Messengers to bid the King prepare for battaile, because the Greeks (as he said) wanting whereupon to dine, could not endure to heare of truce till their bellies were full; Artaxerxes dissembling the indignity, was contented sweetly to swallow downe this pill, sending them guides, who conducted them to a place where was plenty of victuals to relieue them.

How Tissaphernes, vnder colour of peace, betraied all the Captaines of the Greekes.

HItherto the Greekes, relying vpon their owne vertue, had rather aduanced their affaires, than brought themselues into any straights or feares of disaduantage. But now came vnto them the subtile Foxe Tissaphernes, who circumuenting the chiefe Commanders by fine sleights, did mischieuously entrappe them, to the extreame danger of the Armie. He told them, that his Prouince, lying neere vnto Greece, had caused him greatly to desire, that their deliuerance might be wrought by his procurement, knowing well that in time to come, both they, and their Countrimen at home, would not be vnthankefull for such a benefit. Herewithall he forgot not to rehearse the great seruice that he had done to his Master, being the first that aduertised him of Cyrus his intent, and hauing not onely brought him a good strength of men, but in the day of battaile shewed his face to the Greekes, when all others turned their backes: that he, together with the King, did enter their Campe, and gaue chase to the Barbarians that stood on the part of Cyrus. All this (quoth he) did I alleadge to the King, entreating that he would giue me leaue to conduct you safe into Greece; in which suite I haue good hope to speede, if you will send a milde answere to him, who hath willed me to aske you, for what cause ye haue borne Armes against him. The Captaines hearing this, were contented to giue gentle words, which Tissaphernes relating to the King, procured (though very hardly as he said) that peace should be granted: the conditions whereof were; That they should passe freely through all the Kings Dominions, paying for that they tooke, and committing no spoile: yet that it should be lawfull for them to take victuals by force, in any place that refused to affoord them an open Market. Hereupon both parties hauing sworne, the League was concluded, and Tissaphernes returning to the King to take leaue, and end all businesse, came vnto them againe after twenty dayes, and then they set forward. This interim of twenty dayes, which Tissaphernes did spend at the Court, ministred great occasion of mistrust to his new Confederates. For besides his long absence, which alone sufficed to breede doubt, the Brethren, and Kindred of Arieus, retaining daily to him, and other Persians to his Soulders, did worke him and them so with assurance of pardon, and other allurements, that he daily grew more strange to the Greekes, than formerly he had beene. This caused many to aduise Clearchus, rather to passe forward as well as he might, than to relye vpon couenants, and sit still whilest the King layed snares to entrappe them. But he on the contrary perswaded them, to rest contented whilest they were well, and not to cast themselues againe into those difficulties, out of which they were newly freed by the late Treatie; reciting withall their owne wants, and the Kings meanes, but especially the Oathes mutually giuen and taken, wherewith he saw no reason why the enemie should haue clogged himselfe if he meant mischiefe, hauing power enough to doe them harme by a faire and open Warre.

Tissaphernes was a very honourable man (if honour may be valued by greatnesse and place in Court) which caused his Oath to be the more esteemed; for as much as no inforcement, or base respect, was like to haue drawne it from him. But his falshood was such, both in substance and in succesſe, as may fitly expound that saying, which proceeded from the fountaine of Truth, I hate a rich man a lyar. A lye may finde excuse when it growes out of feare: for that passion hath his originall from weakenesse. But when Power, which is a Character of the Almighty, shall be made the supporter of vntruth, the falshood is most abominable; for the offender, like proud Lucifer, aduancing his owne strength against the diuine Iustice, doth commit that sinne with an high hand, which commonly produceth lamentable effects, and is followed with sure vengeance. It was not long ere Tissaphernes found meanes to destroy all the Captaines, whom he subtilly got into his power by a traine; making the Generall Clearchus himselfe the meane to draw in all the rest. The businesse was contriued thus: Hauing trauailed some dayes together in such wise, that the Persians did not encampe with the Greekes, who were very iealous of the great familiarity, appearing betweene Tissaphernes, and Arieus; Clearchus thought it conuenient to roote out of Tissaphernes his braines all causes of distrust, whereof many had growne in that short time. To which purpose obtaining priuate conference with him, he rehearsed the oath of Confederacie, which had past betweene them, shewing how religiously he would keepe it, and repeating the benefits, which the Greekes did receiue by the helpe of Tissaphernes, he promised that their loue should appeare to him not vnfruitfull, if he would make vse of their seruice against the Mysians or Pisidians, who were accustomed to infest his Prouince, or against the Aegyptians, who were then Rebels to the great King. For which cause he desired him, that whereas all diuine and humane respects had linked them together, he would not giue place to any close accusation or suspition, whereby might grow sudden inconuenience to either of them, vpon no iust ground. The faithlesse Persian was very much delighted with this speech, which ministred faire occasion to the execution of his purpose: Therefore he told Clearchus, that all this was by him wisely considered, wishing him further to call to minde how many waies he could haue vsed to bring them to confusion, without perill to himselfe, especially by by burning the country, through which they were to passe, whereby they must needs haue perished by meere famine. For which cause he said that it had beene great folly, to seeke by periurie, odious to God and Man, the destruction of such as were already in his hands. 3. But the truth was, that his owne loue to them had moued him to worke their safetie, not onely for those ends which Clearchus had recounted, of pleasures that might redound to himselfe, and the King, by their assistance: but for that hee might by their friendship, hope to obtaine what Cyrus had mist. Finally, he inuited the credulous Gentleman to Supper, and sent him away so well assured of his good will, that he promised to bring all the Captaines with him to the same place, where, in presence of them all, Tissaphernes likewise promised to tell openly, which of them had by secret information sought to raise dissension betweene them. Clearchus himselfe being thus deceiued, with great importunitie drew all the chiefe Commanders, and many of the inferiour Leaders, to repaire with him to the Campe of Tissaphernes, whither followed them about two hundred of the common Souldiers as it had been to some common Faire. But being there arriued, Clearchus with other the fiue principall Coronels, were called into the Tent, the rest staying without, where they had not waited long ere a signe was giuen, vpon which they within were apprehended, and the residue slaine. Forth-with certaine bands of Persian Horse-men scoured the field, killing as many Greekes as they met, and riding vp to the very Campe of the Gracians, who wondred much at the tumult, whereof they knew not the cause, till one, escaping sorely wounded, informed them of all that had beene done. Hereupon the Greekes tooke Armes in haste, thinking that the enemy would forthwith haue assailed their Campe. Anon they might perceiue the Embassadours of Tissaphernes, among whom were his owne brother, and Arieus, followed with three hundred Horse, who called for the principall men in the Armie, saying, that they brought a message from the King, which Arieus deliuered to this effect: That Clearchus hauing broken his faith, and the league made, was iustly rewarded with death; that Menon and Proxenus, two other of the fiue Coronels, for detecting his treacherie, were highly honored: and finally, that the King required them to surrender their Arms, which were due to him, as hauing belonged vnto his seruant Cyrus. When some altercation had followed vpon this message, Xenophon told the Embassadours, that if Clearchus had in such sort offended, it was well that he was in such sort punished: but hee willed them to send backe Menon and Proxenus, whom they had so greatly honoured, that by them, as by common friends to both Nations, the Greekes might be aduised how to answer the Persian. Hereunto the Embassadours know not how to frame any reply, and therfore departed without speaking one word more. Clearchus, and the other foure were sent to Artaxerxes, by whose commandement their heads were stricken off. I hold it not amisse to preuent the order of time, annexing to this perfidiousnesse of Tissaphernes, the reward which he afterward receiued. He saw his Prouince wasted by the Greekes, against whom receiuing from his Master conuenient aid of men and money, he did so ill manage his affaires, that neither subtiltie, nor periurie (to which he failed not to haue recourse) availed him; finally, the King was iealous of his cunning head, and sent a new Lieutenant into those parts, who tooke it from his shoulders. Such was the recompence of his treacherie, which made him so mistrusted at home, that the seruice which he could not doe, he was thought vpon priuate ends to neglect; and so hated abroad, that he knew not which way to flie from the stroke, all the word being shut against him. But now let vs returne to the prosperitie, wherein hee triumphed without great cause, hauing betrayed brauer men then himselfe, and intending to bring the like mischiefe vpon the whole Armie.

§. VIII.

How Xenophon heartened the Greekes; and in despight of Tissaphernes went off safely.

GReat was the heauinesse of the Souldiers, being now left destitute of Leaders; and no lesse their feare of the euill hanging ouer their heads, which they knew not well how to auoide. Among the rest, Xenophon, whose learning supplied his want of experience, finding the deepe sadnesse of the whole Armie to be such as hindred them from taking any course of preuenting the danger at hand, began to aduise the vndervnder-Officers of Proxenus his companies, whose familiar friend he had beene, to bethinke themselues of some meane, whereby their safety might be wrought, and the Souldiers encouraged: setting before their eyes whatsoeuer might serue for to giue them hope, and aboue all, perswading them in no wise to yeeld to the mercy of their barbarous enemies.

Hereupon they desired him to take vpon him the charge of that Regiment; and so together with him, the same night calling vp such as were remaining of any accoqnt, they made choice of the fittest men to succeed in the places of those who were slaine, or taken. This being done, and order set downe for disburdening the Armie of all superfluous impediments, they easily comforted themselues for the losse of Tissaphernes his assistance, hoping to take victuals by force better cheape than he had beene wont to sell them; To which purpose they intended to take vp their lodging two or three miles further, among some plentifull Villages, and so to proceed, marching towards the heads of those great Riuers, which lay in their way, and to passe them where they were foordable. Many attempts were made vpon them by Tissaphernes, whom they, seruing all on foot, were not able to requite for the harme which they receiued by the Persian Archers, who shot at a farther distance than the Greekes could reach. For this cause did Xenophon prouide slings, wherewith hee ouer-reached the enemy; and finding some Horses fit for seruice, that were imployed among the carriages, he set men vpon them; training likewise his Archers to shoot compasse, who had been accustomed to the point blanke. By these meanes did he beare off the Persians who assailed him; and sometimes gaue them chase with that band of fiftie Horse, which being well backt with a firme bodie of footmen, and seconded with troupes of the light-armed-shot & slingers, compelled the enemie to lie a-loof. Tissaphernes not daring to come to handie-gripes with these resolute men, did possesse the tops of Mountaines, and places of aduantage, by which they were to passe. But finally, when their valour made way through all such difficulties, he betooke himselfe to that course, which was indeed the surest, of burning the Countrie. With great sorrow did the Greekes behold the Villages on fire, and thereby all hope of victuals cut off. Some aduised to defend the Countrie, as granted by the enemie himselfe to be theirs; others to make more fires, if so perhaps the Persians might be ashamed to doe that which was the desire of such as made passage in hostile manner; But these were faint comforts. The best counsaile was, that being neere vnto the Carduchi, a people enemie to the Persian, they should enter into their Country, passing ouer some high mountaines which lay betweene them. This course they followed, which could not haue auailed them, if Tissaphernes had begun sooner to cut off their victuals, rather then to seeke to force, or to circumuent them by his fine wit.

The difficulties which the Greeke Armie found in passing through the Land of the Carduchi.

ENtring vpon the Land of the Carduchi, they were encountred with many difficulties of waies, but much more afflicted by the fierce Inhabitants, who, accustomed by force to defend themselues against the huge Armies of the Persian, were no way inferiour to the Greekes in daring, but onely in the Art of Warre. They were very light of foot, skilfull Archers; and vsed the Sling well; which weapons in that mountainous Countrie were of much vse against these poore trauellers, afflicting them in seuen daies which they spent in that passage, farre more than all the power of the great King had done. Betweene the Territorie of these Carduchi, and the parts of Armenia confining them, ranne Centrites, a great Riuer, vpon which the Greekes refreshed themselues one day, reioycing that they had so well escaped these dangers, and hoping that the remainder would proue easie. But the next morning they saw certaine troupes of Horse, that lay to forbid their passage. These were leauied by the Kings deputies in those parts; Tissaphernes and his Companies hauing taken their way towards Ionia. The Riuer was broad and deepe, so that it was not possible for such as would enter it, to make resistance against those which kept the opposite bankes. To increase these dangers the Carduchi following vpon them, lay on the side of a Mountaine, within lesse than a mile of the water. But it was their good hap to discouer a Foord, by which the greater number of them passing ouer, did easily chase away the Subiects of the Persian, and then sending backe the most expedite men, gaue succour to the Reare-ward, against which the Carduchi being slightly armed, could not on plaine ground make resistance hand to hand. These Carduchi seeme to haue inhabited the Mountaines of Niphates, which are not farre from the Spring of Tygris; though Ptolomie place them far more to the East vpon the Riuer of Cyrus in Media, wherein he differs much from Xenophon, whose relation being grounded vpon his owne knowledge, doth best in this case deserue credit. Of the Riuer Centrites (as of many other Riuers, Townes, and Places, mentioned by Xenophon) I will not labour to make a coniecture, which may endure the seuerity of a Criticke. For Ptolomie, and the whole Nation of Geographers, adde small light to this expedition: onely of this last, I thinke it the same which falleth into Tigris, not much aboue Artasigarta springing out of Niphates, and running by the Towne of Sardena in Gordene, a Prouince of Armenia the Great, wherein the Greekes hauing passed Centrites did arriue.

greater

How Teribazus Gouernour of Armenia, seeking to entrap the Greekes with tearmes of fained peace, was disappointed and shamefully beaten.

THe Armie finding in Armenia good prouision, marched without any disturbance about fiftie or threescore miles to the heads of the Riuer Tigris, and passing ouer them, trauailed as farre further without resistance, till they were encountred by Teribazus at the Riuer Teleboa, which Xenophon commends as a goodly water, though small; but Ptolomie and others omit it. Teribazus gouerned that Countrie for the Persian, and was in great fauor with Artaxerxes, whose Court may seeme to haue been a Schoole where the Art of falshood was taught as wisedome. He desired peace of the Greeks, which was made vpon this condition, that they should take what they pleased, but not burne downe the Townes and Villages in their way. As soone as he had made this league, he leauied an Armie, and besetting the Streights of certaine Mountaines which they were to passe, hoped well to make such benefit of their security, as might giue him the commendation of being no lesse craftily dishoneſt than Tissaphernes. Yet his cunning failed of successe. For a great snow fell, which caused the Greekes to make many fires, and scatter themselues abroad in the Villages. Teribazus also made many fires, and some of his men wandred about seeking relieſe. By the fires he was discouered, and by a Souldier of his that was taken prisoner, the whole plot was reuealed. Hereupon the Greekes, taking this captiue with them for a guide, sought him out, and comming vpon his Campe, did so affright him, that before the whole Armie could arriue there, the shout which was raised by the Vaunt-currors, chased him away. They tooke his Pauilion, wherein (besides many slaues, that were Artificers of voluptuousneſſe) very rich furniture was left by the treacherous coward, who returned no more to challenge it. From hence the Armie went Northward, and passing Euphrates, not farre below the springs thereof, trauailed with much difficulty through deepe snow, being followed aloofe by the enemie, who durst not approach them, but did cut off such as they found straggling behinde. The Inhabitants of the Countrey, through which they marched, had their wintering houses vnder ground, wherein was found great plentie of victuals, and of cattaile, which likewise did winter in the same Cellars with the owners. Hauing refreshed themselues in those parts, and taken sufficient ease after the miserable iourney, which had consumed many of them with extreame cold; they departed, leading with them many bond-slaues, and taking away (besides other Horses and Cattaile) some Colts that were bred vp for the great King.

§. XI.

The passage of the Armie to Trabizonde, through the Countries bordering vpon the Riuer of Phasis, and other obscure Nations.

SO without impediment they came to the Riuer Phasis, neere whereunto the people called Phasiani Taochi, and Chalybes were seated. These Nations ioyned together, and occupying the tops of a ledge of Mountaines, which the Greekes were were to passe, made countenance of warre: but some companies being sent by night to seize vpon a place of equall height to that whereon the enemies lay, making good the piece of ground which they had taken, secured the ascent of the rest; which caused these people to flye, euery one retyring to the defence of his owne. The first vpon whose Countrie the Greekes did enter were the Tacchi, who conueying all their prouision of victuals into strong holds, brought the Armie into much want, vntill with hard labour one place was forced, wherein great store of cattaile were taken; the people, to auoide captiuitie, threw themselues head-long downe the rockes, the very women throwing downe first their owne children, and then casting themselues vpon them. Here was taken a great bootie of Cattaile, which serued to feede them, trauailing through the land of the Chalybes, of whom they got nothing but strokes. The Chalybes were a very stout Nation, well armed at all points, and exceeding fierce. They encountred the Greekes hand to hand, killing as many as they tooke prisoners, and cutting off their heads, which they carried away, singing and dancing, to the great griefe of their companions liuing; who were glad, when after seauen dayes iourney they escaped from those continuall skirmishes, wherewith they had beene vexed by these Barbarians. Hence trauailing through a good corne-Countrie, inhabited by an obscure Nation called the Scythini, they came to a rich Towne, the Lord whereof, and of the Region adioyning, vsed them friendly, and promised to guide them to a Mountaine, whence they might discouer the Euxine Sea. From Gymnias (which was the name of his Towne) he led them through the Territorie of his enemies, desiring them to waste it with sword and fire. After fiue dayes march, they came to a Mountaine called Teches, being (as I thinke) a part of the Mountaines called Moschici, whence their guide shewed them the Sea; towards which they bent their course, and passing friendly through the Region of the Macrones, (with whom by meanes of an interpreter, found among themselues, who borne in that place had beene sold into Greece, they made a good peace) they arriued in the Land of Colchos, wherein stands the Citie of * Trabisond, called then Trapezus, a Colonie of the Greekes. The Colchi entertaining them with hostilitie, were requited with the like; for the Armie hauing now good leisure to repose themselues among their friends the Trapezuntians, did spoile the Countrie thirtie dayes together, forbearing onely the Borderers vpon Trabizonde, at the Citizens request.

* Trabisond a Colonie of the Greeke, situate in the bottome of the Euxine Sea.

§. XII.

How the Armie began at Trabizond to prouide a Fleet, wherewith to returne home by Sea: how it came into the Territorie of Sinope, and there prosequuted the same purpose.

HAuing now found an Hauen Towne, the Souldiers were desirous to take shipping, & change their tedious Land-iournies into an easie Nauigation. To which purpose Cherisophus a Lacedemonian, one of the principall Commanders, promised by meanes of Anaxibius the Lacedamonian Admirall, who was his friend, that he would prouide Vessels to embarke them. Hauing thus concluded, they likewise tooke order for the staying of such ships as should passe that way, meaning to vse them for their nauigation. Lest all this prouision should be found insufficient for the transportation of the whole Armie, Xenophon perswaded the Cities adioyning to cleare the wayes, and make an easie passage for them by Land; whereunto the Souldiers were vtterly vnwilling to giue eare, being desirous to returne by Sea; but the Countrie fearing what inconuenience might grow by their long stay, did readily condescend to Xenophons request. Two ships they borrowed of the Trapezuntians, which they manned and sent to Sea: the one of them sailed directly into Greece, forsaking their Companions, who had put them in trust to bring ships into the Port of Trabisonde: the other tooke Merchants and passengers, whose goods were safely kept for the owners, but the Vessels were staied to increase the fleet. After long aboade, when victuals began to faile, by reason that all the Land of the Colchi, neere vnto the Campe was already quite wasted, they were faine to embarke their sicke men, with the women, children, and such of the baggage as might best be spared, in those few ships which they had already prouided. The rest of the Armie tooke their way by Land to Cerasus, a Greeke Towne, where the fleet likewise arriued. Here the Armie being mustered, was found to consist of eight thousand and sixe hundred men. From hence they passed through the Countrie of the * Mosynaci, who were

diuided into factions. The stronger partie, despising their friendship, caused them to ioyne them with the weaker, whom they left Masters of all.

The next place of their abode was [b] Cotyora, a Greeke Towne likewise, and a Colonie of the Sinopians, as Trapezus and Cerasus were; but the entertainment which here they found was very churlish, hauing neither an open Market afforded to them, nor the sicke men that were among them admitted into any house. Hereupon the Souldiers entred the Towne by force, and (committing no outrage) bestowed those which were sicke in conuenient lodgings, taking into their owne hands the custody of the Gates. Prouision for the Armie they made by strong hand, partly out of the Territorie of the Paphlagonians, partly out of the Lands belonging to the Towne. These newes were vnwelcome to [c] Sinope, whence Embassadours were sent to the Camp, who complaining of these dealings, and threatning to ioyne with the Paphlagonians, if redresse could not otherwise be had, were roundly answered by Xenophon, That meere necessitie had enforced the Army to teach those of Cotyora good manners in so bad a methode: letting them know, that he feared not to deale with them and the Paphlagonian at once; though perhaps the Paphlagonian would be glad to take Sinope it selfe, to which, if cause were giuen, they would lend assistance. Vpon this answere the Embassadors grew better aduised, promising all friendship that the State of Sinope could shew, and commanding the Towne of Cotyora to relieue the Souldiers as well as they might. Further, they promised to assist them with shipping, letting them vnderstand how difficult the passage by Land would proue, in regard of the many and great Riuers, as Thermodon, Iris, Halys, and Parthenius, which crossed their way. This good counsaile, and the faire promises accompanying it, were kindly accepted by the Armie, which well perceiued, that the City of Sinope would spare for no cost, to be freed from such a neighbourhood. It was therefore decreed that they would passe the rest of the way by Sea; prouided that if there should want such number of Vessels as might serue to imbarke euery one of them, then would they not put from the shore.

[b] Cotyora a Port-Towne in the same Region.

§. XIII.

Of dissension which arose in the Armie; and how it was embarked.

HItherto the danger of enemies, and miseries of weather and wants, had kept the companie in firme vnitie; which now beganne to dissolue and to thaw, by the neighbouring aire of Greece, warming their heads with priuate respects to their seuerall ends and purposes. Whilest they, who were sent as Agents from the Campe, remained at Sinope; Xenophon considering the strength and valour of his men, and the opportunitie of the coast whereon they lay, thought it would be an honourable worke to build a City in those parts, which were soone like to proue great and wealthie, in regard both of their owne puissance, and of the great repaire of the Greekes into that quarter. For this cause he made sacrifice, according to the superstition of his time and Countrie, diuining of his successe by the entrailes of beasts. The Sooth-sayer whom he imployed had receiued a great reward of Cyrus, for coniecturing aright, that Artaxerxes would not giue battaile in ten daies: he therefore, hauing preserued his money carefully, was desirous to be soone at home, that hee might freely enioy his gettings. By him the purpose of Xenophon was diuulged, which was interpreted according to the diuersitie of mens opinions; some approuing the motion, but the greater part reiecting it. They of Sinope and Heraclea, being informed of this consultation, were sore afraid, lest the pouertie of the Souldiers, who had not wherewith to maintaine themselues at home, should giue successe to the proiect. Which to preuent, they promised to supply the Armie with a sufficient fleet, and likewise offered money to some of the Captaines, who thereupon vndertooke to giue the Souldiers pay, if they would presently set saile for Greece. One of these Captaines being a banished man, desired them to follow him into Troas; another offered to leade them into Cherronesus. Xenophon who desired onely the common good, was pleased greatly with these propositions, and professed openly that hee would haue them to set forward, and hold together in any case, punishing him as a traitor that should forsake the Armie, before such time as they were arriued at their iournies end. Silanus the Sooth-sayer, who had vttered Xenophons purpose, was heereby staied from out-running his fellowes, and driuen to abide with his wealth among poore men, longer than

ſtood with his good liking. Alſo the other Captaines were much troubled and afraid, when they perceiued, that ſhips were prepared ſufficient for their Nauigation, but that the money promiſed to them, and by them to the Souldiers, came not. For the people of Sinope, and Heraclea, knowing that the Armie was now reſolued for the voyage, and that Xenophon, whom they feared, had perſiuaded them to this reſolution, thought it the wiſeſt way to furniſh them with a Nauie whileſt they were in good readineſſe to depart, but to keepe the money to themſelues. The Captaines therefore who being diſappointed by theſe Townes, found themſelues in great danger of their men, whom they had deceiued with faire hopes, repented much of their faire offers, and ſignifying as much to Xenophon, prayed him to make propoſition to the Armie, of taking the ſhips, and ſayling to Phaſis, where they might ſeize vpon Lands, and plant themſelues in ſuch wiſe as ſhould ſtand beſt with their good liking. But finding him cold in the buſineſſe, they began to worke the principall of their owne followers, hoping by them to draw in all the reſt. Theſe newes becomming publike, bred a ſuſpition of Xenophon, as if he had won the reſt of the Captaines to his purpoſe, and meant now to carry the Army quite another way from their owne home. Wherfore aſſembling the Companies, he gaue them ſatisfaction, and withall complained of ſome diſorders which he cauſed them to redreſſe. A generall inquiſition was likewiſe made of offences committed ſince the death of Cyrus; which being puniſhed, all things were in quiet. Shortly after came Embaſſadours from Corylas, Lord of the Paphlagonians, who ſending preſents deſired peace of the Greeks: the Embaſſadours were friendly entertained, and peace concluded, which needed not to haue beene ſought, for that the Greeks hauing now their fleet in a readines, did ſoone weigh Anchors, and ſet ſaile for Harmene the Port of Sinope, whither Cheriſophus came, bringing with him a few Gallies from the Admiral Anaxibius, who promiſed to giue the Army pay as ſoone as they came into the parts of Greece.

§. XIIII.

Another great diſſenſion and diſtraction of the Armie. How the mutiners were beaten by the Barbarians, and reſcued by Xenophon.

THe neerer that they approached to Greece, the greater was their deſire to make prouiſion for themſelues, that they might not returne home emptie-handed. Wherefore truſting well that if the charge of the Armie were abſolutely committed to one ſufficient man, he might the more conueniently procure the good of them all, they determined to make Xenophon ſole Commander of all; in whoſe fauour as well the Captaines as the common Souldiers were very earneſt and violent. But he, either fearing to diſpleaſe the Lacedæmonians, who were iealous of him already (being incenſed by that fugitiue who forſooke the Army at Trabizond, flying with one of their two ſhips) or moued by ſome tokens appearing to him in the entrails that threatned ill ſucceſſe to his gouernment, procured with vehement contention, that this honour was laied vpon Cheriſophus a Lacedæmonian. It ſeemes that Xenophon, conſidering the vexation incident to the conduct of a voluntary Armie, wanting pay, did wiſely in yeelding to ſuch tokens as forbad him to accept it: eſpecially, knowing ſo well their deſire, which was by right or by wrong to get wealth whereſoeuer it might be found, without all regard of Friend or Foe. Cheriſophus had beene Generall but ſixe or ſeauen dayes, when he was depoſed, for hauing beene vnwilling to rob the Towne of Heraclea which had ſent preſents to the Campe, and beene very beneficiall vnto them in lending ſhips for their tranſportation. Two daies they had ſailed by the coaſt of Aſia, when being paſt thoſe great Riuers, which would haue giuen impediment to their iourney by Land, they touched at Heraclea, where conſulting how to take their way onwards: whether by Land or Sea, one ſeditious man began to put them in minde of ſeeking to get ſomewhat for themſelues, telling them that all their prouiſion would be ſpent in three dayes, and that being now come out of the enemies Countrie, victuals and other neceſſaries could not be had without money; for which cauſe he gaue aduice to ſend meſſengers into the Towne of Heraclea, giuing the Citizens to vnderſtand what their wants were, and demanding of them three thouſand pieces of money, called Cyzicens, which ſumme amounteth to two thouſand and fiue hundred pound ſtarling, or thereabout. This motion was greatly applauded, and the ſum raiſed to ten thouſand Cyzicens at leaſt: which to require, they thought Cheriſophus, as being Generall, the fittest man; others had more desire to send Xenophon: but in vaine, for they both refused it, and renounced the action as dishonest. Lest therefore either of these should faile in managing the businesse which agreed not with his disposition, others of more impudency and lesse discretion were sent, who in such wise deliuered their insolent message; that the Citizens taking time to deliberate vpon their request, brought what they could out of the fields into the Towne, and shutting the Gates, did forthwith man the wals. When the Souldiers perceiued themselues to be disappointed of their rauenous purpose, they fell to mutiny, saying, That their Leaders had betrayed them: and being for the more part of them Arcadians and Achaans, they forsooke immediately Cherisophus and Xenophon, choosing new Leaders out of their owne number. Aboue foure thousand and fiue hundred they were, all heauily armed, who electing ten Captaines, sailed into the Port of Calphas, which is in the mid-way betweene Heraclea and Bizantium, with purpose to assaile the Bythinians on the suddaine. With Cherisophus there abode two thousand and one hundred, of whom one thousand and foure hundred were armed weightily: Xenophon had two thousand foot, three hundred whereof were lightly armed, and fortie horse, which small band had done good seruice already, and could not haue beene spared now. Cherisophus had agreed with Cleander Gouernour of Bizantium, to meet him at the mouth of the Riuer Calphas, whither Cleander promised to bring some Gallies to conuey him ouer into Greece; for which cause he tooke his way thither by Land, leauing to Xenophon such shipping as he had; who passing some part of the way by Sea, landed vpon the Confines of Heraclea, and Thracia Asiatica, intending to make a cut through the mid-land-Countrie to the Propont. The Mutiners, who had landed at Calphas by night, with purpose to take spoiles in Bythinia, diuided themselues into ten Companies, euery Captaine leading his owne Regiment into some Village, fiue or sixe miles from the Sea, in the greater Townes were two Regiments quartered; and so was that part of the countrie surprised on the suddaine, and sacked all at one time. The place of Rendeuous was an high peece of ground, where some of them arriued, finding no disturbance; others, not without much trouble and danger; two Companies were broken and defeated, onely eight men escaped, the rest were all put to the sword. For the Thracians which had slipt at first out of the Souldiers hands, did raise the Countrie, & finding the Greeks loden with bootie, took the aduantage of their disorder, cutting in pieces those two Regiments: which done, they attempted the rest, encompassing the hill wheron they encamped. One great aduantage the Thracians had, that being all light armed, they could at pleasure make retrait from these Arcadians & Achaans: who wanting the assistance of horse, & hauing neither Archers nor Slingers among them, were driuen to stand meerely vpon their defence, bearing off with greater danger, & many wounds receiued, the Darts and Arrows of the Barbarians, till finally they were driuen from their watering place, and enforced to craue parly. Whatsoeuer the articles of composition were, the Thracians yeelded to all; but pledges for assurance they would giue none, without which the Greeks well knew, that all promises of such people, especially so incensed, were nothing worth. In the meane time Xenophon holding his way quietly through the In-land Region, did enquire of some Trauailers, whether they knew ought of any Graecia Army, passing along those parts: & receiuing by them true information of the desperate case into which these Gallats had foolishly throwne themselues, he marched directly towards the place where they lay, taking with him for guides them who gaue him the intelligence. His horse-men he sent before to discouer, & to scowre the wayes; the light-armed foot-men tooke the hill tops on either hand, all of them setting fire on whatsoeuer they found combustible, whereby the whole Countrie seemed to be on a light flame, to the great terrour of the enemies, who thought that some huge Armie had approached. That night he encamped on a hill, within fiue mile of the Arcadians, encreasing still the number of his fires, which he caused hastily to be quenched soone after Supper. The enemies perceiuing this, thought certainly that he would haue fallen vpon them in the darke, which caused them in all haste to dislodge. Early in the next morning Xenophon comming thither in very good order, to haue giuen battaile, found that his deuice, to affright the Thracians, had taken full effect; but he marualled that the Greekes were also departed, concerning whom he learned by enquirie, that they remoued at breake of day, and perceiued by signes that they had taken the way to the Port of Calphas, in which iourney he ouertooke them. They embraced Him, and His, with great ioy: Confessing that they themselues had thought the same which the enemies did, looking that he should haue come by night; wherein finding themselues deceiued, they were afraid lest he had forsaken them, and therefore hastened away, to ouertake him, and ioyne with him. So they arriued at the Hauen of Calpas, where it was decreed, That whosoeuer from thenceforth made any motion to disioyne the Armie, should suffer death.

§. XV.

Of diuers pieces of Seruice done by Xenophon; and how the Armie returned into Greece. The occasions of the Warre betweene the Lacedæmonians and the Persian.

THe Hauen of Calpas lay vnder a goodly head-land, that was very strong, and abounding with all kinde of Graine and Fruits, except Oliues. There was also Timber for building and shipping, and a very conuenient sea for a great Citie. All which commodities, that might haue allured the Souldiers to stay there, and to plant, caused them to haste away, fearing lest Xenophon should finde some deuice to haue setled himselfe and them in that place. For the greater part of them had good meanes to liue at home; neither did they so much for hope of gaine follow Cyrus in that Warre, as in regard of his Honour, and the loue which they bare vnto him: the poorer sort were such as left their Parents, Wiues, and Children, to whom (though failing of the riches which they had hoped to purchase) they were now desirous to returne. But whether it were so that Xenophon found aduantage by their owne superstition, to make them stay, which they greatly suspected; or whether the signes appearing in the entrailes, did indeede forbid their departure: so long they were inforced to abide in the place till victuals failed; neither would the Captaines leade them forth to forrage the Countrie, vntill the Sacrifices should promise good successe. Cherisophus was dead of an Ague, and his ships were gone, being returned to the Heracleans, of whom they were borrowed. His followers were ioyned to the rest of the Armie, which the greater it was, the more prouision it needed, and the sooner felt want. For which cause, he that was chosen Coronell into the place of Cherisophus, would needes aduenture to gratifie the Souldiers with the spoile of some Villages that stood neere at hand; in which enterprise he found ill successe, the whole Countrie lying in waite to entrap him, and an Armie of Horse being sent by Pharnabazus the Satrapa, or Vice-roy of Phrygia, to the assistance of these Bythinian Thracians, which troupes falling vpon the Greekes that were scattered abroade in seeking bootie, slew fiue hundred of them, and chased the rest to a certaine Mountaine thereby. The newes of this ouerthrow comming to Xenophon, he led forth a part of the Armie to the rescue of those that suruiued, and brought them safe to the Campe; vpon which the Bythinians made an offer that night, and breaking a Corps du garde, slew some, pursuing the rest to the very Tents. This new courage of the enemy, together with the present condition of the Armie, so disheartened and vnfurnished of necessaries, caused the Greekes to remoue their Campe to a place of more strength; which hauing intrenched, and committed to the defence of such as were least able to endure trauaile, Xenophon with the firmest and best able men went forth, both to burie those which were lately slaine, and to abate the pride of the Thracians, and their assistants. In this iourney his demeanour was very honourable. For hauing giuen buriall to the dead, the Enemy was discouered, lying on the tops of the Hils adioyning, to whom (notwithstanding that the way was very rough, and troublesome, so that some thought it a matter of too great danger, to leaue at their backes a wood scarce passeable) he marched directly, telling his men plainely, that he had rather follow the enemy with halfe the number, than turne his back to them with twice as many; and letting them further know, that if they did not charge the Barbarians, he would not faile with the greater resolution to pursue them, from whom if they could safely retire to the campe, yet what should they doe there, wanting victuals to sustaine them in the place, and ships, to carrie them away? Wherefore he willed them rather to fight well that day, hauing eaten their dinners, than an other day fasting; and not to regard the vneasie returne, which might serue to stay Cowards from running away, but to wish vnto the Enemie a faire and easie way, by which he might flye from them. These perswasions were followed with so valiant execution, that both Persians and Bythinians being chased out of the field, abandoned the Countrie forthwith, remouing their Families, and leauing all that could not sodainely be conueighed away, to the discretion of the Greekes, who at good leisure gathered the harueſt of theſe bad Neighbours fields. This was the laſt fight which they had on the ſide of Aſia. For they were not onely ſuffered quietly to enioy the ſpoile of the Countrie, but when the opinion grew common in thoſe parts, that it was the intent of Xenophon to plant a Colonie on the Port of Calpas, Embaſſadours were ſent from the Neighbour people, to deſire friendſhip, and make offer of their beſt aſſiſtance. But the Souldiers had no minde to ſtay. Wherefore entring further into Bythinia, they tooke a great bootie, which they carried away to Chryſopolis, a Citie neere vnto Chalcedon, where they ſold it. Pharnabazus, Lieutenant in Phrygia to Artaxerxes, did greatly feare, leſt their long ſtay in that Countrie might breede in them a deſire to viſite his Prouince, where they might haue found great wealth, and little power to guard it. Therefore he ſent to the Lacedæmonian Admirall, entreating him with much inſtance and large promiſes to waft them ouer into Europe; to whom Anaxibius the Admirall condeſcending, promiſed to giue the Souldiers pay, as ſoone as they arriued at Bizantium. So were they carried out of Aſia at the intreatie of the Perſian, who in the height of his pride had thought them ſo ſurely impriſoned with mighty Riuers, that he not onely denied to permit their quiet departure, but willed them to ſurrender their Armes into his hands, and ſo to yeeld their liues to his diſcretion. How diſcourteouſly they were intreated by Anaxibius, and how to requite his iniurious dealings, they ſeized vpon Bizantium, which by Xenophons perſwaſion they forbare to ſacke, I hold it ſuperfluous to relate. For the reſidue of their doings appertaine little to the generall courſe of things. But this expedition, as in all ages it was glorious, ſo did it both diſcouer the ſecrets of Aſia, and ſtirre vp the Greekes to thinke vpon greater enterpriſes, than euer their forefathers had vndertaken. Likewiſe it was the onely remarkeable action which the time affoorded. For the Roman warres did hitherto extend no further than to the next neighbouring Townes of Italie; and in Greece all things were quiet, the Lacedæmonians ruling inſolently, but without diſturbance. True it is, that the ſeedes of the Warre ſhortly following, which the Lacedæmonians made vpon Artaxerxes, were already ſowne, before theſe companies returned out of the high Countries of Aſia. For the Townes of Ionia, which had ſided with young Cyrus againſt Tiſſaphernes, if not againſt the great King, prepared to rebell; which they thought ſafer, than to fall into the hands of Tiſſaphernes, who was now appointed Lieutenant, both of his old Prouince, and of all that had belonged to Cyrus. Wherefore the Ionians beſought the Lacedæmonians to ſend them aide, whereby to recouer their libertie, and obtained their requeſt. For a power was ſent ouer, vnder conduct of Thimbro a Spartan, who beſtowed his men in ſuch Townes as had already reuolted, to ſecure the Cities and their Fields, but not to make any offenſiue Warre.

CHAP. XI.

Of the affaires of Greece, whileſt they were managed by the Lacedæmonians.

§. I.

How the Lacedæmonians tooke courage by example of Xenophons Armie, to make Warre vpon Artaxerxes.

IT ſeemes that the Lacedæmonians did well perceiue in how ill part Artaxerxes tooke their fauour ſhewed vnto his brother, and yet were timorous in beginning an open warre againſt him, thinking it ſufficient to take al care that no aduantage might ſlip, which could ſerue to ſtrengthen their Eſtate, by finding the Perſian worke beyond the Sea. But when Xenophons Armie had reuealed the baſeneſſe of thoſe effeminate Aſiatiques, and rehearſed the many victories which they themſelues had gotten, vpon tearmes of extreame diſaduantage; then was all Greece filled with deſire of vndertaking vpon this huge vnweildie Empire, thinking it no hard matter for the ioyntforces of that whole Nation, to hew out the way to Susa, whereof one handfull had opened the passage to Babylon, and further, finding no power that was able to giue them resistance, in all that long iourney of foure and thirty thousand two hundred and fifty fiue furlongs, spent in going and returning, which make of English miles about foure thousand two hundred foure score and one, a very painefull march of one yeere and three moneths. Neuertheless the ciuill distraction wherewith Greece was miserably torne, and especially that hot fire of the Theban Warre, which, kindled with Persian gold, brake forth sodainly into a great flame, drew backe out of Asia the power of the Lacedæmonians, to the defence of their owne Estate; leauing it questionable, whether Agesilaus, hauing both the same, and farre greater forces, could haue wrought proportionable effects. Sure it is, that in the whole space of two yeeres, which he spent in Asia, his deedes procured more commendation of magnanimity and faire behauiour, than of stout courage, and great, or profitable atchieuements. For how highly so euer it pleased Xenophon, who was his friend, and follower in this, and in other warres, to extoll his vertue; his exploits being onely a few incursions into the Countries lying neere the Sea, carrying no proportion to Xenophons owne iourney, which I know not whether any Age hath paralleled: the famous retrait of Conon the Briton with sixe thousand men from Aquileia, to his owne Countrie, through all the breadth of Italie, and length of France, in despite of the Emperor Theodosius, being rather like it than equall. But of Agesilaus and his wars in Asia and Greece, we shall speake more in due place.

§. II.

The prosperous beginnings of the warre in Asia.

THimbro receiuing Xenophons men, began to take in Townes, and to entertaine all such as were willing to reuolt from the Persian, who were many, and some of them such, as had beene highly beholding to the King; who seeme to haue had no other cause of discontent, than that they were to liue vnder the gouernement of Tissaphernes, whom all others did as vehemently hate as the King his Master did loue him. The managing of the warre begun by Thimbro, was for his oppressions taken out of his hands, and committed to Dercyllidas a Spartan, who behaued himselfe as a good man of Warre, and a wise Commander. For whereas the rule of the low-Countries of Asia was diuided betweene Pharnabazus and Tissaphernes, who did ill agree, Pharnabazus being the worthier man, but the other by his Princes fauour the greater, and hauing the chiefe command in those warres against the Greekes; Dercyllidas who did beare a priuate hatred to Pharnabazus (knowing well that Tissaphernes was of a mischieuous nature, and would not be sorry to see his Corriuall throughly beaten, though to the Kings losse) made an appointment with Tissaphernes, and forthwith entred Æolis, which was vnder the iurisdiction of Pharnabazus, which Prouince in few dayes, he brought into his owne power.

That Countrie of Æolis had about the same time suffered a violent alteration, which gaue easie succesle to the attempts of Dercyllidas. Zenis a Dardanian had beene Deputie to Pharnabazus in those parts, after whose death his wife Mania procured his Office, wherein she behaued her selfe so well, that she not onely was beloued of the people vnder her gouernement: but enlarged her Territorie, by the conquest of certaine Townes adioyning; and sundry times gaue assistance to Pharnabazus in his warres against the Mysians and Persians. For she had in pay some Companies of Greekes, whose valour by her good vsage did her great seruice. But somewhat before the arriuall of Dercyllidas in those parts, a Sonne-in-law of hers, called Midias, whom she trusted and loued much, being blinded with ambition, found meanes to stifle her, and kill her sonne of seauenteene yeeres old; which done, he seized vpon two of her principall Townes, wherein her treasure lay, hoping to haue beene admitted into possession of her whole estate. Being denied entrance by her Souldiers, that lay in Garrison, he sent Messengers with presents to Pharnabazus, desiring him to make him Gouernour in the place of Mania. His presents were not onely reiected by Pharnabazus, but reuenge of his foule treason threatned, whereby the wicked villaine was driuen into tearmes of almost vtter desperation. In the meane time came Dercyllidas, to whom the Townes of Mania, that held against Midias, did quickely open their Gates. One onely Towne stood out foure dayes (against the will will of the Citizens, who were couetous of liberty) the Gouernour ſtriuing in vaine to haue kept it to the vſe of Pharnabazus. Now remained onely two Cities, Gergethe and Scepſis, which the Traitour held, who fearing all men, as being loued of none, ſent Embaſſadours to Dercyllidas, deſiring leaue to ſpeake with him, and pledges for his ſecuritie: vpon the deliuery of which he iſſued out of Scepſis, and comming into the Campe, made offer to ioyne with the Greekes vpon ſuch conditions, as might ſeeme reaſonable. But he was plainely told by Dercyllidas, that other condition there was none, than to ſet the Citizens freely at liberty. And preſently vpon theſe words they marched toward Scepſis. When Midias perceiued that it was in vaine to ſtriue againſt the Armie, and the Towneſ-men, who were all of one minde; he quietly went along with Dercyllidas; who remaining but a few houres in the Citie, did a ſacrifice to Minerua, and then leading away the Garriſon of Midias, he left the Citie free, and departed toward Gergethe. Midias did not forſake his Companie, but followed him, earneſtly intreating that he might be ſuffered to retaine Gergethe: but comming to the Gates, he was bidden to command his Souldiers that they ſhould be opened, for (quoth Dercyllides) I muſt here likewiſe doe a ſacrifice to Minerua. The Traitor, not daring to make deniall, cauſed his Mercenaries to open the Gates, whereby Dercyllidas, taking poſſeſſion of the place, tendred pay to the Garriſon, who did not refuſe to ſerue vnder his Enſignes. This done, all the goods of Mania were ſeized vpon, as belonging to one that had beene ſubiect to Pharnabazus, who was enemie to the Greekes: and ſo the murderous wretch was ſent away naked, not knowing in what part of the World he might finde any place to hide his deteſted head. Dercyllidas, hauing in eight dayes taken nine Cities, purpoſed for the eaſe of his Confederates to winter in Bythinia, to which end he tooke Truce with Pharnabazus, who had not any deſire of Warre. That Winter, and the Sommer enſuing, the Truce being recontinued held; in which time, beſides the waſting of Bythinia, the necke of Land ioyning Cherronea to the Main, was fortified, being foure or fiue miles in breadth, by which meanes eleauen Towns with much good Land belonging to them, were freed from the incurſions of the wilde Thracians; and made fit and able to victuall the Campe. Likewiſe the Citie of Atarne was taken, which was of great ſtrength, and very well ſtored with prouiſion. After this, Dercyllidas had command from Sparta, to diuert the warre into Caria, where was the ſeate of Tiſſaphernes; for that hereby it was thought not vneaſie to recouer all the Townes of Ionia; Pharax the Admirall of the fleet (which was a yeerely Office) being appointed to ioyne with him. Though it was manifeſt that Tiſſaphernes had neglected Pharnabazus in time of neceſſity, yet was he not in his owne danger requited with the like. For Pharnabazus hauing reſpect to the Kings ſeruice, came to aſſiſt his priuate enemie Tiſſaphernes, and ſo paſſing into Caria, they thruſt Garriſons into all places of ſtrength; which done, they marched towards Ionia, hoping to finde the Townes ill manned for reſiſtance. As theſe Perſians were deſirous to keepe the warre from their owne doores, ſo was Dercyllidas willing to free his Confederates the Ionians from the ſpoile and danger of the warre, by transferring it into Caria. For which cauſe he paſſed the Riuer of Meander, and not looking to haue bin ſo ſoone encountered, marched careleſly through the Countrie: when on the very ſodaine the whole Armie of Tiſſaphernes and Pharnabazus was diſcouered, conſiſting of Perſians, Carians, and ſome Mercenarie Greekes, who were all marſhalled in very good order to preſent battaile. The odds was too apparent, both in numbers of men, and in readineſſe, as alſo in aduantage of ground: for the Perſian had a great multitude of Horſe, the Greeke very few and feeble, being to fight in an open plaine. Therefore all the Ionians, together with the Ilanders and others, of ſuch places as bordered vpon the Kings Dominions, did either betake themſelues to preſent flight; or abiding a while for ſhame, did plainely diſcouer by their lookes, that they meant not to be more bold than wiſe. Onely Dercyllidas with his Peloponneſians regarding their honour, prepared to endure the fight: which muſt needes haue brought them to deſtruction, if the counſaile of Pharnabazus had beene followed, who perceiuing the opportunitie of ſo great a victory, was not willing to let it ſlip. But Tiſſaphernes, who naturally was a coward, ſeeing that countenance of reſiſtance was made, began to conſider what ſtrange defence the Souldiers of Xenophon had ſhewed, and thinking that all the Greekes were of the like reſolution, held it the wiſeſt way to craue parley; the concluſion of which was, That a truce ſhould be made, to laſt vntill Tiſſaphernes might receiue anſwer from the King, and Dercyllidas from Sparta, concerning the demands propounded in the Treatie, which were on the one part, that all the Greekes in Asia might enioy their owne libertie and lawes; but contrariwise on the other side, that the Lacedæmonians should depart Asia, and leaue the Townes to the Kings pleasure. This Treatie was of none effect; onely it serued to free the Greekes from the present danger, and to gaine time vnto Tissaphernes, who desired to auoide the warre by procrastination, which he durst not aduenture to finish by triall of a battaile.

§. III.

How the Lacedæmonians tooke reuenge vpon the Eleans for old displeasure. The discontents of the Corinthians and Thebans, conceiued against the State of Sparta.

IN the meane season the Lacedæmonians, who found none able to withstand them in Greece, beganne to call the Eleans to accompt for some disgraces receiued by them during the late warres, when leisure was wanting to the requitall of such pettie iniuries. These Eleans being Presidents of the Olympiaque games, had set a fine vpon the Citie of Sparta, for Non-paiment of which, they forbad them to come to the solemnitie; and publiquely whipt one of them, that was of note, for presuming to contend against their decree. Likewise they hindred Agis King of Sparta, from doing sacrifice to Iupiter; and in all points vsed great contempt toward the Spartans, who now had no businesse that could hinder them from taking reuenge: and therefore sent a peremptorie message to the Eleans, commanding them to set at libertie the Cities which they held in subiection. This was the vsuall pretence which they made the ground of all their warres: though little they cared for the libertie of such Townes, which they caused afterwards to become followers, and little better than meere Vassals of the Lacedæmonians. In their late warres with Athens, the strong opposition which they found, caused this goodly Title of liberty to worke very slowly: but hauing now to doe with a State of great spirit and small force, it gaue present successe to their desires. Two yeeres together they sent an Armie into the Countrey of the Eleans: the first yeere an earthquake (held in those times a prodigious signe, and which did alwayes forbid the prosecution of any enterprise in hand) caused them to retire: the second yeere, all the Townes of the Eleans did hastily reuolt, and the Citie it selfe was driuen to submission; consenting both to suffer their old subiects freely to enioy their libertie, and to haue her owne wals throwne downe. Onely the Presidentship of the Olympian games was left vnto them, which, it was not to be doubted that they would in time comming vse modestly, finding themselues to stand at the mercy of Sparta. In this expedition all the Greekes were assistant to the Lacedæmonians, excepting the Corinthians and Bœotians, whose aide hauing beene of as much importance in the late Peloponnesian Warre, as the force of Sparta it selfe, they could not smoother their dislike of their vnequall diuision following the victory; which gaue to Sparta the command of all Greece; to Thebes, and Corinth, onely security against Athens, but such a security as was worse than the danger. For when the equall greatnesse of two mighty Estates did counterpoise each the other, it was in the power of these Neutrall Common-weales to adhere to either, as the condition of their affaires required; but when to reuenge iniuries, they had by mortall hatred prosecuted the warre to extremitie, leauing the one Citie naked of power and friends, the other mightily encreased in both; it was then (if not necessary to obey the greatnesse which themselues had made, yet) foolish and dangerous to prouoke it. Neuertheless, it was not the purpose of the Spartans to take occasion of any quarrell, which they could not finish at pleasure, till such time as they had by victory or composition made some good end with the Persian, toward whom they bent all their care and forces.

§. IIII.

§. IIII.

The paſſage of Ageſilaus into Aſia. His warre with Tiſſaphernes. How Tiſſaphernes was put to death; and the warre diuerted into another Prouince, through perſwaſion and gifts of Tithrauſtes his ſucceſſour. How careleſſe the Perſian Lieutenants were of the Kings good.

AGeſilaus newly made King of Sparta, was deſirous to haue the honour of the victory, which not without cauſe, he expected vpon thoſe of Aſia; and therefore procuring a great Armie to ioyne with that of Dercyllidas, he tooke his way in great pompe to Aulis in Bœotia, a Hauen, lying oppoſite to the Iland of Eubœa; in which place Agamemnon (leading the power of all Greece to the warre againſt Troy, many Ages before) had embarked his men. In imitation of Agamemnon he meant alſo to doe ſacrifice in Aulis, which the Thebans, Lords of that Countrey, would not permit, but ſaying that the performance of ſuch ceremonies in that place, belonged vnto their Officers; they were ſo vnable to conceale their malice, that ſending ſome Companies of horſe, they threw downe his ſacrifice from the Altar. It was not then conuenient time for Ageſilaus to entangle himſelfe and his Countrey in a new warre; therefore waiting better opportunitie of reuenge, he quietly ſwallowed the contumelie, and followed his maine intendment. Hauing landed his men at Epheſus, he was entertained by Tiſſaphernes with a Treatie of peace, wherein Ageſilaus peremptorily requiring that the Perſian ſhould reſtore to liberty all the Greeke Townes in Aſia, was promiſed that the King, being firſt informed of his demand, ſhould ſend anſwere to his good liking, if he would in the meane while make truce. Truce was therefore made, which Tiſſaphernes had ſought, onely to win time of making prouiſion for the warre, and getting ſupply of men and money from Artaxerxes; whileſt Ageſilaus was buſie in ſetling the eſtates of his confederate Cities on that ſide of the Sea. The end of this long vacation from warre was at the comming downe of theſe forces which Artaxerxes had ſent: at what time Ageſilaus receiued a plaine meſſage from Tiſſaphernes, that either he muſt forth-with depart out of Aſia, or make good his aboade by ſtrong hand. Ageſilaus returning word, that he was glad to heare that his enemies had by periurie deſerued vengeance from Heauen, prepared to inuade them; and ſending word to all the Townes which lay betweene him and Caria, that they ſhould prouide victuals and other neceſſaries for his Armie, did eaſily make Tiſſaphernes beleeue, that his intent was to inuade that Prouince wherein Tiſſaphernes dwelt, and which was vnfit for Horſe, in which part of his forces the Perſian had moſt confidence. Therefore Tiſſaphernes beſtowing all his Companies of foot in Caria, entred with his horſe into the plaines of Meander, hoping thereby to ſtop the paſſage of a heauie foot-Armie, not ſuffering them to paſſe into that Countrie which was fitteſt for their ſeruice. But the Greekes left him waiting there in vaine, and marched directly into Phrygia, where they tooke great ſpoyle without reſiſtance, till ſuch time as the Horſe-men of Pharnabazus met him, who in a ſmall skirmiſh hauing the better of the Greekes, were the occaſion that Ageſilaus returned to Epheſus. Although in this laſt fight onely twelue men were loſt, yet Ageſilaus perceiuing by that triall how hard it would be to preuaile, and hold the maſtery of the field, without a greater ſtrength of Horſe, tooke all poſſible care to encreaſe that part of his forces. By which meanes hauing enabled himſelfe, whileſt winter laſted he entred vpon the Countrey of Tiſſaphernes, as ſoone as the ſeaſon of the yeere would permit, and not onely tooke a great bootie, but finding the Horſe-men of Tiſſaphernes in the plaine of Meander, without aſſiſtance of their infanterie, he gaue them battaile, and had a great victory, taking their Campe in which he found great riches. The blame of this loſſe fell heauie vpon Tiſſaphernes, who either vpon cowardiſe had abſented himſelfe from the battaile, or following ſome other buſineſſe, was then at Sardes. For which cauſe his Maſter hauing him in diſtruſt, and thinking that peace might be the ſooner had, which he much deſired, if the man, ſo odious to the whole Nation of the Greekes, were taken out of the way; he ſent into thoſe parts Tithrauſtes a Perſian, to cut off the head of Tiſſaphernes, and ſucceede him in the gouernment. Such was the end of this baſe and cowardly Politician, who little caring to offend Heauen, when by periurie he could aduance his purpoſes on Earth, failed at the laſt through too much ouer-weening of his owne wiſedome, euen in that part of cunning, wherein he thought himſelfe moſt perfect; for ſuppoſing posing, that by his great skill in subtile negotiation he should one way or other circumuent the Greekes, and make them wearie of Asia; he did not seeke to finish the warre, and according to his Masters wish, bring all things speedily to quiet, but rather to temporize, till he might finde some opportunitie of making such end as best might stand with the Kings honour and his owne. Wherein it seemes that he much mistooke his Princes disposition, who though he had highly rewarded him for the aide which he did bring in his time of danger, yet would he much more gladly haue taken it, if he could haue found such meanes whereby the danger it selfe might haue beene auoided: as not louing to haue warre, whilest by any conditions (honourable or not) he might obtaine peace. And this appeared well by the course which Tithraustes tooke at his first possession of the low-Countries. For he sent Embassadours to Agesilaus, in very friendly sort, letting him know, that the man who had beene Author of the warre, was now taken out of the way; and that it was the Kings pleasure to let the Greekes enioy their owne lawes and libertie, vpon condition, that they should pay him the tribute accustomed, and the Armie be forthwith dismissed. The answere to this proposition, was by Agesilaus referred to the Councell of Sparta; in the meane season he was content to transferre the warre into the Prouince of Pharnabazus, at the request of Tithraustes, who bought his departure with thirtie Talents.

This was a strange manner of Warre, both on the offensiue and on the defensiue part. For Agesilaus hauing entertained great hopes of vanquishing the great King, was contented to forbeare his seuerall Prouinces, at the entreatie of the Lieutenants: and those Lieutenants being employed by the King to maintaine his Estates against all enemies (wherein if they failed, they knew that their heads might easily be taken from their shoulders) were little offended at any losse that fell on their next Neighbour-Princes, which were subiect likewise to the same Crowne of Persia, so long as their owne gouernement could be preserued free from waste and danger. The cause of this disorder on the Persian side, I can ascribe to nothing so deseruedly, as to the corrupted estate of the Court, wherein Eunuches, Concubines, and ministers of pleasure, were able by partiall construction to countenance, or disgrace, the actions of such as had the managing of things abroade; and to that foolish manner of the Kings (which was so vsuall that it might be called a rule) to reward or punish the Prouinciall Gouernour, according to the benefit or losse, which the Countrie giuen in charge vnto each of them, receiued, during the time of his rule. Whereby it came to passe, that as euery one was desirous to make his owne Territorie yeeld a large increase to the Kings treasure; so no man was carefull to assist his borderers, if losse or danger might thereby grow to himselfe and his; but sate still as an idle beholder, when perhaps by ioyning their forces, it had not beene vneasie to recompence the spoile of one Countrie, by conquering another, or defending a third from farre greater miseries.

§. V.

The Warre and Treatie betweene Agesilaus and Pharnabazus.

AGesilaus hauing thus compounded with Tithraustes, entred Phrygia, burning and wasting the Countrie without resistance. He tooke the Palace of Pharnabazus, and by his Lieutenant draue him out of his Campe. These actions, together with his honourable behauiour, which added much to their lustre, were more glorious then profitable. For he did not win Cities and Places of strength, which might haue encreased his power, and giuen assurance to the rest of his proceedings: but purchased fame and high reputation, by which he drew vnto him some that were discontented and stood vpon bad tearmes with the great King; whom he lost againe as easily, by meanes of some slight iniurie done to them by his vnder-Captaines. Pharnabazus did not enclose himselfe in any Towne for feare of being besieged, but kept the field, lying as neere as he could safely to the enemies, with whom it was not his purpose to fight, but to make some good end by composition, which he found not vneasie to doe. For the pleasures, by him formerly done to the State of Sparta, in the times of their most necessity, had beene so great, that when he (obtaining parley) did set before their eyes his bounty towards them, and his loue (which had beene such, that besides many other hazards of his person, he had for the rescue of their fleet when it was driuen to runne a-shore at Abydus, aduenaduentured to ride into the Seas as farre as he could finde any ground, and fight on horſe-backe againſt the Athenians) together with his faith which had neuer beene violated in word or deede: they knew not how to excuſe their ingratitude, otherwiſe then by telling him, That hauing warre with his Maſter, they were inforced, againſt their will, to offend him. Ageſilaus did make a faire offer to him, that if he would reuolt from the King to them; they would maintaine him againſt the Perſian, and eſtabliſh him free Prince of the Countrie wherein he was at that time onely Deputie to Artaxerxes. But Pharnabazus told him plainely, That if the King his Maſter did put him in truſt to make war againſt them, he would not faile to doe the beſt that he could as their enemy; if the charge were taken out of his hand, and he commanded to obey an other, he would then ſhift ſide, and betake himſelfe to their alliance. The iſſue of this parlie was, That the Armie ſhould no longer abide in Phrygia, nor againe returne into it, whileſt employment could be found elſewhere. The excuſe made by Ageſilaus, and the withdrawing of his forces out of thoſe parts, were not ſufficient to appeaſe Pharnabazus, whom he had not inuaded for want of more neceſſary buſineſſe elſewhere; but becauſe his Countrie would yeeld great bootie, and for the hire of thirtie Talents. By this meanes the Lacedamonians changed an honourable Friend into a hot Enemie, who afterwards requited their vnthankefulneſſe with full reuenge.

§. VI.

The great commotions raiſed in Greece by the Thebans and others, that were hyred with gold from the Perſian.

IN the meane while Tithrauſtes, perceiuing that Ageſilaus meant nothing leſſe then to returne into Greece, and let Artaxerxes reſt quietly in Aſia, tooke a wiſe courſe whereby the Citie of Sparta was not onely driuen to looke to her owne, and giue ouer her great hopes of ſubuerting the Empire, but was beaten out of all that had beene gotten by many late victories, and ſaw her Dominion reſtrained vnto the narrow bounds of her owne Territorie. He ſent into Greece fiftie talents of ſiluer, to be imployed in raiſing warre againſt the Lacedamonians; which treaſure was, by the ſubtile practice of him that was put in truſt with it, in ſuch wiſe diſperſed among the principall men of the Thebans, Argiues, and Corinthians, that all thoſe Eſtates hauing formerly borne ſecret hate to that of Sparta, were now deſirous of nothing ſo much as of open warre. And leſt this great heate of the incenſed multitude ſhould, for want of preſent exerciſe, begin to faint, and vaniſh away in idle words, occaſion was found out to thruſt the Lacedamonians into Armes, that they themſelues might ſeeme Authors of the quarrell. Some land there was in the tenure of the Locrians, to which the Thebans had in former time laid claime; but the Phocians either hauing the better tittle, or finding the greater fauour, had it adiudged vnto them, and receiued yeerely money for it. This money the Locrians were either hired or perſwaded to pay now to the Thebans, who readily accepted it: The Phocians not meaning ſo to loſe their Rent, made a diſtreſſe by ſtrong hand, recouering a great deale more than their owne; which the Thebans (as in protection of their new Tenants) requited with an inuaſion made vpon Phocis, waſting that Countrie in the manner of open war. Such were the beginnings of profeſſed hoſtilitie betweene Thebes & Sparta, & the firſt breaking out of their cloſe enmitie, that had long time, though hardly, beene concealed. For when the Phocian Embaſſadors came to Sparta, complaining of the violence done by the Thebans, and requeſting ſuccour, they had very fauourable audience, & ready conſent to their ſuite; it being the manner of the Lacedamonians, to deferre the acknowledgement of iniuries receiued, vntill occaſion of reuenge were offered, and then to diſcouer their indignation in cold bloud. At this time they had very good opportunitie to worke their owne wils, hauing no other war to diſturbe them in Greece, and hearing out of Aſia no newes, that could offend or trouble them. Wherfore they ſent Lyſander to raiſe all the Countries about Phocis, and with ſuch forces as he could leauie, to attend the comming of Pauſanias King of Sparta (for Sparta, as hath beene ſhewed before, had two Kings) who ſhould follow him with the ſtrength of Peloponneſus. Lyſander did as he was appointed, and being of great reputation in thoſe parts, he drew the Orchomenians to reuolt from Thebes. Pauſanias likewiſe raiſed all Peloponneſus, except the Corinthians, (who refuſed to aſſiſt him in that enterpriſe) meaning to ioyne with Lyſander, & make a ſpeedy end of the warre. The conſideration of ſo great a danger, approaching ſo ſwiftly, cauſed the Thebans to ſeeke what helpe they could abroad, for as much as their owne ſtrength was farre too little to make reſiſtance againſt ſuch mighty preparations. It was not vnknowne to them, that many followers of the Lacedæmonians were otherwiſe affected in heart than they durſt vtter in countenance; but the good wiſhes of ſuch people were little auaileable, conſidering that the moſt which could be expected from them, was, that they ſhould doe as little hurt as they could: by which manner of tergiuerſation, the Corinthians did at that preſent caſt themſelues into the diſpleaſure of the Spartans, to the no great benefit of Thebes. Wherefore it was thought the ſafeſt courſe, to procure the aſſiſtance of ſome Eſtate that might preſently declare it ſelfe on their ſide, which would cauſe many others to follow the example, and make their partie ſtrong. To this end they ſent Embaſſadours to Athens, excuſing old offences, as either not committed by publike allowance, or done in time of the generall warre, and recompenced with friendſhip lately ſhewne in their refuſall of aſſiſting Pauſanias, when he came in behalfe of the thirty Tyrants, againſt the good Citizens of Athens. In regard of which, and for their owne Honour ſake, they requeſted them of aide in the preſent warre, offering to doe the beſt that they could for the reſtoring of Athens to her former Eſtate and Dignitie. Thraſybulus and his Friends, who perſecuted by the thirtie, had beene well entertained at Thebes, procured now the Citie to make a large requitall of the courteſie which they had receiued. For it was decreed, that the State of Athens ſhould not onely refuſe to aide the Lacedæmonians in this Warre; but that it ſhould aſsiſt the Thebans, and engage it ſelfe in their cauſe. Whileſt Pauſanias lay ſtill, waiting the arriuall of his Confederates; Lyſander being deſirous to doe ſomewhat that might aduance the buſineſſe in hand, came to Haliartus, where, though Pauſanias did not meet him, as had beene appointed, yet he attempted the Towne, and was ſlaine in fight by the Thebans, who came haſtily to the reſcue. As this victory did encourage the Thebans, ſo the comming of Pauſanias with his great Armie did againe amaze them, with preſentation of extreame danger; but their ſpirits were ſoone reuiued by the ſtrong ſuccour which was brought from Athens, in conſideration of which, and of the late battaile, Pauſanias durſt not hazard a new fight with them, but receiuing the bodies of thoſe that were ſlaine, by compoſition, departed out of their Territorie; for which, either cowardiſe or indiſcretion, he was at his returne to Sparta condemned as a Traitour, and driuen to flie into Tegea, where he ended his daies in baniſhment.

How Ageſilaus was called out of Aſia to helpe his Countrie. A victorie of the Spartans. Conon the Athenian, aſsiſted by Pharnabazus, ouercomes the Lacedæmonian fleet; recouers the maſterie of the Seas; and rebuilds the wals of Athens.

THis good ſucceſſe, and the confederacie made with Athens, gaue ſuch reputation to the Thebans, that the Argiues, Corinthians, Eubœans, Locrians, and Acarnanes, did forthwith ſide with them, and raiſing a ſtrong Armie, determined to giue battaile to the Lecedæmonians as neere as they might, to their owne doores; Conſidering that the force of Sparta it ſelfe was not great, but grew more and more by the adiunction of their Confederates. The Magiſtrates of Sparta perceiuing the danger, ſent for Ageſilaus, who readily obeied them, and promiſing his friends in Aſia to returne ſpeedily to their aſſiſtance, paſſed the Streights of Helleſpont into Europe. In the meane time the Cities of the new league had giuen battaile to the Lacedæmonians, and the remainder of their Aſſociates, but with ill ſucceſſe. For when the right-wing of each part had gotten the better hand, the Argiues and Thebans returning from the chaſe in ſome diſorder, were broken and defeated by the Lacedæmonians, who meeting them in good order, won from them the Honour which they had gotten, by forcing the left wing of the Lacedæmonians, and made the victory of that day entirely their owne. The report of this battaile meeting Ageſilaus at Amphipolis, were by him ſent ouer into Aſia, wherein it is not likely that they brought much comfort vnto his friend, who had ſince his departure ſeene the Spartan fleet beaten, and Lyſander the Admirall ſlaine. The ſame man, whoſe endeuour had brought the Athenians into order, by aduancing the Sea-forces of the Lacedæmonians with money, and all manner of ſupplies, was now the occaſion that the power of Athens grew strong at Sea, when the City was despoiled of her olde reputation, & scarsly able to maintaine an Army by Land for her defence. Pharnabazus considering how much it imported the King his Master, to haue the Greeks diuided into such factions, as might vtterly disable them from vndertaking abroad, thought it the safest way for himselfe, during these broyles, to take such order, that he should not need any more, to seeke peace by entreaty and commemoration of old benefits, at their hands, who vnprouoked had sold his loue for thirty Talents. To which purpose he furnished Conon the Athenian with eight ships, who had escaped, when the fleet of Athens was surprized by Lysander at Ægos-Potamos; giuing him the command of a great Nauy, wherewith he requited the losse receiued at Ægos-Potamos, by repaying the Lacedæmonians with the like destruction of their fleet at Cnidus. After this victory Conon sailed to Athens, bringing with him, partly as the liberality of Pharnabazus, partly as the fruit of his victory, so strong a Nauy, and so much golde, as encouraged the Athenians to rebuild their walles, and thinke more hopefully vpon recouering the Signiory which they had lost.

§. VIII.

Of sundry small victories gotten on each part. The Lacedæmonians lose all in Asia; The Athenians recouer some part of their old Dominion.

Nevertheless the Lacedæmonians, by many victories at Land, maintained for some yeeres the honour of their Estate, endangered very greatly by this losse at Sea. For Agesilaus obtained the better with his horse-men from the Thessalians, who were accounted the best riders in Greece: He wasted Bœotia, and fought a great battaile at Coronea against the Thebans, and their Allies, whom hee ouer-threw: and by his Marshall Gylis forraged the Countrey of Locris: which done, hee returned home.

The gaine of these victories was not great, and the reputation of them was, by many losses, much defaced. For the Thebans did in the battaile of Coronea vanquish the Orchomenians, who stood opposite vnto them, and retyred vnbroken to Moune Helicon, opening way perforce when Agesilaus charged them in the returne from the pursuite. Likewise Gylis was slaine with a great part of his Army by the Locrians; and some other exploits by the Lacedæmonians performed against the Corinthians, were repayed with quall damage receiued in the parts adioyning; many Townes being easily taken, and as easily recouered. The variety of which enterfeats was such, that the Thebans themselues were drawne by the losse of the hauen of Corinth, to sue for peace, but could not get audience, till such time as the newes came of a great victory obtained by Iphicrates, Generall of the Athenian-forces at Lechæum; whereupon the Theban Embassadours being sent for, and willed to doe their message, required onely in scorne, to haue a safe conduct giuen them, that they might enter into Corinth. From this time forward the Warre was made for a while onely by incursions, wherein the Athenians, confederates of Sparta, felt most losse, their whole state being endangered by the Acarnanians, who held with the contrary side, vntill Agesilaus repayed these inuaders with equall, or greater calamities, brought vpon their owne Lands, which did so afflict the Acarnanes, that they were driuen to sue for peace. But the affaires at Sea were of most consequence, vpon which the successe of all depended. For when the Towns of Asia perceiued, that the Lacedæmonians were not onely intangled in an hard warre at home, but almost disabled to passe the Seas, hauing lost their fleet at Cnidus; they soone gaue eare to Pharnabazus, who promised to allow that they should vse their owne lawes, if they would expell the Spartan Gouernours. Onely the City of Abidus did stand firme, wherein Dercyllidas lay, who did his best to contain all the Townes about Hellespont, in the alliance of the Lacedæmonians; which he could not doe, because the Athenian fleet vnder Thrasybulus rooke in Byzantium, Chalcedon, and other places thereabout, reducing the Ile of Lesbos to their ancient acknowledgement of Athens.

The base conditions offered vnto the Persian by the Lacedæmonian. Of sundry fights and other passages in the warre. The peace of Antalcidas.

ABout this time the Spartans began to perceiue how vneasie a thing it would be, to maintaine the warre against men as good as themselues, assisted with the treasures of Persia: wherefore they craued peace of Artaxerxes, most basely offering, not onely to renounce the Greekes inhabiting Asia, and to leaue them to the Kings disposition, but withall to set the Ilanders, and euery Towne in Greece, as well the little as the great, at full and absolute liberty whereby they said that all the principall Estates of their Countrie would be so weakened, that no one, nor all of them should be able to stir against the great King. And sure it was, that the power of the Countrie being so broken and rent into many small pieces, could neither haue disquieted the Persian, by an offensiue warre, nor haue made any good defence against him, but would haue left it easie for him in continuance of time, to haue taken the Cities one after another, till he had made himselfe Master of all. The Spartans were not ignorant of this, but were so carried with enuie, that perceiuing how the dominion of the Seas was like to returne to Athens, they chose rather to giue all from themselues and others, and make all a-like weake; than to permit that any of their owne Nation should grow stronger than themselues, who so lately had commanded all. Yet this great offer was not at the first accepted, both in regard that the other Estates of Greece, who had in the Kings behalfe ioyned together against the Lacedæmonians, did by their seuerall Embassadours oppose themselues vnto it; and for that it was thought safest for Artaxerxes, rather to weaken the Lacedæmonians yet more, than by interposing himselfe to bring friends and foes on the suddaine to an equalitie. Especially Struthas, whom Artaxerxes had sent as his Lieutenant into the low-Countries, did seeke to repay the harme done by Agesilaus in those parts: which his intent appearing plaine, and all hope of the peace being thereby cut off; Thimbro was sent into Asia to make warre vpon Struthas; and others were appointed to other places, whereby the warre, being scattered about, all the Iles and Townes on the firme Land grew almost to the manner of piracie and robberie, affording many skirmishes, but few great actions worthy of remembrance. Thimbro was slaine by Struthas, & in his place Diphridas was sent, who demeaned himselfe more warily. Dercyllidas was remoued from his charge at Abydus, because he had not impeached Thrasybulus in his enterprises about Hellespont; Anaxibius, who succeeded him, was surprised and slaine in a skirmish by Iphicrates the Athenian. Thrasybulus, departing from Lesbos toward Rhodes, was slaine by the way at Aspendus. The Citie of Rhodes had long before ioyned with the Lacedæmonians, who erected there (as was their manner) an Aristocratie, or the Gouernment of a few the principall Citizens; whereas contrariwise the Athenians were accustomed to put the Soueraignetie into the hands of the people, each of them seeking to assure themselues, by erecting in the Towne of their Confederates a Gouernment like vnto their owne: which doing (where more especiall cause did not hinder) caused the Nobilitie to fauour Sparta, and the Commons to encline to Athens. The people of Ægina roued vpon the coast of Attica, which caused the Athenians to land an Armie in Ægina, and besiege their Towne: but this siege being raised by the assistance of the Lacedæmonian fleet, the Ilanders began a-new to molest Attica, which caused the Athenians to man their ships againe, that returned beaten, hauing lost foure of thirteene. The losse of these ships was soone recompensed by a victory which Chabrias the Athenian Generall had in Ægina, whereupon the Ilanders were faine to keepe home, and leaue to the Athenians the Seas free. It may well seeme strange that the Citie of Athens, hauing but newly raised her wals; hauing not by any fortunate and important battaile secured her estate from dangers by land; but onely depending vpon the assistance of such Confederates, as carried vnto different ends, had often discouered themselues irresolute in the common cause; would send a fleet and an Armie to Cyprus, in defence of Euagoras, when the mastry of the Seas was so ill assured, that an Iland lying in the eye of Pyræus, had abilitie to vexe the coast of Attica. But as the ouer-weaning of that Citie did cause it vsually to embrace more then it could compasse; so the insolency and shameless iniustice of the people, had now bred in the chiefe Commanders, a desire to keepe themselues farre out of sight, and to seeke emploiments at such distance distance as might secure them from the eyes of the enuious, & from publike iudgements, out of which, few or none escaped. For which cause Timotheus did passe away much part of his time in the Isle of Lesbos; Iphicrates in Thrace; and Chabrias now did carry away into Cyprus a greater force than his Country well could haue spared: with which he returned not when the businesse in Cyprus came to an end, but sought new aduentures in Ægypt; whereby arose neither thanks to himselfe, nor profit to his Citie, though honour both to him and it. The Athenians being thus careless of things at hand, had a notable blow giuen vnto them, shortly after that Chabrias was gone to Cyprus, euen within their owne Hauen. For Teleutias, a Lacedæmonian, being made Gouernour of Ægina; conceiued a strong hope of surprising the Nauie of Athens, as it lay in Piræus; thinking a right that it was an harder matter to encounter with ten ships prepared for the fight, than with twenty lying in harbour, whose Mariners were asleepe in their Cabbins, or drinking in Tauernes. Wherefore he sailed by night into the mouth of the Port, which entring at the breake of day, hee found (according to his expectation) most of the men on shore, and few or none left aboord to make resistance: by which meanes hee tooke many ships laden with merchandizes, many fisher-men, passengers, and other Vessells, also three or foure Gallies; hauing sunke or broken, and made vnseruiceable, as many of the rest as the time would suffer. About this time Pharnabazus, the Lieutenant of Phrygia, had one of the Kings Daughters giuen to him in marriage, with whom hee liued about the Court; and many Officers that fauoured the Lacedæmonians were placed in the lower Asia; by whose assistance the fleet of Sparta grew victorious about Hellespont; in such wise, that perhaps they should not haue needed the peace, which they themselues procured by Antalcidas, from the great King, the conditions whereof were such as are mentioned before, giuing freedome to all the Cities of Greece, and diuiding the Countrie into as many seuerall States as were pettie Boroughes in it. Thus Artaxerxes hauing bought his owne peace with money, did likewise by his money become Arbitrator and decider of Controuersies betweene the Greekes, disposing of their businesse in such wise as stood best with his owne good. The tenor of Artaxerxes his decree was, That all Asia and Cyprus should be his owne; the Iles of Lemnos, Imbrus, and Scirus bee subject to Athens; all other Greeke Townes, as well the little as the great, be set at liberty; and that whosoeuer should refuse this peace, vpon them the approuers of it should make warre, the King assisting them by Land and Sea, with men, and ships, and treasure. The Athenians were so discouraged by their losses at Sea; the Lacedæmonians by reuolt of their Confederates, and the necessity of maintaining many Garrisons, for which they wanted money; and other States by the miseries of the warre, whereof they saw no end; that all (excepting the Thebans) did consent vnto these Articles. This was called the peace of Antalcidas: whereof the Lacedæmonians taking vpon themselues the execution, did not onely compell the Argiues to depart out of Corinth (which vnder pretence of defending they held by Garrisons, lately thrust into it, not as Patrons, but as Lords) and the Thebans to leaue Bœotia free, of which Prouince Thebes had alwaies held the gouernment: the Thebans themselues being also comprehended vnder the name of the Bœotians; but caused the Mantineans to throw downe their owne Citie, and to dwell in Villages: alleaging that they had formerly beene accustomed so to doe, though purposing indeed to chastise them, as hauing beene ill affected to Sparta in the late Warre. By these courses the Lacedæmonians did hope that all the small Townes in Greece would, when occasion should require it, willingly follow them in their warres, as Authors of their libertie; and that the great Cities hauing lost all their dependants, would bee vnable to make opposition.

The warre which the Lacedæmonians made vpon Olynthus. They take Thebes by treason; and Olynthus by famine.

WHilest these Warres, which ended without either victory or profit, consumed the riches and power of Greece, the Citie of Olynthus in Thrace was growne so mighty, that shee did not onely command her Neighbour Townes, but was also become terrible to places farre remooued, and to Sparta it selfe. Great part of Macedonia, together with Pella, the principall Citie of that Kingdome, was taken by the Olynthians, who following the vsuall pretence of the Lacedæmonians, to set at libertie the places ouer which King Aminta did tyrannize, had almost now driuen him out of his Dominions, and taken all to themselues. The Citizens of Acanthus and of Apollonia, being neerest vnto the danger of those incroaching neighbours, acquainted the Lacedæmonians with their feare, affirming that this Dominion of the Olynthians would be too strong for all Greece, if continuance of time should giue it reputation, which onely it wanted: wherefore they requested assistance, but in such termes as did sound of compulsion; protesting that either they must warre vpon Olynthus, or become subject vnto her, and fight in her defence. Hereupon was made a hastie leuie of men, two thousand being presently sent away, with promise to be seconded by a greater Armie. Whilest these two thousand gaue such beginning to the warre, as agreed with their small number, the body of the Armie following them, surprized the Cittadell of Thebes, which was betraied into the hand of Phœbidas the Lacedæmonian, by some of the Magistrates, who sought to strengthen their faction by the slauerie of their Country. The Thebans were ill affected to Sparta, but had not in any one point violated the peace lately made between them; which caused the Lacedæmonians to doubt whether this act of Phœbidas were more worthy of reward or of punishment; In conclusion, profit so farre ouer-weighed honestie, that the deede was approoued, many principall Citizens of Thebes condemned to death, many driuen into banishment, and the Traitors rewarded with the gouernment of the Citie: by whose authoritie, and the force of the Garrison, the Thebans were compelled to serue the Lacedæmonians, in all, and more than all that they could require. This accesse of power hauing strengthened the Lacedæmonians, caused them to entertaine the greater forces about Olynthus, which (notwithstanding the losse of one great battaile, and some other disasters) they compelled at length by famine to render it selfe vnto their obedience.

§. XI.

How the Tebans recouered their libertie, driuing out the Lacedæmonian Garrison.

AFter this Olynthian Warre, which endured almost three yeeres, it seemed that no Estate in Greece was able to make head against that of Sparta: but it was not long ere the Thebans found a meanes to shake off their yoke, and gaue both example and meanes to others to do the like. One of the banisht men found by conference with a Scribe of the Theban Magistrates, comming to Athens, that the tyrannie wherewith his Countrie was oppressed, pleased him no better then it did those who for feare of it were fledde from home. Whereupon a plot was layd betweene these two, that soone found very good successe, being managed thus. Seauen of the banished men forsooke Athens priuily, and entred by night into the fields of Thebes; where spending the next day secretly, they came late in the euening to the Gates like husband-men returned from worke, and so passed vndiscouered vnto the house of Charon, whom Phyllidas the Scribe had drawne into the conspiracie. The day following, a solemne feast being then held in the Citie, Phyllidas promised the Gouernors, who were insolent and lustfull men, that he would conueigh vnto them that night the most beautifull Dames of the Towne, with whom they should take their pleasure. Hauing cheared them with such hope, and plentie of good wine, he told them when the time of performance (which they vrged) came, that hee could not make good his promise, vnlesse they would dismisse their followers, because the Gentlewomen, who attended without a Chamber, would not endure that any of the seruants should see their faces. Vpon this occasion the attendants were dismissed, and the Conspirators, attired like Ladies and their Maides, brought into the place; who taking aduantage of the Gouernours loose behauiour, slew them all vpon the sodaine with Daggers, which they brought hidden vnder their garments. Then presently casting off their disguise, they went to other places, where feigning themselues to come to the Gouernours vpon businesse, they got admittance, and likewise slew those which were of the Lacedæmonian faction. By the like deuice they brake into the prison; slew the Gaoler; and set at liberty such as they thought meet, and being followed by these desperate men, proclaimed libertie, making the death of the Tyrants known. The Captaine of the Castle hearing the sodaine Proclamation, thought the Rebels to bee stronger then indeede they were: the Citizens contrariwise mistrusted, that it was a practice to discouer such, as would be forward vpon occasion of reuolting. But as soon as day-light reuealed the plaine truth, all the people tooke armes & besieged the Castle, sending hastily to Athens for succour. The Garrison also sent for aide vnto the Townes adioyning, whence a few broken troupes comming to the rescue, were defeated on the way by the horse-men of Thebes. On the other side the banished Thebans did not onely make speed to assist their Countrimen, but procured some Athenians to ioyne with them, and thereby came so strong into the Citie, that the Castle was yeelded, more through feare than any necessitie, vpon condition that the Souldiers might quietly depart with their Armes; for which composition the Captaine at his returne to Sparta was put to death. When the newes of the doings at Thebes, and the successe arriued at Sparta, an Armie was raised forth-with, and all things prepared as earnestly for the recouering of that Citie, as if some part of their ancient inheritance had beene taken from the Lacedæmonians, and not a Towne perfidiously vsurped by them, restored to her owne libertie. Cleombrotus, one of the Kings, was sent on this expedition, who hauing wearied his followers, with a toilesome Winters journey, returned home without any good or harme done; leauing Sphodrias, with part of his Armie, at Thespies, to infest the Thebans; who doing them some displeasures, made large amends by a foolish attempt vpon the Hauen of Athens, which failing to take, he wasted the Countrie adjoyning, and draue away Cattell, causing by this outrage the Athenians to enter with all their power into the Warre, out of which they were before very carefully seeking how they might possibly with-draw themselues.

§. I.

How Thebes and Athens ioyned together against Sparta. How the Athenians made peace for themselues, and others, out of which the Thebans were excluded. The battaile of Leuctra, and beginning of the Theban greatnesse.

THE Lacedæmonians were men of great resolution, and of much grauitie in all their proceedings, but one dishonourable rule they held, That all respects withstanding the commoditie of Sparta were to be neglected; the practice of which doctrin, euen by the best and wisest of them, did greatly blemish that Estate: but when it was put in execution by insufficient ouer-weening men, it seldome failed to bring vpon them in stead of profit vniustly expected, both shame and losse. And so it befell them in these enterprises of Phœbidas, vpon the Castle of Thebes, and Sphodrias vpon the Pireus. For, howsoeuer Agesilaus did spoyle the Countrie about Thebes, in which hee spent two Summers, yet the diligence of the Thebans repaired all, who by the good successe of some attempts, grew stronger than they were at the first.

The Athenians likewise began to looke abroad, sayling to the Isle of Corcyra, where they ordered things at their pleasure, and hauing in some fights at Sea preuailed, began as in the Peloponnesian Warre, to surround Peloponnesus with a Naule; afflicting so the Lacedæmonians, that had not the Thebans by their insolencie wearied their friends, and caused them to seeke for peace, it had beene very likely that the end of this warre, should haue soone come to a good end, which neuertheless, being prosequuted by the Thebans (who opposed at once both these two great Estates) left the City of Sparta as much dejected, as the beginning found it proud and tyrannous. But the Athenians perceiuing how Thebes encroached euery day vpon her weake Neighbours, not sparing such as had beene dependants vpon Athens, and finding themselues, whilest engaged in such a warre, vnable to relieue their complaining friends, resolued to settle the affaires of of Greece, by renewing that forme of peace which Antalcidas had brought from the Persian. Wherefore they sent Messengers to Thebes, peremptorily signifying, That it was their intent to finish the Warre; to which purpose they willed the Thebans to send Embassadors along with them to Sparta; who readily condescended, fearing otherwise that they should be left out of the Treaty of peace: which came to passe, being so wrought by the couragious wisedome of Epaminondas, who vnderstood farre better than his Countrimen, what was to be feared or hoped. In this Treatie the Lacedæmonians and Athenians did soone agree; but when the Thebans offered to sweare to the Articles in the name of the Bœotians; Agesilaus required them to sweare in their owne name, and to leaue the Bœotians free, whom they had lately reduced vnder their obedience. Whereunto Epaminondas made answere, That the City of Sparta should giue example to Thebes by setting the Laconians free; for that the Signorie of Bœotia did by as good right appertaine to the Thebans, as that of Laconia to the Spartans. This was well and truly spoken; but was heard with no patience: For Agesilaus bearing a vehement hatred vnto those of Thebes, by whom he was drawne backe out of Asia into Greece, and disappointed of all the glory which he had hoped to atchieue by the Persian war, did now passionately vrge that point of setting the Bœotians at libertie, & finding it as obstinately refused, hee dasht the name of the Thebans out of the league. At the same time Cleombrotus the other King of Sparta lay in Phocis, who receiued command from the Gouernours of Sparta forthwith to enter vpon the Land of the Thebans with all his power; which hee did, and was there slaine at Leuctra, and with him the flowre of his Armie. This battaile of Leuctra, being one of the most famous that euer were fought betweene the Greekes, was not so notable for any circumstance fore-going it, or for the managing of the fight it selfe, as for the death of the King, and many Citizens of Sparta, but especially, for that after this battell (betweene which and the conclusion of the generall peace there passed but twentie daies) the Lacedæmonians were neuer able to recouer the strength and reputation which had formerlie made them redoubted farre and neere; whereas contrariwise the Thebans, whose greatest ambition had in former times confined it selfe vnto the little Region of Bœotia, did now begin to vndertake the leading and command of many People and Estates, in such wise, that soone after they brought an Armie of threescore and ten thousand strong vnto the Gates of Sparta. So much do the afflictions of an hard warre, valiantly endured, aduance the affaires of the distressed, and guide them into the way of Conquest, by stiffening that resolution with a manly temper, which wealth and ease had through luxurie, retchlesnes, and many other vices or vanities, made rustie and effeminate.

§. II.

How the Athenians tooke vpon them to maintaine the peace of Greece. New troubles hence arising. Epaminondas inuadeth and wasteth the Territorie of Lacedæmon.

THe Athenians, refusing to take aduantage of this ouerthrow fallen vpon their old Enemies, and new Confederates the Lacedæmonians; did neuertheless finely giue them to vnderstand, that their Dominion was expired, and therefore their pride might well be laid away. For taking vpon themselues the maintenance of the peace lately concluded, which Agesilaus (perhaps of purpose to make benefit of quarrells that might arise) had left vnperfect, they assembled the Deputies of all the Estates confederated at Athens; where the generall libertie of all Townes, as well small as great, was ratified, vnder the stile Of the Athenians, and their Associates. Hereupon began fresh garboiles. The Mantineans, claiming power by this decree to order their affaires at their owne pleasure, did (as it were) in despight of the Spartans, who had enforced them to raze their towne, reedifie it, and allie themselues with such of the Arcadians as stood worst affected to Sparta. The Arcadians, a strong Nation, consisting of many Cities, were distracted with factions; some desiring to hold good correspondency with the Lacedæmonians; some to weaken & keepe them low; yet all pretending other ends. The Lacedæmonians durst not giue impeachment to the Mantineans; nor take vpon them to correct their ill-willers among the Arcadians, till such time as the factions brake out into violence, and each part called in forraine helpe. Then was an Army sent from Sparta, as it were in defence of the people of Tegea, against the Mantineans, but indeed against them both. Agesilaus had the leading of it, but effected nothing. The Thebans had by this time subdued the the Phocians, and were become head of the Locrians, Acarnanians, Eubœans, and many others; with the power of which Countries they entred Peloponnesus in fauour of the Arcadians, who had, vpon expectation of their comming, abstained from giuing battaile to Agesilaus. The Armie of the Spartans being dismissed, and Epaminondas ioyned with the Arcadians; the Region of Laconia was inuaded & spoyled: a thing so strange, that no Oracle could haue found beliefe if any had foretold it. Almost 600. yeeres were spent, since the Dorians, vnder the posteritie of Hercules, had seized vpon Laconia, in all which time the sound of an enemies trumpet was not heard in that Countrie: Ten yeeres were not fully past, since all Greece was at the deuotion of the Spartans: but now the Region which neither Xerxes with his huge Armie could once looke vpon, nor the mighty forces of Athens, and other enemie-States had dared to set foot on, sauing by stealth, was all on a light fire, the very smoke whereof the women of Sparta were ashamed to behold. All which indignitie notwithstanding, the Lacedæmonians did not issue out of Sparta to fight, but sought how to preserue the Towne, setting at libertie as many of their Heilotes or Slaues as were willing to beare Armes in defence of the State, & somewhat pittifully entreated the Athenians to giue them succour. From Corinth & some Towns of Peloponnesus they receiued speedy assistance; the Athenians came forward more slowly, so that Epaminondas returned without battell, hauing re-builded the Citie of Messene, and peopled it a-new by calling home the ancient inhabitants, whom the Lacedæmonians many ages before had chased away to other Countries, possessing their Territories themselues.

§. III.

The Composition betweene Athens and Sparta for command in warre against the Thebans; who againe inuade and spoyle Peloponnesus. The vnfortunate presumption of the Arcadians.

THis iournie therefore vtterly defaced the reputation of the Spartans, in such wise, that they did no longer demand the conduct of the Army, which was to be raised, nor any manner of precedence: but sending Embassadors from Sparta, and from all the Cities which held league with it, vnto Athens, they offered to yeeld the Admiraltie to the Athenians, requesting that they themselues might be Generalls by Land. This had beene a composition well agreeing with the situation and qualitie of those two Cities; but it was reiected, because the Mariners and others that were to bee imployed at Sea, were men of no marke or estimation, in regard of those companies of horse and foot, whereof the Land-Armie was compounded, who being all Gentlemen or Citizens of Athens, were to haue serued vnder the Lacedæmonians. Wherefore it was agreed that the Authority should be diuided by time, the Athenians ruling fiue daies, the Lacedæmonians other fiue, and so successiuely that each of them should haue command of all, both by Land and by Sea. It is manifest, that in this conclusion vaine ambition was more regarded than the common profit, which must of necessitie be very slowly aduanced, where consultation, resolution, and performance are so often to change hands. This appeared by a second inuasion of Peloponnesus, wherein the Thebans found their enemies so vnable to impeach them, that hauing fortified Isthmus from Sea to Sea, as in former times they had done against Xerxes, they were driuen out of their strength by Epaminondas, who forraged the Country without resistance. But as the Articles of this league betweene Athens and Sparta did, by diuiding the conduct in such manner, disable the societie, and make it insufficient to those ends for which it was concluded; so the example of it wrought their good, by filling the enemies heads with the like vanitie. For the Arcadians considering their owne numbers which they brought into the field, and hauing found by many trials that their people were not inferiour to others in strength of body, in courage, or in good Souldiership, thought it good reason that they should in like manner share the gouernment, with their friends the Thebans; and not alwaies continue followers of others, by increasing whose greatnesse they should strengthen their owne yoke. Hereupon they beganne to demeane themselues very insolently, whereby they grew hatefull to their Neighbors, and suspected of the Thebans in an ill time. For a motion of generall peace hauing beene made (which tooke not effect, because the Citie of Messene was not abandoned to the Lacedæmonians) the next enterprise of the Spartans and their friends was vpon these Arcadians, who relying too much vpon their owne worth, were ouerthrowne in a great battaile, their calamitie being as pleasing to their Confederates, as to their Enemies.

§. IIII.

The great growth of the Theban Estate. Embassages of the Greekes to the Persian; with the reasons why he most fauoured the Thebans. Troubles in the Persian Empire. The fruitlesse issue of the Embassages.

THe Thebans especially reioyced at the Arcadians misfortune, considering, that, without their aide, the successe of all enterprises proued so ill; whereas they themselues had by their owne power accomplished very well whatsoeuer they tooke in hand, and were become not onely victorious ouer the Lacedæmonians, but patrons ouer the Thessalonians, and moderatours of the great quarrels that had risen in Macedonia; where compounding the differences about that Kingdome, as pleased them best, they carried Philip the Sonne of Amyntas, and Father of Alexander the Great, as an Hostage vnto Thebes. Hauing therefore obtained such reputation, that little seemed wanting to make them absolute Commanders of all Greece, they sought meanes of alliance with the Persian King, to whom they sent Embassadour the great and famous Captaine Pelopidas, whose reputation drew Artaxerxes to grant vnto the Thebans all that they desired; whereof two especiall points were, That Messene should remaine free from the Lacedæmonians, and that the Athenians should forbeare to send their ships of Warre to Sea; onely the later of these two was somewhat qualified with reference to further aduice. The other States of Greece did also send their Embassadours at the same time, of whom few or none receiued much contentment. For the King hauing found by long experience, how farre it concerned him to maintaine a sure partie in Greece, did vpon many weightie considerations resolue, to binde the Thebans firmely vnto him; iustly expecting; that their greatnesse should be on that side his owne securitie. The Athenians had beene ancient enemies to his Crowne; and hauing turned the profit of their victories vpon the Persian to the purchase of a great Estate in Greece, maintained their Signorie in such puissant manner, that (sundry grieuous misfortunes notwithstanding) they had endured a terrible warre, wherein the Lacedæmonians being followed by most of the Greekes, and supplied with treasure, and all sorts of aide by Darius Nothus, were not able to vanquish them, till their owne indiscretion brought them on their knees. The Lacedæmonians being victorious ouer Athens, had no sooner established their Dominion at home, than they vndertooke the conquest of Asia, from which though by the commotion raised in Greece with Persian gold, they were called backe, yet hauing renewed their power, and setled things in Greece, it was not vnlikely, that they should vpon the next aduantage haue pursued the same enterprise, had not they beene empeached by this Theban Warre. But the Thebans contrariwise had alwayes discouered a good affection to the Crowne of Persia. They had sided with Xerxes in his inuasion of Greece; with Darius and the Lacedæmonians against Athens: And finally, hauing offered much contumelie to Agesilaus when he put to Sea, they drew him home by making warre on the Confederates of Sparta. Besides all these their good deseruings, they were no Sea-men, and therefore vnlikely to looke abroade; whereupon if perchance they should haue any desire, yet were they disabled by the want of good hauen townes, which they could not seize vpon without open breach of that peace, whereof they intended to become the Executors, giuing liberty to all Cities that had at any time beene free. Wherefore Artaxerxes did wholly condescend vnto the requests of Pelopidas, as farre forth as he might without giuing open defiance to the rest of Greece; and by that meane he purchased his owne quiet, being neuer afterward molested by that Nation in the lower Asia. The ill meanes which the Greekes had to disturbe Artaxerxes, was very beneficiall to the Estate of Persia shortly after these times, in that great rebellion of all the Maritime Prouinces. For had then the affaires of Greece beene so composed, that any one Citie might without empeachment of the rest haue transported an Armie, to assist the reuolting Satrapæ, or Viceroies of Caria, Phrygia, Lydia, Mysia, Lycia, Pisidia, Pamphilia, Cilicia, Syria, and Phœnicia; humane reason can hardly finde the meanes, by which the Empire could haue beene preserued from that ruine, which the diuine Counsell had deferred vnto the dayes of Alexander. But this great conspiracie of so many large and wealthy Prouinces, wanting ting a firme body of good and hardy Souldiers, was in short space discussed and vanished like a mist, without effect: these effeminate Asiatiques wearied quickly with the trauailes and dangers incident to warre, forsaking the common cause, and each man striuing to be the first, that by treason to his company should both redeeme the former treason to his Prince, and purchase withall his owne promotion with encrease of riches. Of this commotion, which in course of time followed some actions not as yet related, I haue rather chosen to make short mention in this place, than hereafter to interrupt the Narration of things more important, but for that it was like a sudden storme, rashly commenced, idlely followed, and foolishly layed downe, hauing made a great noise without effect, and hauing small reference to any other action regardable; as also because in the whole reigne of Artaxerxes, from the warre of Cyrus, to the inuasion of Ægypt, I finde nothing (this insurrection, and a fruitlesse iourney against the Caduſians excepted) worthy of any mention; much lesse of digression from the course of the businesse in Greece. All, or the most of his time passed away so quietly, that he enioyed the pleasures which an Empire so great and wealthy could affoord vnto so absolute a Lord, with little disturbance. The troubles which he found were onely or chiefly Domesticall; growing out of the hatred which Paryſatis the Queene-Mother bare vnto his wife Statira, and to such as had beene the greatest enemies to her sonne Cyrus, or gloried in his death: vpon whom, when by poyson and mischieuous practices she had satisfied her feminine appetite of reuenge, thenceforth she wholly applyed her selfe to the Kings disposition, cherishing in him the lewd desire of marrying his owne Daughter, and filling him with the perswasion, which Princes, not endued with an especiall grace, doe readily entertaine: That his owne will was the supreame law of his subiect, and the rule by which all things were to be measured and adiudged to be good or euill. In this imaginarie happinesse Pelopidas, and the other Embassadours of Greece, both found and left him; but left him by so much more assured than they found him, by how much the conclusion of his Treatie with them, being altogether to his owne aduantage, did seeme to promise, if not the perpetuitie, a long endurance of the same felicity to him and his, or (at the least) a full security of danger from Greece, whence onely could any danger be feared. But such foundations of eternity laied by mortall men in this transitory world, like the Tower of Babel, are either shaken from heauen, or made vaine and vnprofitable, ere the frame can be raised to full heighth, by confusion of tongues among the builders. Hereof was found a good example in the Thebans, and other Estates of Greece that had sent Embassadours to the Persian. For whereas it had beene concluded, that all Townes, as well the little as the great, should be set at liberty, and the Thebans made Protectors of this common peace, who thereby should become the Iudges of all controuersies that might arise, and Leaders in warre of all that would enter into this Confederacy; the Kings letters being solemnly published at Thebes, in the presence of Embassadours, drawne thither from all parts of Greece; when an oath was required for obseruation of the forme of peace therein set downe, a dilatorie answere was made by the Embassadors, who said, that they were sent to heare the articles; not to sweare vnto them. Hereby the Thebans were driuen to send vnto each of the Cities to require the Oath; But in vaine. For when the Corinthians had boldly refused it, saying, That they did not neede it; others tooke courage by their example to doe the like, disappointing the Thebans of their glorious hopes, to whom this negotiation with Artaxerxes gaue neither addition nor confirmation of greatnesse, but left them as it found them to relie vpon their owne swords.

§. V.

How all Greece was diuided, betweene the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, on the one side, and Thebans on the other. Of the great tumults rising in Arcadia.

THE condition of things in Greece at that time did stand thus. Athens and Sparta, which in former times had commanded all that Nation, and each vpon enuie of the others greatnesse drawne all their followers into a cruell intestine warre, by which the whole Countrie, and especially the Estate of these two Cities, was brought very low, did now conioyne their forces against the Thebans, who sought to make themselues Lords of all. The Eleans, Corinthians, and Achaians, followed the party of these ancient gouerning Cities; either for the old reputation of them, & benefits receiued, or in dislike dislike of those, who by strong hand were ready to become Rulers, to which authority they could not suddenly aspire without some iniurie and much enuie. The Citie of Thebes abounding with men, whom necessitie had made warlike, & many victories in few yeeres had filled with great spirits; and being so mighty in dependants, that she had reduced all the continent of Greece without Peleponnesus (the Region of Attica, and very little part beside excepted) vnder such acknowledgement, as wanted not much of meere Vassallage, did hope to bring all Peloponnesus to the like obedience, wherein already she had set good footing by her coniunction with the States of Argos, and of Arcadia. The Argines had beene alwayes bad Neighbours to the Spartans, to whom they thought themselues in ancient Nobilitie Superiours, but were farre vnder them in valour, hauing beene often beaten out of the field by them, and put in danger of losing all: which caused them to suspect and enuie nothing more than the greatnesse and honour of Sparta, taking truce with her when she was at rest, and had leisure to bend her whole force against them; but firmely ioyning with her enemies whensoeuer they found her entangled in a difficult Warre. As the Argiues were, in hatred of Sparta, sure friends of Thebes, so the Arcadians, transported with a great opinion of their owne worthinesse, had formerly renounced and prouoked against them their old Confederates and Leaders, the Lacedæmonians, and were now become very doubtfull adherents to the Thebans. In which regard it was thought conuenient by Epaminondas, and the State of Thebes, to send an Armie into Peloponnesus, before such time as these wauering friends should fall further off, and become either Neutrall, or, which was to be feared open enemies. And surely great cause there was to suspect the worst of them, considering that without consent of the Thebans, they had made peace with Athens; which was very strange, & seemed no lesse to the Athenians themselues, who holding a firme league with Sparta at the same time when the Arcadians treated with them, did neuertheless accept this new Confederacy, not relinquishing the old, because they found that, howsoeuer these Arcadians were enemies to the Lacedæmonians, they should hereby be drawne somewhat further from their alliance with Thebes, which without them was vnlikely to inuade Peloponnesus with a stong Armie. But this did rather hasten, than by any meanes stay, the comming of Epaminondas; who finding the way somewhat more cleare for him (because the Citie of Corinth, which lay vpon the Isthmus, and had beene aduerse to Thebes, was now, by miseries of this grieuous warre, driuen to become Neutrall) tooke occasion hereby, and by some disorders among the Arcadians, to visit Peloponnesus with an Armie, consisting of all the power of Thebes. A great tumult had risen in Arcadia about consecrated money, which many principall men among them had laied hands on, vnder pretence of imploying it to publique vses. In compounding the differences growne vpon this occasion, such as had least will to render account of the money which had come into their hands, procured the Captaine of some Theban Souldiers, lying in Tegea, to take prisoners many of their Countrimen, as people desirous of innouation, This was done: but the vp-roare thereby caused was so great, that the prisoners were forth-with enlarged, and the Arcadians, who had in great numbers taken Armes, with much a-doe scarse pacified. When complaint of the Captaines proceedings came to Thebes, Epaminondas turned all the blame vpon them, who had made the peace with Athens, letting them know, that he would be shortly among them, to iudge of their fidelity, by the assistance which they should giue him, in that warre, which he intended to make in Peloponnesus. These Lordly words did greatly amaze the Arcadians; who needing not the aide of so mighty a power as he drew a-long with him, did vehemently suspect that great preparation to be made against themselues. Hereupon such of them as had before sought meanes to settle the affaires of their Countrie, by drawing things to some good conclusion of peace, did now forthwith send to Athens for helpe, and withall dispatched some of the principall among them as Embassadours to Sparta, by whom they offered themselues to the common defence of Peloponnesus, now ready to be inuaded. This Embassage brought much comfort to the Lacedæmonians, who feared nothing more than the comming of Epaminondas, against whom they well knew, that all their forces, and best prouisions, would be no more than very hardly sufficient. Forbearing therefore to dispute about prerogatiues, they (who had beene accustomed vnto such a supremacie, as they would in no wise communicate with the powerfull Citie of Athens, till other hope of securing their owne Estate could not be thought vpon) did now very gently yeelde to the Arcadians, that the command of the Army in chiefe, ſhould be giuen, for the time, to that Citie, in whoſe Territorie it lay.

§. VI.

A terrible inuaſion of Peloponneſus by Epaminondas.

CErtaine it is, that the condition of things did at that time require a very firme conſent, and vniforme care of the common ſafetie. For beſide the great forces raiſed out of the other parts of Greece, the Argiues and Meſſenians, prepared with all their ſtrength to ioyne with Epaminondas; who hauing lien a while at Nemea, to intercept the Athenians, receiued there intelligence, that the Armie comming from Athens would paſſe by Sea, whereupon he diſlodged, and came to Tegea, which Citie, and the moſt of all Arcadia beſides, forthwith declared themſelues his. The common opinion was, that the firſt attempt of the Thebans, would be vpon ſuch of the Arcadians as had reuolted; which cauſed the Lacedæmonian Captaines to fortifie Mantinæa with all diligence, and to ſend for Ageſilaus to Sparta, that he bringing with him all that ſmall force of able men which remained in the Towne, they might be ſtrong enough to abide Epaminondas there. But Epaminondas held ſo good eſpiall vpon his Enemies, that had not an vnknowne fellow brought haſty aduertiſement of his purpoſe to Ageſilaus, who was then well onward in the way to Mantinæa, the Citie of Sparta had ſuddenly beene taken. For thither with all ſpeede and ſecrecie did the Thebans march, who had ſurely carried the Citie, notwithſtanding any defence that could haue beene made by that handfull of men remaining within it; but that Ageſilaus in all flying haſte got into it with his Companies, whom the Armie of his Confederates followed thither to the reſcue as faſt as it was able. The arriuall of the Lacedæmonians and their friends, as it cut off all hope from Epaminondas of taking Sparta, ſo it preſented him with a faire aduantage vpon Mantinæa. It was the time of Harueſt, which made it very likely, that the Mantinæans, finding the warre to be carried from their wals into another quarter, would vſe the commoditie of that vacation, by fetching in their corne, and turning out their cattell into their fields, whileſt no enemie was neere that might empeach them. Wherefore he turned away from Sparta to Mantinæa, ſending his horſe-men before him, to ſeize vpon all that might be found without the Citie. The Mantinæans (according to the expectation of Epaminondas) were ſcattered abroad in the Countrie; farre more intent vpon their harueſt-buſineſſe, than vpon the warre, whereof they were ſecure, as thinking themſelues out of diſtance. By which preſumption it fell out, that great numbers of them, and all their Cattell, being vnable to recouer the Towne, were in a deſperate caſe; and the Towne it ſelfe in no great likelihood of holding out, when the enemie ſhould haue taken all their prouiſion of victuals with ſo many of the people, as had not ouer-deerely beene redeemed, by that Cities returning to ſocietie with Thebes. But at the ſame time, the Athenians comming to the ſuccour of their Confederates, whom they thought to haue found at Mantinæa, were very earneſtly entreated by the Citizens to reſcue their goods, and people, from the danger whereinto they were fallen, if it were poſſible by any couragious aduenture to deliuer thoſe who otherwiſe were giuen as loſt. The Thebans were knowne at that time to be the beſt Souldiers of all the Greekes, and the commendation of good horſemanſhip had alwayes beene giuen to the Theſſalians, as excelling in that qualitie all other Nations; yet the regard of honour ſo wrought vpon the Athenians, that for the reputation of their Citie, which had entred into this warre, vpon no neceſſitie of her owne, but onely in deſire of relieuing her diſtreſſed friends, they iſſued forth of Mantinæa, not abiding ſo long as to refreſh themſelues, or their horſes with meate; and giuing a luſtie charge vpon the enemie, who as brauely receiued them, after a long and hot fight, they remained maſters of the field, giuing by this victory a ſafe and eaſie retrait to all that were without the wals. The whole power of the Bœotians arriued in the place ſoone after this battaile, whom the Lacedæmonians and their Aſſiſtants were not farre behinde.

The great battaile of Mantinæa. The honourable death of Epaminondas, with hũ commendation.

EPaminondas, considering that his Commission was almost now expired, and that his attempts of surprising Sparta and Mantinæa, hauing failed, the impression of terrour which his name had wrought in the Peloponnesians, would soone vanish, vnlesse by some notable act he should abate their courage in their first growth, and leaue some memorable character of his expedition; resolued to giue them battaile, whereby he reasonably hoped both to settle the doubtfull affections of his owne Associates, and to leaue the Spartans as weake in spirit and abilitie, as he found them, if not wholly to bring them into subiection. Hauing therefore warned his men to prepare for that battaile, wherein victory should be rewarded with Lordship of all Greece; and finding the alacritie of his Souldiers to be such as promised the accomplishment of his owne desire; he made shew of declining the enemie, and intrenching himselfe in a place of more aduantage, that so by taking from them all expectation of fighting that day, he might allay the heate of their valour, and afterward strike their senses with amazement, when he should come vpon them vnexpected. This opinion deceiued him not. For with very much tumult, as in so great and sodaine a danger, the enemie ran to Armes, necessity enforcing their resolution, and the consequence of that dayes seruice vrging them to doe as well as they might. The Theban Armie consisted of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the Lacedæmonians and their friends were short of this number, both in horse and in foot, by a third part. The Mantinæans (because the warre was in their Countrie) stood in the right wing, and with them the Lacedæmonians: the Athenians had the left wing; the Achæans, Eleans, and others of lesse account, filled the body of the Armie. The Thebans stood in the left wing of their owne battaile, opposite to the Lacedæmonians, hauing by them the Arcadians; the Eubœans, Locrians, Sicyonians, Messenians, and Thessalians with others, compounding the maine battaile; the Argiues held the right wing; the horse-men on each part were placed in the flankes, onely a troupe of the Eleans were in reare. Before the footmen could ioyne, the encounter of the horse on both sides was very rough, wherein finally the Thebans preuailed, notwithstanding the valiant resistance of the Athenians: who not yeelding to the enemie either in courage or skill, were ouer-laied with numbers, and so beaten vpon by Thessalian slings, that they were driuen to forsake the place, and leaue their infanterie naked. But this retrait was the lesse disgracefull, because they kept themselues together, and did not fall backe vpon their owne foot-men; but finding the Theban horse to haue giuen them ouer, and withall discouering some Companies of foot, which had beene sent about by Epaminondas, to charge their battaile in the reare, they brake vpon them, routed them, and hewed them all in peeces. In the meane season the battaile of the Athenians had not onely to doe with the Argiues, but was hardly pressed by the Theban Horsemen, in such wise that it began to open, and was ready to turne backe, when the Elean squadron of Horse came vp to the relieue of it, and restored all on that part. With farre greater violence did the Lacedæmonians and Thebans meete, these contending for Dominion, the other for the maintenance of their ancient honour, so that equall courage and equall losse on both sides made the hope and appearance of victory to either equally doubtfull; vnlesse perhaps the Lacedæmonians being very firme abiders, might seeme the more likely to preuaile, as hauing borne the first brunt and furie of the on-set, which was not hitherto remitted; and being framed by Discipline, as it were by Nature, to excell in patience, whereof the Thebans, by practice of a few yeeres, cannot be thought to haue gotten a habite so sure and generall. But Epaminondas perceiuing the obstinate stiffenesse of the Enemies to be such, as neither the bad successe of their owne horse, nor all the force of the Bœotian Armie, could abate so farre, as to make them giue one foote of ground: taking a choise Companie of the most able men, whom he cast into the forme of a Wedge, or Diamond, by the aduantage of that figure against a squadron, and by his owne exceeding vertue, accompanied with the great strength and resolution of them which followed him, did open their ranckes, and cleaue the whole battaile in despight of all resistance. Thus was the honour of that day won by the Thebans, who may iuſtly be ſaid to haue carried the victory, ſeeing that they remained Maſters of the ground whereon the battaile was fought, hauing driuen the Enemie to lodge farther off. For that which was alleaged by the Athenians, as a token that the victorie was partly theirs, the ſlaughter of thoſe Mercenaries vpon whom they lighted by chance in their owne flight, finding them behinde their Armie, and the retaining of their dead bodies; it was a Ceremonie regardable onely among the Greekes, and ſerued meerely for oſtentation, ſhewing that by the fight they had obtained ſomewhat, which the Enemie could not get from them otherwiſe than by requeſt. But the Thebans arriued at the generall immediate end of battaile; none daring to abide them in the field: whereof a manifeſt confeſſion is expreſſed from them, who forſake the place which they had choſen or accepted, as indifferent for triall of their abilitie and proweſſe. This was the laſt worke of the incomparable vertue of Epaminondas, who being in the head of that Warlike troupe of men, which broke the Lacedæmonian eſquadron, and forced it to giue backe in diſaray, was furiouſly charged on the ſodaine, by a deſperate Company of the Spartans, who all at once threw their Darts at him alone; whereby receiuing many wounds, he neuertheleſſe with a ſingular courage maintained the fight, vſing againſt the Enemies many of their Darts, which he drew out of his owne body; till at length by a Spartan, called Anticrates, he receiued ſo violent a ſtroake with a Dart, that the wood of it brake, leauing the yron and a peece of the tronchion in his breſt. Hereupon he ſunke downe, and was ſoone conueighed out of the fight by his friends; hauing by his fall ſomewhat animated the Spartans (who faine would haue got his body,) but much more inflamed with reuengefull indignation, the Thebans, who raging at this heauie miſchance did with great ſlaughter compell their diſordered enemies to leaue the field; though long they followed not the chaſe, being wearied more with the ſadneſſe of this diſaſter, than with all the trauaile of the day. Epaminondas being brought into his Tent, was told by the Phyſitians, That when the head of the Dart ſhould be drawne out of his body, he muſt needes dye. Hearing this, he called for his ſhield, which to haue loſt, was held a great diſhonour: It was brought vnto him. He bad them tell him which part had the victory; anſwere was made, that the Bœotians had won the field. Then ſaid he, It is faire time for me to dye, and withall ſent for Iolidas, and Diophantes, two principall men of Warre, that were both ſlaine; which being told him, Hee aduiſed the Thebans to make Peace, whileſt with aduantage they might, for that they had none left that was able to diſcharge the office of a Generall. Herewithall he willed, that the head of the weapon ſhould be drawne out of his body; comforting his friends that lamented his death, and want of iſſue, by telling them, that the victories of Leuctra and Mantinæa were two faire Daughters, in whom his memory ſhould liue.

So died Epaminondas, the worthieſt man that euer was bred in that Nation of Greece, and hardly to be matched in any Age or Countrie: for he equalled all others in the ſeuerall vertues, which in each of them were ſingular. His Iuſtice, and Sincerity, his Temperance, Wiſedome, and high Magnanimity, were no way inferiour to his Militarie vertue; in euery part whereof he ſo excelled, that he could not properly be called a Warie, a Valiant, a Politique, a Bountifull, or an Induſtrious, and a Prouident Captaine. Neither was his priuate Conuerſation vnanſwerable to thoſe high parts, which gaue him praiſe abroade. For he was Graue, and yet very Affable and Curteous, reſolute in publique buſineſſe, but in his owne particular eaſie, and of much mildeneſſe: a louer of his People, bearing with mens infirmities, wittie and pleaſant in ſpeech, farre from inſolence, Maſter of his owne affections, and furniſhed with all qualities that might win and keepe loue. To theſe Graces were added great abilitie of bodie, much Eloquence, & very deepe knowledge in all parts of Philoſophy and Learning, wherewith his minde being enlightened, reſted not in the ſweetneſſe of Contemplation, but brake forth into ſuch effects as gaue vnto Thebes, which had euer-more been an vnderling, a dreadfull reputation among all people adioyning, and the higheſt command in Greece.

§. VIII.

Of the peace concluded in Greece after the battaile of Mantinæa. The voiage of Agesilaus into Ægypt. His death, and qualities; with an examination of the comparison made betweene him and Pompey the Roman.

THis battaile of Mantinæa was the greatest that had euer beene fought in that Countrie betweene the Naturals; and the last. For at Marathon, and Platæa, the populous Armies of the barbarous Nations gaue rather a great fame, than a hard triall to the Gracian valour; neither were the practice of Armes and Art Militarie, so perfect in the beginnings of the Peloponnesian Warre, as long continuance and daily exercise had now made them. The times following produced no actions of worth or moment, those exepted which were vndertaken against forraine enemies, prouing for the most part vnfortunate. But in this last fight all Greece was interessed, which neuer had more able Souldiers, and braue Commanders, nor euer contended for victory with greater care of the successe, or more obstinate resolution. All which notwithstanding the issue being such as hath beene related, it was found best for euery particular Estate, that a generall peace should be established, euery one retaining what he presently had, and none being forced to depend vpon another, The Messenians were by name comprised in this new league; which caused the Lacedæmonians not to enter into it. Their standing out hindred not the rest from proceeding to conclusion; considering that Sparta was now too weake to offend her Neighbours, and therefore might well be allowed to shew that anger in ceremonies, which had no power to declare it selfe in execution. This peace, as it gaue some breath and refreshing to all the Country, so to the Cities of Athens and Sparta it afforded leisure to seeke after wealth by forraine employment in Ægypt, whither Agesilaus was sent with some small forces to assist, or indeede, as a Mercenarie, to serue vnder Tachos King of Ægypt in his warre vpon Syria. Chabrias the Athenian, who had before commanded vnder Acoris King of Ægypt, went now as a voluntary, with such forces as he could raise, by entreatie, and offer of good pay, to the same seruice. These Ægyptian Kings descended from Amyrtæus of Saïs, who rebelled against Darius Nothus, hauing retained the Countrie, notwithstanding all intestine dissensions, and forraine inuasions, during three Generations of their owne race, were so well acquainted with the valour of the Greekes, that by their helpe (easily procured with gold) they conceiued great hope, not onely to assure themselues, but to become Lords of the Prouinces adioyning, which were held by the Persian. What the issue of this great enterprise might haue beene, had it not fallen by Domesticall rebellion, it is vncertaine. But very likely it is, that the rebellion it selfe had soone come to nothing, if Agesilaus had not proued a false Traitor, ioyning with Nectanebus, who rose against his Prince, and helping the Rebell with that Armie which the money of Tachos had waged. This falshood Agesilaus excused, as tending to the good of his owne Countrie; though it seeme rather, that he grudged because the King tooke vpon himselfe the Conduct of the Armie, vsing his seruice onely as Lieutenant, who had made full accompt of being appointed the Generall. Howsoeuer it came to passe, Tachos being shamefully betraied by them, in whom he had reposed his chiefe confidence, fled vnto the Persian, who vpon his submission gaue him gentle entertainement; and Nectanebus (who seemes to haue beene the Nephew of Tachos) reigned in his stead. At the same time the Citizens of Mendes had set vp another King, to whom all, or most of the Ægyptians yeelded their obedience. But Agesilaus fighting with him in places of aduantage, preuailed so farre, that he left Nectanebus in quiet possession of the Kingdome; who in recompence of his treason to the former King Tachos, and good seruice done to himselfe, rewarded him with two hundred and thirtie Talents of siluer, with which bootie sailed homewards, he died by the way. He was a Prince very temperate, and valiant, and a good Leader in Warre, free from couetousnesse, and not reproached with any blemish of lust; which praises are the lesse admirable in him, for that the discipline of Sparta was such as did endue euery one of the Citizens (not carried away by the violent streame of an ill nature) with all, or the chiefe, of these good qualities. He was neuertheless very arrogant, peruerse, vniust and vaine-glorious, measuring all things by his owne will, and obstinately prosecuting those courses, whose ends were beyond hope. The expedition of Xenophon had filled him with an opinion, that by his hand the Empire of Persia should be ouerthrowne; with which conceit being transported, and finding his proceedings interrupted by the Thebans and their Allies, he did euer after beare such hatred vnto Thebes; as compelled that Estate by meere necessity to grow war-like, and able, to the vtter dishonour of Sparta, and the irreparable losse of all her former greatnesse. The commendations giuen to him by Xenophon his good friend, haue caused Plutarch to lay his name in the ballance against Pompey the Great; whose actions (the solemne grauity of carriage excepted) are very disproportionable. Yet we may truely say, That as Pompey made great warres vnder sundry Climates, and in all the Prouinces of the Roman Empire, exceeding in the multitude of imployments all that were before him; so Agesilaus had at one time or other, some quarrell with euery Towne in Greece, had made a Warre in Asia, and medled in the businesse of the Ægyptians, in which variety he went beyond all his Predecessours: yet not winning any Countries, as Pompey did many, but obtaining large wages, which Pompey neuer tooke. Herein also they are very like: Each of them was the last great Captaine which his Nation brought forth in time of liberty, and each of them ruined the liberty of his Countrey by his owne Lordly wilfulnesse. We may therefore well say, Similia magis omnia quàm paria; The resemblance was neerer then the equality. Indeed the freedome of Rome was lost with Pompey, falling into the hands of Cæsar, whom he had enforced to take Armes; yet the Roman Empire stood, the forme of Gouernement onely being changed: But the liberty of Greece, or of Sparta it selfe, was not forfaited vnto the Thebans, whom Agesilaus had compelled to enter into a victorious warre; yet the Signiorie, and ancient renowne of Sparta was presently lost; and the freedome of all Greece being wounded in this Theban warre, and after much bloud lost, ill healed by the peace ensuing, did very soone, vpon the death of Agesilaus, giue vp the Ghost, and the Lordship of the whole Country was seized by Philip King of Macedon, whose actions are now on foot, and more to be regarded than the Contemporarie passages of things, in any other Nation.

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORIE OF THE WORLD:

INTREATING OF THE TIMES FROM THE reigne of PHILIP of MACEDON, to the establishing of that Kingdome, in the race of ANTIGONVS.

THE FOVRTH BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

Of Philip the Father of Alexander the Great, King of Macedon.

§. I.

What Kings reigned in Macedon before Philip.

THe Greekes, of whom we haue already made large discourse, not as yet wearied with intestine Warre, nor made wise by their vaine contention for superiority, doe still as in former times, continue the inuasion and vastation of each other.

Against Xerxes, the greatest Monarch of that part of the World, their defended their libertie, with as happy successe as euer Nation had, and with no lesse honour, than hath euer been acquired by deeds of Armes. And hauing had a tryall and experience, more then fortunate, against those Nations, they so little regarded what might come frō them, who had so often forfeited the reputation of their forces, as whatsoeuer could be spared from their owne distraction at home, they transported ouer the Hellespont, as sufficient, to entertaine and busie them withall.

But, as it commonly falleth out with euery man of mark in the world, that they vnderfall, and perish, by the hands and harmes which they least feare; so fared it at this time with the Greekes. For of Philip of Macedon (of whom we are now to speake) they had so little regard, as they grew euen then more violent in deuouring each other, when the fast-growing greatnesse of such a Neighbour-King, should, in regard of their owne safeties, haue serued them for a strong argument of vnion and accord. But the glory of their Persian victories, wherewith they were pampred and made proud, taught them to neglect all Nations but themselues, and the rather to value at little the power and purposes of the Macedonians, because those Kings and States, which sate neerer them than they did, had in the time of Amyntas, the Father of Philip, so much weakened them, and wonne vpon them, that they were not (as the Gracians perswaded themselues) in any one age, likely to recouer.

recouer their owne, much lesse to worke any wonders against their borderers. And, indeed, it was not in their Philosophie to consider, That all great alterations are stormelike, suddaine, and violent; and that it is then ouer-late to repaire the decayed and broken banks, when great Riuers are once swollen, fast-running, and inraged. No, the Greeks did rather imploy themselues, in breaking downe those defences, which stood betweene them and this inundation, than seeke to rampard and re-enforce their owne fields, which by the Leuell of reason they might haue found to haue lien vnder it. It was therefore well concluded by Orosius: Gracia Ciuitates imperare singula cupiunt, imperium omnes perdiderunt; The Cities of Greece lost their commaund, by striuing each of them to command all. Oros. l. 3. c. 12.

The Kingdome of Macedon, so called of Macedon, the sonne of Osiris, or, as other Authors affirme, of Iupiter and Æthra, is the next Region towards the North which bordereth Greece; It hath to the East, the Ægean Sea; it is bounded on the North and North-west, by the Thracians and Illyrians; and on the South and South-west, by Thessalie and Epirus.

Their Kings were of the family of Temenus, of the race of Hercules, and by nation Argiues; who are listed as followeth. About some sixe yeares after the translation of the Assyrian Empire, Arbaces then gouerning Media; Caranus of Argos, commanded by an Oracle, to leade a Colonie into Macedon, departed thence with many people, and as he was marching through that Country, the weather being raynie and tempestuous, he espied a great heard of Goats, which fled the storme as fast as they could, hasting them to their knowne place of couert. Whereupon Caranus, calling to minde, that he had also by another Oracle beene directed, to follow the first troupe of beasts, that should eyther leade him, or flie before him; He pursued these Goates to the Gates of Edessa, and being vndiscouered by the Inhabitants, by reason of the darkenesse of the aire, he entred their Citie without resistance, and possest it. Soone after this, by the ouerthrow of Cisseus, Caranus became Lord of the rest of Macedon, and held it eight and twentie yeeres. Paul. Diac. Chus. Theop. Anios. 6. Euseb. in Chro.

Cænus succeeded Caranus, and reigned twelue yeeres. Tyrimas followed Cænus, and ruled eight and twentie yeeres.

Perdiccas the first, the sonne of Tyrimas, gouerned one and fiftie yeeres: a Prince, for his great valour, and many other vertues, much renowned. Solinus, Plinie, Iustine, Eusebius, Theophilus, Antiochenus, and others affirme, that he appoynted a place of buriall for himselfe, and for all the Kings of Macedon his Successours, at Ægæ: assuring them, that the Kingdome should so long continue in his line and race, as they continued to lay vp their bodies in that Sepulchre; wherein it is said, that because Alexander the great failed, therefore the posteritie of the Temenida failed in him: a thing rather deuised after the effect, as I conceiue, then fore-told by Perdiccas. Solc. 14. Plin. l. 4. c. 10.

Argæus succeeded vnto Perdiccas, and ruled eight and twentie yeeres. Euseb. in Chro.

Philip the first, his successour, reigned eight and twentie yeeres.

Europus followed Philip, and gouerned six and twentie yeeres: in whose infancie the Illyrians inuaded Macedon, and hauing obtained a great victorie, they pursued the same to the great danger of that State. Whereupon the Macedonians, gathering new forces, and resoluing either to recouer their former losse, or to lose at once both their Kingdome and their King, they carried him with them in his Cradle into the field, and returned victorious; for they were either confident that their nation could not be beaten (their King being present,) or rather they perswaded themselues that there was no man so void of honour and compassion, as to abandon their naturall Lord, being an infant, and no way (but by the hands of his seruants) able to defend himselfe from destruction. The like is reported by Aimonius of Clotarius the sonne of Fredegunda. Euseb. Iustin. Ammian. Tho. Ant. & c. Aimon. l. 3. c. 82.

Alcetas succeeded Æropus, and ruled nine and twentie yeeres.

Amyntas the first succeeded Alcetas, and reigned fiftie yeeres; He liued at such time as Darius Hystaspes, after his vnprosperous returne out of Scythia, sent Megabazus with an Armie into Europe, who in Xerxes name required Amyntas to acknowledge him for his Supreme Lord, by yeelding vnto him Earth and Water. But his Embassadours, as you haue heard before, were, for their insolent behauiour towards the Macedonian Ladies, slaine by the direction of Alexander, who was the sonne of Amyntas, and his Successour. Her. Euse. Iust. &c.

Alexander, surnamed the Rich, the sonne of Amyntas, gouerned Macedon three and fortie yeeres. He did not onely appease the wrath of Megabazus, for the slaughter of the Persian Embassadours, by giuing Gygea his Sister, to Bubares of the bloud of Persia, but by that meanes hee grew so great in Xerxes grace, as hee obtained all that Region betweene the Mountaines of Olympus and Hemus, to be vnited to the Kingdome of Macedon. Yet could not these benefits buy his affection from the Greekes. For Xerxes being returned into Asia, and Mardonius made Generall of the Persian Armie, Alexander acquainted the Greeks with all his intents and purposes against them. He had three sonnes, Perdiccas, Alcetas, and Philip.

Her. lib. 8. Plut. Euseb. Iust. &c.

Perdiccas the second, the sonne of Alexander, liued in the time of the Peloponnesian Warre, and raigned in all eight and twentie yeeres. The Warres which he made were not much remarkeable: the Storie of them is found heere and there by pieces in Thucydides his first six bookes. He left behind him two sonnes, Perdiccas, who was very yong, and Archelaus, who was base borne.

Perdiccas the third, being deliuered to the custody and care of Archelaus, was at seuen yeeres of age cast into a Well and drowned by his false Guardian: who excusing this fact to Cleopatra the mother of the young King, said, That the child in following a Goose hastily, fell thereinto by misaduenture. But Archelaus stayed not here: for hauing thus dispatched his brother, he slew both his Vncle Alcetas the sonne of Alexander the Rich, and Alexander the sonne of this Alcetas, his Cosen Germaine, & enioyed the Kingdome of Macedon himselfe foure and twentie yeeres.

Plat. in Gorg. Arist. in Pol. 5.

This Archelaus, of whom both Plato and Aristotle make mention, though he made himselfe King by wicked murder, yet he performed many things greatly to the profit of his Nation. It is said, That he sought by all meanes to draw Socrates vnto him, and that he greatly loued and honored Eurypides the Tragedian. He had two sons, Archelaus and Orestes.

Archelaus the second succeeded his Father, and hauing raigned seuen yeeres, hee was slaine in hunting, either by chance, or of purpose by Crataeus.

Orestes his younger sonne was committed to the education of Aeropus, of the royall bloud of Macedon, and had the same measure which Archelaus had measured to his Pupill; for Aeropus murdered him and vsurped the Kingdome, which hee held some six yeeres: the same who denied passage to Agesilaus King of Sparta, who desired after his returne from the Asian expedition, to passe by the way of Macedon into Greece.

Diod. Polyaen. Plut. in Demetr.

This Vsurper left three sonnes, Pausanias, Argaeus, and Alexander. Pausanias succeeded his father Aeropus, and hauing raigned one yeere, hee was driuen out by Amyntas the son of Philip, the son of the first Perdiccas, the son of Alexander the Rich, which Philip was then preserued, when Archelaus the Bastard slew his brother Perdiccas, his Vncle Alcetas, and his sonne Alexander. This Amyntas raigned (though very vnquietly) foure and twentie yeeres, for he was not only infested by Pausanias, assisted by the Thracians, and by his brother Argaeus, incouraged by the Illyrians; and by the said Argaeus, for two yeeres dispossest of Macedon: but on the other side, the Olynthians, his Neighbors neare the Aegean Sea, made themselues for a while Masters of Pella, the chiefe Citie of Macedon.

Amyntas the second had by his Wife Eurydice the Illyrian, three Sonnes; Alexander the second, Perdiccas the third, and Philip the second, Father of Alexander the Great; and one Daughter called Eurynone or Eurione: Hee had also by his second Wife Gygea, three Sonnes; Archelaus, Argaeus, and Menelaus, afterward slaine by their brother Philip: He had more by a Concubine, Ptolomie, surnamed Alorites, of the Citie Alorus, wherein he was borne.

Alexander the second raigned not much aboue one yeere, in which time he was inuaded by Pausanias, the sonne of Aeropus, but defended by Iphicrates the Athenian, while hee was at that time about Amphipolis. He was also constrained (for the payment of a great summe of mony) to leaue his yongest brother Philip in Hostage with the Illyrians, who had subiected his father Amyntas to the payment of tribute. After this, Alexander, being inuited by the Aleuadæ against Alexander the Tyrant of Pheres in Thessaly, hauing redeemed his brother Philip, to draw the Thebans to his assistance, entred into confederacie with Pelopidas, being at that time in the same Countrey, with whom he also left Philip with diuers other principall persons for the gage of his promises to Pelopidas. But Eurydice his mother falling in loue with her Sonne-in-law, who had married her Daughter Euryone or Exione, practized the death of Alexander her ſonne, with a purpoſe to conferre the Kingdome on her Paramour, which Ptolomy Alorites did put in execution: by meanes whereof hee held Macedon for three yeeres, but was ſoone after ſlaine by Perdiccas the brother of Alexander. Diodore hath it otherwiſe of Philip being made pledge; and ſayth, That Amyntas his Father deliuered him for hoſtage to the Illyrians, by whom he was conueyed to Thebes, there to be kept: others report that Philip (while his father was yet liuing) was firſt ingaged to the Thebans, and deliuered for hoſtage a ſecond time by Alexander his brother. Diod. li. 15. & 16.

Perdiccas the third, after hee had ſlaine Alorites his baſe brother, gouerned Macedon fiue yeeres, and was then ſlaine in a battaile againſt the Illyrians, according to Diodorus; but Iuſtine affirmeth, that he periſhed by the practice of Eurydice his mother, as Alexander did. Iuſt. li. 7.

§. II.

The beginning of Philips reigne; and how he deliuered Macedon from the troubles wherein he found it entangled.

PHilip the ſecond, the yongeſt ſonne of Amyntas by Eurydice, hauing beene inſtructed in all knowledge requiſite vnto the gouernment of a Kingdome, in that excellent education which he had vnder Epaminondas, making an eſcape from Thebes, returned into Macedon, in the firſt yeere of the hundred and fifth Olympiad; which was after the building of Rome three hundred fourſcore and thirteene yeeres: and finding the many enemies and dangers wherewith the Kingdome was enuironed, hee tooke on him, not as King (for Perdiccas left a ſonne, though but an infant) but as the Protector of his Nephew, and Commander of the men of Warre. Yet his fruitfull ambition ſoone ouer-grew his modeſtie, and hee was eaſily perſwaded by the people to accept both the Title of King, and withall, the abſolute Rule of the Kingdome. And to ſay the truth, The neceſſitie of the State of Macedon at that time required a King both prudent and actiue. For, beſides the incurſions of the Illyrians and Pannonians, the King of Thrace did ſet vp in oppoſition Pauſanias, the Athenians, Argæus, ſonnes of the late Vſurper Æropus: each of theſe labouring to place in Macedon a King of their owne Election. Theſe heauie burdens when Philip could not well beare, hee bought off the weightieſt by money, and by faire promiſes vnloded himſelfe of ſo many of the reſt, as hee ranne vnder the remainder happily enough. For, notwithſtanding that his brother Perdiccas had his death accompanied with foure thouſand Macedonians, beſide theſe that were wounded and taken priſoners; and that the Pannonians were deſtroying all before them in Macedon; and that the Athenians with a fleete by Sea, and three thouſand Souldiers by Land vnder Mantias, did beate vpon him on all ſides and quarters of his Country: Yet after he had practiſed the men of warre of Pannonia; and corrupted them with gifts; and had alſo bought the King of Thrace from Pauſanias, hee forthwith made head againſt the Athenians his ſtiffeſt enemies; and, for the firſt, he preuented their recouerie of Amphipolis, a Citie on the frontier of Macedon: and did then purſue Argæus the ſonne of Æropus, ſet againſt him by the Athenians, and followed him ſo hard at the heeles, in his retrait from Æges, that hee forced him to abide the battaile: which Argæus loſt, hauing the greateſt part of his Army ſlaine in the place. Thoſe of the Athenians, and others which remayned vnbroken, tooke the aduantage of a ſtrong peece of ground at hand, which though they could not long defend, yet auoyding thereby the preſent furie of the Souldiers, they obtained of the vanquiſhers life and libertie to returne into Attica. Whereupon a peace was concluded betweene him and the Athenians for that preſent, and for this elemencie hee was greatly renowned and honoured by all the Greekes.

§. III.

The good ſucceſſe which Philip had in many enterpriſes.

NOw had Philip leiſure to looke Northward, and to attend the Illyrians and Pæonians, his irreconciliable enemies and borderers: both which he inuaded with so prosperous successe, as he slew Bardillis, King of the Illyrians, with seuen thousand of his Nation, and thereby recouered all those places which the Illyrians held in Macedon: and withall, vpon the death of the King of Pannonia, he pierst that Countrey, and after a maine victory obtained, he enforst them to pay him tribute. This was no sooner done, than (without staying to take longer breath) he hasted speedily towards Larissa, vpon the Riuer Peneus in Thessalie, of which Towne he soone made himselfe master; and thereby he got good footing in that Country, whereof he made vse in time following. Now although he resolued either to subdue the Thessalians, or to make them his owne against all others, because the horse-men of that Countrey were the best, and most feared in that part of Europa; yet hee thought it most for his safety to close vp the entrances out of Thrace, least, while he inuaded Thessalie and Greece towards the South, those ample Nations, lying towards the North, should either withdraw him, or ouer-runne Macedon, as in former times. He therefore attempted Amphipolis, seated on the famous Riuer of Strimon, which parteth Thrace from Macedon, and wonne it. He also recouered Pydna; and (to the North of Amphipolis) the City of Crenides (sometime Datus,) and called it after his name Philippi: to the people whereof Saint Paul afterward directed one of his Epistles. This place, wherein Philippi stood, is very rich in mines of gold, out of which greatly to the aduancement of Philips affaires, he drew yeerely a thousand talents, which make sixe hundred thousand French Crownes.

And that he might with the more ease disburden the Thracian-shores of the Athenian Garrisons, to which he had giuen a great blow by the taking in of Amphipolis; he entred into league with his Fathers malicious enemies the Olynthians; whom the better to fasten vnto him, he gaue them the Citie of Pydna with the Territory, meaning nothing lesse than that they should enioy it, or their owne Estate, many yeeres.

Now that he might by degrees winne ground vpon the Greekes, he tooke the faire occasion to deliuer the City of Pheres in Thessalie, from the tyrants Lycophron and Tisiphonus: who, after they had conspired with Thebe the wife of Alexander, who vsurped vpon the liberty of that State, they themselues (Alexander being murdered) held it also by the same strong hand and oppression that Alexander did, till by the assistance of Philip they were beaten out, and Pheres restored to her former liberty. Which act of Philip did for-euer after fasten the Thessalians vnto him, and, to his exceeding great aduantage, binde them to his seruice.

§. IIII.

Of the Phocian Warre which first drew Philip into Greece.

ABout this time, to wit, in the second yeere of the hundred and sixth Olympiad, eight yeeres after the battaile of Mantinea, and about the eighth yeere of Artaxerxes Ochus, beganne that Warre, called Sacred. Now, as all occasions concurre towards the execution of eternall prouidence, and of euery great alteration in the World there is some preceding preparation, though not at the first easily discerned; so did this reuengefull hatred by the Thebans, Thessalians, and Locrians, conceiued against the Phocians, not onely teach Philip how he might with halfe a hand wrest the sword out of their fingers; but the Greekes themselues, beating downe their owne defences, to giue him an easie passage; and beating themselues, to giue him victory without perill, left nothing vnperformed towards their owne slauery, sauing the title and imposition. Of this Warre the Thebans (made ouer-proude by their victory at Leuctres) were the inflamers. For at the Councell of the Amphyctiones, or of the generall Estates of Greece, in which, at that time, they swayed most, they caused both the Lacedemonians and Phocians to bee condemned in greater summes of money than they could well beare; the one for surprizing the Castle of Cadmea in the time of peace, the other for ploughing vp a peece of ground belonging to the Temple of Delphos. The Phocians being resolued not to obey this Edict, were secretly set on and incouraged by the Lacedemonians: and for refusall were exposed as Sacrilegers, and accursed to all their Neighbour-Nations, for whom it was then lawfull to inuade, and destroy them at their pleasures.

The Phocians perswaded thereunto by Philomelus, a Captaine of their owne, cast the same dice of hazzard that Cæsar after many Ages following did; but had not the same chance. Yet they dealt well enough with all the enemies of their owne Nation. And the better to beare out an vngracious quarrell, of which there was left no hope of compoſition, they reſolued to ſacke the Temple it ſelfe. For ſeeing that for the ploughing of a piece of Apollo's ground, they had ſo much offended their Neighbour-God, and their Neighbour-Nations, as worſe could not befall them than alreadie was intended; they reſolued to take the gold with the ground, and either to periſh for all, or to preuaile againſt all that had commiſſion to call them to account. The treaſure which they tooke out of the Temple in the beginning of the Warre, was tenne thouſand talents, which in thoſe dayes ſerued them to wage a great many men; and ſuch was their ſucceſſe in the beginning of the warre, as they wonne three great battailes againſt the Thebans, Theſſalians, and Locrians; but being beaten in the fourth, their Leader Philomelus caſt himſelfe head-long ouer the Rockes.

In the meane while the Cities of Cherſoneſus, both to defend themſelues againſt their bad neighbour Philip, who encroched vpon them, and to draw others into their quarrell, rendred themſelues to the Athenians. Philip prepareth to get them into his hands, and at the ſiege of Methone loſt one of his eyes. It is ſaid, That hee that ſhot him, did purpoſely direct his arrow towards him, and that it was written on the ſhaft thereof: After Philippo; After to Philip; for ſo hee was called that gaue him the wound. This Citie he euened with the ſoile. Plut. Vlpian. Strab. l. 8.

The Tyrant Lycophron before mentioned, while Philip was buſied on the border of Thrace, and the Theſſalians ingaged in the holy warre, entred Theſſalie with new forces, being aſſiſted by Onomarchus, Commander of the Phocian Armie, in place of Philomelus. For hereby the Phocians hoped ſo to entertaine the Theſſalians at home, as they ſhould not find leiſure to inuade them. Hereupon was Philip the ſecond time called into Theſſalie; but both the Theſſalians, and Macedonians, (Philip being preſent) were vtterly ouerthrowne by Onomarchus; and great numbers of both Nations loſt. From Theſſalie, Onomarchus drew ſpeedily towards Bœotia, and with the ſame victorious Armie brake the forces of the Bœotians, and tooke from them their Citie of Coronea. But Philip impatient of his late miſaduenture, after hee had re-enforced his Armie, returned with all ſpeed into Theſſalie, there to find againe the honour which hee lately loſt: and was the ſecond time encountred by Onomarchus, who brought into the field twentie thouſand foot, and fiue hundred horſe. All this great preparation ſufficed not, for Onomarchus was by Philip ſurmounted, both in numbers and in good fortune, his Armie ouerturned, ſixe thouſand ſlaine, and three thouſand taken: of which number himſelfe being one, was among others hanged by Philip. Thoſe that fled, were in part receiued by the Athenian Gallies, which ſailed alongſt the coaſt, commanded by Chares; but the greateſt number of thoſe that tooke the Sea, were therein deuoured ere they recouered them. Lycophron was now againe driuen out of Theſſalie, and Pheres made free as before.

Of the Olynthian Warre. The ambitious practiſes of Philip.

FRom hence Philip reſolued to inuade Phocis it ſelfe, but the Athenians did not fauour his enterance into thoſe parts, and therefore with the helpe of the Lacedæmonians, they retrencht his paſſage at the Streits of Thermopylis. Whereupon he returned into Macedon, and after the taking of Micyberne, Torone, and other Townes, he quarrelled with the Olynthians, whom not long before he had wooed to his alliance, and bought his peace of them. For the Olynthians were very ſtrong, and had euermore both braued and beaten the Macedonians. It is ſaid, that Philip hauing put to death Archelaus his halfe brother (for Amyntas had three ſonnes by Eurydice the Mother of Philip, and three other ſonnes by Gygæa: but Philips elder brothers by the ſame Mother being dead, he determined to rid himſelfe alſo of the reſt) the two yonger held themſelues within Olynthus; and that the receiuing of them by the Olynthians was the cauſe of the war, Iuſtine affirmeth. But iuſt quarrels are ballanced by iuſt Princes, for to this King all things were lawfull that might ſerue his turne; all his affections, & paſſions, how diuers ſoeuer in other men, were in his ambition ſwallowed vp, and thereinto conuerted. Iuſt. l. 8.

For

For he neither forbare the murder of his owne brothers, the breach of faith, the buying of other mens fidelitie; he esteemed no place strong where his Asse loaden with gold might enter: Nor any Citie or State vnconquerable, where a few of the greatest, to be made greater, could lose the sense of other mens sorrow and subiection. And because he thought it vaine to practise the winning of Olynthus, till he had inclosed all the power they had within their owne walls, he entred their Territorie, and by the aduantage of a well-compounded and trained Armie, he gaue them two ouerthrowes ere he sate downe before the Citie it selfe: which done, he bought Euthicrates and Lasthenes from their people, and from the seruice of their Countrie and Common-weale, by whose treason he entred the Towne, slew his brothers therein, sackt it, and sold the inhabitans for slaues by the drum. By the spoile of this place he greatly enriched himselfe, and had treasure sufficient to buy in other Cities withall, which he daily did. For so was hee aduised by the Oracle in the beginning of his vndertaking, That he should make his assaults with siluer speares: Whereupon Horace well and truely said, Hor. carm. Od. 16.

——— Diffidit Vrbium
Portas vir Macedo, & subruit æmulos
Reges muneribus.———

By gifts the Macedon claue gates asunder,
And Kings enuying his estate brought vnder.

And it is true that he wonne more by corruption and fraude, then he did by force. For as he had in all the principall Cities of Greece his secret workers (which way of Conquest was well followed by Philip the second of Spaine:) So when in the contention betweene the Competitors, for the kingdome of Thrace, he was chosen the Arbitrator, he came not to the Counsell accompanied with Pietie and Iustice, but with a powerfull Armie, and hauing beaten and slaine both Kings, gaue sentence for himselfe, and made the Kingdome his owne.

§. VI.

How Philip ended the Phocian Warre.

THe warre still continued betweene the Phocians, and the Associates of the holy warre, the Bœotians, finding themselues vnable to subsist without some present aide, sent vnto Philip for succour, who willingly yeelded to their necessities, and sent them such a proportion of men, as were neither sufficient to master their enemies, nor to assure themselues; but yet to inable them to continue the warre, and to waste the strength of Greece. They also sent to Artaxerxes Ochus for supply of treasure, who lent them thirtie talents, which makes a hundred & fourescore thousand Crownes: but when with these supplies they had still the worst against the Phocians, who held from them three of the strongest Cities within Bœotia it selfe, they then besought Philip of Macedon that he would assist them in person, to whom they would giue an enterance into their Territory, and in all things obey his Commandements in Warre.

Now had Philip what he longed for; for he knew himselfe in state to giue the law to both, and so quitting all his other purposes towards the North, he marched with a speedie pace towards Bœotia, where being arriued, Phallechus who commanded the Phocian Armie, fearing to shock with this victorious King, made his owne peace, and withdrew himselfe with a Regiment of eight thousand Souldiers into Peloponnesus, leauing the Phocians to the mercy of the Conquerour; and for conclusion he had the glorie of that warre called Sacred, which the Græcians with so many mutuall slaughters had continued for ten yeeres; and, besides the glorie, he possest himselfe of Orchomene, Coronea, and Corsia, in the Country of the Bœotians, who inuited him to be victorious ouer themselues. He brought the Phocians into seruitude, & wasted their Cities, and gaue them but their Villages to inhabite, reseruing vnto himselfe the yerely tribute of threescore talents, which make sixe and thirtie thousand French Crownes. He also hereby (besides the fame of pietie for seruice of the Gods) obtained the same double voice in the Councell of the Amphyctions, phoriens, which the Phocians had, with the superintendencie of the Pythian games, forfeited by the Corinthians, by being partakers in the Phocian sacrilege.

How Philip with ill successe attempted vpon Perinthus, Byzantium, and the Scythians.

PHilip, after his triumphant returne into Macedon, by the Lieutenant of his Armie Parmenio, slaughtered many thousands of the Illyrians and Dardanians, and brought the Thracians to pay him the tenth part of all their reuenues. But his next enterprise against the Perinthians staied his fury. Perinthus was a City of Thrace, seated vpon Propontis, in the mid-way betweene Sestos and Byzantium, a place of great strength, and a people resolued to defend their libertie against Philip, whete the Athenians incouraged and assisted them. Philip sate downe before it with a puissant Armie, made many faire breaches, gaue many furious assaults, built many ouer topping and commanding Towers about it. But he was repell'd with equall violence. For whereas Philip thought by his continuall assaults to wearie them, and waste both their men and munition, they were supplied, not only from the Persian with men and money, and succoured from Byzantium which stood vpon the same Sea-coast, but they were relieued from Athens, Chio, and Rhodes, by the conduction of Phocion, with whatsoeuer was wanting to their necessitie. But because those of Byzantium, by reason of their neighbourhood, and easie passage by water, gaue them often and ready helpe; Philip remoued the one halfe of his Armie and besieged it, leauing fifteene thousand foot before Perinthus, to force it if they could; But to be short, he failed in both attempts, (as all Princes commonly doe that vndertake diuers enterprises at one time) and returned into Macedon with no lesse dishonour than losse: whereupon he made an Ouerture of peace with the Athenians, and greatly desired it, to which though Phocion perswaded them in all he could, and that by the occasion offered they might greatly aduantage their conditions; Yet Demosthenes with his eloquence preuailed in the refusall. In the meane while, Philip hauing digested his late affront, and supplied his expence, by the taking of an hundred and threescore and ten Merchants ships, he gathered new forces, and being accompanied with his sonne Alexander, led them into Scythia; but he was also vnprosperous in this enterprise: For the Triballi, a people of Mœsia set on him in his returne, wounded him, and tooke from him the greatest part of the spoiles, which he had gathered.

§. VIII.

How Philip ouerthrowing the Greekes in the battaile of Chæronea, was chosen Captaine-Generall of Greece. The death of Philip.

AMong these Northren Nations (part of which he suppresst, and part quieted) he spent some eight yeeres; and in the ninth yeere, after the end of the holy warre, he was by his great aduantage inuited againe by the Grecians to their assistance. For the Citizens of Amphissa hauing disobeyed the decree of the Amphyctiones, in which Philip had a double voice, and who by reason that the Thebans and Locrians gaue countenance and aide to the Amphissenians, the rest were not of themselues able to constraine them, they besought Philip to come in person to their assistance. Now you must thinke that Philip was not long in resoluing vpon this enterprise; he needed no drawing on, whom nothing could keepe backe; nor other dissuasion than a masting power could hold thence. He therefore commanded his Army forthwith to march; the same being compounded of thirty thousand foot, and two thousand horse; and with as much expedition as could be made, he entred Phocis, wanne Platæa, and brought into subiection all that Region.

The rest, and especially the Athenians, although they had good cause to feare that a great part of this storme would fall on themselues, yet were they dissuaded by Demosthenes from accepting such reasonable conditions of peace as Philip offered, and rather made choise (hauing drawne the Thebans to ioyne with them) to leaue the enioying of their eſtates and their freedome to the chance of one battaile, than to hold it either by compoſition, or by the grace of Philip. But this their Oratours eloquence coſt them deare. It is true that he could farre more eaſily minde them of the vertue of their Anceſtors, than make them ſuch as they were. He might repeat vnto them (with words mouing paſſion) the wonders they wrought at Marathon, but he could not transforme the Macedonians into Perſians, nor draw from the dead, a Miltiades, an Ariſtides, a Themiſtocles, or a Cimon, or any of thoſe famous Commanders, whoſe great vertues they had payed with the greateſt ingratitude that euer Nation did. A Phocion they had, but by the ſtrength of a contrary faction he was at this time in diſgrace, and not imployed: in ſo much as when the Armies of Philip and the Confederates incountred, although ſome thouſand of the Athenians did abide the killing, and the like number well-neere of the Thebans died with them; yet the want of the worthie men on that ſide to holde vp the reſt, and to draw them on, and the many choiſe Captains of the Macedonians, incouraged by a King of a growing fortune, as it gaue to Philip ſo ſtaining a victorie that Alexander by the light thereof found his way (in deſpight of all the Nations interiacent) into Perſia, India, and Ægypt; ſo it cut to the ground, and gaue ende and date to all the Grecian glory: Yea their libertie (ſaith Curtius) with their large Dominion wonne with ſo many difficulties, continued for ſo many Ages, and ſo often defended againſt the greateſt Kings, was now loſt in a moment, and for euer loſt.

Now this aduiſed King (neuer paſſionate to his diſaduantage) to the ende hee might obtaine the Soueraignetie ouer all Greece, and be acknowledged for their Captaine-Generall againſt the Perſians, without any further hazard or trouble, was content to let goe thoſe Athenians that were taken at this battaile of Cheronæa, as he alſo forbare to attempt any thing againſt their Citie: but in Thebes (which lately by the vertue of Epaminondas triumphed ouer the reſt) hee lodged a Garriſon of Macedonians. And being ſoone after (according vnto the long deſire which he had nouriſhed of this Soueraignetie) by the generall States at Corinth, ſtiled the firſt Commander of all the Gracians, and contribution of men and money granted him, he compounded an Armie of great ſtrength, and vnder the Commandement of Attalus and Parmenio, tranſported the ſame ouer the Helleſpont into Aſia, to begin the warre. Of his enterpriſe againſt Perſia, hee ſought the ſucceſſe from the Oracle at Delphos, from whence he receiued ſuch another conuertible riddle, as Græſus did when he attempted Cyrus, and was in like ſort miſtaken in the expoſition.

But as it is hard to diſcerne and withſtand the flatteries of our owne appetites, ſo did Philips ambitious deſire to inuade Perſia, abuſe his iudgement, ſo farre, that the death, wherewith himſelfe was threatned, he vnderſtood to be deliuered of his enemie, whom he intended preſently to inuade. Before his purpoſed departure into Aſia, hee prepared for the marriage of his Daughter Cleopatra, with Alexander King of Epirus, to which feaſt and paſtimes thereat appointed, he inuited all his Friendes, and Alleis, with the principall perſons of the Grecian Cities, from whom he receiued much honour and many rich preſents; but this was indeed the feaſt of his Funerall. For hauing refuſed to doe iuſtice to one Pauſanias a Gentleman of his Guard, whom Attalus (greatly fauoured by Philip) had firſt made drunke, and then left to be carnally abuſed by diuers baſe perſons. This Pauſanias grew into ſo great deteſtation of the Kings partiality in ſo foule a fact, as when Philip was paſſing towards the Theater, he drew a ſword from vnder his long garment and wounded him to death, when he had liued fiue and fortie yeeres, and reigned fiue and twenty. Iuſtine reports it, that Olympias incouraged Pauſanias to murder the King her huſband, which after his death ſhe boldly auowed, by the honor ſhe did vnto Pauſanias, in crowning his dead body, in conſecrating his ſword vnto Apollo, by building for him a monument, and other like Graces. Iuſt. l. 9.

What good foundations of Alexanders greatneſſe were laid by Philip. Of his laudable qualities, and iſſue.

NOw although he were then taken from the World, when he had maſtred all oppoſition on that ſide of the Sea, and had ſeene the fruits of his hopes, and labours, changing colour towards ripeneſſe and perfection; yet hee was her-herein happy that he liued to see his sonne Alexander at mans estate, and had himselfe been an eye-witnesse of his resolution, and singular valour in this last battaile.

The foundation of whose future greatnesse he had laid so soundly for him, with so plaine a patterne of the buildings which himselfe meant to erect, as the performance and finishing was farre more easie to Alexander, though more glorious than the beginnings vnto Philip, though lesse famous. For besides the recouery of Macedon it selfe, in competition betweene him and the sonnes of Aropus, the one assisted by the Thracians, the other by the Athenians, and besides the regaining of many places possest by the Illyrians, the crushing of all those Northren Kings his Neighbours, the ouer-throw of Olynthus, a State that despised the power of his Father, the many Maritimate Cities taken, of great strength and ancient freedome, and the subiection of that famous Nation of Greece, which for so many Ages had defended it selfe against the greatest Kings of the World, and wonne vpon them; He left vnto his sonne, and had bred vp for him, so many choise Commanders, as the most of them, both for their valour and iudgement in the Warre, were no lesse worthy of Crownes, than himselfe was that ware a Crowne. For it was said of Parmenio (whom Alexander, vngratefull to so great vertue, impiously murdered) That Parmenio had performed many things challenging eternall fame, without the King, but the King, without Parmenio neuer did any thing worthy of renowne: as for the rest of his Captaines, though content to obey the Sonne of their Father, yet did they not after Alexanders death endure to acknowledge any man Superiour to themselues.

Of this Prince it is hard to iudge, whether his ambition had taught him the exercise of more vices, than Nature and his excellent Education had inriched him with vertues. For besides that he was Valiant, Wise, Learned, and Master of his Affections, he had this fauour of Piety, that he rather laboured to satisfie those that were grieued, than to suppresse them. Whereof (among many other) we finde a good example in his dealing with Arcadion, and Nicanor; whom, when for their euill speech of Philip, his familiars perswaded him to put to death; He answered them, That first it ought to be considered, whether the fault were in them that gaue him ill language, or in himselfe: Secondly, that it was in euery mans owne power to be well spoken off; and this was shortly prooued, for after Philip relieued their necessities, there were none within his Kingdome that did him more honour than they did. Whereupon he told those that had perswaded him to vse violence, that he was a better Phisition for euill speech than they were.

His Epistles to Alexander his sonne are remembred to Cicero, and Gellius; and by Dion: and Chrysostome exceedingly commended. His Stratagems are gathered by Polyænus and Frontinus, his wise sayings by Plutarch; And albeit he held Macedon as in his owne right, all the time of his reigne, yet was he not the true and next Heire thereof: for Amyntas the sonne of his brother Perdiccas (of whom he had the protection during his infancy) had the right. This Amyntas he married to his Daughter Cyna, who had by him a Daughter called Eurydice, who was married to Philips base sonne Aridæus, her Vncle by the Mothers-side: both which Olympias, Philips first Wife, and mother to Alexander the Great, put to death; Aridæus by extreame torments: Eurydice she strangled.

Cic. Off. 2. Gel. l. 9. c. 3. Dion. 2 de Rep.

Philip had by this Olympias, the Daughter of Neoptolemus, King of the Molossians (of the race of Achilles) Alexander the Great, and Cleopatra. Cleopatra was married to her Vncle Alexander, King of Epirus, and was after her brother Alexanders death slaine at Sardis, by the commandement of Antigonus.

By Audata, an Illyrian, his second Wife, he had Cyna, married as is shewed before.

By Nicasipolis, the Sister of Iason, Tyrant of Pheres, he had Thessalonica, whom Cassander, after he had taken Pidna, married, but she was afterward by her Father-in-law Antipater put to death.

By Cleopatra the Neece of Attalus, he had Caranus, whom others call Philip: him, Olympias, the Mother of Alexander the Great, caused to be rosted to death in a copper Pan. Others lay this murder to Alexander himselfe. By the same Cleopatra he had likewise a Daughter, called Europa, whom Olympias also murdered at the Mothers brest.

Athen. l. 13. c. 2. Iust. l. 3.

By Phila and Meda he had no issue.

He had also two Concubines, Arsinoe, whom after he had gotten with childe, he married to an obscure man, called Lagus, who bare Ptolomie, King of Ægypt, called the sonne of Lagus, but esteemed the sonne of Philip: by Philinna, his second Concubine, a pub-a publike Dancer, hee had Aridæus, of whom wee shall haue much occasion to speake hereafter.

CHAP. II.

Of Alexander the Great.

A briefe rehearsall of Alexanders doings, before he inuaded Asia.

ALexander, afterward called the Great, succeeded vnto Philip his Father; being a Prince no lesse valiant by Nature, than by Education, well instructed, and inriched in all sorts of Learning and good Arts. He began his reigne ouer the Macedonians foure hundred and seuenteene yeeres after Rome built, and after his owne birth twenty yeares. The strange dreames of Philip his Father, and that one of the gods in the shape of a Snake, begat him on Olympias his Mother, I omit as foolish tales; but that the Temple of Diana (a worke the most magnificent of the World) was burnt vpon the day of his birth, and that so strange an accident was accompanied with the newes of three seuerall victories, obtained by the Macedonians, it was very remarkeable, and might with the reason of those times be interpreted for ominous, and fore-shewing the great things by Alexander afterward performed. Vpon the change of the King, the Neighbor-Nations, whom Philip had oppresst, began to consult about the recouery of their former liberty, and to aduenture it by force of Armes. Alexanders yong-yeeres gaue them hope of preuailing, and his suspected seuerity increased courage in those, who could better resolue to die, than to liue slauishly. But Alexander gaue no time to those swelling humours, which might speedily haue endangered the health of his Estate. For after reuenge taken vpon the Conspirators against his Father, whom he slew vpon his Tombe; & the celebration of his Funerals, he first fastened vnto him his owne Nation, by freeing them from all exactions and bodily slauery, other than their seruice in his Warres; and vsed such kingly austerity towards those that contemned his young yeares, and such clemency to the rest that perswaded themselues of the cruelty of his disposition, as all affections being passed at home, hee made a present iourney into Peloponnesus, and so well exercised his spirits among them, as by the Councell of the States of Greece, he was according to the great desire of his heart, elected Captaine-Generall against the Persians, vpon which warre Philip had not onely resolued, (who had obtained the same title of Generall Commander) but had transported vnder the leading of Parmenio, and Attalus, a part of his Army, to recouer some places on Asia-side, for the safe descent of the rest.

This enterprise against the Persian occupied all Alexanders affections; those faire marks of Riches, Honour, and large Dominion, he now shot at both sleeping and waking: all other thoughts and imaginations were either grieuous or hatefull. But a contrary wind ariseth; for he receiueth aduertisement that the Athenians, Thebans, and Lacedæmonians, had vnited themselues against him, and, by assistance from the Persian, hoped for the recouery of their former freedome. Hereto they were perswaded by Demosthenes, himselfe being thereto perswaded by the gold of Persia; the deuice he vsed was more subtile then profitable, for hee caused it to be bruted that Alexander was slaine in a battaile against the Triballes, and brought into the assembly a Companion whom he had corrupted to affirme, That himselfe was present and wounded in the battaile. There is indeed a certaine Doctrine of Policy (as Policy is now a-daies defined by falshood and knauery) that deuised rumors & lies, if they serue the turne, but for a day or two, are greatly auaileable. It is true that common people are sometime mockt by them, as Souldiers are by false alarums in the Wars; but in all that I haue obserued, I haue found the successe as ridiculous as the inuention. For as those that find themselues at one time abused by such like brutes, doe at other times neglect their duties, when they are vpon true reports, and in in occasions perilous, summoned to assemble; so doe all men in generall condemne the Venters of such trumperie, and for them, feare vpon necessary occasions to entertaine the truth it selfe. This labour vnlooked for, and losse of time, was not onely very grieuous to Alexander, but by turning his sword from the ignoble and effeminate Persians, against which he had directed it, towards the manly and famous Gracians, of whose assistance he thought himselfe assured, his present vndertaking was greatly disordered. But he that cannot endure to striue against the winde, shall hardly attaine the Port which he purposeth to recouer: and it no lesse becommeth the worthiest men to oppose misfortunes, than it doth the weakest children to bewaile them.

He therefore made such expedition towards these Reuolters, as that himselfe, with the Armie that followed him, brought them the first newes of his preparation. Hereupon all stagger, and the Athenians, as they were the first that moued, so were they the first that fainted, seeking by their Embassadours to pacifie the King, and to be receiued againe into his grace. Alexander was not long in resoluing; for the Persians perswaded him to pardon the Grecians. Wise men are not easily drawne from great purposes by such occasions as may easily be taken off, neither hath any King euer brought to effect any great affaire, who hath intangled himselfe in many enterprises at once, not tending to one and the same certaine end.

And hauing now quieted his borderers towards the South, he resolued to assure those Nations which lay on the North-side of Macedon, to wit, the Tracians, Triballes, Peones, Getes, Agrians, and other saluage people, which had greatly vexed with incursions, not onely other of his Predecessours, but euen Philip his Father: with all which, after diuers ouerthrowes giuen them, he made peace, or else brought them into subiection. Notwithstanding this good successe, he could not yet finde the way out of Europe. There is nothing more naturall to man than liberty, the Greekes had enioyed it ouer-long, and lost it too late to forget it; they therefore shake off the yoke once againe. The Thebans, who had in their Citadell a Garrison of a thousand Macedons, attempt to force it; Alexander hasteneth to their succour, and presents himselfe with thirty thousand foot, all old Souldiers, & three thousand horse, before the Citie, & gaue the Inhabitants some daies to resolue, being euen heart-sicke with the desire of passing into Asia. So vnwilling, indeed, he was to draw bloud of the Gracians, by whom he hoped to serue himselfe elsewhere, that he offered the Thebans remission, if they would onely deliuer into his hands Phœnix and Prothytes, the stirrers vp of the Rebellion. But they, opposing the mounting fortune of Alexander, (which bare all resistance before it, like the breaking-in of the Ocean-Sea) in stead of such an answere, as men besieged and abandoned should haue made, demanded Philotas and Antipater to be deliuered vnto them; as if Thebes alone, then layed in the ballance of Fortune with the Kingdome of Macedon, and many other Prouinces, could either haue cuened the scale or swaied it. Therefore in the end they perished in their obstinacie. For while the Thebans oppose the Armie assailant, they are charged at the backe by the Macedonian Garrison, their Citie taken and razed to the ground, sixe thousand slaine, and thirty thousand sold for slaues, at the price of foure hundred and fortie talents. This the King did to the terrour of the other Gracian Cities.

Many Arguments were vsed by Cleadas one of the prisoners, to perswade Alexander to forbeare the destruction of Thebes. He prayed the King to belieue that they were rather misse-led by giuing hasty credit to false reports, than any way malicious; for being perswaded of Alexanders death, they rebelled but against his Successour. He also besought the King to remember, that his father Philip had his education in that Citie, yea that his Ancestor Hercules was borne therein: but all perswasions were fruitlesse; the times wherein offences are committed, doe greatly aggrauate them. Yet for the honour he bare to learning, he pardoned all of the race of Pindarus the Poet, and spared, and set at liberty Timoclea, the sister of Theagenes, who died in defence of the liberty of Greece against his Father Philip. This Noble woman being taken by a Thracian, and by him ruished, he threatned to take her life vnlesse she would confesse her treasure: she led that Thracian to a Well, and told him that she had therein cast it: and when the Thracian stooped to looke into the Well, she suddenly thrust him into the mouth thereof, and stoned him to death.

Now because the Athenians had receiued into their City so many of the Thebans, as had escaped and fled vnto them for succour, Alexander would not grant them peace, but vpon condition to deliuer into his hands both their Orators which perswaded this second reuolt, and their Captaines; yet in the end it being a torment vnto him to retard the enterprise of Persia, he was content that the Orators should remaine, and accepted of the banishment of the Captaines, wherein he was exceeding ill aduised, had not his fortune, or rather the prouidence of God, made all the resistance against him vnprofitable: for these good Leaders of the Gracians betook themselues to the seruice of the Persian, whom after a few dayes he inuaded.

§. II.

How Alexander passing into Asia, fought with the Persians vpon the Riuer of Granicus.

When all was now quieted at home, Alexander, committing to the trust of Antipater both Greece & Macedon, in the first of the Spring did passe the Hellespont, and being ready to dis-imbarke, he threw a Dart towards the Asian shore, as a token of defiance, commanding his Souldiers not to make any waste in their owne Territorie, or to burne, or defaee those buildings which themselues were presently, and in the future to possesse. He landed his Armie, consisting of two and thirty thousand foot, & fiue thousand horse, all old Souldiers, neere vnto Troy, where he offered a solemne sacrifice vpon Achilles Tombe, his maternall Ancestor.

But before he left his owne coast, he put to death, without any offence giuen him, all his Mother-in-lawes Kinsmen, whom Philip his Father had greatly aduanced, not sparing such of his owne as he suspected. He also tooke with him many of his tributarie Princes, of whose fidelity he doubted; thinking by vniust crueltie to assure all things, both in the present and future. Yet the end of all fell out contrary to the policy which his Ambition had commended vnto him, though agreeing very well with the iustice of God; for al that he had planted, was soone after withered, and rooted vp; those, whom he most trusted, were the most traiterous; his mother, friends, and children, fell by such another mercilesse sword as his owne, and all manner of confusion followed his dead body to the graue, and left him there.

When the knowledge of Alexanders landing on Asia side was brought to Darius, he so much scorned the Armie of Macedon, and had so contemptible an opinion of Alexander himselfe, as hauing stiled him his seruant on a letter which he wrote vnto him, reprehending his disloyaltie and audacitie (for Darius intitled himselfe King of Kings, and the Kinsman of the gods) he gaue order withall to his Lieutenants of the lesser Asia, that they should take Alexander aliue, whip him with rods, and then conuay him to his presence: that they should sinke his ships, and send the Macedons taken prisoners beyond the Red-Sea, belike into Æthiopia, or some other vnhealthfull part of Affrica.

In this sort did this glorious King, confident in the glittering, but heartlesse, multitude which he commanded, dispose of the already-vanquished Macedonians; But the ill destinies of men beare them to the ground, by what strong confidence soeuer armed. The great numbers which he gathered together, and brought in one heape into the field, gaue rather an exceeding aduantage to his enemies, than any discouragement at all. For besides that they were men vtterly vnacquainted with dangers, men who by the name and countenance of their King were wont to preuaile against those of lesse courage than themselues, men that tooke more care how to embroder with gold and siluer their vpper garments, as if they attended the inuasion but of the Sunne-beames, than they did to arme themselues with yron and steele against the sharpe pikes, swords and darts of the hardie Macedonians; I say, besides all these, euen the opinion they had of their own numbers, of which euery one in particular hoped that it would not fall to his turne to fight, filled euery of them with the care of their owne safetie, without any intent at all to hazard any thing but their owne breath, and that of their horses, in running away. The Macedonians as they came to fight, and thereby to enrich themselues with the gold and iewels of Persia, both which they needed; so the Persians, who expected nothing in that Warre but blowes and wounds, which they needed not, obeyed the King, who had power to constraine them in assembling themselues for his seruice; but their owne feares and cowardice, which in time of danger had most power ouer them, they onely then obeyed, when their rebellion against so seruile a passion did iustly and violently require it. For saith Vegetius: Quemadmodum bene exercitatus miles prælium cupit, ita formidat indoctus; nam sciendum est in pugnâ vsum amplius prodesse quàm vires; As the well-practised Souldier desires to come to battaile, so the raw one feares it: for we must vnderstand, that in fight it more auailes to haue beene accustomed vnto the like, than onely to haue rude strength. What manner of men the Persians were, Alexander discouered in the first encounter, before which time it is said, by those that writ his Storie, That it was hard to iudge, whether his daring to vndertake the conquest of an Empire so well peopled, with a handfull of men, or the successe he had, were more to be wondred at. For at the Riuer of Granick, which seuereth the Territorie of Troy from Propontis, the Persians sought to stop his passage, taking the higher ground and banke of the Riuer to defend, which Alexander was forced (as it were) to clime vp vnto, and scale from the Leuel of the water; Great resistance (saith Curtius) was made by the Persians, yet in the end Alexander preuailed. But it seemes to me, that the victory then gotten was exceeding easie, and that the twenty thousand Persian foot-men, said to be slaine, were rather kil'd in the backe, in running away, than hurt in the bosomes by resisting. For had those twenty thousand foot, and two hundred and fiftie horse-men, or after Plutarch, two thousand and fiue hundred horse-men, dyed with their faces towards the Macedonians, Alexander could not haue bought their liues at so small a rate, as with the losse of foure and thirtie of all sorts of his owne. And if it were also true, that Plutarch doth report, how Alexander encountred two of the Persian Commanders, Spithridates and Rhœsaces, and that the Persian horse-men fought with great furie, though in the end scattered; and lastly, how those Grecians in Darius his pay, holding themselues in one body vpon a piece of ground of aduantage, did (after mercy was refused them) fight it out to the last; how doth it then resemble truth, that such resistance hauing beene made, yet of Alexanders Armie there fell but twelue Foot-men, and two and twenty Horse-men?

§. III.

A digression concerning the defence of hard passages. Of things following the battaile of Granicke.

THe winning of this passage did greatly encourage the Macedonians, and brought such terrour vpon all those of the lesser Asia, as he obtained all the Kingdomes thereof without a blow, some one or two Townes excepted. For in all inuasions, where the Nations inuaded haue once beene beaten vpon a great aduantage of the place, as in defence of Riuers, Streights, and Mountaines; they will soone haue perswaded themselues, that such an enemy vpon equall tearmes and euen ground, can hardly be resisted. It was therefore Machiauels counsell, that he which resolueth to defend a passage, should with his ablest force oppose the Assailant. And to say truth, few Regions of any great circuit are so well fenced, that Armies of such force as may be thought sufficient to conquer them, can be debarred all entrance, by the naturall difficultie of the wayes. One passage or other is commonly left vnguarded: if all be defended, then must the forces of the Country be distracted, and yet lightly, some one place will be found that is defended very weakely. How often haue the Alpes giuen way to Armies, breaking into Italie? Yea, where shall we finde that euer they kept out an inuadour? Yet are they such, as (to speake briefly) afflict with all difficulties those that trauaile ouer them; but they giue no security to those that lye behinde them: for they are of too large extent. The Townes of Lombardie perswaded themselues that they might enioy their quiet, when the Warlike Nation of the Switzers had vndertaken to hinder Francis the French King from descending into the Duchie of Milan: but whilest these Pattons of Milan, whom their owne dwelling in those Mountaines had made fittest of all other for such a seruice, were busied in custodie of the Alpes; Francis appeared in Lombardie; to so much the greater terrour of the Inhabitants, by how much the lesse they had expected his arriuall. What shall we say of those Mountaines, which locke vp whole Regions in such sort, as they leaue but one gate open? The Streights, or (as they were called) the gates of Taurus in Cilicia, and those of Thermopylæ, haue seldome beene attempted, perhaps because they were thought impregnable: but how seldome (if euer) haue they beene attempted in vaine? Xerxes and long after him, the Romans, forced the entrance of Thermopylæ; Cyrus the yonger, and after him Alexander, found the Gates of Cilicia wide open; how strongly soeuer they had beene locked and barred, yet were those Countries open enough to a fleet that should enter on the backe-side. The defence of Riuers how hard a thing it is, we finde examples in all histories that beare good witnesse. The deepest haue many Foords; the swiftest and broadest may be passed by Boates, In case it be found a matter of difficultie to make a bridge. He that hath men enough to defend all the length of his owne banke, hath also enough to beate his enemie; and may therefore doe better to let him come ouer, to his losse, than by striuing in vaine to hinder the passage, as a matter tending to his owne disaduantage, fill the heads of his Souldiers with an opinion, that they are in ill case, hauing their meanes of safeguard taken from them, by the skill or valour of such as are too good for them. Certainely, if a Riuer were sufficient defence against an Armie, the Isle of Mona, now called Anglesey, which is diuided from North-Wales by an arme of the Sea, had beene safe enough against the Romans, inuading it vnder conduct of Iulius Agricola. But he wanting, & not meaning to spend the time in making vessels to transport his forces, did assay the foords. Wherby he so amazed the enemies attending for ships and such like prouision by Sea, that surely beleeuing nothing could be hard or inuincible to men, which came so minded to Warre, they humbly intreated for peace, and yeelded the Iland. Yet the Britaines were men stout enough; the Persians were very dastards.

It was therefore wisely done of Alexander, to passe the Riuer of Granicke in face of the enemy; not marching higher to seeke an easier way, nor labouring to conuey his men ouer it by some safer meanes. For hauing beaten them vpon their owne ground, he did thereby cut off no lesse of their reputation, than of their strength, leauing no hope of succour to the partakers and followers of such vnable Protectors.

Soone after this victory he recouered Sardis, Ephesus, the Cities of the Trallians and Magnesia, which were rendred vnto him. The Inhabitants of which, with the people of the Countrie, he receiued with great grace, suffering them to be gouerned by their owne lawes. For he obserued it well; Nouum Imperium inchoantibus vtilis clementia sima; It is commodious vnto such as lay the foundations of a new Soueraignty, to haue the fame of being mercifull. He then by Parmenio wan Miletus, and by force mastred Halicarnassus, which because it resisted obstinately, he razed to the ground. From whence he entred into Caria, where Ada the Queene, who had beene cast out of all that she held (except the Citie of Alinda) by Darius his Lieutenants, presented her selfe vnto him, and adopted him her sonne and successour; which Alexander accepted in so gracious part, as he left the whole Kingdome to her disposing. He then entred into Lycia, and Pamphylia, and obtained all the Sea-coasts, and subiecting vnto him Pisidia, he directed himselfe towards Darius (who was said to be aduanced towards him with a maruellous Armie) by the way of Phrygia: For all the Prouince of Asia the lesse, bordering vpon the Sea, his first victory layed vnder his feet.

While he gaue order for the gouernment and setling of Lycia, and Pamphylia, they sent Cleander to raise some new Captaines in Peloponnesus, and marching towards the North, he entred Celenas seated on the Riuer Meander, which was abandoned vnto him, the Castle onely holding out, which also after forty dayes was giuen vp: for so long time he gaue them to attend succour from Darius. From Celenas he past on through Phrygia towards the Euxine Sea, till he came to a City called Gordium, the Regall-seate, in former times, of King Midas. In this City it was that he found the Gordian-knot, which when he knew not how to vndoe, he cut it a sunder with his sword. For there was an ancient prophecie did promise to him that could vntie it, the Lordship of all Asia; whereupon Alexander, not respecting the manner how, so it were done, assumed to himselfe the fulfilling of the prophesie, by hewing it in pieces.

But before he turned from this part of Asia the lesse towards the east, he tooke care to cleare the Sea-coast on his backe, and to thrust the Persians out of the Ilands of Lesbos, Chio, and Coos: the charge whereof he committed vnto two of his Captaines, giuing them such order as he thought to be most conuenient for that seruice; and deliuering vnto them fiftie Talents to defray the charge; and withall out of his first spoyle gotten, he sent threescore Talents more to Antipater his Lieutenant in Greece and Macedon. From Celenas he remoued to Ancira, now called Anguori, standing on the same Riuer of Sangarius, which runneth through Gordium: there he mustered his Armie, and then then entred Paphlagonia, whoſe people ſubmitted themſelues vnto him, and obtained freedome of tribute: where he left Catus Gouernour with one Regiment of Macedonians lately arriued.

Here he vnderſtood of the death of Memnon, Darius Lieutenant, which hartned him greatly to paſſe on towards him; for of this onely Captaine he had more reſpect than of all the multitude by Darius aſſembled, and of all the Commanders he had beſides. For ſo much hath the ſpirit of ſome one man excelled, as it hath vndertaken and effected the alteration of the greateſt States and Common-weales, the erection of Monarchies, the conqueſt of Kingdomes and Empires, guided handfuls of men againſt multitudes of equall bodily ſtrength, contriued victories beyond all hope and diſcourſe of reaſon, conuerted the fearefull paſſions of his owne followers into magnanimitie, and the valour of his enemies into cowardize; ſuch ſpirits haue beene ſtirred vp in ſundry Ages of the world, and in diuers parts thereof, to erect and caſt downe againe, to eſtabliſh and to deſtroy, and to bring all things, Perſons and States, to the ſame certaine ends, which the infinite Spirit of the Vniuerſall, piercing, mouing, and gouerning all things, hath ordained. Certainely the things that this King did were maruellous, and would hardly haue beene vndertaken by any man elſe: and though his Father had determined to haue inuaded the leſſer Aſia, it is like enough that he would haue contented himſelfe with ſome part thereof, and not haue diſcouered the Riuer of Indus: as this man did. The ſwift courſe of victory, wherewith he ran ouer ſo large a portion of the World, in ſo ſhort a ſpace, may iuſtly be imputed vnto this, that he was neuer encountred by an equall ſpirit, concurring with equall power againſt him. Hereby it came to paſſe that his actions being limited by no greater oppoſition, then deſert places, and the meere length of tedious iournies could make, were like the Coloſſus of Rhodes, not ſo much to be admired for the workemanſhip, though therein alſo praiſe-worthy, as for the huge bulke. For certainely the things performed by Xenophon, diſcouer as braue a ſpirit as Alexanders, and working no leſſe exquiſitely, though the effects were leſſe materiall, as were alſo the forces and power of command, by which it wrought. But he that would finde the exact patterne of a noble Commander, muſt looke vpon ſuch as Epaminondas, that encountring worthy Captaines, and thoſe better followed than themſelues, haue by their ſingular vertue ouer-topped their valiant enemies, and ſtill preuailed ouer thoſe, that would not haue yeelded one foot to any other. Such as theſe are, doe ſeldome liue to obtaine great Empires. For it is a worke of more labour and longer time, to maſter the equall forces of one hardy & well-ordered State, than to tread down and vtterly ſubdue a multitude of ſeruile Nations, compounding the body of a groſſe vnweildie Empire. Wherefore theſe Parua Potentes, men that with little haue done much vpon enemies of like abiliy, are to be regarded as choiſe examples of worth; but great Conquerours, to be rather admired for the ſubſtance of their actions, than the exquiſite managing: exactneſſe and greatnes concurring ſo ſeldome, that I can finde no inſtance of both in one, ſaue onely that braue Roman, Caſar.

Hauing thus farre digreſſed, it is now time that we returne vnto our Eaſterne Conqueror; who is trauailing haſtily towards Cilicia, with a deſire to recouer the Streights thereof before Darius ſhould arriue there. But firſt making a diſpatch into Greece, he ſent to thoſe Cities, in which he repoſed moſt truſt, ſome of the Perſian Targets which he had recouered in his firſt battaile; vpon which, by certaine inſcriptions, he made them partakers of his victory. Herein he well aduiſed himſelfe; for he that doth not as well impart of the honour which he gaines in the Warres, as he doth of the ſpoiles, ſhall neuer be long followed of thoſe of the better ſort. For men which are either well borne or well bred, and haue more of wealth than of reputation, doe as often ſatisfie themſelues with the purchaſe of glory, as the weake in fortune, and ſtrong in courage, doe with the gaine of gold and ſiluer.

The Gouernour of Cilicia hearing of Alexander comming on, left ſome Companies to keepe the Streights, which were indeede very defencible; and withall, as Curtius noteth, he began ouer-late to priſe and put in execution the Counſell of Memnon: who in the beginning of the Warres aduiſed him to waſte all the prouiſions for Men and Horſe, that could not be lodged in ſtrong places, & alwayes to giue ground to the Inuader, till he found ſome ſuch notable aduantage as might aſſuredly promiſe him the obtaining of victory. For the fury of an inuading Army is beſt broken, by delaies, change of diet, and want, eating sometimes too little, and sometimes too much, sometimes reposing themselues in beds, and more oftner on the cold ground. These and the like suddaine alterations bring many diseases vpon all Nations out of their owne Countries. Therefore if Darius had kept the Macedonians but a while from meat and sleepe, and refusing to giue or take battaile, had wearied them with his light horse, as the Parthians afterward did the Romans, hee might perchance haue saued his owne life, and his estate. For it was one of the greatest incouragements giuen by Alexander to the Macedonians, in the third and last fatall battaile, that they were to fight with all the strength of Persia at once.

Xerxes, when he inuaded Greece and fought abroad, in being beaten, lost onely his men; but Darius being inuaded by the Greekes, and fighting at home, by being beaten, lost his Kingdome. Pericles, though the Lacedæmonians burnt all in Attica to the Gates of Athens, yet could not be drawne to hazard a battaile: for the inuaded ought euermore to fight vpon the aduantage of time and place. Because we reade Histories to informe our vnderstanding by the examples therein found, wee will giue some instances of those that haue perished by aduenturing in their owne countries, to charge an inuading Armie. The Romans, by fighting with Hannibal, were brought to the brinke of their destruction.

Pompey was well aduised for a while, when he gaue Cæsar ground, but when by the importunity of his Captaines he aduentured to fight at Pharsalia, he lost the battaile, lost the freedome of Rome, and his owne life.

Ferdinand, in the Conquest of Naples, would needs fight a battaile with the French to his confusion, though it was told him by a man of sound iudgement, that those Counsels which promise suretie in all things, are honourable enough.

The Constable of France made frustrate the mighty preparation of Charles the Fift, when he inuaded Prouence, by wasting the Countrie, and forbearing to fight; so did the Duke of Alua wearie the French in Naples, and dissolue the boisterous Armie of the Prince of Orange in the low-Countries.

The Ixigers, contrarie to the aduice of their Generall, would needs fight a battaile with the Bourgonians, inuading their Countrie, and could not be perswaded to linger the time, and stay their aduantage; but they lost eight and twenty thousand vpon the place. Philip of Valois set vpon King Edward at Chesse; and King Iohn (when the English were well-neere tired out, and would in short time by an orderly pursuit haue beene wasted to nothing) constrained the blacke Prince with great furie, neere Poitiers, to ioyne battaile with him: But all men know what lamentable successe these two French Kings found. Charles the fift of France made another kinde of Fabian-Warfare; and though the English burnt and wasted many places, yet this King held his resolution to forbeare blowes, and followed his aduice which told him, That the English could neuer get his inheritance by smoake; and it is reported by Bellay and Herrault, that King Edward was wont to say of this Charles, that he wan from him the Dutchie of Guien without euer putting on his Armour.

But where God hath a purpose to destroy, wise men grow short-liued, and the charge of things is committed vnto such as either cannot see what is for their good, or know not how to put in execution any sound aduice. The course which Memnon had propounded, must in all appearance of reason haue brought the Macedonian to a great perplexity, and made him stand still a while at the Streights of Cilicia, doubting whether it were more shamefull to returne, or dangerous to proceede. For had Cappadocia and Paphlagonia been wasted whilest Alexander was farre off; and the Streights of Cilicia beene defended by Arsenes, Gouernor of that Prouince, with the best of his forces: hunger would not haue suffered the enemy, to stay the triall of all meanes that might be thought vpon, of forcing that passage; or if the place could not haue beene maintained, yet might Cilicia, at better leisure haue beene so throughly spoiled, that the heart of his Armie should haue beene broken, by seeking out miseries by painfull trauaile.

But Arsenes leauing a small number to defend the Streights, tooke the best of his Armie with him, to waste and spoile the Countrie; or rather, as may seeme, to finde himselfe some worke, by pretence of which he might honestly run further away from Alexander. He should rather haue aduentured his person in custody of the Streights, whereby he might perhaps haue saued the Prouince; and in the meane time, all that was in the fields, would haue beene conueighed into ſtrong Townes. So ſhould his Armie, if it were driuen from the place of aduantage, haue found good entertainment within walled Cities, and himſelfe with his horſe-men haue had the leſſe worke in deſtroying that little which was left abroad. Handling the matter as he did, he gaue the Cilicians cauſe to wiſh for Alexanders comming, and as great cauſe to the Keepers of the paſſage not to hinder it. For cowards are wiſe in apprehending all formes of danger. Theſe Guardians of the Streights, hearing that Arſenes made all haſte to ioyne himſelfe with Darius, burning downe all as he went, like one deſpairing of the defence, began to grow circumſpect, and to thinke that ſurely their Generall, who gaue as loſt the Countrie behinde their backes, had expoſed themſelues vnto certaine death, as men that were good for nothing elſe, but to dull the Macedonian ſwords. Wherefore, not affecting to die for their Prince and Countrie (which honour they ſaw that Arſenes himſelfe could well forbeare) they ſpeedily followed the foot-ſteps of their Generall, gleaning after his Harueſt. Thus Alexander without labour got both the entrance of Cilicia, abandoned by the cowardiſe of his Enemies, and the whole Prouince that had beene alienated from the Perſian ſide by their indiſcretion.

§. IIII.

Of the vnwarlike Armie leuied by Darius againſt Alexander. The vnaduiſed courſes which Darius took in this Expedition. He is vanquiſhed at Iſſus; where his Mother, Wife, and Children are made priſoners. Of ſome things following the battaile of Iſſus.

IN the meane ſeaſon Darius approched; who (as Curtius reports) had compounded an Armie of more than two hundred and ninetie thouſand Souldiers, out of diuers Nations; Iuſtine muſters them at three hundred thouſand Foot, and a hundred thouſand Horſe; Plutarch at ſixe hundred thouſand.

The manner of his comming on, as Curtius deſcribes it, was rather like a masker than a man of Warre, and like one that tooke more care to ſet out his glorie and riches, than to prouide for his owne ſafety, perſwading himſelfe, as it ſeemed, to beat Alexander with pompe and ſumptuous Pageants. For, before the Armie there was carried the holy fire which the Perſians worſhipped, attended by their Prieſts, and after them three hundred and threeſcore and fiue yong-men, anſwering the number of the daies of the yeere, couered with Scarlet; then the Chariot of Iupiter drawne with white Horſes, with their Riders cloathed in the ſame colour, with rods of gold in their hands; And after it, the Horſe of the Sunne: Next after theſe follow ten ſumptuous Chariots, in-laied and garniſht with ſiluer and gold; and then the Vantguard of their horſe, compounded of twelue ſeuerall Nations, which the better to auoid confuſion, did hardly vnderſtand each others language, and theſe marſhalled in the head of the reſt, being beaten, might ſerue very fitly to diſorder all that followed them; in the taile of theſe Horſes the Regiment of foot marched, with the Perſians called immortall, becauſe if any died, the number was preſently ſupplied: and theſe were armed with chaines of gold, & their coates with the ſame mettall imbrodered, whereof the ſleeues were garniſhed with pearle; baites, either to catch the hungrie Macedonians withall, or to perſwade them that it were great inciuilitie to cut and to deface ſuch glorious garments. But it was well ſaid: Sumptuosè induƈtus miles, ſe virtute ſuperiorem alijs non exiſtimet, cum in prælijs oporteat fortitudine animi, & non veſtimentis muniri, quoniam hoſtes veſtibus non debellantur; Let no man thinke that hee exceedeth thoſe in valour, whom hee exceedeth in gay garments; for it is by men armed with fortitude of minde, and not by the apparell they put on, that enemies are beaten. And it was perchance from the Roman Papyrius that this aduice was borrowed, who when he fought againſt the Samnites in that fatall battaile, wherein they all ſware eyther to preuaile or die, thirty thouſand of them hauing apparelled themſelues in white garments, with high creſts and great plumes of feathers, bade the Roman Souldiers to lay aſide all feare: Non eximcriſtas vulnera facere, & per picta atque aurata ſcuta tranſire Romanum pilum; For theſe plumed creſts would wound no body, and the Romane pile would bore holes in painted and gilded ſhields.

To ſecond this Court-like company, fifteene thouſand were appointed more rich and glittering than the former, but apparelled like Women (belike to breede the more terrour) & theſe were honoured with the Title of the Kings Kinſmen. Then came Darius himſelfe, himselfe, the Gentle-men of his Guard-robe, riding before his Chariot, which was supported with the gods of his Nation, cast and cut in pure gold; these the Macedonians did not serue, but they serued their turnes of these, by changing their massie-bodies into thin portable and currant coyne. The head of this Chariot was set with precious stones, with two little golden Idols, couered with an open-winged-Eagle of the same mettall: The hinder part being raised high wheron Darius sate, had a couering of inestimable value. This Chariot of the King was followed with ten thousand Horse-men, their Lances plated with siluer, and their heads guilt; which they meant not to imbrew in the Macedonian bloud, for feare of marring their beautie. Hee had for the proper Guard of his owne person, two hundred of the bloud Royall, bloud too Royall and precious to bee spilt by any valorous aduenture, (I am of opinion that two hundred sturdy fellowes, like the Switzers, would haue done him more seruice) and these were backt with thirtie thousand foot-men, after whom againe were led foure hundred spare horses for the King, which if he had meant to haue vsed, hee would haue marshalled somewhat nearer him.

Now followed the Reareward, the same being led by Sisygambis the Kings Mother, and by his Wife, drawn in glorious Chariots, followed by a great traine of Ladies their attendants on horse-backe, with fifteene Wagons of the Kings children, and the wiues of the Nobility, waited on by two hundred and fiftie Concubines, and a world of Nurses and Eunuchs, most sumptuously apparelled. By which it should seeme that Darius thought that the Macedonians had beene Comedians or Tumblers; for this troope was far fitter to behold those sports than to be present at battailes. Betweene these and a company of slight-armed slaues, with a world of Vallets, was the Kings treasure, charged on sixe hundred Mules, and three hundred Camels, brought, as it proued, to pay the Macedonians. In this sort came the Maygame-King into the field, incumbred with a most vnnecessary traine of Strumpets, attended with troupes of diuers Nations, speaking diuers languages, and for their numbers impossible to be marshalled; and for the most part so effeminate, and so rich in gold and in garments, as the same could not but haue encouraged the nakedest Nation of the world against them. Wee finde it in daily experience, that all discourse of magnanimitie, of Nationall Vertue, of Religion, of Libertie, and whatsoeuer else hath beene wont to moue and incourage vertuous men, hath no force at all with the common-Souldier, in comparison of spoyle and riches. The rich ships are boorded vpon all disaduantages, the rich Townes are furiously assaulted, and the plentifull Countries willingly inuaded. Our English Nation haue attempted many places in the Indies, and runne vpon the Spaniards head-long, in hope of their Royals of plate, and Pistolets; which, had they beene put to it vpon the like disaduantages in Ireland, or in any poore Countrie, they would haue turned their Peeces and Pikes against their Commanders, contesting that they had beene brought without reason to the Butchery & slaughter. It is true that the warre is made willingly, and for the most part with good successe, that is ordained against the richest Nations; for as the needie are alwaies aduenturous, so plentie is wont to shunne perill, and men that haue well to liue, doe rather studie how to liue well, I meane wealthily, than care to die (as they call it) honourably. Car on il n'y a rien a gaigner que des coups, volontiers il n'y va pas. No man makes haste to the market, where there is nothing to be bought but blowes.

Now if Alexander had beheld this preparation before his consultation with his Soothsaiers, hee would haue satisfied himselfe by the out-sides of the Persians, and neuer haue looked into the intrailes of Beasts for successe. For leauing the description of this second battell (which is indeed no-where wel described, neither for the confusion & hastie running away of the Asians could it be) we haue enough by the slaughter that was made of them, & by the few that fell of the Macedonians, to informe vs what manner of resistance was made. For if it be true that threescore thousand Persian footmen were slaine in this battaile, with ten thousand of their horsemen: Or (as Curtius saith) an hundred thousand footmen, with the same number of horsemen, and besides this slaughter, fortie thousand taken prisoners, while of Alexanders Armie there miscarried but two hundred & fourescore of all sorts, of which numbers Arianus and other Historians cut off almost the one halfe: I doe verily beleeue, that this small number rather died with the ouer-trauaile and paines-taking in killing their enemies, than by any strokes receiued from them. And surely if the Persian Nation (at this time degenerate and the baasest of the World) had had any ſauour remaining of the ancient valour of their fore-fathers; they would neuer haue ſold ſo good cheape, and at ſo vile a price, the Mother, the Wife, the Daughters, and other the Kings children; had their owne honour beene valued by them at nothing, and the Kings ſafetie and his eſtate at leſſe. Darius by this time found it true, that Charidemus a baniſhed Grecian of Athens had told him, when he made a view of his Army about Babylon, to wit, That the multitude which he had aſſembled of diuers Nations, richly attired, but poorely armed, would be found more terrible to the Inhabitants of the countrey, whom in paſſing by they would deuoure, than to the Macedonians, whom they meant to aſſaile; who being all old and obedient Souldiers, imbattailed in groſſe ſquadrons, which they call their Phalanx, well couered with Armour for defence, and furniſhed with weapons for offence of great aduantage, would make ſo little accompt of his delicate Perſians, louing their eaſe and their palat, being withall ill armed and worſe diſciplined, as except it would pleaſe him to entertain (hauing ſo great aboundance of treaſure to doe it withall) a ſufficient number of the ſame Grecians, and ſo to encounter the Macedonians with men of equall courage, he would repent him ouerlate, as taught by the miſerable ſucceſſe like to follow.

But this diſcourſe was ſo vnpleaſing to Darius (who had beene accuſtomed to nothing ſo much as to his owne praiſes, and to nothing ſo little as to heare truth;) as he commanded that this poore Grecian ſhould be preſently ſlaine: who while hee was a ſundring in the Tormentors hand, vſed this ſpeech to the King, That Alexander, againſt whom hee had giuen this good counſell, ſhould aſſuredly reuenge his death, and lay deſerued puniſhment vpon Darius for deſpiſing his aduice.

It was the ſaying of a Wiſe man: Deſperata eius Principis ſalus eſt, cuius aures ita formatæ ſunt, vt aſpera quæ vtilia, nec quicquam niſi iucundum accipiat; That Princes ſafetie is in a deſperate caſe, whoſe eares iudge all that is profitable to be too ſharpe, and will entertaine nothing that is vnpleaſant.

For libertie in counſell is the life and eſſence of counſell; Libertas conſilij eſt eius vita, & eſſentia, qua erepta conſilium euaneſcit.

Darius did likewiſe value at nothing the Aduice giuen him by the Grecian Souldiers that ſerued him, who intreated him not to fight in the Streights: But had they beene Counſellers and directors in that Warre, as they were vnderlings and commanded by others, they had with the helpe of a good troupe of horſe-men beene able to haue oppoſed the furie of Alexander, without any aſſiſtance of the Perſian foot-men. For when Darius was ouerthrowne with all his cowardly and confuſed rabble, thoſe Grecians, vnder their Captaine Amyntas, held firme, and marched away in order, in deſpight of the vanquiſhers. Old Souldiers are not eaſily diſmayed: wee reade in Hiſtories ancient and moderne, what braue retraits haue beene made by them, though the reſt of the Army in which they haue ſerued, hath beene broken.

At the battaile of Rauenna, where the Imperialls were beaten by the French, a ſquadron of Spaniards, old Souldiers, came off vnbroken and vndiſmayed; whom when Gaſton de Foix, Duke of Nemures, and Nephew to Lewis the twelfth, charged, as holding the victorie not entire by their eſcape, he was ouer-turned and ſlaine in the place. For it is truely ſaid of thoſe men, who, by being acquainted with dangers feare them not, That, Neglecto periculo imminenti is mali opus ipſum quantumuis difficile aggrediuntur; They goe about the buſineſſe it ſelfe, how hard ſoeuer it be, not ſtanding to conſider of the danger, which the miſchiefe hanging ouer their heads may bring: and as truely of thoſe that know the warres but by heare-ſay. Quòd valentes ſunt & præualentes ante pericula, in ipſis tamen periculis diſcedunt; They haue abilitie enough, and to ſpare, till dangers appeare; but when perill indeed comes, they get them gone.

Theſe Grecians alſo that made the retract, aduiſed Darius to retire his Army into the plaine of Meſopotamia, to the end that Alexander being entred into thoſe large fields and great Champions, hee might haue inuironed the Macedonians on all ſides with his multitude; and withall they counſelled him to diuide that his huge Armie into parts, not committing the whole to one ſtroke of Fortune, whereby hee might haue fought many battailes, and haue brought no greater numbers at once than might haue been well marſhalled & conducted. But this counſell was ſo contrary to the cowardly affections of the Perſians, as they perſwaded Darius to inuirone the Grecians which gaue the aduice, and to cut them in pieces as Traitors. The infinite wiſedome of God doth not work alwaies

by

by one and the same way, but very often in the alteration of Kingdomes and Estates, by taking vnderstanding from the Gouernours, so as they can neither giue nor discerne of Counsels. For Darius that would needs fight with Alexander vpon a streightned piece of ground, neere vnto the Citie of Issus, where he could bring no more hands to fight than Alexander could, (who by the aduice of Parmenio staied there, as in a place of best aduantage) was vtterly ouerthrowne, his Treasure lost, his Wife, Mother, and Children (whom the Grecians his followers had perswaded him to leaue in Babylon, or elsewhere) taken prisoners, and all their traine of Ladies spoiled of their rich Garments, Iewels, and Honour. It is true, that both the Queene, with her Daughters, who had the good hap to be brought to Alexanders presence, were entertained with all respect due vnto their birth, their Honours preserued, and their Iewels and rich Garments restored vnto them; and though Darius Wife was a most beautifull Lady, and his Daughters of excellent forme, yet Alexander mastred his affections towards them all: onely it is reported out of Aristobulus the Historian, that he imbraced the Wife of the valiant Memnon, her Husband lately dead, who was taken flying from Damascus by Parmenio, at which time the Daughters of Ochus, who reigned before Darius, and the Wiues and Children of all the Nobility of Persia in effect, fell into captiuitie; at which time also Darius Treasure (not lost at Issus) was seized, amounting to sixe thousand and two hundred talents of coine, and of Bullion fiue hundred talents, with a world of riches besides.

Darius himselfe leauing his brother dead, with diuers other of his chiefe Captaines, (casting the Crowne from his head) hardly escaped.

After this ouerthrow giuen vnto Darius, all Phœnicia (the Citie of Tyre excepted) was yeelded to Alexander, of which Parmenio was made Gouernour.

Aradus, Zidon, and Biblos, maritimate Cities of great importance, of which one Strato was King (but hated of the people) acknowledged Alexander. Good fortune followed him so fast that it trod on his heeles; for Antigonus, Alexanders Lieutenant in Asia the lesse, ouerthrew the Cappadocians, Paphlagonians, and others lately reuolted; Aristodemus, Darius Admirall, had his Fleet partly taken, and in part drowned by the Macedonians newly leauied; the Lacedæmonians that warred against Antipater were beaten; foure thousand of those Greeks which made the retrait at the last battaile, forsaking both the party of Darius and of Alexander, and led by Amyntas into Ægypt, to hold it for themselues, were buried there; for the time was not yet come to diuide Kingdomes.

Alexander to honour Ephestion, whom he loued most, gaue him power to dispose of the Kingdome of Zidon. A man of a most poore estate, that laboured to sustaine his life, being of the Royall bloud, was commended by the people vnto him, who changed his Spade into a Scepter, so as he was beheld both a Begger and a King in one and the same houre.

It was a good desire of this new King, when speaking to Alexander, he wisht that he could beare his prosperity with the same moderation, and quietnesse of heart, that he had done his aduersitie; but ill done of Alexander, in that he would not performe in himselfe that which he commended in another mans desire: for it was a signe that he did but accompany, and could not gouerne his felicitie.

While he made some stay in those parts, he receiued a letter from Darius, importing the ransome of his Wife, his Mother, and his Children, with some other conditions of peace, but such as rather became a Conqueror, than one that had now been twice shamefully beaten, not vouchsafing, in his direction, to stile Alexander King. It is true, that the Romans after that they had receiued an ouerthrow by Pyrrhus, returned him a more scornefull answer vpon the offer of peace, than they did before the triall of his force. But as their fortunes were then in the Spring, so that of Darius had already cast leafe; the one a resolued well armed and disciplined Nation, the other cowardly and effeminate. Alexander disdained the offers of Darius, and sent him word that he not onely directed his letter to a King, but to the King of Darius himselfe.

§. V.

How Alexander besieged and wan the Citie of Tyre.

ALexander comming neere to the Citie of Tyre, receiued from them the present of a golden Crowne, with great store of victuals, and other presents, which he tooke very thankefully, returning them answere, That he desired to offer a sacrifice sacrifice to Hercules, the Protector of their Citie, from whom he was descended. But the Tyrians like not his companie within their Walls, but tell him that the Temple of Hercules was seated in the old City adioyning, now abandoned and desolate. To be short, Alexander resolued to enter it by force: and though it were a place in all mens opinion impregnable, because the Iland whereon it was built, was eight hundred furlongs from the Maine, yet with the labour of many hands, hauing great store of stone from the old Tyre, and timber sufficient from Libanus, he filled the passage of the Sea betweene the Iland and the Maine, which being more then once carried away by the strength of the Sea vpon a storme of winde, sometime by the Tyrians fired, and sometime torne asunder; yet with the helpe of his Nauie which arriued (during the siege) from Cyprus, he ouercame all difficulties and preuailed, after he had spent seauen moneths in that attempt. The Tyrians in the beginning of the siege had barbarously drowned the messengers sent by Alexander, perswading them to render the City, in respect whereof, and of the great losse of time and men, he put eight thousand to the sword, and caused two thousand of those, that escaped the first furie, to be hanged on Crosses on the Sea-shore, and reserued for slaues (saith Diodore) thirteene thousand; Arrianus reckons them at thirty thousand. Many more had died, had not the Zidonians, that serued Alexander, conueied great numbers away by shipping vnto their owne Citie. Arrian. Iustin. l. 11.

Happy it was for Apollo that the Towne was taken, for one of the Tyrians hauing dreamt, that this god meant to forsake the Citie, they bound him fast with a golden chaine to the Idoll of Hercules; but Alexander like a gracious Prince loosened him againe.

It is true, that it was a notable enterprise and a difficult, but great things are made greater. For Nabuchodonosor had taken it before, and filled vp the channell, that lay betweene the Iland and the Maine.

The gouernement of this Territorie he gaue to Philetas, the Sonne of Parmenio; Cilicia, he committed to Socrates, and Andromachus Lieutenant vnder Parmenio, Ephestion had the charge of the Fleet, and was directed to finde Alexander at Gaza towards Ægypt.

§. VI.

How Darius offered conditions of peace to Alexander. Alexander wins Gaza; and deales graciously with the Iewes.

IN the meane while Darius sends againe to Alexander, sets before him all the difficulties of passing on towards the East, and laieth the losse of the last battaile to the streightnesse of the place: he hoped to terrifie him, by threatning to encompasse him in the plaine Countries, he bids him to consider, how impossible it was to passe the Riuers of Euphrates, Tigris, Araxes, and the rest, with all such other feareful things: for he that was now filled with nothing but feare, had arguments enough of that nature to present vnto another. All the Kingdomes betweene the Riuer of Alys, and the Hellespont, he offered him in Dower with his beloued daughter. But Alexander answered, That he offered him nothing but his owne, and that which victory and his own vertue had possest him of; That he was to giue conditions, and not to receiue any, & that he hauing passed the Sea it selfe, disdained to thinke of resistance in transporting himselfe ouer Riuers. It is said, that Parmenio, who was now old and full of honour and riches, told the King, that were he Alexander, he would accept of Darius his offers; to which Alexander answered, That so would he, if he were Parmenio.

But he goes on towards Ægypt, and comming before Gaza, Betis a faithfull seruant to Darius, shuts the Gate against him, and defends the Towne with an obstinate resolution, at the siege whereof Alexander receiued a wound in the shoulder, which was dangerous, and a blow on his legge with a stone; He found better men in this place then he did at the former battailes, for he left so many of his Macedonians buried in the sands of Gaza, that he was forst to send for a new supply into Greece. Here it was that Alexander first began to change condition, and to exercise cruelty. For after that he had entred Gaza by assault, and taken Betis (whom Iosephus calleth Babemesis) that was weakened with many wounds, and who neuer gaue ground to the Assailants, he bored holes through his feete, and caused him to be drawne about the streets, whilest he was as yet aliue; who being as valiant a man as himselfe, disdained to aske him either life or remission of his torments. And what had he to countenance this his tyrannie, but the imitation of his Ancestor Achilles, who did the like to Hector? It is true, that cruelty hath alwayes somewhat to couer her deformity.

Lib. 11. c. 16. From Gaza (saith Iosephus) he led his Army towards Ierusalem, a Citie, for the antiquitie and great fame thereof, well knowne vnto him while he lay before Tyre; He had sent for some supply thither, which Iaddus the high Priest, being subiect and sworne to Darius, had refused him. The Iewes therefore fearing his reuenge, and vnable to resist, committed the care of their estates and safetie to Iaddus, who, being taught by God, issued out of the Citie couered with his Pontificall Robes, to wit, an vpper garment of purple, embrodered with gold, with his Miter, and the plate of gold wherein the name of God was written, the Priests and Leuites in their rich ornaments, and the people in white garments, in a manner so vnusuall, stately and graue, as Alexander greatly admired it. Iosephus reports it, that he fell to the ground before the high Priest, as reuerencing the name of God, and that Parmenio reprehended him for it; Howsoeuer it was, I am of opinion, that he became so confident in his enterprise, and so assured of the successe after the prophesie of Daniel had beene read vnto him, wherein he saw himselfe, and the conquest of Persia so directly pointed at, as nothing thence-forth could discourage him or feare him. He confessed to Parmenio (saith Iosephus) That in Dio a Citie of Macedon, when his mind laboured the conquest of Asia, he saw in his sleepe such a person as Iaddus, and so apparelled, professing one and the same God, by whom he was incouraged to pursue the purpose he had in hand with assurance of victorie. This apparition, formerly apprehended onely by the light of his fantasie, he now beheld with his bodily eies, wherewith he was so exceedingly pleased and imboldened, as contrarie to the practice of the Phenicians, (who hoped to haue sackt and destroyed Ierusalem) he gaue the Iewes all, and more than they desired, both of libertie and immunitie, with permission to liue vnder their owne lawes, and to exercise and enioy their owne Religion.

Alexander winnes Ægypt: and makes a iournie to the Temple of Hammon.

FRom Ierusalem Alexander turned againe towards Ægypt, and entred it, where Darius his Lieutenant, Asiaces, receiued him and deliuered into his hand the Citie of Memphis, with eight hundred talents of treasure, and all other the Kings riches. By this we see that the King of Persia, who had more of affection than of iudgement, gaue to the valianteſt man he had but the command of one Citie, and to the veriest coward the gouernment of all Ægypt. When hee had set things in order in Ægypt, he began to trauaile after God-head, towards Iupiter Hammon, so fooliſh had prosperitie made him. He was to passe ouer the dangerous and drie sands, where, when the water which he brought on his Camels backe was spent, he could not but haue perished, had not a maruellous showre of raine fallen vpon him, when his Armie was in extreame despaire. All men that know Ægypt, and haue written thereof, affirm, That it neuer raines there; but the purposes of the Almighty God are secret, and he bringeth to passe what it pleaseth him; for it is also said, That when he had lost his way in those vast deserts, that a flight of Crowes flew before the Armie; who making faster wing when they were followed, and fluttering slowly when the Army was cast backe, guided them ouer those pathlesse sands to Iupiters Temple.

Arrian. l. 3. Arrianus from the report of Ptolomie, the sonne of Lagus, saies, That hee was led by two Dragons, both which reports may bee a-like true. But many of those wonders and things prodigious, are fained by those that haue written the Storie of Alexander, as that an Eagle lay houering directly ouer his head at the battell of Issus; That a Swallow flew about his head when he slept, and could not be feared from him, till it had wakened him at Halicarnasseus, fore-shewing the treason of Æropus, practised by Darius to haue slaine him; That from the yron barres of which the Tyrians, made their defensiue engines, when Alexander besieged them, there fell drops of bloud; and that the like drops were found in a loafe of bread, broken by a Macedonian Souldier, at the same time; That a Turfe of earth fell on his shoulder, when he lay before Gaza, out of which there flew a Bird into the aire. The Spaniards in the conquest of the West Indies haue many such pretie tales; telling how they haue beene assisted in battaile, by the presence of our Lady, and by Angels riding on white horses, with the like Romish miracles, which I thinke themselues doe hardly beleeue. The strangest thing that I haue read of in this kinde being certainly true, was, That the night before the battaile at Nouara, all the Dogges which followed the French Armie, ranne from them to the Switzers, leaping and fawning vpon them, as if they had beene bred and fed by them all their liues, and in the morning following, Triuulzi and Tremouille, Generals for Lewis the twelfth, were by these Imperiall Switzers vtterly broken and put to ruine.

The place of this Idol of Iupiter Hammon is ill described by Curtius, for hee bounds it by the Arabian Troglodites on the South, betweene whom and the Territorie of Hammon, the Region Thebais, or the superiour Ægypt, with the Mountaines of Lybia, and the Riuer of Nilus, are interiacent; and on the North hee ioynes it to a Nation, called Nassamones, who bordering the Sea-shore, liue (saith he) vpon the spoyles of shipwracke: whereas the Temple or groue of this Idoll hath no Sea neere it by two hundred miles and more, being found on the South part of Lybia; these Nassamones being due West from it, in the South part of Marmarica. Ptol. Af. Tab. 3

When Alexander came neere the place, hee sent some of his Parasites before him to practise the Priests attending the Oracle, That their answer might be giuen in all things, agreeable to his madde ambition, who affected the title of Iupiters sonne. And so he was saluted, Sonne of Iupiter, by the Deuils Prophet, whether prepared before to flatter him, or rather (as some thinke) defectiue in the Greeke tongue; For whereas hee meant to say Opaidion, he said Opai dios, that is; O sonne of Iupiter, in stead of, O deare sonne: for which Grammaticall error he was richly rewarded; and a rumour presently spred, that the great Iupiter had acknowledged Alexander for his owne.

He had heard that Perseus and Hercules had formerly consulted with this Oracle, The one, when he was imployed against Gorgon, The other, against Anteus and Busiris; and seeing these men had deriued themselues from the gods, why might not hee? By this it seemes, that hee hoped to make his followers and the world fooles, though indeed hee made himselfe one, by thinking to couer from the Worlds knowledge his vanities and vices; and the better to confirme his followers in the beleefe of his Deitie, he had practized the Priests to giue answere to such as consulted with the Oracle, that it should bee pleasing to Iupiter to honour Alexander as his Sonne. Curt. li. 4.

Who this Ammon was, and how represented, either by a bosse carried in a Boat, or by a Ram, or a Rams-head; I see that many wise men haue troubled themselues to finde out; but, as Arrianus speakes of Dionysius, or Liber Pater (who liued, saith S. Augustine, in Moses time) Ea quæ de diis veteres fabulis suis conscripsere, non sunt nimium curiosè perue-stiganda; Wee must not ouer-curiously search into the fables, which the Ancients haue written of their gods.

But this is certaine and notable, that after the Gospell beganne to bee preached in the world, the Deuill in this and all other Idols became speechlesse. For that this Hammon was neglected in the time of Tiberius Cæsar, and in the time of Traian altogether forgotten, Strabo and Plutarch witnesse.

There is found neere his Temple a Fountaine called Fons solis (though Ptolomie in his third African Table sets it farther off) that at mid-night is as hot as boyling water, and at Noone as cold as any yce: to which I cannot but giue credit, because I haue heard of some other Wells of like nature, and because it is reported by S. Augustine, by Diodore, Herodotus, Plinie, Mela, Solinus, Arrianus, Curtius, and others; and indeed our Bathes in England are much warmer in the night, than in the day.

§. VIII.

How Alexander marching against Darius, was opposed very vnskilfully by the Enemy.

FRom the Temple of Hammon hee returned to Memphis, where among many other learned men, he heard the Philosopher Psammones, who, belike vnderstanding that he affected the Title of Iupiters Sonne, told him that God was the Father-King of all men in generall; and refining the pride of this haughtie King, brought him to say, That God was the Father of all mortall men, but that he acknowledged none for his children saue good men.

He gaue the charge of the seuerall Prouinces of Ægypt to seuerall Gouernours, fol-Arist. Pol. l. 5. lowing the rule of his Master Aristotle, That a great Dominion should not be continued in the hands of any one: whom therein the Romane Emperours also followed, not daring to commit the gouernment of Ægypt to any of their Senators, but to men of meaner ranke and degree. He then gaue order for the founding of Alexandria vpon the Wester-most branch of Nilus. And hauing now setled (as he could) the estate of Ægypt, with the Kingdomes of the lesser Asia, Phœnicia, and Syria, (which being but the pawnes of Darius his ill fortune, one happie victory would readily haue redeemed,) he led his Army towards Euphrates, which passage though the same was committed to Mazeus to defend, yet was it abandoned, and Alexander without resistance past it. From thence hee marched towards Tigris, a Riuer for the swiftnesse thereof called by the Persians The Arrow. Heere, as Curt. l. 4. Curtius, and Reason it selfe tells vs, might Darius easily haue repelled the inuading Macedonian: for the violent course of the streame was such, as it draue before it many waighty stones, and those that moued not but lay in the bottome, were so round and well polished by continuall rolling, that no man was able to fight on so slipperie a footing; nor the Macedonian foot-men to wade the Riuer, otherwise then by ioyning their hands and enterlacing their armes together, making one waighty and entire body to resist the swift passage and furious race of the streame. Besides this notable helpe, the Channell was so deepe towards the Easterne shore, where Darius should haue made head, as the footmen were inforst to lift their Bowes and Arrowes, and Darts ouer their heads to keepe them from being moistned, and made vnseruiceable by the Waters. But it was truely and vnderstandingly said of Homer,

Talis est hominum terrestrium mens,
Qualem quotidie ducit pater virorumq; Deorumq;.

The mindes of men are euer so affected,
As by Gods will they daily are directed.

And it cannot be denied, that as all Estates of the World, by the surfet of misgouernement haue beene subiect to many grieuous, and sometimes mortall diseases: So had the Empire of Persia at this time brought it selfe into a burning and consuming Feauer, and thereby become franticke and without vnderstanding, forshewing manifestly the dissolution and death thereof.

But Alexander hath now recouered the Easterne shores of Tygris, without any other difficultie, than that of the nature of the place; where Mazeus (who had charge to defend the passage both of Euphrates and it) presented himselfe to the Macedonians, followed with certaine companies of Horse-men, as if with vneuen forces hee durst haue charged them on euen ground, when as with a multitude farre exceeding them, hee forsooke the aduantage which no valour of his enemies could easily haue ouercome. But it is commonly seene, that fearefull and cowardly men doe euer follow those waies and counsels, whereof the opportunity is already lost.

It is true that he set all prouisions a fire wherewith the Macedonians might serue themselues ouer Tygris, thinking thereby greatly to haue distressed them; but the execution of good counsell is fruitlesse, when vnseasonable. For now was Alexander so well furnished with carriages, as nothing was wanting to the competencie of the Armie which hee conducted. Those things also which he sought to waste, Alexander being now in sight, were by his Horse-men saued and recouered. This, Mazeus might haue done some daies before at good leisure; or at this time with so great a strength of horse-men, as the Macedonians durst not haue pursued them, leauing the strength of their foote out of sight, and far behinde.

DArius, vpon Alexanders first returne out of Ægypt, had assembled all the forces which those Regions next him could furnish, and now also were the Arians, Scythians, Indians, and other Nations arriued; Nations (saith Curtius) that rather serued to make vp the names of men, than to make resistance. Arrianus hath numbred numbred them with their Leaders; and findes of foot-men of all sorts ten hundred thousand, and of horse foure hundred thousand, besides armed Chariots, and some few Elephants. Curtius who musters the Armie of Darius at two hundred thousand foote, and neere fiftie thousand horse, comes (I thinke) neerer to the true number; and yet seeing hee had more confidence in the multitude than in the valour of his Vassalls, it is like enough that hee had gathered together of all sorts some three or foure hundred thousand, with which hee hoped in those faire plaines of Assyria, to haue ouer-borne the few numbers of the inuading Armie. But it is a Rule in the Philosophie of the Warre:

In omni prælio non tam multitudo, & virtus indocta, quàm ars & exercitium solent præstare victoriam; In euery battaile skill and practice doe more towards the victory, than multitude and rude audacitie. Veget.

While Alexander gaue rest to his Armie after the passage ouer Tigris; there happened an Eclipse of the Moone, of which the Macedonians, not knowing the cause and reason, were greatly affrighted. All that were ignorant (as the multitude alwaies are) tooke it for a certaine presage of their ouerthrow and destruction, in so much as they began not only to murmur, but to speake it boldly, That for the ambition of one man, a man that disdained Philip for his Father, and would needs be called the Son of Iupiter, they should all perish; For he not onely inforst them to make warre against Worlds of enemies, but against Riuers, Mountaines, and the Heauens themselues.

Hereupon Alexander being ready to march forward made a halt, and to quiet the mindes of the multitude, he called before him the Ægyptian Astrologers, which followed him thence, that by them the Souldiers might bee assured that this defection of the Moone was a certaine presage of good successe; for that it was naturall they neuer imparted to the common people, but reserued the knowledge to themselues, so as a sorry Almanack-maker had beene no small foole in those daies.

Of this kind of superstitious obseruation Cæsar made good vse, when he fought against Ariouistus and the Germans: for they being perswaded by the casting of lots, that if they fought before the change of the Moone, they should certainely lose the battaile, Cæsar forst them to abide it, though they durst not giue it; wherein hauing their mindes already beaten by their owne superstition, and being resolutely charged by the Romanes, the whole armie in effect perished.

These Ægyptians gaue no other reason than this, That the Grecians were vnder the aspect of the Sunne, the Persians, of the Moone; and therefore the Moone failing and being darkened, the state of Persia was now in danger of falling, and their glory of being obscured. This iudgement of the Ægyptian Priests being noysed through all the Armie, all were satisfied, and their courage redoubled. It is a principle in the Warre, which, though deuised since, was well obserued then: Exercitum terrore plenum Dux ad pugnam non ducat; Let not a Captaine leade his Armie to the fight, when it is possessed with matter of terrour.

It is truely obserued by Curtius, that the people are ledde by nothing so much as by superstition; yea, wee finde it in all stories, and often in our owne, that by such inuentions, deuised tales, dreames, and propheſies, the people of this Land haue beene carried head-long into many dangerous tumults and insurrections, and still to their own losse and ruine.

As Alexander drew neere the Persian Armie, certaine letters were surprized, written by Darius to the Grecians, perswading them for great summes of money, either to kill or betray Alexander. But these by the aduice of Parmenio he suppressed.

At this time also Darius his faire Wife, oppresst with sorrow, and wearied with trauell, died. Which accident Alexander seemed no lesse to bewaile than Darius, who vpon the first bruit, suspected that some dishonourable violence had beene offered her; but being satisfied by an Eunuch of his owne that attended her, of Alexanders Kingly respect towards her, from the day of her being taken, he desired the immortall Gods, That if they had decreed to make a new Master of the Persian Empire, then it would please them to conferre on so iust and continent an enemy as Alexander, to whom he once againe before the last triall by battell offered these conditions of peace.

That with his Daughter in marriage he would deliuer vp and resigne all Asia the lesse, and with Ægypt, all those Kingdoms between the Phœnician Sea, & the Riuer of Euphrates; That he would pay him for the ransome of his Mother, and his other Daughters 30.

thousand talents, and that for the performance thereof, hee would leaue his son Occhus in hostage: To this they sought to perswade Alexander by such arguments as they had. Alexander causing the Embassadors to be remoued, aduised with his Counsel, but heard no man speak but Parmenio, the very right hand of his good fortune, who perswaded him to accept of these faire conditions. He told him, that the Empire between Euphrates and Hellespont was a faire addition to Macedon; that the retaining of the Persian prisoners was a great cumber, and the treasure offered for them of farre better vse then their persons, with diuers other arguments; all which Alexander reiected. And yet it is probable that if he had followed his aduice, and bounded his ambition within those limits, hee might haue liued as famous for vertue as for fortune, and left himselfe a Successor of able age to haue enioyed his estate, which afterward, indeede, hee much inlarged, rather to the greatning of others than himselfe: who to assure themselues of what they had vsurped vpon his issues, left not one of them to draw breath in the world within a few yeeres after. The truth is, That Alexander in going so farre into the East, left behinde him the reputation which he brought out of Macedon; the reputation of a iust and prudent Prince, a Prince temperate, aduised and gratefull: and being taught new lessons by abundance of prosperitie, became a louer of wine, of his owne flatterie, and of extream cruelty. Yea, as Seneca hath obserued, the taint of one vniust slaughter, amongst many, defaced and withered the flourishing beauty of all his great acts and glorious victories obtained. But the Persian Embassadors stay his answere, which was to this effect, That whatsoeuer hee had bestowed on the Wife and children of Darius, proceeded from his owne naturall clemencie and magnanimitie, without all respect to their Master, but thankes to an enemie was improper; that he made no warres against aduersitie, but against those that resisted him; not against Women and Children, but against armed enemies: and although by the reiterated practice of Darius, to corrupt his Souldiers, and by great summes of money to perswade his friends to attempt vpon his person, he had reason to doubt that the peace offered was rather pretended then meant, yet he could not (were it otherwise & faithfull) resolue in haste to accept the same, seeing Darius had made the Warre against him, not as a King with Royall and ouert-force, but as a Traitor by secret and base practice; That for the Territorie offered him, it was already his owne, and if Darius could beat him back againe ouer Euphrates, which he had already past, he would then beleeue that hee offered him somewhat in his owne power: Otherwise he propounded to himselfe for the reward of the Warre which hee had made, all those Kingdomes as yet in Darius possession; wherein, whether hee were abused by his owne hopes or no, the battaile which hee meant to fight in the day following should determine. For in conclusion, he told them, that he came into Asia to giue, and not to receiue; That the Heauens could not hold two Sunnes: and therefore if Darius could be content to acknowledge Alexander for his Superiour, hee might perchance be perswaded to giue him conditions fit for a second Person, and his Inferiour.

The battaile of Arbela: and that it could not bee so strongly fought as report hath made it.

WIth this answere the Embassadors returne; Darius prepares to fight, and sends Mazæus to defend a passage, which hee neuer yet dared so much as to hazard. Alexander consults with his Captaines, Parmenio perswades him to force Darius his Campe by night; so that the multitude of enemies might not moue terrour in the Macedonians, being but few. Alexander disdaines to steale the victorie, and resolues to bring with him the day-light, to witnesse his valour. But it was the successe that made good Alexanders resolution, though the counsell giuen by Parmenio was more sound: For it is a ground in Warre, Si pauci necessariò cum multitudine pugnare cogantur, consilium est nocti tempore belli fortunam tentare. Notwithstanding vpon the view of the multitude at hand, hee staggers and trenches himselfe vpon a ground of aduantage, which the Persian had abandoned: And whereas Darius for feare of surprise had stood with his Armie in armour all the day, and forborne sleepe all the night; Alexander gaue his men rest and store of foode, for reason had taught him this Rule in the Warre, In pugna Milites validiùs resistunt, si cibo potuque refecti fuerint, nam fames intrinsecus magis magis pugnat, quàm ferrum exterius; Souldiers doe the better ſtand to it in fight, if they haue their bellies full of meate and drinke; for hunger within, fights more eagerly than ſteele without.

The numbers which Alexander had, ſaith Arrianus, were fortie thouſand foot, and ſeuen thouſand horſe; theſe belike were of the Europaan Armie; for hee had beſides both Syrians, Indians, Ægyptians, and Arabians, that followed him out of thoſe Regions. He vſed but a ſhort ſpeech to his Souldiers to incourage them; and I thinke that hee needed little Rhetoricke; for by the two former battailes vpon the Riuer of Granick and in Cilicia, the Macedonians were beſt taught with what men they were to encounter. And it is a true ſaying, Victoria Victoriam parat, animumque victoribus auget, & aduerſarijs aufert; One victorie begets another, and puts courage into thoſe that haue alreadie had the better, taking ſpirit away from thoſe that haue beene beaten.

Arrianus and Curtius make large deſcriptions of this battaile, fought at Gaugamela; They tell vs of many charges and re-charges; That the victory inclined ſometime to the Perſians, ſometime to the Macedonians; That Parmenio was in danger of being ouerthrowne, who led the left wing; That Alexanders Reare-guard was broken, and his carriages loſt; That for the fierce and valorous encounters on both ſides, Fortune her ſelfe was long vnreſolued on whom to beſtow the Garland: And laſtly, That Alexander in perſon wrought wonders, being charged in his retrait. But, in concluſion, Curtius deliuers vs in account but three hundred dead Macedonians, in all this terrible daies worke, ſaying, That Epheſtion, Perdiccas and others of name were wounded. Arrianus findes not a third part of this number ſlaine; of the Perſians there fell fortie thouſand (ſaith Curtius,) thirty thouſand according to Arrianus: Ninety thouſand, if wee beleeue Diodore. But what can we iudge of this great encounter, other than that, as in the two former battailes, the Perſians vpon the firſt charge ranne away, and that the Macedonians purſued? For if of theſe foure or fiue hundred thouſand Aſians brought into the field by Darius, euery man had caſt but a Dart, or a Stone, the Macedonians could not haue bought the Empire of the Eaſt at ſo eaſie a rate, as ſixe or ſeuen hundred men in three notorious battailes. Certainely, if Darius had fought with Alexander vpon the bankes of Euphrates, & had armed but fiftie or threeſcore thouſand of this great multitude, onelie with Spades (for the moſt of all hee had were fit for no other weapon) it had beene impoſſible for Alexander to haue paſt that Riuer ſo eaſily, much leſſe the Riuer of Tygris. But as a man whoſe Empire God in his prouidence had determined, hee abandoned all places of aduantage, and ſuffered Alexander to enter ſo farre into the bowells of his kingdome, as all hope and poſſibilitie of eſcape by retrait being taken from the Macedonians, they had preſented vnto them the choiſe, either of death or victorie; to which election Darius could no way conſtraine his owne, ſeeing they had many large Regions to runne into from thoſe that inuaded them.

§. XI.

Of things following the battaile of Arbela. The yeelding of Babylon and Suſa.

DArius after the rout of his Armie recouered Arbela the ſame night, better followed in his flight, than in the fight. He propounded vnto them that ranne after him his purpoſe of making a retrait into Media, perſwading them that the Macedonians, greedy of ſpoyle and riches, would rather attempt Babylon, Suſa, and other Cities, filled with treaſure, than purſue the vanquiſhed. This miſerable reſolution his Nobilitie rather obeyed than approued.

Alexander ſoone after Darius his departure arriues at Arbela, which with a great maſſe of treaſure, and Princely ornaments, was rendred to him: for the feare which conducted Darius, tooke nothing with it but ſhame and diſhonour. Hee that had beene twice beaten, ſhould rather haue ſent his treaſure into Media, than brought it to Arbela, ſo neer the place where he abid the comming of his enemies; if he had beene victorious, hee might haue brought it after him at leiſure; but being ouer-come, he knew it vnpoſſible to driue Mules and Camels laden with gold from the purſuing Enemie, ſeeing himſelfe, at the ouerthrow hee had in Cilicia, caſt the Crowne from his head, to runne away with the more ſpeed. But errors are then beſt diſcerned when moſt incurable. Et præterita magis reprehendi poſſunt quàm corrigi; It is eaſier to reprehend than amend what is paſt.

From Arbela Alexander tooke his way towards Babylon, where Mazeus in whom Darius had most confidence rendred himselfe, his children and the Citie. Also the Captaine of the Castle, who was keeper of the treasure, strewed the streets with flowres, burnt frankincence vpon Altars of siluer as Alexander passed by, and deliuered vnto him whatsouer was committed to his trust. The Magi (the Chaldean Astrologers) followed this Captaine in great solemnitie to entertaine their new King: after these came the Babylonian horsemen, infinite rich in attire, but exceeding poore in warlike furniture. Betweene these (though not greatly to be feared) and himselfe, Alexander caused his Macedonian foote-men to march. When he entred the Castle, hee admired the glory thereof, and the aboundance of treasure therein found, amounting to fiftie thousand talents of siluer vncoyned. The Citie it selfe I haue elsewhere described with the Walles, the Towers, the Gates and Circuite, with the wonderfull place of pleasure about two miles in Circuite, surrounded with a Wall of fourescore foote high, and on the top thereof (being vnder-borne with Pillars) a Groue of beautifull and fruitfull trees, which it is said that one of the Kings of Babylon caused to be built, that the Queene and other Princesses might walke priuately therein. In this Citie, rich in all things, but most of all in voluptuous pleasures, the King rested himselfe and the whole Army foure and thirty daies, consuming that time in banqueting and in all sorts of effeminate exercise, which so much softned the mindes of the Macedonians, not acquainted till now with the like delicacies, as the seuere discipline of warre which taught them the sufferances of hunger and thirst, of painefull trauaile, and hard lodging, began rather to bee forgotten, than neglected.

An. b. Alex.

Heere it was that those bands of a thousand Soldiers were erected, and Commanders appointed ouer them, who thereupon were stiled Chiliarchi. This new order Alexander brought in, was to honor those Captaines which were found by certaine selected Iudges to haue deserued best in the late warre. For before this time the Macedonian companies consisted but of fiue hundred. Certainely the drawing downe of the foot-bands in this latter age hath beene the cause (saith the Marshal Monluct) that the title and charge of a Captaine hath been bestowed on euery Picque Bœuf or Spurn-Cow; for when the Captaines of foote had a thousand Souldiers vnder one Ensigne, and after that fiue hundred, as in the time of Francis the first, the title was honorable, and the Kings were lesse charged, and farre better serued. K. Henry the eight of England neuer gaue the commandement of any of his good ships, but to men of known valour, and of great estate, nay sometime he made two Gentlemen of qualitie Commanders in one ship: but all orders and degrees are fallen from the reputation they had.

While Alexander was yet in Babylon, there came to him a great supply out of Europe, for Antipater sent him sixe thousand foote and fiue hundred horse, out of Macedon; of Thracians three thousand foot, and the like number of horse; and out of Greece foure thousand and foure hundred horse, by which his Armie was greatly strengthened: for those that were infected with the pleasures of Babylon, could hardly bee brought againe, De quitter la plume pour dormir sur la dure; To change from soft beds to hard boords.

Hee left the Castle and Citie of Babylon with the Territories about it in charge with three of his owne Captaines, to wit, Agathon, Minetus, and Appolidorus; to supply all wants, a thousand talents: but to grace Mazeus, who rendred the Citie vnto him, hee gaue him the title of his Lieutenant ouer all, and tooke with him Bagistines that gaue vp the Castle, and hauing distributed to euery Souldier a part of the Treasure, he left Babylon, and entred into the Prouince Satrapene: from thence hee went on towards Susa in Persia, the same which Ptolomie, Herodotus, and Elianus call Memnonia, situate on the Riuer Euleus, a Citie sometime gouerned by Daniel the Prophet. Abulites also, gouernour of this famous Citie, gaue it vp to the Conqueror, with fifty thousand talents of siluer in bullion, and twelue Elephants for the warre, with all other the treasures of Darius. In this sort did those Vassalls of fortune, louers of the Kings prosperity, not of his person (for so all ambitious men are) purchase their owne peace and safetie with the Kings treasures. And heerein was Alexander well aduised, that whatsoeuer titles hee gaue to the Persians, yet hee left all places of importance in trust with his owne Captaines, to witte, Babylon, Susa, and Persepolis, with other Cities and Prouinces by him conquered; for if Darius (as yet liuing) had beaten the Macedonians but in one battell, all the Nobilitie of Persia would haue returned vnto their naturall Lord. Those that are Traitors

Diodor speaketh of more than fortie thousand talents in bullion, and of nine Millions of gold. sub dorrica forma excusi

to

to their owne Kings, are neuer to be vſed alone in great enterpriſes by thoſe Princes that entertaine them, nor euer to be truſted with the defences of any frontier-Towne, or Fortreſſe of waight, by the rendring whereof they may redeeme their liberty and eſtates loſt. Hereof the French had experience, when Don Pedro de Nauarra, being baniſhed out of Spaine, was truſted with Fonterabe, in the yeere 1523.

While Alexander ſpoiled Arbela, Mazeus might haue furniſht the King from Babylon; and while he ſtayed foure and thirty daies at Babylon, Abulites might haue holpen him from Suſa: and while he feaſted there, Tiridates from Perſepolis might haue relieued him, for the great maſſe of treaſure was laied vp in that Citie. But who hath ſought out and friended fearefull aduerſitie? It is certaine, that benefits binde not the ambitious, but the honeſt: for thoſe that are but greedy of themſelues, doe in all changes of fortune onely conſult the conſeruation of their owne greatneſſe.

The gouernment of Suſa, with the Caſtle and Treaſure, he committed to his own Macedonians, making Abulites who rendred it vnto him his Lieutenant, as he had done Mazeus and others, in giuing them Titles, but neither truſt nor power; for he left three thouſand old Souldiers in Garriſon to aſſure the place; and Darius Mother and her children to repoſe themſelues.

It is ſaid, that Charles the fift hauing promiſed Charles of Bourbon the gouernement of Marſeilles, if he could haue forſt it, and whereof he made ſure accompt, told ſome of his neereſt Counſellers, that he meant nothing leſſe than the performance of that promiſe, becauſe hee ſhould thereby haue left the Duke (reuolted from his Maſter) very well wherewithall to haue recouered his fauour.

How Alexander came to Perſepolis, and burnt it.

FRom Suſa Alexander leadeth his Armie toward Perſepolis, and when he ſought to paſſe thoſe mountains which ſunder Suſiana and Perſia, he was ſoundly beaten by Ariobarzanes, who defended againſt him thoſe Steights, called Pylæ Perſidis, or Suſcidæ, and after the loſſe of many Companies of his Macedonians; he was forſt to ſaue himſelfe by retrait, cauſing his foote to march cloſe together, and to couer themſelues with their Targets from the ſtones tumbled on them from the Mountaine top. Yet in the end he found out another path, which a Lycian, liuing in that Countrie, diſcouered vnto him, and came thereby ſuddenly in view of Ariobarzanes, who being inforſt to fight vpon euen ground, was by Alexander broken, whereupon he fled to Perſepolis; but (after that they of Perſepolis had refuſed to receiue him) he returned and gaue a ſecond charge vpon the Macedonians, wherein he was ſlaine. In like manner did King Francis the firſt, in the yeere 1515. finde a way ouer the Alpes, the Switzers vndertaking to defend all the paſſages, who, if their footmanſhip had not ſaued them vpon the Kings deſcent on the other ſide, they had beene ill paied for their hard lodging on thoſe Hils.

Foure thouſand Greekes, ſaith Curtius (Iuſtine numbers them but at eight hundred) hauing beene taken priſoners by the Perſians, preſented themſelues to Alexander now in ſight of Perſepolis. Theſe had the barbarous Perſians ſo maimed and defaced, by cutting off their Hands, Noſes, Eares, and other Members, as they could no way haue beene knowne to their Countrey-men, but by their voices; to each of theſe Alexander gaue three hundred Crownes, with new garments, and ſuch Lands as they liked to liue vpon.

Tiridates, one of Darius his falſe-hearted Grandes, hearing of Alexanders approach, made him know that Perſepolis was ready to receiue him, and prayed him to double his pace, becauſe there was a determination in the people to ſpoyle the Kings treaſure. This Citie was abandoned by many of her Inhabitants vpon Alexanders arriuall, and they that ſtaied followed the worſt counſell, for all was left to the liberty of the Souldiers, to ſpoyle and kill at their pleaſure. There was no place in the world at that time, which, if it had beene layed in the ballance with Perſepolis, would haue waighed it downe. Babylon, indeede, and Suſa, were very rich; but in Perſepolis lay the bulke and maine ſtore of the Perſians. For after the ſpoyle that had beene made of money, curious plate, bullion, Images of gold and ſiluer, and other Iewells; there remained to Alexander himſelfe one hundred and twenty thouſand talents. Hee left the ſame number of three thouſand

Macedonians

Macedonians in Persepolis, which he had done in Susa, and gaue the same formall honour to the Traitor Tiridates, that he had done to Abulites; but he that had the trust of the place was Nicarides, a creature of his owne. The body of his Armie hee left here for thirtie dayes, of which the Commanders were Parmenio and Craterus, and with a thousand horse and certaine troopes of chosen foote, hee would needes view in the Winter-time those parts of Persia, which the Snow had couered, a fruitlesse and foolish enterprise, but as Seneca saies; Non ille ire vult, sed non potest stare; He hath not a will to goe, but he is vnable to stand still. It is said and spoken in his praise: That when his Souldiers cried out against him, because they could not endure the extreame frost, and make way, but with extreame difficulty, through the snow, that Alexander forsooke his horse, & led them the way. But what can be more ridiculous than to bring other men into extremitie, thereby to shew how well himselfe can endure it? His walking on foote did no otherwise take off their wearinesse that followed him, than his sometime forbearing to drinke did quench their thirst, that could lesse endure it. For mine owne little iudgement I shall rather commend that Captaine, that makes carefull prouision for those that follow him, and that seekes wisely to preuent extreame necessity, than those witlesse arrogant fooles, that make the vaunt of hauing endured equally with the common Souldier, as if that were a matter of great glory and importance.

We finde in all the Warres that Cæsar made, or the best of the Roman Commanders, that the prouision of victuals was their first care. For it was a true saying of Coligni, Admirall of France; That who so will shape that beast (meaning Warre) must begin with his belly.

But Alexander is now returned to Persepolis, where those Historians, that were most amorous of his vertues, complaine, that the opinion of his valour, of his liberality, of his clemencie towards the vanquished, and all other his Kingly conditions, were drowned in drinke; That he smothered in carrowsing cups all the reputation of his actions past, and that by descending, as it were, from the reuerend Throne of the greatest King, into the company and familiarity of base Harlots, he began to be despised both of his owne and all other Nations. For being perswaded, when he was enflamed with wine, by the infamous Strumpet Thais, he caused the most sumptuous and goodly Castle and Citie of Persepolis, to be consumed with fire, notwithstanding all the arguments of Parmenio to the contrary, who told him that it was a dishonour to destroy those things by the perswasions of others, which by his proper vertue and force he had obtained; and that it would be a most strong perswasion to the Asians, to thinke hardly of him, & thereby aliene their hearts: For they might well beleeue that he which demolished the goodliest Ornaments they had, meant nothing lesse than (after such vastation) to hold their possession. Per violentiam crudelitas sequitur; Cruelty doth commonly follow drunkennesse: For so it fell out soone after, and often, in Alexander.

Curt. l. 5.

Sen. Epist. 84.

§. XIII.

ABout this time he receiued a new supply of Souldiers out of Cilicia, and goes on to finde Darius in Media. Darius had there compounded his fourth and last Armie, which he meant to haue increased in Bactria, had he not heard of Alexanders comming on, with whom (trusting to such companies as he had, which was numbred at thirty or forty thousand) he determined once againe to trie his fortune. He therefore cals together his Captaines and Commanders, and propounds vnto them his resolution, who being desperate of good successe vsed silence for a while. Artabazus, one of his eldest men of Warre, who had sometime liued with Philip of Macedon, brake the yce, and protesting that he could neuer be beaten by any aduersitie of the Kings, from the faith which he had euer ought him, with firme confidence, that all the rest were of the same condition (whereof they likewise assured Darius by the like protestation) he approued the Kings resolution. Two onely, and those the greatest, to wit, Naburzanes, and Bessus, whereof the latter was Gouernour of Bactria, had conspired against their Master, and therefore aduised the King to lay a new foundation for the Warre, and to pursue it by some such person for the present, against whom neither the gods nor Fortune had in all things declared themselues to be an enemy: this preamble Naburzanes vsed, and

and in conclusion aduised the election of his fellow Traitor Bessus, with promise that the warres ended, the Empire should againe be restored to Darius. The King swollen with disdaine prest towards Naburzanes to haue slain him, but Bessus and the Bactrians whom he commanded, being more in number than the rest, with-held him. In the meane while Naburzanes with-drew himselfe, and Bessus followed him, making their quarter a-part from the rest of the Armie. Artabazus, the Kings faithfull seruant, perswaded him to be aduised, and serue the time, seeing Alexander was at hand, and that he would at least make shew of forgetting the offence made; which the King being of a gentle disposition, willingly yeelded vnto. Bessus makes his submission and attends the King, who remoues his Armie. Patron, who commanded a Regiment of foure thousand Greekes, which had in all the former Battailes serued Darius with great fidelity, and alwayes made the retrait in spight of the Macedonians, offered himselfe to guard his person, protesting against the Treason of Bessus; but it was not his destinie to follow their aduice who from the beginning of the Warre gaue him faithfull counsell, but he enclined still to Bessus, who told him, that the Greekes with Patron their Captaine were corrupted by Alexander, and practised the diuision of his faithfull seruants. Bessus had drawne vnto him thirtie thousand of the Armie, promising them all those things, by which the louers of the World and themselues are wont to be allured, to wit, riches, safetie, and honour.

Now the day following Darius plainely discouered the purposes of Bessus, and being ouercome with passion, as thinking himselfe vnable to make head against these vngratefull and vnnaturall Traytors, he prayed Artabazus his faithfull seruant to depart from him, and to prouide for himselfe. In like sort he discharged the rest of his attendants, all saue a few of his Eunuchs, for his Guards had voluntarily abandoned him: His Persians being most base Cowards, durst not vndertake his defence against the Bactrians, notwithstanding that they had foure thousand Greekes to ioyne with him, who had beene able to haue beaten both Nations. But it is true, that him, which forsakes himselfe, no man followes. It had beene farre more Man-like and King-like, to haue dyed in the head of those foure thousand Greekes, which offered him the disposition of their liues, (to which Artabazus perswaded him) than to haue lien bewailing himselfe on the ground, and suffering himselfe to be bound like a Slaue by those ambitious Monsters that layd hand on him, whom neither the consideration of his former great estate, nor the honour he had giuen them, nor the trust reposed in them, nor the world of benefits bestowed on them, could moue to pittie: no, nor his present aduersitie, which aboue all things should haue moued them, could pierce their viperous and vngratefull hearts. Vaine it was indeede to hope it, for infidelitie hath no compassion.

Now Darius, thus forsaken, was bound & laid in a Cart, couered with Hides of Beasts, to the end that by any other ornament he might not be discouered; and to adde despight and derision to his aduersity, they fastned him with Chaines of Gold, and so drew him on among their ordinary Carriages and Carts. For Bessus and Nabarzanes perswaded themselues to redeeme their liues and the Prouinces they held, either by deliuering him a Prisoner to Alexander, or if that hope failed, to make themselues Kings by his slaughter, and then to defend themselues by force of Armes. But they failed in both. For it was against the nature of God, who is most iust, to pardon so strange villany, yea though against a Prince purely Heathenish and an Idolater.

Alexander hauing knowledge that Darius was retyred towards Bactria, and durst not abide his comming, hastened after him with a violent speede, and because he would not force his Foote-men beyond their powers, he mounted on horse-backe certaine selected Companies of them, and best armed, and with sixe thousand other Horse, rather ran than marched after Darius. Such as hated the Treason of Bessus, and secretly forsooke him, gaue knowledge to Alexander of all that had happened, informing him of the way that Bessus tooke, and how neere he was at hand: for many men of worth daily ran from him. Hereupon Alexander againe doubled his pace, and his Vant-gard being discouered by Bessus his Reare, Bessus brought a Horse to the Cart, where Darius lay bound, perswading him to mount thereon, and to saue himselfe. But the vnfortunate King refusing to follow those that had betrayed him, they cast Darts at him, wounded him to death, and wounded the Beasts that drew him, & slew two poore Seruants that attended his person. This done, they al fled that could, leauing the rest to the mercy of the Macedonian swords.

Polystratus

Polystratus a Macedonian, being by pursuite of the vanquished prest with thirst, as he was refreshing himselfe with some water that he had discouered, espying a Cart with a Teame of wounded beasts breathing for life, and not able to moue, searched the same, and therein found Darius bathing in his owne bloud: And by a Persian captiue which followed this Polystratus, he vnderstood that it was Darius, and was informed of this barbarous Tragedie. Darius also seemed greatly comforted (if dying men ignorant of the liuing God can be comforted) that he cast not out his last sorrowes vnheard, but that by this Macedonian, Alexander might know and take vengeance on those Traitors, which had dealt no lesse vnworthily than cruelly with him, recommending their reuenge to Alexander by this messenger, which he besought him to pursue, not because Darius had desired it, but for his owne honour, and for the safetie of all that did, or should after weare Crownes. He also, hauing nothing else to present, rendred thankes to Alexander for the Kingly grace vsed towards his Wife, Mother, and Children, desiring the immortall gods to submit vnto him the Empire of the whole World. As he was thus speaking, impatient death pressing out his few remaining spirits, he desired water, which Polystratus presented him, after which he liued but to tell him, that of all the best things that the world had, which were lately in his power, he had nothing remaining but his last breath, where-with to desire the gods to reward his compassion.

§. XIIII.

IT was now hoped by the Macedonians, that their trauels were neere an end, euery man preparing for his returne. Hereof when Alexander had knowledge, he was greatly grieued; for the bounded earth sufficed not his boundlesse ambition. Many arguments he therefore vsed to draw on his Armie farther into the East, but that which had most strength was, that Bessus, a most cruell Traitor to his Master Darius, hauing at his deuotion the Hyrcanians, and Bactrians, would in short time (if the Macedonians should returne) make himselfe Lord of the Persian Empire, and enioy the fruits of all their former trauailes. In conclusion, he wan their consents to goe on: which done, leauing Craterus with certaine Regiments of foote, and Amyntas with sixe thousand Horse in Parthenia, he enters not without some opposition into Hyrcania; for the Mardons, and other barbarous Nations, defended certaine passages for a while. He passeth the Riuer of Zioberis, which taking beginning in Parthia, dissolues it selfe in the Caspian Sea: it runneth vnder the ledge of Mountaines, which bound Parthia & Hyrcania, where hiding it selfe vnder-ground for three hundred furlongs, it then riseth againe and followeth its former course. In Zadracarta or Zendracarta, the same Citie which Ptolomie writes Hyrcania, the Metropolis of that Region, he rested fifteene dayes, banquetting, and feasting therein.

Phataphernes, one of Darius his greatest Commanders, with others of his best followers, submit themselues to Alexander, and were restored to their places and gouernments. But of all other he graced Artabazus most highly for his approued and constant faith to his Master Darius. Artabazus brought with him ten thousand and fiue hundred Greekes, the remainder of all those that had serued Darius; He treats with Alexander for their pardon, before they were yet arriued, but in the end they render themselues simply without promise or composition: he pardons all but the Lacedæmonians, whom he imprisoned, their Leader hauing slaine himselfe. He was also wrought, (though to his great dishonor) to receiue Nabarzanes that had ioyned with Bessus to murder Darius.

§. XV.

Of Thalestris Queene of the Amazons; where, by way of digression it is shewed, that such Amazons haue beene, and are.

HEre it is said, that Thalestris or Minothea, a Queene of the Amazones, came to visite him, and her suite was, (which she easily obtained) That she might accompanie him till she were made with childe by him: which done (refusing to follow him into India) she returned into her owne Countrie.

Plutarch

Plutarch citeth many Historians, reporting this meeting of Thalestris with Alexander, and some contradicting it. But, indeede, the letters of Alexander himselfe to Antipater, recounting all that befell him in those parts, and yet omitting to make mention of this Amazonian businesse, may iustly breede suspition of the whole matter as forged. Much more iustly may we suspect it as a vaine tale, because an Historian of the same time reading one of his bookes to Lysimachus (then King of Thrace) who had followed Alexander in all his voyage; was laught at by the King for inserting such newes of the Amazons; and Lysimachus himselfe had neuer heard of. One that accompanied Alexander tooke vpon him to write his acts; which to amplifie, He told how the King had fought single with an Elephant, and slaine it. The King hearing such stuffe, caught the booke, and threw it into the Riuer of Indus; saying, that it were well done to throw the writer after it, who by inserting such fables, disparaged the truth of his great exploits. Yet as we beleeue and know that there are Elephants, though it were false that Alexander fought with one; so may we giue credit vnto writers, making mention of such Amazons, whether it were true or false that they met with Alexander; as Plutarch leaues the matter vndetermined. Therefore I will here take leaue to make digression, as well to shew the opinions of the ancient Historians, Cosmographers, and others, as also of some moderne discouerers touching these warlike Women, because not onely Strabo, but many others of these our times make doubt, whether, or no, there were any such kinde of people. Iulius Solinus seates them in the North parts of Asia the lesse. Pom. Mela finds two Regions filled with them; the one, on the Riuer Thermodoon; the other, neere the Caspian Sea; Quas (saith he) Sauromatidas appellant; Which the people call Sauromatidas. The former of these two had the Cimerians for their Neighbours; Certum est, (saith Vadianus, who hath Commented vpon Mela) illos proximos Amazonibus fuisse; It is certaine that the Cimmerians were the next Nations to the Amazones. Ptolomie sets them farther into the Land North-wards, neere the Mountaines Hippaci, not farre from the Pillars of Alexander. And that they had Dominion in Asia it selfe toward India, Solinus and Pliny tels vs; Where they gouerned a people called the Pandeans, or Padeans, so called after Pandea the Daughter of Hercules, from whom all the rest derite themselues. Claudian affirmes, That they commanded many Nations: For he speakes (largely perhaps as a Poet) thus:

Sol. c. 27. & 65. Lib. 1. pt. 16. Asia Tab. 2. Plin l. 6. c. 20.

Medis leuibusq; Sabæis
Imperat hic sexus: Reginarúmq; sub armis, Barbariæ pars magna iacet.

Claud. de 4. Cons. Honor.

Ouer the Medes, and light Sabæans, raignes
This female sexe: and vnder armes of Queene, Great part of the Barbarian Land remaines.

Diodorus Siculus hath hard of them in Lybia, who were more ancient (saith he) than those which kept the banks of Thermodoon, a Riuer falling into the Euxine Sea, neere Heraclium. L. 2.

Herodotus doth also make report of these Amazons, whom he tels vs that the Scythians call Æorpatas, which is as much as Viricidas, or Men-killers. And that they made incursion into Asia the lesse, sackt Ephesus, and burnt the Temple of Diana, Manethon & Auentinus report, which they performed fortie yeeres after Troy was taken. At the siege of Troy it selfe we reade of Penthesilea, That she came to the succour of Priamus. AEneiad. 1. l. 3

Am. Marcellinus giues the cause of their inhabiting vpon the Riuer of Thermodoon, speaking confidently of the Warres they made with diuers Nations, and of their ouerthrow. L. 22 c. 7.

Plutarch in the life of Theseus, out of Philochorus, Hellenicus, and other ancient Historians, reports the taking of Antiopa Queene of the Amazons by Hercules, and by him giuen to Theseus, though some affirme, That Theseus himselfe got her by stealth, when she came to visit him aboord his ship. But in substance there is little difference; all confessing, That such Amazons there were. The same Author in the life of Pompey speakes of certaine companies of the Amazons, that came to aide the Albanians against the Romans, by whom after the battaile, many Targets and Buskins of theirs were taken vp: and he saith farther, That these women entertaine the Gelæ and Lelages once a yeere, Nations inhabiting betweene them and the Albanians.

But

But to omit the many Authors, making mention of Amazons that were in the old times; Pran. Lopez who hath written the nauigation of Orellana, which he made down the Riuer of Amazons from Peru, in the yeere 1542. (vpon which Riuer, for the diuers turnings, he is said to haue sailed sixe thousand miles) reports from the relation of the said Orellana, to the Councell of the Indies, That he both saw those women and fought with them, where they sought to impeach his passage towards the East-Sea.

Histor. Ind. part. 3. c. 28.

It is also reported by Vlricus Schmidel, that in the yeere 1542. when he sailed vp the Riuers of Paragna and Parabol, that he came to a King of that Countrey, called Scherues, inhabiting vnder the Tropick of Capricorne, who gaue his Captaine Ernando Rieffere, a Crowne of siluer, which he had gotten in fight from a Queene of the Amazons in those parts.

Ed. Lopes, in his description of the Kingdome of Congo, makes relation of such Amazons, telling vs, That (agreeable to the reports of elder times) they burne off their right brests, and liue a-part from men, saue at one time of the yeere, when they feast and accompany them for one moneth. These (saith he) possesse a part of the Kingdome of Monomotapa in Africa, ninteene degrees to the Southward of the line: and that these women are the strongest guards of this Emperour, all the East Indian Portugals know.

I haue produced these authorities in part, to iustifie mine owne relation of these Amazons, because that which was deliuered me for truth by an ancient Cacique of Guiana, how vpon the Riuer of Papamena (since the Spanish discoueries called Amazons) that these women still liue and gouerne, was held for a vaine and vnprobable report.

§. XVI.

How Alexander fell into the Persian Luxurie: and how he further pursued Bessus.

NOw as Alexander had begun to change his conditions after the taking of Persepolis: so at this time his prosperity had so much ouer-wrought his vertue, as he accompted clemency to be but baseneſſe, & the temperance which he had vsed all his life time, but a poore and deiected humour, rather becomming the instructers of his youth, than the condition and state of so mighty a King, as the world could not equall. For he perswaded himselfe that he now represented the greatnesse of the gods; he was pleased that those that came before him, should fall to the ground, & adore him; he ware the Robes and garments of the Persians, & commanded that his Nobility should doe the like; he entertained in his Court and Campe, the same shameleſſe rabble of Curtisans, and Sodomiticall Eunuches, that Darius had done, & imitated in all things the proud, voluptuous, & detested manners of the Persians, whom he had vanquished. So licentious is felicity, as notwithstanding that he was fully perswaded, that the gods whom he serued (detesting the vices of the inuaded) assisted him in all attempts against them, he himselfe, contrary to the Religion he profest (which how Idolatrous soeuer it were, could not be but fearfull vnto him by neglecting it) became by imitation, & not by ignorance or education, a more foule and fearefull Monster than Darius, from whose tyranny he vaunted to haue deliuered so many Nations. Yea, those that were dearest and neerest vnto him, began to be ashamed of him, entertaining each other with this, and the like scornefull discourse; That Alexander of Macedon was become one of Darius his licentious Courtiers; That by his example, the Macedonians were in the end of so many trauailes, more impouerished in their vertues, than inriched by their victories; and that it was hard to iudge whether the Conquerors, or the Conquered were the baser slaues. Neither were these opinions so reserued, but that the noise of them came to his eares. Hee therefore with great gifts sought to pacifie the better sort, and those of whose iudgements he was most iealous; and making it knowne to the Armie, that Bessus had assumed the title of a King, and called himselfe Artaxerxes, and that he had compounded a great Armie of the Bactrians, and other Nations, he had arguments enow to perswade them to goe on, to the end that all already gotten, might not with themselues (so farre ingaged) be cast away. And because they were pestered with the spoiles of so many Cities, as the whole Armie seemed but the guard of their carriages, (not much vnlike the warfare of the French) hauing commanded euery mans fardels to be brought into the market-place, he together with his owne, caused all to be consumed with fire. Certainely, this could not but haue prooued most dangerous vnto him, seeing the common-Souldiers had more interest in these things which they had bought with their painefull trauailes, and with their bloud; than in the Kings ambition; had not (as Seneca often obserued) his happy temeritie ouercome all things. As he was in his way, newes came to him, that Satribarzanes, whom he had established in his former gouernment ouer the Arrians, was reuolted; whereupon leauing the way of Bactria, he sought him out; but the Rebell, hearing of his comming, fled to Bessus, with two thousand Horse. He then went on towards Bessus, and by setting a great pile of wood on fire, with the aduantage of a strong winde, won the passage ouer an high and vnaccessable Rocke, which was defended against him, with thirteene thousand foote. For the extremitie of the Flame and smoake, forced them from the place, otherwise inuincible. I saw in the third ciuill warre of France, certaine Caues in Languedoc, which had but one entrance, and that very narrow, cut out in the mid-way of high Rockes, which we knew not how to enter by any ladder or engine, till at last, by certaine bundels of straw, let downe by an yron chaine, and a waighty stone in the middest, those that defended it, were so smothered, as they rendred themselues with their plate, monie, and other goods therein hidden. There were also some three yeeres before my arriuall in Guiana, three hundred Spaniards well mounted, smothered to death, together with their Horses, by the Countrie-people, who did set the long dry grasse on fire to the Eastward of them, (the winde in those parts being alwayes East) so as notwithstanding their flying from the smoake, there was not any one that escaped. Sir Iohn Borrowes also, with a hundred English, was in great danger of being lost at Margarita, in the West-Indies, by hauing the grasse fired behinde him, but the smoake being timefully discouered, he recouered the Sea-shore with the losse of sixteene of his men. I remember these things, but to giue caution to those that shall in times to come inuade any part of those Countries, that they alwayes, before they passe into the Land, burne downe the grasse and sedge to the East of them; they may otherwise, without any other enemy, than a handfull of straw set on fire, dye the death of hony-Bees, burnt out of the Hiue.

§. XVII.

A Conspiracie against Alexander. The death of Philotas and Parmenio.

ALexander was, after he parted hence, no where resisted, till he came into Aria, to the East of Bactria, where the chiefe Citie of that Prouince, called Artacoana, was a while defended against him, by the reuolt of Satribarzanes, but in the end he receiued the Inhabitants to mercy. At this place his Armie was re-enforced with a new supply of fiue thousand and fiue hundred foote, and neere fiue hundred Horse, out of Greece, Thessalie, and other places. His iournie out of Persis into these parts, is very confusedly described. For hauing (as all his Historians tell vs) a determination to finde Bessus in Bactria, he leaues it at the very entrance, & takes the way of Hyrcania, from thence he wanders Northwards towards the obscure Mardi, vpon the Caspian-Sea, and thence ouer the Mountaine Coronus into Aria, and Drangiana.

At this time it was that the treason of Dimnus brake out, of which Philotas the sonne of Parmenio was accused, as accessarie, if not principall. This Dimnus, hauing (I know not vpon what ground) conspired with some others against the life of Alexander, went about to draw Nicomachus, a young man whom he loued, into the same treason. The Youth, although he was first bound by oath to secrecie, when he heard so foule a matter vttered, began to protest against it so vehemently, that his friend was like to haue slaine him for security of his owne life. So, constrained by feare, he made shew as if he had beene won by perswasion; and by seeming at length to like well of the businesse, he was told more at large what they were, that had vndertaken it. There were nine or ten of them, all men of ranke, whose names Dimnus (to countenance the enterprise) reckoned vp to Nicomachus. Nicomachus had no sooner freed himselfe from the company of this Traitor Dimnus, than he acquainted his owne brother Ceballinus with the whole Historie: whereupon it was agreed betwee e them, that Ceballinus (who might with least suspition) should goe to the Court, and vtter all. Ceballinus, meeting with Philotas, told him the whole businesse, desiring him to acquaint the King therewith: which he promised to doe, but did not. Two dayes passed, and Philotas neuer brake with the King about the matter, but still excused himselfe to Ceballinus by the Kings want of leisure. This his coldnesse bred suspition, and caused Ceballinus to addresse himselfe to another, one Metron, Keeper of the Kings Armorie, who forth-with brought him to Alexanders presence. Alexander, finding by examination what had passed betweene Ceballinus and Philotas, did fully perswade himselfe that this concealement of the treason, argued his hand to haue beene in the businesse. Therefore when Dimnus was brought before him, he asked the Traitor no other question than this: Wherein haue I so offended thee, that thou shouldst thinke Philotas more worthy to be King than I? Dimnus perceiuing when he was apprehended, how the matter went, had so wounded himselfe, that he liued no longer, than to giue his last groane in the Kings presence. Then was Philotas called, and charged with the suspition, which his silence might iustly breede. His answere was, That when the practice was reuealed vnto him by Nichomachus, he iudging it to be but friuolous, did forbeare to acquaint Alexander therewithall, vntill he might haue better information. This errour of his, (if it were onely an errour) although Alexander, for the notorious seruices of his Father Parmenio, of his brother Nicanor lately dead, and of Philotas himselfe, had freely pardoned and giuen him his hand for assurance; yet by the instigation of Craterus, he againe swallowed his Princely promise, & made his enemies his Iudges: Curtius giues a note of Craterus in this businesse; How he perswaded himselfe, that he could neuer finde a better occasion to oppresse his priuate enemie, than by pretending pietie, and dutie towards the King. Hereof a Poet of our owne hath giuen a note as much better, as it is more generall in his Philotas:

See how these great men cloathe their priuate hate,
In these faire colours of the publike good,
And to effect their ends, pretend the State,
As if the State by their affection stood:
And arm'd with power and Princes iealousies,
Will put the least conceit of discontent
Into the greatest ranke of treacheries,
That no one action shall seeme innocent;
Yea valour, honour, bountie, shall be made
As accessaries vnto ends vniust:
And euen the seruice of the State must lade
The needfull'st vndertaking with distrust;
So that base vilenesse, idle Luxurie,
Seeme safer farre, than to doe worthily, &c.

Now although it were so, that the King, following the aduice of Craterus, had resolued the next day to put Philotas to torment, yet in the very euening of the same night in which he was apprehended, he called him to a banquet, and discoursed as familiarly with him as at any other time. But when in the dead of the night Philotas was taken in his lodging, and that they which hated him began to binde him; he cryed out vpon the King in these words: O Alexander, the malice of mine Enemies hath surmounted thy mercy, and their hatred is farre more constant than the word of a King. Many circumstances were vrged against him by Alexander himselfe, (for the Kings of Macedon did in person examine the accusations of treason) and this was not the least (not the least offence, indeede, against the Kings humour, who desired to be glorified as a God) That when Alexander wrote vnto him concerning the title giuen him by Iupiter Hammon; He answered, That he could not but reioyce that he was admitted into that sacred Fellowship of the gods, and yet he could not but withall grieue for those that should liue vnder such a one as would exceede the nature of man. This was (saith Alexander) a firme perswasion vnto me, that his heart was changed, and that he held my glory in despight. See what a strange Monster Flatterie is, that can perswade Kings to kill those that doe not praise and allow those things in them, which are of all other most to be abhorred. Philotas was brought before the multitude, to heare the Kings Oration against him: he was brought forth in vilde garments, and bound like a Theefe; where he heard himselfe, and his absent Father the greatest Captaine of the World, accused, his two other Brothers, Hector and Nicanor hauing beene lost in the present Warre. He was so greatly oppresst with griefe, as for a while he could vtter nothing but teares, and ſorrow had ſo waſted his ſpirits, as he ſanke vnder thoſe that led him. In the end, the King asked him, In what language he would make his defence; he answered, In the ſame wherein it had pleaſed the King to accuſe him, which he did, to the end that the Perſians, as well as the Macedonians, might vnderſtand him. But hereof the King made his aduantage, perſwading the aſſembly, that he diſdained the language of his owne Countrie, and ſo with-drawing himſelfe, left him to his mercileſſe enemies.

This proceeding of the Kings, Philotas greatly lamented, ſeeing the King, who had ſo ſharpely inueyed againſt him, would not vouchſafe to heare his excuſe. For not his enemies onely were imboldened thereby againſt him, but all the reſt, hauing diſcouered the Kings diſpoſition and reſolution, contending among themſelues, which of them ſhould exceede in hatred towards him; Among many other arguments, which he vſed in his owne defence, this was not the weakeſt; That when Nicomachus, deſired to know of Dimnus, what men of marke and power were his partners in the conſpiracie (as ſeeming vnwilling to aduenture himſelfe with meane and baſe Companions) Dimnus named vnto him Demetrius of the Kings Chamber, Nicanor, Amyntas, and ſome others; but ſpake not a word of Philotas, who by being Commander of the Horſe, would greatly haue valued the party, and haue incouraged Nicomachus. Indeede, as Philotas ſaid well for himſelfe, it is likely that Dimnus, thereby the better to haue heartned Nicomachus, would haue named him, though he had neuer dealt with him in any ſuch practice. And for more certaine proofe, that he knew nothing of their intents that practiſed againſt the King, there was not any one of the Conſpirators, being many, inforc'd by torments, or otherwiſe, that could accuſe him; and it is true, that aduerſity being ſeldome able to beare her owne burden, is for the moſt part found ſo malicious, as ſhe rather deſires to draw others (not alwayes deſeruing it) into the ſame danger, than to ſpare any that it can accuſe. Yet at the laſt, howſoeuer it were, to auoide the extremity of reſiſtleſſe and vnnaturall torments, deuiſed by his profeſt enemies Craterus, Cenus, Epheſtion, and others, Philotas accuſed his owne ſelfe; being perſwaded that they would haue ſlaine him forthwith. But he failed euen in that miſerable hope; and ſuffering all that could be laid on fleſh and bloud, he was forced to deliuer, not what he knew, but whatſoeuer beſt pleaſed their eares, that were farre more mercileſſe than death it ſelfe.

Of this kinde of iudiciall proceeding S. Auguſtine greatly complaineth as a matter to be bewailed, ſaith he, with Fountaines of teares, Quid cum in ſua cauſa quiſque torquetur: & cum quaritur vtrum ſit nocens, cruciatur: & innocens luit pro incerto ſcelere certiſſimas penas: non quia illud commiſiſſe detegitur, ſed quia non commiſiſſe neſcitur: what ſhall we ſay to it, when one is put to torture in his owne caſe; and tormented whileſt yet it is in queſtion whether he be guilty; and being innocent, ſuffers aſſured puniſhment for a fault, of which there is no certaintie; not becauſe he is knowne to haue committed the offence, but becauſe others doe not know that he hath not committed it? Aug. de Ciuit: Dei, l. 19. c. 6.

It had beene enough for Alexanders ſafety, if Philotas had beene put to death without torment, the reſt would not much haue grieued thereat, becauſe he was greatly ſuſpected. But Hemolaus, who afterward conſpired againſt him, made the Kings cruelty and delight in bloud, the greateſt motiue of his owne ill intent. Therefore, Seneca, ſpeaking of Alexander, ſaith thus: Crudelitas minime humanum malum eſt, in dignum iam mitti animo; ferina iſta rabies eſt ſanguine gaudere & vulneribus, & abiecto homine, in ſilueſtre animal tranſire; Cruelty is not a humane vice; it is vnworthy of ſo milde a ſpirit. It is euen a beaſtly rage to delight in bloud and wounds, and caſting away the nature of man, to become a ſauage Monſter. Sen. de Clem. l. 1.

For the concluſion of this Tragedie, Curtius makes a doubt, whether the confeſſion that Philotas made, were to giue end to the torments which he could not any longer endure, or that the ſame was true indeede; For (ſaith he) in this caſe, they that ſpeake truely, or they that deny falſly, come to one and the ſame end. Now, while the Kings hands were yet wet in bloud, he commanded that Lynceſtes, ſonne-in-Law to Antipater, who had beene three yeeres in priſon, ſhould be ſlaine; The ſame diſpatch had all thoſe that Nicomachus had accuſed; others there were that were ſuſpected, becauſe they had followed Philotas, but when they had anſwered for themſelues that they knew no way ſo direct to winne the Kings fauour, as by louing thoſe whom the King fauoured; they were diſmiſt. But Parmenio was yet liuing; Parmenio, who had ſerued with great fidelitie as well Philip of Macedon the Kings Father, as himselfe; Parmenio that first opened the way into Asia, That had depreſt Attalus the Kings enemy; that had alwayes, and in all hazards, the leading of the Kings Vant-guard, that was no lesse prudent in counsell, than fortunate in all attempts; A man beloued of the men of War, and, to say the truth, he that had made the purchase for the King of the Empire of the East, and of all the glory and fame he had: That he might not therefore reuenge the death of his Sonne, though not vpon the King, (for it was vnlikely that he would haue dishonoured his fidelity in his eldest age, hauing now liued threescore and ten yeeres) yet vpon those that by the witchcraft of flattery had possest themselues of his affection; it was resolued that he should be dispatcht. Polydamas was imployed in this businesse, a man whom of all other Parmenio trusted most, and loued best, who (to be short) finding him in Media, and hauing Cleander and other Murderers with him, slew him walking in his Garden, while he Lib. 7. was reading the Kings letters Hic exitus Parmenionis fuit, militiæ domiq; clari viri; Multa sine Rege prosperè, Rex sine illo nihil magnæ rei gesserat; This was the end of Parmenio (saith Curtius) who had performed many notable things without the King, but the King, without him, did neuer effect any thing worthy of praise.

§. XVIII.

How Alexander subdued the Bactrians, Sogdians, and other people. How Bessus was deliuered into his hands. How he fought with the Scythians.

When these things had end, Alexander went on with his Armie, and brought vnder his obedience the Araspians or Euergitans; he made Amenides (sometime Darius his Secretarie) their Gouernour, then he subdued the Arachosians, and left Menon to command ouer them. Here the Armie, sometimes led by Parmenio, findes him, consisting of twelue thousand Macedons and Greekes, with whom he past through some cold Regions with difficultie enough. At length he came to the foote of the Mountaine Taurus towards the East, where he built a Citie which he honoured with his own name, and peopled it with seuen thousand of his old Macedons, worne with age and with trauailes of the warre. The Arians, who since he left them were reuolted, he subdued againe by the industry and valour of Caranus and Erigius; And now he resolues to finde out the new King Bessus in Bactria. Bessus, hearing of his comming, prepares to passe ouer the great Riuer of Oxus which diuides Bactria from Sogdiana; Artabazus is made Gouernour of Bactria abandoned by Bessus; The Macedonian Armie suffereth for want of Water, insomuch as when they came to the Riuer of Oxus, there died more of them by drinking inordinately, then Alexander had lost in any one battaile against the Persians. And it may well be; For (as Clytus did after obiect vnto him) he fought against women, not against men, and not against their persons, but their shadowes. He found on the bankes of this great Riuer no manner of Timber or other materials, to make either boates, bridges, or raffe, but was forst to sew together the Hides that couered his carriages, and stuffe them with straw, and on them in sixe daies to passe ouer his Armie, which Bessus might easily haue distrest, if he had dared but to behold the Macedonian Armie a farre off. He had formerly complained against Darius for neglecting to defend the banks of Tigris, and other passages, and yet now, when this traiterous slaue had styled himselfe a King, he durst not performe any thing worthy of a slaue. And therefore those that were neerest vnto him, and whom he most trusted, to wit, Spitamenes, Dataphernes, Catanes, and others the Commanders of his Armie, moued both by the care of their owne safety, and by the memory of Bessus his Treason and cruelty against Darius, bound him in the like manner that he had done his Master, but with this difference, that he had the chaine closed about his necke like a mastiffe Cog, and so was dragged along to be presented to his enemie.

In the meane while Alexander was arriued at a certaine Towne inhabited with Greekes of Miletum, brought thither by Xerxes, when long before he returned out of Greece, whose issues had well-neere forgotten their Country-language. These most cruelly (after they had receiued him with great ioy) he put to the sword, and destroyed their Citie. At this place he receiued Bessus, and hauing rewarded Spitamenes with the rest that deliuered him, he gaue the Traitor into the hands of Oxatres, Darius his brother, to be tormented.

But

But while he now thought himselfe secure, some twenty thousand Mountainers assaulted his Campe; in repelling whom he receiued a shot in the legge, the arrow head sticking in the flesh, so as he was carried in a Horse-Lytter, sometime by the horse-men, sometime by the foote.

Soone after he came vnto Maracanda, which Petrus Perondinus takes to be Samarchand, the regall Citie of the great Tamerlaine. It had in compasse threescore and ten furlongs (Curtius saith.) Here he receiued the Embassadors of the Scythians (called Auians) who offered to serue him.

The Bactrians are shortly again with the Sogdians stirred to Rebellion, by the same Spitamenes and Catanes, who had lately deliuered into his hands the Traitor Bessus. Many Cities were resoluedly defended against him, all which, after victory, he defaced and rased, killing all therein. At one of these he receiued a blow on the necke, which strucke him to the ground, and much disabled him for many dayes after. In the meane while Spitamenes had recouered Maracanda, against whom he imployed Menedemus with three thousand foote and eight hundred horse.

In the heate of these tumults Alexander marched on (if we may beleeue Curtius and others) till he came to the Riuer of Tanais, vpon whose banke he built another Alexandria threescore furlongs in compasse, which he beautified with houses within seuenteene daies after the wals built. The building of this Citie is said to haue beene occasion of a war betweene him and the Scythians; the Scythian King perswading himselfe, that this new Towne was fortified of purpose to keepe him vnder. I doe not well vnderstand, why the Scythians, offering war in such terrible manner, that Alexander was iudged by his owne Souldiers to counterfeit sicknesse for very feare, should neuertheless make suit for peace: neither finde I the reason why Alexander (not intending the conquest of those Northerne desarts, but onely the defence of his owne banke) should refuse to let them alone, with whom he could not meddle further then they should agree to suffer him. Yet hereof is made a great matter; & a victory described, in pursuit of which the Macedons ran beyond the bounds and monuments of Bacchus his expedition.

The truth is, That Curtius and Trogus haue greatly mistaken this Riuer which they call Tanais. For it was the Riuer of Iaxartes, that runs betweene Sogdiana and Scythia, which Alexander past ouer, while Menedemus was imployed in the recouery of Samarchand: But Tanais which diuides Asia from Europe, is neere two thousand miles distant from any part of Bactria and Sogdiana, and the way desart and vnknowne. So that Alexander had (besides Iaxartes) the great Riuer of Volga and many others to swim ouer, ere he could recouer Tanais: which (from the place where he was) he could hardly haue discouered with the Armie that followed him, if he had imploied all the time that he liued in Asia in that trauaile.

Wherefore it is enough to beleeue, that the Asiatique Scythians, making some offer to disturbe the erection of this new Citie, which was like to giue some hindrance to their excursions, were driuen away by the Macedonians; and being naked of defensiue Armes, easily chased some ten or twelue miles; which is the substance of Curtius his report. As for the limits of Bacchus his iournie; like enough it is that Bacchus (if in his life time he were as sober a man, as after his death he was held a drunken god) went not very far into that waste Countrie, where he could finde nothing but trees and stones, nor other businesse than to set vp a monument.

Threescore of the Macedons are said to haue beene slaine, and one thousand one hundred hurt in this fight, which might easily be in passing a great Riuer, defended against them by good Archers. Of Scythian horses one thousand eight hundred were brought into the Campe, and many prisoners. It is forbidden by some Historians, and indeede it is hardly possible, to set down the numbers of such as perish in battell: yet Cæsar commonly did it. And where the diligence of the victors hath beene so inquisitiue into the greatnesse of their owne successe, that writers haue beene able to deliuer such particulars by credible report, I hold it not vnlawfull to set downe what wee finde; especially when it serues to giue light to the businesse in hand. The small number which the Macedonians lost; the omission of the number which they slew (a thing not vsuall in Curtius, who forbeares nothing that may set out the greatnes of Alexander) & the little bootie that was gotten; doe make it probable, that this war was no better than the repulsion of a few rouing Tartars (the like being yeerely performed by the Moscouite, without any boast) and therefore better omitted by some Historians, than so highly extolled as a great exploit by others.

While Alexander was assuring himselfe of those Scythians bordering vpon Iaxartes, he receiued the ill newes that Menedemus was slaine by Spitamenes, the Armie (by him led) broken, and the greatest numbers slaine, to wit, two thousand foot, and three hundred horse. He therefore, to appease the rebellion, and to take reuenge of Spitamenes, makes all the haste he can; but Spitamenes flies into Bactria. Alexander kils, burns, and layes waste all before him; not sparing the innocent children, and so departs, leaning a new Gouernour in that Prouince.

To repaire this losse he receiued a great supply of nineteene thousand Souldiers out of Greece, Lycia, and Syria, with all which, and the old Armie, he returnes towards the South, and passeth the Riuer of Oxus; on the South-side whereof he built sixe Townes neere each other for mutuall succour. But he findes a new start-vp-Rebell, called Arimazes, (a Sogdian) followed with thirty thousand Souldiers that defended against him a strong piece of ground on the top of a high Hill; whom when Alexander had sought in vaine to win by faire words, he made choice of three hundred yong men, and promised ten talents to the first, nine to the second, and so in proportion to the rest, that could finde a way to creepe vp to the top thereof. This they performed with the losse of some two and thirty of their men, and then made a signe to Alexander, that they had performed his commandement. Hereupon he sent one Cophes to perswade Arimazes to yeeld the place; who, being shewed by Cophes that the Armie of Macedon was already mounted vp, yeelded simply to Alexanders mercy, and was (with all his kinred) scourged and crucified to death; which punishment they well deserued for neglecting to keepe good watch in so dangerous a time. For the place, as seemes by the description, might easily haue beene defended against all the Armies of the World. But, what strength cannot doe, Mans wit, being the most forcible engine, hath often effected; Of which I will giue you an example in a place of our owne.

The Iland of Sarke, ioyning to Garnsey and of that gouernement, was in Queene Maries time surprised by the French, and could neuer haue beene recouered againe by strong hand, hauing cattell and corne enough vpon the place to feede so many men as will serue to defend it, and being euery way so inaccessible, that it might be held against the Great Turke. Yet by the industry of a Gentleman of the Netherlands, it was in this sort regained. He anchored in the roade with one Ship of small burden, and, pretending the death of his Merchant, besought the French, being some thirty in number, that they might burie their Merchant in hallowed Ground, and in the Chappell of that Isle; offering a present to the French of such Commodities as they had aboord; whereto (with condition that they should not come a-shore with any weapon, no not so much as with a Knife) the French men yeelded. Then did the Flemings put a Coffin into their Boat, not filled with a dead carkasse, but with Swords, Targets, and Harquebusses; The French receiued them at their landing, and searching euery of them so narrowly as they could not hide a Pen-knife, gaue them leaue to draw their Coffin vp the Rockes with great difficulty; some part of the French tooke the Flemish Boat and rowed aboord their Ship, to fetch the commodities promised, and what else they pleased, but being entred, they were taken and bound. The Flemings on the Land, when they had carried their Coffin into the Chappell, shut the doore to them, and taking their weapons out of the Coffin, set vpon the French; they run to the Cliffe and cry to their Company aboord the Fleming to come to their succour, but finding the Boat charged with Flemings, yeelded themselues and the place. Thus a Fox-taile doth sometimes helpe well to piece out the Lions-skin, that else would be too short.

§. XIX.

How Alexander slew his owne friends.

AFter these Sogdian and Scythian Warres, we reade of Alexanders killing of a Lion, and other friuolous matters, and that he committed the Gouernment of Maracanda, and the Country about it, to Clytus, and how he slew him soone after, for valuing the vertue of Philip the father before that of Alexander the son, or rather because he obiected to the King the death of Parmeno, and derided the Oracle of Hammon:

for

for the ſin hee touche him as the quicke, the ſame being deliuered in publike, and at a drunken Banquet. Clytus, indeed, had deſerued as much at the Kings hands, as any man liuing had done, and had in particular ſaued his life, which the King well remembred when he came to himſelfe, and when it was too late. Yet to ſay the truth, Clytus his inſolencie was intolerable. As he in his Cups forgat whom he offended, ſo the King in his (for neyther of them were themſelues) forgat whom he went about to ſlay, for the griefe whereof hee tare his owne face and ſorrowed ſo inordinately, as, but for the perſwaſions of Caliſthenes, it is thought he would haue ſlaine himſelfe.

Wine begat Furie, Furie matter of Repentance: but preceding miſchiefes are not amended by ſucceeding bewailings: Omne vitium ebrietas & incendit, & detegit; obſtantem malis conatibus verecundiam removet, ubi poſſedit animum nimia vis vini, quicquid mali latebat, emergit: non facit ebrietas vitia, ſed protrahit; Drunkenneſſe both kindles and layes open euery vice; it remooues out of the way that ſhame which giues impediment vnto badde attempts; where wine gets the maſtrie, all the ill that before lay hidden breakes out: drunkenneſſe indeed rather diſcouers vices, than makes them.

Soone after this, Spitamenes, who ſlew Beſſus, and had lately reuolted from Alexander, was murdered by his Wife, and his head preſented to Alexander. Spitamenes being taken away, the Dahans alſo ſeized vpon his fellow conſpirator Dataphernes, and deliuered him vp. So Alexander being now freed from all theſe pettie-Rebels, diſpoſed of the Prouinces which he paſt ouer, and went on with his Armie into Gabaza, where it ſuffered ſo much Hunger, Cold, Lightning, Thunder, and Storme, as he loſt in one Tempeſt a thouſand of his Traine. From hence he inuaded the Sacans, and deſtroyed their Countrie. Then came he into the Territorie of Cohortanes, who ſubmitted himſelfe vnto him, feaſted him greatly, & preſented him with thirtie beautifull Virgins, among whom Roxane, afterward his Wife, was one: which although all the Macedonians diſdained, yet none of them durſt vſe any freedome of ſpeech after Clytus his death. From hence he directed his courſe towards India, hauing ſo increaſed his numbers, as they amounted to an hundred and twenty thouſand armed men.

In the meane while he would needs be honoured as a God: whereto that hee might allure the Macedonians, hee imployed two pernicious Parafites, Hagis and Cleo; whom Caliſthenes oppoſed: For, among many other honeſt arguments vſed to the aſſembly, he told Cleo, That hee thought, that Alexander would diſdaine the gift of God-head from his Vaſſalls; That the opinion of Sanctity, though it did ſometime follow the death of thoſe, who in their life-time had done the greateſt things, yet it neuer accompanied any one as yet liuing in the world. Hee further told him, That neither Hercules nor Bacchus were Deified at a banquet, and vpon drinke, (for this matter was propounded by Cleo at a carouſing feaſt) but that, for the more than manly acts by them performed while they liued, they were in future and ſucceeding Ages numbred among the gods. Alexander ſtood behinde a partition and heard all that was ſpoken, waiting but an opportunitie, to be reuenged on Caliſthenes, who being a man of free ſpeech, honeſt, learned, and a louer of the Kings honour, was yet ſoone after tormented to death; not for that hee had betraied the King to others: but becauſe he neuer would condeſcend to betray the King to himſelfe, as all his deteſtable flatterers did. For in a conſpiracie againſt the King made by one Hermolaus and others (which they confeſt) he cauſed Caliſthenes without confeſſion, accuſation, or triall, to be torne aſunder vpon the racke: This deed, vnworthy of a King, Seneca thus cenſureth. Hoc eſt Alexandri crimen æternum, quod nulla virtus, nulla bellorum felicitas redimet. Nam quotiens quis dixerit, Occidit Perſarum multa millia: opponitur, & Caliſthenem: Quotiens dictum erit, Occidit Darium: opponitur, & Caliſthenem. Quotiens dictum erit, Omnia Oceani tenus vicit, ipſum quoque tentauit nouis claſſibus, & Imperium ex angulo Thraciæ vſque ad Orientis terminos protulit: dicetur, ſed Caliſthenem occidit. Omnia licet antiqua Ducum Regumque exempla tranſierit, ex his quæ fecit nihil tam magnum erit quàm ſceleſtus Caliſthenes; This is the eternall crime of Alexander, which no vertue nor felicitie of his in Warre ſhall euer be able to redeeme. For as often as any man ſhall ſay, Hee ſlew many thouſand Perſians; it ſhall bee replied, Hee did ſo, and hee ſlew Caliſthenes: When it ſhall bee ſaid, Hee ſlew Darius, it ſhall bee replied, and Caliſthenes; When it ſhall be ſaid, Hee wanne all as farre as the very Ocean; thereon alſo hee aduentured with vnuſuall Ships; and extended his Empire from a corner of Thrace, to the vtmoſt bounds of the Orient, it ſhall be ſaid withall; But hee killed Caliſthenes. Let him haue out-gone all the ancient examples examples of Captaines and Kings, none of all his acts make so much to his glory, as Callisthenes to his reproach.

§. XX.

Of Alexanders iourney into India. The battaile betweene him and Porus.

WIth the Armie before remembred, of one hundred and twenty thousand foote and horse, Alexander did enter the borders of India, where such of the Princes, as submitted themselues vnto him, he entertained louingly, the rest hee constrained; killing Man, Woman, and Childe, where they resisted. He then came before Nisa built by Bacchus, which after a few daies was rendred vnto him. From thence he remoued to a Hill at hand, which on the top had goodly Gardens filled with delicate fruits and Vines, dedicated to Bacchus, to whom hee made feasts for ten daies together. Now when hee had drunke his fill, hee went on towards Dedala, and from thence to Acadera, Countries spoiled and abandoned by the Inhabitants, by reason whereof, victualls failing, hee diuides his Armie: Ptolomie led one part, Cenon another, and himselfe the rest. They take many Townes, whereof that of greatest fame was Mazage, which had in it 3. hundred thousand men; but after some resistance, it was yeelded vnto him by Cleophe the Queene, to whom againe he restored it; at the siege of this Citie he receiued a wound in the legge. After this, Nora was taken by Polysperchon, and a Rocke of great strength by himselfe: he wanne also a passage vpon one Eryx, who was slaine by his companie, and his head presented to Alexander. This is the summe of Alexanders doings in those parts, before such time as he arriued at the Riuer of Indus. Comming to Indus, he found there Ephestion, who (being sent before) had prepared boates for the transportation of his Army, and ere Alexanders arriuall, had perswaded Omphis King of that part of the Country, to submit himselfe to this great Conquerour. Therefore, soone vpon Alexanders comming, Omphis presented himselfe with all the strength of his Country, and fiue and fiftie Elephants, vnto him; offering him his seruice and assistance. He made Alexander know, that hee was an Enemie to the next two great Kings of that part of India, named Abiasares and Porus; wherewith Alexander was not a little pleased, hoping by this dis-vnion to make his owne victorie by farre the more easie. Hee presented Alexander with a Crowne of gold, so did hee the rest of his Commanders, and withall fourescore talents of siluer coyne; which Alexander not onely refused, but to shew that he was couetous of glory, not of gold, hee gaue Omphis a thousand talents of his owne treasure, besides other Persian rarities. Abiasares, hauing heard that Alexander had receiued his enemie Omphis into his protection, resolued to make his owne peace also: For, knowing that his owne strength did but equall that of Omphis, and that there was no other difference betweene them, than that which the chance of Warre gaue, hee thought it an ill match when Alexander, who had alreadie beaten vnder foote all the greatest Princes of Asia, should make himselfe a Party and Head of the quarrell. So had Alexander none now to stand in his way but Porus, to whom he sent a commandement, that hee should attend him at the border of his Kingdome, there to doe him homage. But from Porus he receiued this manly answere; That he would satisfie him in his first demand, which was to attend him on his borders, and that well accompanied; but for any other acknowledgement hee was resolued to take counsell of his Sword. To be short, Alexander resolues to passe ouer the Riuer Hydaspes, and to finde Porus at his owne home. Porus attends him on the farther banke with thirtie thousand foot, fourescore and ten Elephants, and three hundred armed Chariots, and a great troope of Horse. If Darius had done the like on Tigris, Alexander had surely stayed somewhat longer ere he had seene India. The Riuer was foure furlongs broad, which makes halfe a mile, and withall deep and swift. It had in it many Ilands, among which there was one well shadowed with wood, and of good capacitie. Alexander sent Ptolomie vp the Riuer with a great part of the Army, shrowding the rest from the view of Porus: who by this deuice being drawne from his first incamping, sets himselfe downe opposite to Ptolomie, supposing that the whole Armie of Macedon meant to force their passage there. In the meane while Alexander recouers the farther shore without resistance. Hee orders his troopes and aduanceth towards Porus, who at first rather beleeues, that Abiasares his Confederate (but now the Confederate of fortune) had bin come ouer Hydaspes to his aide, than that Alexander had past it.

But

But he findes it otherwise, and sends his Brother Hago with fourethousand horse, and a hundred armed waggons to entertaine him. Each waggon had in it foure to fight, and two to guide it; but they were at this time of little vse: for there had fallen so much raine, and thereby the fields were so moistned, as the horses could hardly trot. The Stythians and Dahans had the Vantguard, who so galled these Indians, as they brake their reines, & other furniture, ouerturning the waggons, and those in them. Perdiccas also gaue vp the Indian horse-men, and the one and the other were forst to recoile. Porus moues forward with grosse of his Armie, that those of his Vantguard scattered might recouer his Reare: Alexander being followed with Ephestion, Ptolomie, and Perdiccas, tooke on him to charge the Indian horsemen on the left wing; commanding Cenus or Cenon to inuade the right; Antigonus and Leonatus, he directed to breake vpon Porus his battaile of foot, strengthened with Elephants, Porus himselfe being carried vpon one of them, of the greatest stature. By these beasts the Macedonian foot were most offended; but the Archers and Darters being well guarded with the long & strong Pikes of the Macedonians, so galled them, as being inraged, they turned head, and ranne ouer the foot that followed them: In the end, and after a long and doubtfull fight, by the aduantage of weapon, and by the courage and skilfulnesse of the Macedonian Captaines, the victory fell to Alexander, who also farre exceeded Porus in number: for besides the Macedonians and other Easterne and Northerne Nations, Porus was assailed by his owne Confederate and Countrie people. Yet for his owne person hee neuer gaue ground otherwise than with his sword towards his enemies, till beeing weakened with many wounds, and abandoned by his Armie, he became a prisoner to the Conqueror, from whom againe hee receiued his estate with a great enlargement.

§. XXI.

I Forbeare to trouble my selfe and others with a friuolous discourse of Serpents, Apes and Peacocks, which the Macedonians found in these their trauailes: or of those pettie Warres which Alexander made betweene the ouerthrow of Porus, and his sailing downe the Riuer of Indus. The descriptions of places about the head and branches thereof are better knowne vnto vs in this Age, by meanes of our late Nauigations into those parts, than they were in any former times. The magnificence and riches of those Kings we could in no sort be perswaded to beleeue, till our owne experience had taught vs, that there were many stranger things in the World, than are to be seene betweene London and Staines.

Our great traueller Mandeuile, who died in the yeere 1372. and had seene so much of the World, and of the East India, we accompted the greatest fabler of the World, yet had hee another reputation among other Nations, as well able to iudge as we. Witnesse the Monument made of him in the Couent of the Friers Guillimins in Liege, where the religious of that place keep some things of his, Comme pour honorable memoire de son Excellence, For an honourable memorie of his Excellencie, saith Guicchardine. Guic. in Disc. of the Low Countries.

The Countries towards the Springs of Indus, and where those many Riuers of Hydaspes, Zaradrus, Acesines, and the rest, fall into the maine riuer, are now possest by the great Mogor, the ninth from Tomberlane, who commands all that tract betweene Persia and Indus towards the West, as also a great extent of Countrie towards Ganges. In the mouth of Indus, the Ascension, a shippe of London, suffered shipwracke, in the yeere 1609. and some of the company trauelled ouer Land till they came to Agra, the same great Citie (as I take it) which our later Cosmographers call Nagra, being named of old Dionysiopolis.

Philostratus in the life of Apollonius Tyaneus, speaking of the expedition of Bacchus and Hercules into the East India, tells vs, that those two great Captaines (whom Alexander sought by all meanes to out-fame) when they indeauored to subiect to them the Oxydracæ, a people inhabiting betweene the Riuers of Hyphasis and Ganges, they were beaten from the assault of their Cities with thunder and lightnings. This may well be vnderstood by the great Ordinance that those people had then in vse. For it is now certainely knowne, that the great Kings of the vtter most East, haue had the vse of the Canon many hundreds of yeeres since, and euen since their first ciuilitie and greatnesse; which was long before Alexanders time. But Alexander pierst not so farre into the East. It sufficed, that hauing the aduice ouer-wearied his Armie, hee discouered the rest of India by fame. The Indian Kings whom he had subdued, informed him, that a Prince called Aggramenes, who commanded many Nations beyond the Riuer Ganges, was the powerfullest King of all those Regions: and that he was able to bring into the field two hundred thousand Foot, three thousand Elephants, twenty thousand Horse, and two thousand armed Chariots. With this report, though Alexander were more inflamed than euer to proceed in this discouery and conquest, yet all the art hee had, could not perswade the Souldiers to wander ouer those great Deserts beyond Indus and Ganges, more terrible vnto them than the greatest Armie that the East could gather. Yet at the last contented they were, after many persuasiue Orations, to follow him towards the South, to discouer such part of the Ocean Sea, as was neerer at hand, whereunto the Riuer of Indus was their infallible guide. Alexander seeing that it would be no otherwise, deuised a prettie tricke, wherewith hee hoped to beguile posteritie, and make himselfe seeme greater than he was. Hee enlarged his Campe, made greater trenches, greater cabbines for Souldiers, greater Horse-stalles, and higher mangers than Horses could feede in. Hee caused all furniture of Men and Horses to bee made larger than would serue for vse; and scattered these Armours and Bridles about his Campe, to be kept as reliques, and wondred at by the Sauages. Proportionable to these he raised vp twelue great Altars to be the monument of his iournies end. This was a readie way to encrease the fame of his bignesse; to his greatnesse it could adde nothing saue a suspition, that it was lesse than is thought, seeing he strouе so earnestlie to make it thought more than it was.

Alexanders

This done, he returned againe to the banke of Acesines, and there determined to set vp his fleet where Acesines and Hydaspis incounter, where to testifie by a surer monument, how far he had past towards the East, he built by those riuers two Cities: the one he called Nicæa, & the other Bucephalon, after the name of his beloued Horse Bucephalus. Here againe he receiued a fourth supply of sixe thousand Thracian Horse-men, seuen thousand Foot, and from his Lieutenant at Babylon fiue and twenty thousand Armours, garnished with siluer and gold, which he distributed among his Souldiers. About these Riuers he wanne many Townes, and committed great slaughter on those that resisted; It is then written of him, that assaulting a Citie of the Oxidracans, he lept from the top of the wall into it, and fought, I know not how long, against all the Inhabitants; tales like those of Beuis of Southampton, friuolous and incredible. Finally, hee past downe the Riuer with his fleete, at which time also the newes came vnto him of a rebellion in Bactria, and then of the arriuall of an hundred Embassadours from a King of India, who submitted himselfe vnto him. Hee feasted these Embassadours vpon a hundred beds of gold, with all the sumptuosity that could bee deuised, who soone after their dispatch, returned againe with a present of three hundred Horse, one hundred and thirty Waggons, and to each of them foure Horses, a thousand Targets, with many other things rare and rich.

Their entertainments ended, hee sailed towards the South, passed through many obscure Nations, which did all yeeld vnto him either quietly, or compelled by force: among these he builded another Alexandria. Of many places which he tooke in this passage, Sarnus was one, the Inhabitants whereof fought against him with poysoned Swords, with one of which Ptolomie (afterward King of Egypt) was wounded, and cured by an herb which Alexander dreamt he had seene in the mouth of a Serpent.

When he came neere the out-let of Indus (being ignorant of the tides of the Sea) his Gallies as they were on a sudden shuffled one vpon another by the Floud, so on the Ebbe they were left on the drie ground, and on the sandie bankes of the Riuer, wherewith the Macedonians were much amazed; but after he had a few daies obserued well the course of the Sea, he past out of the riuers mouth some few miles, and after Sacrifices offered to Neptune, returned: and the better to informe himselfe, hee sent Nearchus and Onesicritus, to discouer the coast towards the mouth of Euphrates. Arrianus in the beginning of his sixt Booke hath written this passage downe the Riuer of Indus at length, with the manner of the Vessels in which he transported his Army, the Commanders that were vsed therein, and other the marueilous prouisions made.

Neere the out-lets of this Riuer, he spent some part of the Winter, and in eighteene daies march from thence recouered Gedrosia, in which passage his Armie suffered such miserie miſerie for want of food, that of a hundred and twenty thouſand foot, and twelue thouſand horſe, which he carried into India, not the fourth part returned aliue.

§. XXII.

Of Alexanders Riot, Crueltie, and death.

From Gedroſia, Alexander led his Armie into Carmania, and ſo drawing neere to Perſia, hee gaue himſelfe wholly to feaſting and drinking, imitating the triumphs of Bacchus. And though this Swiniſh vice be hatefull enough in it ſelfe, yet it alwaies inflamed this King to Crueltie. For (ſaith Curtius) the Hang-man followed the feaſt, for Aſpaſtes one of his Prouinciall Gouernors he commanded to bee ſlaine, ſo as neither did the exceſſe of voluptuouſneſſe qualifie his crueltie, nor his crueltie hinder in ought his voluptuouſneſſe.

While he refreſhed his Army in theſe parts, a new ſupply of fiue thouſand foote and a thouſand horſe, was brought him by Cleander, and his fellows, that had been imployed in the killing of Parmenio. Againſt theſe Murderers great complaint was made by the Deputies of the Prouinces, in which they had commanded; and their offences were ſo outragious, as Alexander was perſwaded, that, had they not altogether deſpaired of his returne out of India, they durſt not haue committed them. All men were glad of the occaſion, remembring the vertue of him, whom they had ſlaughtered. The end was, That Cleander, and the other chiefe, with ſixe hundred Souldiers by them imployed, were deliuered ouer to the Hang-man: euery one reioycing that the Ire of the King was at laſt executed on the miniſters of his Ire.

Nearchus and Oneſicritus were now returned from the coaſt, and made report of an Iland rich in gold, and of other ſtrange things; whereupon they were commanded to make ſome farther diſcouerie: which done, that they ſhould enter the mouth of Euphrates, and finde the King at Babylon.

As he drew neere to Babylon, he viſited the Sepulchre of Cyrus in Paſargada, now called Chalquera: where he was preſented with many rich gifts by Orſines, one of the Princes of Perſia, of the race of Cyrus. But becauſe Bagoas, an Eunuch in eſpeciall fauour with the King, was neglected, he not onely practiſed certaine looſe fellowes to witneſs againſt Orſines, that he had robbed Cyrus tombe, for which hee was condemned to die; but hee aſſiſted the Hang-man with his own hands in tormenting him. At which time alſo Alexander cauſed Phradites to be ſlaine, ſuſpecting his greatneſſe. Caperat (ſaith Curtius) eſſe præceps ad repræſentanda ſupplicia, item ad deteriora credenda; Hee began head-longly to ſhed bloud, and to beleeue falſe reports. It is true, that he tooke a way to make all men weary of his gouernement, ſeeing crueltie is more fearefull, than all aduentures that can bee made againſt it.

Arrianus hath a farre different deſcription of Cyrus Tombe.

At this time it is ſaid, that Calanus the Philoſopher burnt himſelfe, when hee had liued threeſcore and thirteene yeeres. Whether herein he followed the cuſtome of his Countrie, being an Indian, Or ſought to preuent the griefe and incommoditie of elder age, it is vncertaine: but in this the Hiſtorians agree, that fore-ſeeing and fore-ſhewing Alexanders death, he promiſed to meet him ſhortly after at Babylon.

From Paſargada hee came to Suſa, where he married Statira, Darius his eldeſt Daughter, giuing her younger ſiſter to his beloued Epheſtion, and foureſcore other Perſian Ladies to his Captaines. There were ſixe thouſand gueſts inuited to the feaſt, to each of which he gaue a cup of gold. Here there came vnto him three thouſand yong ſouldiers, out of his conquered Prouinces, whereat the Macedonians greatly murmured, Harpalus, his Treaſurer in Babylon, hauing lauiſhly conſumed the monies in his keeping, got him going with fiue thouſand Talents, and ſixe thouſand hired Souldiers, but hee was reiected in Greece, and there ſlaine. Alexander greatly reioyced at the fidelity of the Greeks, whom Harpalus with theſe forces and treaſures could not ſtirre: yet hee ſent commandement, that they ſhould againe receiue their baniſhed men, whereunto (fearefull of his indignation) all ſubmitted themſelues (except the Athenians) though they reſolued, that it was a manifeſt preparation towards their bondage. After this there followed a maruellous diſcontentment in his Army, becauſe he had reſolued to ſend into Macedon all thoſe olde Souldiers, which could no longer endure the trauell of Warre, and to keepe the reſt in Aſia. Hee vſed many Orations to ſatisfie them, but it was in vaine during the tempeſt tempest of their fury. But afterward, as Whales are drawne to the Land with a twine-threed, when they haue tumbled a while, so are the vnconsiderate multitude easily conducted when their first passions are evaporate. With such as were licenced to depart, he sent Craterus, to whom he gaue the Lieutenantship of Macedon, Thessaly, and Thrace, which Antipater had held from his first departure out of Europe, who had beaten the rebellious Greekes in his absence, discharged the trust committed vnto him with great fidelitie, and sent him so many strong supplies into Asia from time to time. Certainely if Alexander had not taken counsell of his cups, hee would haue cast some better colour on this alteration, and giuen Antipater a stronger reason for his remooue, than to haue imployed him in the conduction of a new supply to be brought him to Babylon, the Warre being now at an end. For Antipater saw nothing in this remoue, but the Kings disposition to send him after Parmenio, and the rest. With this Antipater, the King, notwithstanding his great courage, had no great appetite to grapple: Princes, though iealous, doe not stand in doubt of euery man ill affected, though valiant: but there is a kinde of Kingly courage, compounded of hardinesse and vnderstanding, which is many times so fearefull vnto them, as they take leaue both of Law and Religion, to free themselues thereof.

After hee had sent for Antipater, hee made a iourney into Media to settle things there; where Ephestion, whom hee fauoured most of all men, dies. The King according to the greatnesse of his loue, laments his losse; hangs his Physicion; and bestowes vpon his Monument twelue thousand talents: After which he returnes to Babylon. Thither Antipater came not, but sent; and not to excuse himselfe, but to free himselfe. For if wee beleeue Curtius (whom Plutarch and others gaine-say) Antipater by his sonnes, Cassander, Philip, and Iolla, who waited on Alexanders cup, gaue him poyson; Thessalus (who was of the conspiracie) hauing inuited him to a drinking feast of purpose. For after hee had taken a carouse in Hercules his cup, a draught of drinke stronger than Hercules himselfe, hee quitted the World within a few daies.

Certainely the Princes of the World haue seldome found good, by making their Ministers ouer-great, and thereby suspicious to themselues. For hee that doth not acknowledge fidelitie to be a debt, but is perswaded, that Kings ought to purchase it from their Vassalls, will neuer please himselfe with the price giuen. The onely restoratiue, indeed, that strengthens it, is the goodnesse and vertue of the Prince, and his liberality makes it more diligent; so as proportion and distance be obserued. It may bee that Antipater hauing commanded two or three Kingdomes ten or twelue yeeres, knew not how to play any other part; no more than Cæsar did, after he had so long a time gouerned the Gaules, where he vtterly forgat the art of obedience. A most cruell and vngratefull traitor Antipater was, if Curtius doe not belie him: For though he feared some ill measure vpon his remoue (the Tragedies of Parmenio, Clytus, and Callisthenes, hauing beene so lately acted) yet hee knew nothing to the contrary, but that the King had resolued to haue giuen him some other great gouernment in Asia: The old Souldiers thence returned, hauing perchance desired to be gouerned by Craterus, whom they had followed in all the former Warre.

§. XXIII.

Of Alexanders person and qualities.

HOwsoeuer it were, Alexanders former cruelties cannot be excused, no more than his vanitie to be esteemed the sonne of Iupiter, with his excessiue delight in drinke and drunkennesse, which others make the cause of his feuer and death. In that he lamented his want of enterprising, and grieued to consider what hee should doe when hee had conquered the World, Augustus Cæsar found iust cause to deride him, as if the well-gouerning of so many Nations and Kingdomes, as he had already conquered, could not haue offered him matter more than aboundant, to busie his braines withall. That hee was both learned and a louer of learning, it cannot bee doubted. Sir Francis Bacon, in his first booke of the Aduancement of Learning, hath prooued it sufficiently. His liberalitie I know not how to praise, because it exceeded proportion. It is said, That when he gaue a whole Citie to one of his Seruants, He, to whom it was giuen, did out of modestie refuse it, as disproportionable to his fortune: to whom Alexander replied, That he did not enquire what became him to accept, but the King to giue: of which Seneca;

Animosa

Animosa vox videtur & regia, cum sit stultissima. Nihil enim per se quenquam decet. Refert, quid, cui, quando, quare, vbi, &c. sine quibus facti ratio non constabit; habeatur personarum & dignitatum proportio, & cum sit vbique virtutis modus, æquè peccat quod excedit, quàm quod deficit; It seemes a braue and royall speech, whereas indeed it is very foolish. For nothing simply considered by it selfe beseemes a man. We must regard what, to whom, when, who, where, and the like; without which considerations no act can be approued. Let honours be proportioned vnto the persons: for whereas vertue is euer limited by measure, the excesse is as faultie as the defect. L. 2. de Benef. 1

For his Person, it is very apparent, That he was as valiant as any man, a disposition taken by it selfe, not much to be admired; For I am resolued that he had ten thousand in his Armie as daring as himselfe. Surely, if aduenturous natures were to be commended simply, we should confound that vertue with the hardinesse of Theeues, Ruffians, and mastiffe Dogges. For certainely it is no way praise-worthy but in daring good things, and in the performance of those lawfull enterprises, in which wee are imployed for the seruice of our Kings and Common-weales.

If we compare this great Conquerour with other troublers of the World, who haue bought their glory with so great destruction, and effusion of bloud, I thinke him farre inferiour to Cæsar, and many other that liued after him, seeing hee neuer vndertooke any warlike Nation, the naked Scythians excepted; nor was euer encountred with any Armie of which he had not a most mastring aduantage, both of weapons & Commanders, euery one of his Fathers old Captaines by far exceeding the best of his Enemies. But it seemes, Fortune and Destinies (if we may vse those termes) had found out and prepared for him, without any care of his owne, both heaps of Men, that willingly offered their neckes to the yoke, and Kingdomes, that inuited and called in their owne Conquerours. For conclusion, we will agree with Seneca, who speaking of Philip the Father; and Alexander the Sonne, giues this iudgement of them: Quod non minores fuere pestes mortalium quàm inundatio, qua planum omne perfusum est, quàm conflagratio qua magna pars animantium exaruit; They were no lesse plagues to mankinde, than an ouerflow of Waters, drowning all the leuell; or some burning drought, whereby a great part of liuing creatures are scorched vp. Natur. quæst. l. 3. 4.

CHAP. III.

The reigne of Aridæus.

§. I.

Of the question about succession to Alexander.

THE death of Alexander left his Armie (as Demades the Athenian then compared it) in such case, as was that monstrous Giant Polyphemus, hauing lost his onely eye. For, that which is reported in fables of that great Cyclops, might well be verified of the Macedonians: their force was intollerable, but for want of good guidance vneffectuall, and harmefull chiefly to themselues. The causes whereof (vnder the diuine ordinance) were, partly the vncertainty of Title to succession in the Kingdome of Macedon, partly the stubborne pride of Alexander himselfe, who thinking none worthy to bee his Heire, did refuse to establish the right in any one, leauing euery one to his owne fortune: but especially the great ambition of his followers, who all had learned of their Master to suffer no equalls; a lesson soone taught vnto spirits reflecting vpon their owne worth, when the reuerence of a greater obiect faileth.

It hath formerly beene shewed, That Philip (the Father of Alexander) gouerning in Macedon as Protector, assumed vnto himselfe the Kingdome, not rendring it vnto Amyntas, (the Sonne of his elder brother Perdiccas) when hee grew to mans estate; but onely bestowing vpon him in marriage a Daughter of his owne: by which bond, and much more by his owne proper strength, hee assured the Crowne vnto himselfe: Amyntas neuer attempting ought against Philip, (though with price of his life) he did against againſt Alexander in the beginning of his reigne. Wherefore Eurydice the ſole iſſue of this marriage, ought in reaſon to haue beene acknowledged Queene after Alexander; as hauing better Title thereto, than either He or Philip had, when they liued, vnleſſe (peraduenture) ſome Law of that Nation forbade the reigne of Women. But the excellent vertue of theſe two Princes had vtterly defaced the right of all Pretenders, not claiming from their owne bodies: and ſo great were their conqueſts, that Macedon it ſelfe was (in regard of them) a very ſmall Appendix, and no way deſeruing to bee laid in ballance againſt the demand of their poſteritie, had they left any able to make challenge of the Royall ſeate.

Alexander hauing taken many wiues, had iſſue by none of the principall of them. Barſine the Daughter of Artabazus a Perſian had borne vnto him a yong Sonne: and Roxane the Daughter of Oxyartes (whom hee had more ſolemnly married) was left by him great with childe. But the baſeneſſe of the Mothers, and contempt of the conquered Nations, was generally alleaged in Barre of Plea made for them, by ſome that would (perhaps) haue wrought out their owne ends, vnder the name of Alexanders children.

Cleopatra a ſiſter of Alexander, widdow to the King of Epirus, & Aridæus his baſe brother (ſonne to Philip by a Concubine of no account) who had married the Lady Eurydice before mentioned, were next in courſe. Of Cleopatra there was no ſpeech, which may giue ſuſpicion, that either Law or Cuſtome had made that ſexe vncapable of the Soueraignty: Aridæus (beſides his baſtardie) was neither for perſon nor qualitie fit to rule as King; yet vpon him the election fell, but ſlowly, and (as happeneth often) for lacke of a better: when the Counſailors hauing ouer-laboured their diſagreeing wits in deuiſing what was beſt, were content for very wearineſſe to take what came next to hand.

Ptolomie (ſoone after King of Ægypt) concurring with them who reiected all mention of the halfe-Perſian brood, King Alexanders children, was of opinion, that the rule of all ſhould be giuen to the Captaines, that going for law which by the greater part of them ſhould bee decreed: ſo farre was hee from acknowledging any one as true Heire to the Crowne.

This Ptolomie was called the ſonne of Lagus, but reputed of Philip: who hauing vſed the company of Arſinoë Ptolomeis mother, deliuered her in marriage to Lagus being great with childe. Therefore, whether it were ſo, that hee hoped well to worke his owne fortune out of thoſe diſſenſions, which are incident vnto the conſultations of many ambitious men, equall in place, forcing them at length to redeeme their quiet with ſubiection to one, deſeruing regard by his bloud, and truſt for his euen carriage; or whether he deſired onely to get a ſhare to himſelfe, which could not haue come to paſſe, had all beene giuen to one: plaine enough it is, that he thought not on preferring Aridæus before himſelfe; and therefore gaue ſuch counſaile as fitted his owne and other mens purpoſes. Yea, this deuice of his tooke place indeed, though not in forme as hee had propounded it: For, it was in effect all one, to haue aſſembled at Alexanders empty chaire, as Ptolomie had conceiued the forme of their conſultations, or to ſet in the chaire ſuch a King as Aridæus, no wiſer then the chaire it ſelfe. Alſo the controuerſies ariſing were determined by the greater part of the Captaines; by the greater part, if not in number, yet in puiſſance.

But as theſe counterfait ſhewes of diſſembling aſpirers, doe often take checke by the plaine dealing of them, who dare to go more directly to work: ſo was it like to haue fared with Ptolomie & the reſt, when Ariſtonus, another of the Captaines, interpreted the very words of Alexander; ſaying, That he left his Kingdom to the worthieſt, as deſigning Perdiccas, to whom (lying at the point of death) he deliuered his ring. It ſeemed good in reaſon, that Alexander ſhould bee diſpoſer of his owne purchaſes: and thoſe tokens of Alexanders purpoſe appeared plain enough, ſo long as no man would interpoſe anothers conſtruction: euery one being vncertaine how the ſecret affections of the reſt might be inclined. Many therefore, either out of their loue, or becauſe they would not bee of the lateſt, vrged Perdiccas to take vpon him the eſtate Royall. Hee was no ſtranger to the Royall bloud; yet his birth gaue him not ſuch reputation, as the great fauour of his dead King, with whom he had bin very inward, & that eſpecially ſince the death of Epheſtion (a powerful Minion) into whoſe place he was choſen. For his own worth he might wel be commended, as a good man of Warre, and one that had giuen much proofe of his priuate valour. But very ſurly he was: which quality (ioyned with good fortune) carried a ſhew of

Maieſtie:

Maiestie: being checkt with misaduenture, it was called by a true name, Rebellion; and rewarded with death.

In the present businesse a foolish ouer-weening did him as great harme, as it had been great happinesse to haue succeeded Alexander. For not content to haue the acclamation of the Souldiers, approuing the sentence of Aristobulus, he would needs counterfait modestie, thinking that euery one of the Princes would haue intreated him to take the waighty burden of an Empire, which would be the lesse enuious, the more solemnity he vsed in the acceptance. It is truely said, He that faineth himselfe a sheepe, may chance to be eaten by a Wolfe. Meleager, (a man by nature enuious, and bearing a particular hatred to Perdiccas) tooke aduantage of his irresolute behauiour, and very bitterly enueighed against him. In conclusion, he pronounced, That whosoeuer was Heire to the Crowne, the Souldiers ought to be Heires to the treasure; and therefore he inuited them, who were nothing slow, to share it. This disturbed all the Consultation. The Captaines were left alone, farre enough from agreeing, and not able to haue brought any conclusion to good effect without consent of the Souldiers, who greedie of spoile thronged about Meleager.

§. II.

The Election of Aridæus, with the troubles there-about arising; the first diuision of the Empire.

DVring this vp-rore, mention was made of Aridæus by some one, and entertained with good liking of many, vntill at last it grew to the voice of the Armie. Meleager hauing withdrawen himselfe tumultuously from the company of the Lords, was glad of so faire an occasion to make himselfe great: therefore he produced Aridæus, commended him to the Souldiers, who called him by his Fathers name Philip, and brought him into the Palace, inuesting him in Alexanders Robes, and proclaiming him King. Many of the Nobles withstood this election, but in vaine: for they could not resolue what course to follow, reiecting this. Only Python, a hot-headed man, tooke vpon him to proclaime the Sonne of Alexander by Roxane, according to the counsaile which Perdiccas at first had giuen, appointing Perdiccas and Leonatus his Protectors. But this child was not yet borne, which made that attempt of Python vaine. Finally, Perdiccas with fixe hundred men, and Ptolomie with the Kings Pages tooke vpon them to defend the place where Alexanders body lay: but the Army conducted by Meleager, who carried the new king about whither he listed, easily brake in vpon them, and inforced them to accept Aridæus for their Soueraigne Lord. Then by the intercession of the ancient Captaines, a reconciliation was propounded and admitted, but on neither side faithfully meant.

Leonatus, who was of Royall bloud, a goodly Gentleman and valiant, issued out of Babylon, being followed by all the horse, which consisted (for the most part) of the Nobility. Perdiccas abode in the City (but standing vpon his guard) that he might be readie to take the opportunity of any commotion, that should happen among the infantry. The king (who was gouerned by Meleagar) commanded or gaue leaue to haue Perdiccas made away; which attempt succeeded ill, being neither secretly carried, nor committed to sure executioners. Their comming was not vnexpected: and they were by Perdiccas rebuked with such grauitie, that they departed honester then they came; being sorry for their bad enterprise. Vpon the rowes of this attempt the campe was in an vp-rore, which the King seeking to pacifie, wanted authority, as hauing newly got the Crowne by them, and holding it by their courtesie. The matter it selfe affoorded no good excuses, and his indiscretion made them worse. He said, that no harme was done, for Perdiccas was aliue: but their exclamations were against the tyrannous enterprise, which he imputed to Meleager, abandoning the surest of his friends to the rage of the multitude, who were not appeased, vntill the King by offering to resigne his estate vnto them, renued out of their pittie that fauourable affection, which had mooued them to set him vp at the first.

Perdiccas hauing now ioyned himselfe with Leonatus, kept the fields, intending to cut off all prouision of victuals from the City. But after sundry Embassies passing betweene the King, and the Nobles, (they requiring to haue the Authors of sedition giuen vp into their handes; the King, that Meleager might be ioyned with Leonatus and Perdiccas, as a Third in gouernment of the Army) things were compounded according to the Kings desire. Meleager should haue done well to consider, that such men as had one day demanded his head, were not like the day following to giue him a principall place among them without any new occasion offered, had not some purpose of treacherie lurked vnder their great facilitie. Generall peace was renewed, and much loue protested where little was intended. The face of the Court was the same which it had beene in Alexanders time: but no longer now did the same heart giue it life; and windy spirits they were which mooued in the arteries. False reports were giuen out by appointment of Perdiccas, tending to his owne disgrace, but in such termes as might seeme to haue proceeded from Meleager: who finding part of the drift, but not all, tooke it as an injury done to himselfe; and (as desirous of a true friendship) desired of Perdiccas, that such authors of discord might be punished. Perdiccas (as a louer of peace) did well approue the motion; and therefore agreed that a generall Muster should be made, at which time the disturbers of the common quiet should receiue their punishment (as was the manner for Souldiers offending) in presence of the Army. The plot was mischieuously laied: Had Meleager giuen way to seditious rumours, he must needs haue incurred the generall hatred of al, as a sower of dissension, & ther by with a publike approbation might haue been cut off, as hauing often offended in that kinde: his Prince being too weake a Patron. Now seeking redresse of these disorders, he hastened his owne ruine, by a lesse formall, but more speedie way. This kinde of Muster was very solemne, and practised with many ceremonies, as for cleansing of the Army. The Horse-men, the Elephants, the Macedonian foot, the Mercenaries, were each according to their qualitie set in aray, apart from others, as if they had beene of sundrie sorts, met at aduenture: which done, the manner was to skirmish (as by way of exercise) according to direction of their seuerall Captaines. But at that time the great battaile of Macedonian Pikes, which they called the Phalanx, led by Meleager, was of purpose bestowed in a ground of disaduantage; and the countenance of the horse and Elephants beginning to giue charge vpon them, was such, as discouered no jesting pastime nor good intent. Kings were alwaies wont to fight among the horsemen: of which custome Perdiccas made great vse that day, to the vtter confusion of his enemies. For Aridæus was alwaies gouerned by him, which for the present had him in possession. Two or three dayes before he sought the death of Perdiccas at the instigation of Meleager: now he rides with Perdiccas vp and downe about the foot-men, commanding them to deliuer vnto the death all such as Perdiccas required. Three hundred they were who were cast vnto the Elephants, and by them slaine, in the presence of the King, who should haue defended them, and of their affrighted companions. But these three hundred were not the men whose punishment Meleager had expected: they were such as stad followed him, when he disturbed the first consultation that was held about the election of a new King, and some of them his especiall friends. Hauing therefore kept himselfe quiet a while, as vnwilling to giue offence to them which had the aduantage; when he saw their proceedings tend very manifestly to his destruction, he fled away into a Temple, which he found no Sanctuary: for thither they sent and slew him.

The Army being thus corrected was led into the City, where a new Councell of the Princes was held, who finding what maner of man their King was, diuided all the Prouinces of the Empire among themselues; leauing to Aridæus the office of a Visitor, and yet making Perdiccas his Protector, and Commander of the forces remaining with him. Then were the funerals of Alexander thought vpon; whose body hauing been seuen daies neglected, was opened, and embalmed by the Ægyptians: no signe of poison appearing, how great soeuer the suspition might be. The charge of his buriall was committed to Aridæus: one of the Captaines, who was two yeeres preparing of a great and costly shew, making a stately Chariot in which the corps was laid; many coarses of his friendes being layed in the ground before that of Alexander was bestowed in Alexandria, a City of his owne building, in Ægypt.

§. III.

§. III.

The beginning of the Lamian Warre.

WHilest these things were in doing, or presently after, Antipater and Craterus, two principall Noble-men, and inferiour to none of Alexanders followers, if not greater than any of the rest, were busied in Greece with a Warre, which the Athenians more bravely than wisely had begun in Alexanders life, but now did prosecute more boldly than before, vpon the courage which they had taken by his death. Alexander, not long before he died, had commanded that all the banished Greekes (few excepted) should be restored vnto their former places. He knew the factious quality of the Grecian Estates, and therefore thought so to prouide, that in euery City he would haue a sure party. But it fell out otherwise: For he lost the hearts of many more than he wan e by this proud injunction. His pleasure indeede was fulfilled; yet not without great murmuring of the whole Nation, as being against all order of Law, and a beginning of open tyranny. The Athenians greatly decayed in estate, but retainig more than was needfull of their ancient spirits, forbade the execution of this decree in their Dominions; so did also the Ætolians, who were valiant men, and inhabited a Region well fortified by nature: yet neither of them tooke Armes, but seemed to beare themselues, as men that had done no more than they might well iustifie by reason: neuertheless to preuent the worst, the Athenians gaue secret instructions to Leosthenes a Captaine of theirs, willing him to leaue an Army, but in his owne name, and to keepe it in a readinesse for their vse. This was no hard thing for Leosthenes to doe: great numbers of Greeke Souldiers being lately returned from the Asian Warre in poore estate, as defrauded of their pay by the Captaines. Of these he had gathered vp eight thousand, when the certaine newes were brought of Alexanders death: at which the Citie of Athens declared it selfe, and more honourably than wisely, proclaimed open War against the Macedonians for the libertie of Greece. Hereupon Leosthenes drew in the Ætolians, and some other Estates, gaue battaile to the Bœotians, who sided with Antipater, and ouerthrew them; growing so fast in reputation, and so strong in Adherents; That Antipater (arming in all haste, yet suspecting his owne strength) was faine to send into Asia to Craterus for succour.

Nothing is more vaine than the feares and hopes of men, shunning or pursuing their destinies afarre off, which deceiue all mortall wisedome, euen when they seeme neere at hand. One month was scarcely past, since nothing so heauily burthened the thoughs of Antipater as the return of Craterus into Macedon; which he then feared as death, but now desired as the most likly assurance of his life. Craterus, whom Alexander held as of al men the most assured vnto him, was sent into Macedon to conueigh home the old Souldiers (that was the pretence,) and to succeed Antipater in the gouernment of Macedon and Greece. The suspitions were strong that he had a priuy charge to put Antipater to death: neither did that which was commonly published sound much better; which was; That Antipater should be sent vnto the King, as Captaine of the yong Souldiers, newly to be leauied in Europe. For Alexander was much incensed against him by his Mother Olympias: and would sometimes giue out speeches testifying his owne iealousie and hatred of him; but yet he strooe to smother it, which in a cruell Prince betokeneth little good. Few of Alexanders Lieutenants had escaped with life: most of them indeed were meane persons in regard of those who followed him in his Indian expedition, and were therefore (perhaps) remoued to make place for their betters. But if the Kings rigour was such, as could finde rebellious purposes (for so he interpreted euen lewd gouernement) in base persons; little might Antipater hope for, who hauing sitten Viceroy tenne yeeres in the strongest part of the Empire, was called away to the presence of so fell a Master, and the enuy of a Court, wherein they had beene his inferiors, which would now repine to see him their equall. Therefore whether his feare drew him to preuention, working first the kings death by poison, giuen by his sonne Iolaus, Alexandes cup-bearer; or whether it brake not foorth vntill opportunitie had changed it into the passion of reuenge, which was cruell performed by his sonne Cassander: great cause of much feare he had, which I note in this place, as the ground of effects to be produced in very few yeeres.

At the present Craterus was sent for, and all the Captains of companies lying neere, ſolicited to make haſte. Not without cauſe. For in Macedon there could not at that time be raiſed more than thirteene thouſand foot, and ſixe hundred horſe; which Muſter was of raw Souldiers, all the force of the Country being emptied into Aſia. The Theſſalians indeede who had long ſtood firme for Philip and Alexander, who alſo were the beſt horſe-men of Greece, furniſhed him with very braue troupes, that might haue done great ſeruice, had their faith held out, which they changed for the liberty of Greece. With theſe forces did Antipater in Theſſalie trie the fortune of a battaile with Leoſthenes; rather (as may ſeeme) fearing the increaſe of his enemies power and rebellion of the Greekes, (were they not checkt at the firſt) than preſuming on his ſtrength. For Leoſthenes had of Athenians, Aetolians, and Mercinaries, two and twenty thouſand foot, beſides the aſſiſtance of many petty Signories, and of ſome Illyrians, and Thracians: of horſe he brought into the field about two thouſand and fiue hundred; but ouer-ſtrong he was that way alſo, when once the Theſſalians had reuolted vnto him. So Antipater loſt the day: and his loſſe was ſuch, that he neither was able to keepe the field, nor to make a ſafe retraite into his owne Country: therefore he fled into the Towne of Lamia, which was well fortified, and well prouided of all things neceſſary to beare our a ſiege. Thither did Leoſthenes follow him, preſent him battaile againe, and vpon refuſall cloſe vp the Towne with earth-workes, and a wall. There will we leaue him for a while, trauailing in the laſt honourable enterpriſe that euer was vndertaken by that great Citie of Athens.

How Prediccas employed his Army.

KIng Aridæus liuing vnder the rule of Perdiccas, when all the Princes were gone each to his owne Prouince, kept a naked Court: all his greatneſſe conſiſting in a bare title, ſupported by the ſtrength of his Protector, who cared not for him otherwiſe than to make vſe of him. Perdiccas had no Prouince of his owne peculiar, neither was he like to be welcome to any whom he ſhould viſit in his gouernement. A ſtronger Armie then any of the reſt he had, which he might eaſily hope in that vnſettled condition of things to make better worth to him, than many Prouinces could haue been. The better to accompliſh his deſires, he cloſely ſought the marriage of Cleopatra, the ſiſter of Alexander; yet about the ſame time he either married Nicæa the Daughter of Antipater, or made ſuch loue to her as blinded their eyes, who did not ſomewhat narrowly ſearch into his doings.

Ariarathes the Cappadocian, the ſecond of that name, and tenth King of that Country, had continued faithfull to the Perſian Empire as long as it ſtood: following the example of his forefathers, euen from Pharnaces the firſt that reigned in Cappadocia, who married Atoſſa ſiſter to the great Cyrus. Some of his Anceſtors had (indeede) beene oppreſſed by the Perſians: but what Fortune tooke from them at one time, Vertue reſtored at another, and their faithfull Princes had much increaſed all. But now in the fatall Period of ſo great an Empire, with much wiſdome, and (Darius being ſlaine) with ſufficient honour, he might haue acknowledged the Macedonian in the Perſians roome. This he did not; neither did Alexander call him to account, being occupied with great cares. But Perdiccas, who had no greater buſineſſe wherein to entertaine his Army, found it expedient both for the honour of the Empire, to take that in-land Kingdome, ſurrounded with Prouinces of the Macedonian conqueſt, and for his owne particular to haue one opportune place of ſure retrait, vnder the gouernment of a ſtedfaſt friend. Therefore he entred Cappadocia, fought with Ariarathes, who drew into the field thirty thouſand foot, and fifteene thouſand horſe (a ſtrong Army, had it not incountred a ſtronger, and better trained) wanne the victorie, and thereby the whole kingdome. But with much crueltie did he vſe the victory: for hauing taken Ariarathes priſoner with many others, he crucified him, and as many of his Kindred as he could light vpon: and ſo deliuered that Prouince to Eumenes, whom of all men liuing he truſted moſt.

Another part of his forces he had committed, to Python rather as to the moſt honorable of ſuch as remained about him, than as to the moſt aſſured. Python was to ſubdue the Greekes, rebelling in the high Countries of Aſia. About twenty thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe they were, (all old Souldiers) who planted in Colonies by Alexander, to bridle the barbarous nations, were ſoon weary of their vnpleaſant habitations, & the rude people people, among whom they liued: and therefore tooke aduantage of the present troubles to seeke vnto themselues a better fortune. Against these Python went, more desirous to make them his owne, than to destroy them: which intent of his Perdiccas discouering, did both giue him in charge to put all those Rebels to the sword, giuing the spoyles of them to his Souldiers; and further enioyned it vnto Pythons Captaines (his owne creatures) that they should see this commandement executed. These directions for vse of the victory might haue proued needlesse; so vncertaine was the victorie it selfe. A Captaine of the Rebels commanding ouer three thousand, corrupted by Python: did in the heate of the fight (which was very doubtfull) retire without necessitie to a hill not farre off. This dismaied the rest, and gaue the day to Python: who being farre enough from Perdiccas, offered composition to the vanquished, granting vnto them their liues and libertie, vnder condition of laying downe their armes; and hereupon he gaue them his faith. Being master of these companies, he might well haue a good opinion of his owne power: all power being then valued by strength in followers, when as none could vaunt himselfe as free Lord of any Territory. He had thirteene thousand foot, and eight thousand eight hundred horse, besides these new Companions, whom needlesse feare without great losse had caused to leaue the field: but in true estimation all the greatnes whereof Python might thinke himselfe assured, was (and soone appeared to be) inherent in Perdiccas. For by his command were ten thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, of those which followed Python, leauied; the Rulers of the Prouinces carefully obeying the letters of Perdiccas, by which they were enioyned to giue assistance to that businesse: and by vertue of the precept giuen vnto them by Perdiccas, did the Macedonians cut in peeces all those poore men who had yeelded themselues; leauing Python as naked as he came forth to returne vnto his great Master.

Now was Perdiccas mighty aboue the mighty, and had faire leisure to pursue his hopes of marriage with Cleopatra, and thereby to make himselfe Lord of all: but this must be secretly carried for feare of opposition. How it succeeded will appeare, when the Lamian warre taketh ending.

§. V.

The processe of the Lamian warre.

WE left Antipater hardly besieged, wanting meanes to free himselfe without succours from his friends in Asia. Those helps not appearing so soone as he expected, hee came to parley with Leosthenes, and would haue yeelded vnto any termes of reason, wherewith men possessed with hope of victorie, doe seldome limit their desires. Leosthenes willed him without further circumstance to submit himselfe to discretion. This was too much for him, that had once commanded ouer them, who now required of him such a dishonourable composition. Wherefore knowing that the extremities, from which as yet he was farre enough, could bring no worse with it, Antipater prepared for the defence; and the other for winning the Towne, which felt great want of victuals.

In this lingring warre, the Ætolians (whether weary of sitting still at a siege, or hauing businesse which they pretended at home) tooke their leaue, and returned into their owne Countrey. Their departure left the trenches so thinly manned, that Antipater found meanes to sally out vpon his enemies to the great losse: for many were slaine, and Leosthenes himselfe among them, ere he could be repulsed into the Towne. Yet hereby the Macedonians were nothing relieued, their victuals wasted, and they were not strong enough to deale with the Greekes in open fight. Craterus was long in comming. Lysimachus, who was neereſt at hand in Thrace, had worke too much of his owne, leading no more than foure thousand foote, and two thousand horse, against Seuthes the Thracian King, who brought into the field aboue foure times that number; and though Lysimachus, not without losse, had gotten one victory, yet the enemy abounding in multitude, felt not the blow so much as might abate his courage. Therefore Leonatus was earnestly sollicited by Antipaters friends, to make all haste to the rescue. He had the gouernment of Phrygia the lesse, and was able to raise an Army of more than twenty thousand foot, and two thousand fiue hundred horse, whether leauied out of his Prouince, or appointed vnto him out of the maine Armie, it is vncertaine. Certaine it is, that he was more willing ling to take in hand the iourney into Greece, than Antipater was to haue hime come. For Cleopatra had written vnto him, desiring his presence at Pella, the chiefe Citie of Macedon, and very kindly offering her selfe to be his wife; which letters he kept not so close as had beene requisite, and therefore brought himselfe into great suspition, that soone ended with his life. Antiphilus, chosen Generall by the Athenians in place of Leosthenes, hearing of his appproch, forsooke the siege of Lamia, and tooke the ready way to these great Conquerers of Asia, with purpose to giue them an euill welcome home, before Antipater and they should ioyne in one. He had (notwithstanding the departure of the Ætolians) the aduantage of Leonatus in horse, by the ods of 2000. Thessalians; in other things he was equall with him; in cause he thought himselfe Superior; in the fortune of that day he proued so: for he wan a great victorie (chiefly by vertue of the Thessalians) which appeared the greater by the end of Leonatus himselfe; who fighting valiantly, was driuen into a marish piece of ground, where he found his death, which he desperatly had sought among the Indians, but it waited for him at home, not far from the place of his natiuitie. He was the first of Alexanders Captaines which died in battaile, but all, or most of the rest, shall follow him the same way. After this day, the Athenians did neuer any thing surable to their ancient glory.

The vanquished Macedonians were too weake to renew the fight, and too proud to flie. They betooke themselues to high grounds, vnfit for seruice on horse backe, and so abode in the sight of the enemy that day; the day following Antipater with his men came into their campe, and tooke the charge of all. The Athenians perceiuing their strength to be at the greatest, and fearing lest that of the enemy should increase, did earnestly seeke to determine the matter quickely by another battaile. But still Antipater kept himselfe on ground of aduantage; which gaue more than reasonable confidence to the Greekes, many of whom departed to their homes, accounting the enemy to be vanquished. This retchlesnesse (incorrigible in an Army of voluntaries) was very inexcusable; seeing that the victories by Land were very much defaced by losses at Sea, where the Athenians labouring to haue made themselues once againe Masters, were put to the worst.

But now the fatall captiuitie of Greece came on, of which she neuer could be deliuered vnto this day. Craterus with a strong Army hauing made great marches from Cilicia, passed ouer into Europe, and comming into Thessalie, ioyned himselfe with Antipater. The forces of Leonatus, Antipater, and Craterus, being ioyned in one, contained fortie thousand waightily armed, three thousand light-armed men, and fiue thousand horse; of which numbers the Greekes wanted a thousand and fiue hundred in horse, in foot eighteene thousand. Carefully therefore did Antiphilus labour to auoide the necessitie of a battaile, vntill such time as the Townes confederate, should returne vnto the campe those bands which had straggled from it. But those companies were so slow in comming, and Antipater so vrgent vpon the Greekes, that compelled they were to put the matter in hazard without further attendance. Like enough it is, that with a little more helpe they had carried away the victorie: for the Thessalians had the vpper hand, and held it, vntill such time as they perceiued their battailes (ouer-laid with multitude) retire vnto the higher ground, which caused them also to fall backe. So the Macedonians became Lords of the field, hauing little else to boast of, considering that with the losse of an hundred and thirty men, they had onely purchased the death of some fiue hundred enemies. Yet hereof was great vse made. For the Greekes, as not subiect vnto the full command of one Generall, and being euery one desirous to preserue his owne estate, and City; concluded to make a treaty of peace with Antipater; who being a subtile artificer, and well vnderstanding their aptnesse to diuision, refused to harken to any generall composition, but willed euery City to deale apart for it selfe. The intent of his deuice was so apparent, that it was reiected; the Greekes choosing rather to abide the comming of their Assistants, whose vnreasonable carelesnesse betraied the cause. Antipater and Craterus besieging & winning some townes in Thessalie, which the Army of the Confederates wanted meanes and courage to relieue, wearied that Nation from attending any longer vpon other mens vnlikely hopes, with their owne assured and present calamity.

§. VI.

Of the peace granted to Athens by Antipater. Of Demosthenes his death.

THe Thessalians falling off, all the rest soone followed seuerally, and sued for peace; the gentle conditions giuen to the most forward, inuiting such as were slacke. Onely the Athenians and Ætolians held out. Little fauour could they hope for, hauing beene Authors of this tumult; and their feare was not great; the seate of the warre being farre from them. But the celeritie of Antipater confounded all their imaginations; who sate still at Athens, deuising vpon courses of prosecuting the Warre to come, which came to their dores, before their consultation could finde issue. He was ready to enter vpon their Frontiers; they had no abilitie to resist, and were as heartlesse as friendlesse. All that remained was to send Embassadors, desiring peace vpon some good termes: necessitie enforcing them to haue accepted euen the very worst. Phocion, with Demades the Orator, and Xenocrates the Philosopher, were chiefe of this Embassage; Phocion as the most Honorable; Demades a strong Perswader; (both of them well respected by Antipater) and Xenocrates, as one admired for wisedome, grauitie of manners, and vertue; but all these ornaments consisting in speculation, and therefore of lesse regard, when their admiration was to cost much in reall effects.

Antipater calling to minde the pride of Leosthenes, required of the Athenians, that they should wholly submit themselues to his pleasure; which being (perforce) granted, he commanded them to defray the charges of the warre past, to pay a fine, and entertaine a Garrison. Further, he abrogated the popular estate, committing the gouernement of the City to those of most wealth, depriuing of the right of suffrage all such as wanted a conuenient proportion of riches.

About nine thousand they were, all men of good substance, to whom the admin stration of the Common-wealth was giuen; a number great enough to retaine the name and forme of a Democratie. But the rascall multitude of beggerly persons, accustomed to get their liuings out of the common troubles, being now debarred from bearing offices and giuing their voices, cried out, that this was a meere Oligarchie, the violent vsurpation of a few incroaching vpon the publike right. These turbulent fellowes (of whom King Philip had been wont to say, That warre to them was peace, and peace warre) Antipater planted in Thrace, and gaue them lands to manure; leauing as few of them as he could to molest the quiet of Athens.

To the same end (yet withall for satisfying his owne suspitions and hatred) he caused Demosthenes and Hyperides famous Orators, with some others to be slaine. Had the death of these two, especially of Demosthenes, beene forborne, the rest of his proceedings in this action might well haue passed for very milde: whereas now all such, as either are delighted with the Orations of Demosthenes, or haue sur-rendred their iudgements to Authors iustly admiring him, as the most eloquent of all that euer did speake and write, condemne him vtterly, calling him a bloudy tyrant. Such grace and reputation doe the learned arts finde in all ciuill Nations, that the euill done to a man, famous in one of them, is able to blemish any action, how good soeuer otherwise it be, or honorably carried.

Demosthenes had taken Sanctuarie in the Temple of Neptune, in the Isle of Calauria; there did Archias (sent with Souldiers by Antipater for the purpose) finde him, and gently perswaded him to leaue the place, but not so preuailing, he threatned violence. Then Demosthenes, entreating a little respit as it had beene to write somewhat, secretly tooke poison, which he had kept for such a necessity, and so died; rather choosing to do the last execution vpon himselfe, than to fall into the hands of such as hated him. Only this act of his (commendable, perhaps, in a Heathen man) argued some valour in him; who was otherwise too much a coward in battaile, howsoeuer valiant in perswading to enterprises, wherein the way to very honourable ends was to be made through passages exceeding dangerous. He loued money well, and had great summes giuen him by the Persian, to encourage him, in finding worke for the Macedonians at home. Neither did hee ill (me thinkes) in taking from the Persians which loued not his Country, great reward, for speaking such things as tended to his Countries good; which hee did not cease ceaſe to procure, when the Perſians were no longer able to giue him recompence. Such as in tender contemplation of his death can endure no honourable, though true, mention of Antipater, may (if they can) beleeue Lucian, who tells vs, That it was Antipaters purpoſe to haue done him great honour. Sure it is, that he was a ſtedfaſt enemy to the Macedonians; therefore diſcretion required that he ſhould be cut off.

The matters of Athens being thus ordered, the chiefe command was left in the hands of Phocion, a vertuous man, and louer of his Country, yet applying himſelfe to the neceſſity of the times; by which commendations he had both at other times done the City much good, and now procured this peace; which (though grieuous to free-men, yet fauourable to the vanquiſhed) he endeuoured carefully to preſerue.

How Craterus and Antipater were drawne from their Ætolian warres into Aſia. The grounds of the firſt Ciuill Warre betweene the Macedonian Lords.

SO Antipater with Craterus returned into Macedonia, where they ſtrengthned their friendſhip with a new alliance; Craterus taking Phila, the Daughter of Antipater, to Wife.

Shortly after they went againſt the Ætolians, whoſe pouerty was not ſo eaſily danted, as the luxurious wealth of the more powerfull State of Athens had beene. Their Country was rough and mountainous, hauing many places of great faſtneſſe, into which they conueied ſuch of their goods as they moſt eſteemed, and of their people, as were leaſt fit for warre: with the reſt they fortified the ſtrongeſt of their Cities, and ſo abode the comming of the Macedonians, whom they manfully reſiſted. With great obſtinacy did the Macedonians contend againſt the difficulties of the places, which the Ætolians made good as long as their victuals held out. But when Craterus had ſhut vp all paſſages, and vtterly debarred them of reliefe, then were they put to a miſerable choice; either to deſcend from their ſtrong holds, and fight vpon equall ground, with vnequall numbers; or to endure the miſeries of hunger and cold, againſt which they could make no long reſiſtance; or to yeeld themſelues to the Macedonians: who incenſed by the loſſe of many good Souldiers, were not like to leaue ſo ſtubborne enemies in places, which might giue confidence to rebellion. In caſes of extremity, much fineneſſe of wit apprehending all circumſtances of danger, commonly doth more hurt than a blunt conſideration of that only, which at the preſent is in hand. Theſe Ætolians did not as yet want meat; but their enemies dayly moleſted them: wherefore as yet they thought vpon nothing but fighting. Fortune was gracious to their courage. For ſuch newes came out of Aſia into the Macedonian campe, as made Antipater and Craterus thinke euery houre a month, till they had rid their hands of theſe Ætolians, giuing them whatſoeuer conditions they would aske: yet with purpoſe to call them to ſeuere account; yea, to roote them out of Greece by death, or by captiuity, when once they ſhould haue ſettled the affaires of Aſia; as they hoped and deſired. But of mens purpoſes God is diſpoſer: in whoſe high counſell it was ordained, that this poore Nation ſhould continue a troubleſome barre to the proceedings of Macedon and Greece, and (when time had ripened the next Monarchie) an open gate to let the Roman Conquerors into thoſe and other Prouinces. Likewiſe concerning the matters of Aſia, the reformation inteuded by Antipater & Craterus, was ſo far from taking effect, that it ſerued meerely as an introduction to all the ciuill warres enſuing.

The grounds of the Aſiatique expedition, which did ſet the world in an vp-rore, were theſe. Antipater and Craterus were of Alexanders Captaines the mightieſt in reputation: The one, in regard of his ancient precedency, and the preſent rule which he bare in the parts of Europe. The other, as of all men the beſt beloued, and moſt reſpected, both of Alexander and of the whole Army. Next vnto theſe had Perdiccas been; whom the aduantage of his preſence at the Kings death did make equall, or ſuperior, to either of theſe, if not to both together. The firſt intents of Perdiccas were, to haue conſorted with theſe two, and to haue been with them a third partner in the gouernment of all; to which purpoſe he entertained the diſcourſe of marriage with one of Antipaters Daughters. But feeling in ſhort ſpace the ſtrength of that gale of winde which bore him vp, he began to take wing and ſoare quite another way. Aridæus was a very ſimple man, yet ſerued well enough to weare the title of that Maieſtie, whereof Perdiccas being Adminiſtrator, and hoping to become proprietarie, the practice was more ſeuere than had beene in the dayes of Alexander: the deſire to ſeeme terrible, being very familiar with weake Princes, and their ambitious Officers, who know no other meanes of preſeruing themſelues from contempt, and of giuing ſuch a fiery luſtre to their actions, as may dazell the eyes of the beholders. How cruelly the poore Greekes in the higher Aſia were all put to the ſword; and how tyrannouſly the King and Princes of Cappadocia were crucified, hath already beene ſhewed. The Piſidians were the next who felt the wrath of theſe counterfait Alexanders. One Citie of theirs was vtterly razed; the children ſold for ſlaues, and all the reſt maſſacred. The Iſaurians by this example growne deſperate, when after two or three dayes triall they found themſelues vnable to continue the defence, lockt themſelues into their houſes, and ſet the Town on fire, into the flame whereof the yongmen did throw themſelues, after that they had a while repelled the Macedonians from the wals.

Theſe exploits being performed, the Armie had no other worke than to ſift the aſhes of the burnt Citie for gold and ſiluer; but Perdiccas had buſineſſe of greater importance troubling his braines. Nothing was more contrary to his ends, than to ſit ſtill without imploiment: letting his Souldiers grow idle about him, whileſt others grew great, and tooke deepe roote in their ſeuerall Prouinces. He purpoſed therefore to tranſport his forces into Europe, vnder pretence of bringing the King into Macedonia, the ſeate of his Anceſtors, and head of the Empire. The Kings preſence would make the offices of his Vice-roies (during the time) actually voide; Antipater with Craterus being once in caſe of priuate men, and onely Perdiccas holding authoritie, the match with Cleopatra might eaſily be made. So ſhould greatneſſe meete with a good title; and what more could be wiſhed? Some impediment the power of Ptolomie might giue, who held Ægypt well fortified with men, but much better with loue of the people; yet if the buſineſſe proſpered in Macedonia, like enough it was that either Ptolomie would follow of himſelfe, or be driuen to come to reaſon. Antigonus likewiſe then gouerning in Phrygia, a buſie-headed man, and ill affected to the ſide, was to be looked into, and made away, for feare of further trouble. So thought Perdiccas, and was deceiued in ſo thinking. Antigonus was as good a man of warre, of as deepe a iudgement, as high a ſpirit, and as great vndertaking, as any of Alexanders Captaines. His imploiments had beene leſſe than ſome of theirs, which made him alſo the leſſe reſpected. But his thoughts were as proud as theirs: for, he valued himſelfe by his owne worth, not by the opinions of other men; with carefull attention had he watched Perdiccas, and ſounded the depth of his purpoſes, which it was now high time to diſcouer. For Perdiccas hauing with a iealous eye pried into the demeanour of Antigonus, and finding him no way fit for his turne, cauſed him to be charged with ſuch accuſations, as might ſuffice to take away his life, eſpecially by a Iudge that ſought his death. This deuice Antigonus would not ſeeme to perceiue, but prepared himſelfe in ſhew to make anſwere, indeede, to make eſcape, which eaſily he did, putting himſelfe and his ſonne Demetrius aboord of ſome Athenian Gallies, that carried him to Antipater, laden with ſuch tidings, as finiſhed the Ætolian warre before mentioned.

As the comming of Antigonus made Craterus and Antipater manifeſtly perceiue their owne danger: ſo his flight gaue Perdiccas to vnderſtand that his intentions were laied open, and muſt now be iuſtified by the ſword. Therefore he prepared as faſt as he could, not onely for defence, but (as hauing on his ſide the Kings name) to meete with them at home, who were nothing ſlacke in prouiding to encounter him. Ptolomie being aduertiſed of theſe proceedings, and conſidering how neerely they concerned him, ſided with Antipater. To his gouernment of Ægypt he had annexed the Dominion of Cyrene, not without conſent of the chiefe Citizens; and now in the middeſt of theſe garboiles he celebrated the funerall of Alexander with great ſolemnitie, purchaſing thereby to himſelfe much good will and many partakers, notwithſtanding the terrible report of the Kings Armie comming againſt him.

§. VIII.

Perdiccas his voyage into Ægypt, and his death.

PErdiccas, vncertaine which way to bend his maine power, at length resolued to set vpon Ptolomie; leauing Eumenes to keepe to his vse, against Craterus and Antipater, the parts of Asia bordering vpon Europe.

It may seeme strange, that he did not rather make head against those who were to come out of Greece with a great number, and of more able men than Ptolomie could bring. Perhaps he thought to make a quicke end with Ptolomie; or beleeued that Craterus would not be ready for him soone enough. Sure it is that he tooke a bad course, and made it worse with ill handling.

Ptolomie by his sweet behauiour allured many to his party, without helpe of any bad arts. Perdiccas contrariwise was full of insolencie, which neuer failed to be rewarded with hatred; that is truely defined, An affection founded vpon opinion of an vniust contempt. The whole storie of his proceedings in Ægypt is not worth relation: for he did nothing of importance; but (as a wilfull man) tired his followers, and wasted them in hard enterprises without successe. His most forceable attempt was vpon a little Towne, called the Camels wall: thither he marched by night, with more haste than good speede; for Ptolomie preuenting him, did put himselfe into the place, where behauing himselfe not onely as a good Commander, but as a stout Souldier, he gaue the foile to Perdiccas, causing him to retire with losse; after a vehement, but vaine, assault continued one whole day. The night following, Perdiccas made another iournie, (which was his last) and came to the diuisions of Nilus, ouer against Memphis. There with much difficulty he began to passe ouer his Armie into an Iland, where he meant to incampe. The current was strong, the water deepe, and hardly foordable. Wherefore he placed his Elephants aboue the passage, to breake the violence of the streame, and his horse-men beneath it; to take vp such as were carried away by swiftnesse of water. A great part of his Armie being arriued on the further banke, the channell began to waxe deepe; so, that whereas the former companies had waded vp to the chin, they who should haue followed could finde no footing. Whether this came by rising of the water, or flitting away of the ground; (the earth being broken with the feete of so many Men, Horse, and Elephants) no remedy there was, but such as had passed must repasse againe, as well as they might: for they were too weake for the enemy, and could not be relieued by their fellowes. With great confusion therefore they committed themselues to the Riuer, wherein aboue two thousand of them perished, a thousand were deuoured by Crocodiles; a miserable spectacle euen to such as were out of danger; such as were strong and could swim, recouered the Campe; many were carried downe the streame, and driuen to the contrary banke, whereby they fell into the hands of their enemies.

This misfortune exasperated the Souldiers against their Generall, giuing liberty to their tongues, which long time had concealed the euill thoughts of their hearts. While they were thus murmuring, newes came from Ptolomie, which did set them in an vp-rore. Ptolomie had not onely shewed much compassion on those who fell into his hands aliue, but performed all rights of funerall to the dead carcases, which the Riuer had cast vpon his side: and finally, sent their bones and ashes to be interred by their Kinsmen or Friends. This did not onely moue the common Souldiers, but made the Captaines fall to mutinie, thinking it vnreasonable to make warre vpon so vertuous and honourable a person, to fulfill the pleasure of a Lordly ambitious man, vsing them like slaues. The sedition growing strong wanted onely a head, which it quickly found. Python was there, who inwardly hated Perdiccas, for the disgrace which he had suffered by his procurement, after the victory vpon the rebellious Greekes. Python had liued in honourable place about Alexander; he was in the diuision of the Prouinces made Gouernour of Media; he had followed Perdiccas, and being in all things (the Protectorship excepted) equall to him, had neuertheless beene scornefully vsed by him, which now he requited. Drawing together a hundred of the Captaines, and a good part of the horse, which consisted of the Gentrie, (the footmen hauing declared themselues before) he entred the Tent of Perdiccas, where without further circumstance they all ranne vpon him, and slew him. Such end had the proud mis-gouerning authoritie of Perdiccas. He might haue liued as great as any, could he haue ſuffered any as great as himſelfe; yea, peraduenture maſter of all, had he not beene too maſterly ouer thoſe which were already his.

The next day Ptolomie came into the Campe, where he was ioyfully receiued; hee excuſed himſelfe of things paſt, as not hauing beene Author, or giuen cauſe of the Warre, and was eaſily beleeued: the fauour of the Armie being ſuch toward him, that needes they would haue made him Protector in the roome of Perdiccas. But this hee refuſed. It was an Office fit for one that would ſeeke to increaſe his greatneſſe with his trouble. Ptolomie was well enough already; wherefore, for his owne quiet he forbare to accept it, and for their well-deſeruing of him he procured that honourable charge to Python, and to Aridæus the Captaine, who hauing had ſome companies of Souldiers, to furniſh with their attendance the ſolemnities of Alexanders Funerals, did with them adhere to him againſt Perdiccas.

In the middeſt of theſe buſineſſes came newes of two great victories obtained by Eumenes; which newes, had they arriued two or three daies ſooner, had beene entertained with ioyfull acclamations; and would haue giuen ſuch reputation to Perdiccas, as had cauſed both his priuate maligners to continue his open flatterers, and his open enemies to haue accepted any tolerable compoſition. But theſe good tidings comming in ill time, when death had ſtopped the eares which would haue giuen them wel-come, found bad acceptance, as ſhall be ſhewed hereafter.

Victories of Eumenes in the lower Aſia.

BEfore we proceed in the relation of things, happening about the perſon of the King, it is meete that wee ſpeake of thoſe buſineſſes in the lower Aſia, which were handled by Eumenes with notable dexteritie, whileſt Perdiccas was occupied in the Ægyptian warres. Alcetas the brother of Perdiccas, and Neoptolemus, had receiued command from Perdiccas to be aſſiſtant to Eumenes, and to follow his directions. But Alcetas made flat anſwere that he would not; alleaging the backwardneſſe of his men to beare Armes againſt ſo great a perſon as Antipater, and a man ſo much honoured as Craterus. Neoptolemus was content to make faire ſhew, but inwardly hee repined at the Precedency giuen to Eumenes, as thinking himſelfe the better man. Eumenes diſcouering, through the counterfaited lookes of Neoptolemus, the miſchiefe lurking in his heart, wiſely diſſembled with him, in hope to winne him by gentle behauiour, and ſweete language, that commonly are loſt, when beſtowed vpon arrogant creatures. Yet the better to fortifie himſelfe, that he might ſtand vpon his owne ſtrength, hee raiſed out of the Counties vnder his iuriſdiction, about ſixe thouſand horſe, giuing many priuiledges to ſuch as were ſeruiceable, and training them well vp. Not without great need. For when vpon aduertiſemnt of the great preparations made by Craterus and Antipater (who had newly paſſed the Helleſpont) for the inuaſion of his Prouinces, he willed Neoptolemus to come to him with all his power; Neoptolemus did (indeed) aduance, but in hoſtile manner, though vnprouoked, preſented him battell. Neoptolemus had ſecretly couenanted with Antipater to lay open the way for him to the conqueſt of Aſia, which now intending to performe, he was ſhamefully diſappointed. For though his foot-men, being all Macedonians, had much the better, and preuailed farre vpon Eumenes his battailes; yet were his horſe driuen out of the field, and himſelfe compelled, with a few of them, to runne away, leauing naked the backes of his Macedonian foot-men, to bee charged by Eumenes who forced them in ſuch wiſe, that caſting downe their Pikes, they cried for mercie, and gladly tooke their oath to doe him faithfull ſeruice. Antipater and Craterus endeuoured with many goodly promiſes to draw Eumenes into their ſocietie, who contrariwiſe offered himſelfe, as a meane of reconciliation, betweene Perdiccas and Craterus, whom he dearely loued; profeſſing withall his hatred to Antipater, and conſtant faith to the cauſe which hee had vndertaken to maintaine.

Whileſt theſe negotiations were on foote, Neoptolemus came with his broken crue to Antipater, and his Aſſociates, vilifying Eumenes, and calling him a Scribe (at which fooliſh railing they laught,) but extolling the vertue of Craterus (as well he might) with high commendations; aſſuring them, that if Craterus did but once appeare, or that his voyce were but heard by any Macedonian in Eumenes his Campe, the victory was wonne; for they would all forth-with reuolt vnto him. Earnestly therefore he desired them to giue him aide against Eumenes, and especially requested that Craterus might haue the leading of the Armie to be sent. Their owne affections did easily leade them to condescend to his motion; and good hope there was, that the reputation of Craterus might preuaile as much, as the force which he drew along. For hee had in the middest of Alexanders vanities, when others (imitating their King) betooke themselues to the Persian fashions of garments and customes, retained the ancient Macedonian forme of behauiour, and apparell; whereby he became very gracious with the common Souldiers, who beheld these new trickes of Asia, with discontented eies, as reprochfull and derogatorie to the manners of their natiue countrie. So Antipater tooke the way toward Cilicia, to hold Perdiccas at bay, and to ioyne with Ptolomy. Craterus vsed great celeritie, to haue taken Eumenes reuelling (as he hoped) according to the common fashion of Captaines, after a great victory. But he had a warie and well-aduised enemy to encounter, who kept good espiall vpon him, and with much wisedome fore-saw all that was to be feared, and the meanes of preuention, which his courage did not faile to execute. Eumenes was not ignorant, that Craterus was able to defeat him without battell, yea without stroke; him therefore hee feared more than the Army following him: (yet the Armie following him was such, as much exceeded his own in footmen, but was inferior in horse-men) & thought it more vneasie to keepe the Macedonians from reuolting to him, than from knowing him. Hereupon he took in hand a strange peece of worke, which desperation of all courses else taught him, & wise managing, prosperously accomplished. He gaue out reports, that Neoptolemus was returned with such company as he could gather together, & had gotten Pigres (a Captaine of no great estimation, who lay not far off) to ioyne with him. Hauing animated his men against Neoptolemus, whom he knew to be despised & hated among thē, (as hauing bin vanquished by some of them, & forsaken others in plain field, whilest they valiantly fought in his quarrell) he took great care to keep them from receiuing any intelligence of the enemies matters. Peremptorily he cōmanded, that no Messenger nor Trumpeter should be admitted; and not heerewith satisfied, he placed against Craterus no one Macedonian, nor any other that much would haue regarded him had he bin knowne: but Thracians, Cappadocians, and Persians, vnder the leading of such, as thought more highly of none, than of Perdiccas & himselfe. To these also he gaue in charge, that without speaking or hearkning to any word, they should run vpon the enemy, & giue him no leisure to say or do any thing, but fight. The directions which he gaue to others, he did not faile to execute in his own person: but placing himselfe in the right wing of his battaile, opposite to Neoptolemus, who (as he vnderstood) conducted the left wing on the contrary side, he held the Macedonians arranged in good order, & ready to charge the enemy as soon as the distance would giue leaue. A rising piece of ground lay between them, which hauing ascended, the Armies discouered each other: but that of Eumenes euery way prepared for the fight, the other wearied with long iournies, which ouer-hastily they had made, seeking the deceitfull issue of friuolous hopes. Then was it high time for Craterus (hauing failed in surprising them as enemies) to discouer himselfe to his old friends & fellow-souldiers, of whom he could see none. Phœnix a Tenidian, and Artabazus a Persian, had the leading of that side, who mindfull of their instructions, began to giue vpon him, with such countenance as told him his error; which to redeem, he bad his men fight & redeem the day, and take the spoyle to thēselues. But the Beare whose skin he sels is not yet caught. The ground whereon the battaile was fought gaue most aduantage to the horse, who encountred very roughly on all parts: especially about Eumenes & Neoptolemus; who as soone as they had discouered one another, could not containe themselues, but with great rage met body to body, and letting loose their bridles, grappled so violently together, that their horses ran from vnder them, leauing both of them tumbling on the ground. Neoptolemus rose first vp, but Eumenes had his sword first drawne, wherewith he houghed the other, causing him to fall downe and fight vpon one knee. In this conflict they receiued many wounds, but Neoptolemus giuing slight ones tooke such as were deadly, by which hee died in the place, and was there (being halfe-dead halfe-aliue) stripped by his mortall enemie, whose reuilings he requited, lying euen at the last gaspe, with one wound in the groine, dangerous had it not wanted force. The death of Neoptolemus caused his followers to runne away vpon the spurre, and seeke shelter behinde the battailes of their foote. They were nothing hotly pursued. For Eumenes pained himselfe to carrie

succour to his left wing, which he suspected much to be distressed; but found accompanied with the same fortune, that had assisted him when he fought in person. Craterus had gallantly borne himselfe a while, and sustained the impression of Artabazus and Phœnix, with more courage than force; holding it nothing agreeable with his honour to retire and protract the fight, when he was charged by men of little estimation or note. Otherwise it is not vnlikely, that he might haue either carried the day, or preserued himselfe to a better aduenture by giuing ground, as the rest (when he and Neoptolemus were slaine) did. But whilest hee sought to preserue his reputation, hee lost his life by the fall of his horse, or his falling from his horse, through force of a wound receiued; vpon which accident hee was trampled vnder foote by many that knew him not, and so perished vnknowne, till it was too late to know it. Eumenes comming to the place where he lay, made great lamentation, as hauing alwaies loued and honoured Craterus, of whose death hee was now become the instrument. The vanquished Armie entertained a Treatie of peace with Eumenes, making shew of willingnesse to become his followers; but their intent was onely to refresh themselues, which (by his permission) hauing done, they stole away by night, and fled toward Antipater.

This battaile fought within ten daies of the former, wanne to Eumenes more reputation than good will: for his owne Souldiers tooke the death of Craterus heauily; and the Armies lying further off were inraged with the newes. But other matters there were which incensed men against him, besides the death of Craterus, whereof it manifestly appeared, that he was as sorry as any that pretended greater heauinesse. His Army wanted pay. This was a great fault; which he wisely amended, by giuing to them the spoyle of such Townes as were ill-affected to him. So he redeemed the loue of his own men, who of their meere motion appointed vnto him a guard for defence of his person. Others were not so easie to be reconciled. They who had beene Traitors to Perdiccas, hated him for his faithfulnesse, as greatly, as they thought he would hate them for their falshood; neither found they any fairer way of excusing their late reuolt, than by accusing and condemning the side which they had forsaken. Wherefore they proclaimed Eumenes a Traitor, and condemned him to die: but it was an easier matter to giue that sentence, than to put it in execution.

Quarrels betweene Eurydice the Queene, and Python the Protector. Python resignes his office, into which Antipater is chosen.

Python and Aridæus being chosen Protectors of King Aridæus and the children of Alexander, tooke the way to Asia the lesse, conducting the Armie through Syria. Of these two, Python was the greater in reputation, yet farre too weake to sustaine so important a charge. For Eurydice, wife to King Aridæus, was come to her husband, a Ladie of a masculine spirit, well vnderstanding what she was or should be, and thinking her selfe able to support the waight which Fortune laied vpon her fooliſh husband, being due to her owne title. Her Mother Cyna, sister to Alexander by her Father King Philip, was married (as hath beene shewed) to Amyntas, who was the right Heire to the Kingdome of Macedon, being the onely sonne of King Perdiccas, Philips elder brother.

This Cyna was a warlike woman, she had led Armies, and (as a true sister of Alexander) fighting hand to hand with Caria Queene of the Phrygians, a Virago like vnto her selfe, had slaine her. Shee brought vp this Eurydice in the same vnwomanly Art of Warre, who now among the Souldiers beganne to put in practice the rudiments of her education, to the small contentment of Python, that could not brooke her too curious intermedling in his charge. Whether it were so, that Python had some purpose to aduance the sonne of Alexander by Roxane, to the Kingdome; (as once he had sought to doe) or whether the Queene did suspect him of some such intent; or whether only desire of rule caused her to quarrell with him; quarrell shee did, which disturbed the proceeding against Eumenes. The Armie hauing shaken off such a ranke-rider as Perdiccas, would not afterward beereined with a twined thred. Python beating himselfe vpon his office, tooke vpon him to giue directions in the Kings name, which the Queene did oftentimes controll, vsing the same name, with more authoritie, and better liking of the Souldiers.

Python, seeing this, would needs resigne his office, whether vpon wearinesse of the contentions daily growing, or on purpose to bring the Queene into enuie, it is vncertaine. Perhaps he thought, that now being the farre worthiest man in the Campe, hee should be intreated to retaine the place, and haue his authoritie confirmed, or (as might be) increased, were it but for want of a fit Successor. Eurydice was nothing sorrie at this course; for now she thought to manage the affaires of the Empire at her owne will, being freed from the troublesome assistance of a Protector. But the Souldiers disappointed both her and Python, of their contrarie expectations: choosing Antipater, the onely powerfull man of Alexanders Captaines, then liuing, into the roome of Python. Hereat the Queene fretted exceedingly, and began to deale earnestly with the Macedonians, that they should acknowledge no Lord saue onely the King their Soueraigne. Yet shee failed of her purpose, being hindred (as may seeme) by three things: the apparent weakenesse of her husband: the growth of Alexanders children, who (though borne of out-landish women) were bred in the Macedonian Campe; and the mightinesse of Antipater, who commanding a great Armie neere at hand, arriued in few daies at the Campe, and enforced Eurydice to hold her selfe content. Antipater was of such power, that he needed not to worke by any close deuices, as Perdiccas had done: he had no concurrents, all the Gouernours of Prouinces that remained aliue, acknowledged him their better: yea, many of them he displaced out of hand putting others in their roomes. This done, hee tooke the King, Queene, and Princes along with him into Macedonia, leauing Antigonus Generall of the Royall Armie: to whom for his good seruices done, and to be done against Eumenes, he gaue the rule of Susiana, besides his former Prouinces, and committed into his hands the gouernment of Asia during that warre.

Antigonus Lieutenant of Asia, winnes a battell of Eumenes, and besiegeth him in Nora: He vanquisheth other followers of Perdiccas.

HEre begins the greatnesse of Antigonus, whose power in few yeeres ouer-growing the rest, wanted little of spreading it selfe ouer the whole Monarchie. Hee was to make warre vpon Eumenes, Alcetus the brother, and Attalus the brother in-law to Perdiccas: worke enough to keepe his Armie imployed in the publike seruice, till such time as he might finde occasion to make vse of it in his owne businesse. The first of these which he vndertooke was Eumenes, with whom Alcetus and Attalus refused to ioyne, hauing vnseasonably contended with him in time of common danger about the chiefe place. Eumenes had an Army strong in number, courage, and all needfull prouisions; but obedient onely at discretion. Therefore Antigonus tried all waies of corrupting his Souldiers; tempting first the whole Armie with letters: which practice failing by the cunning of Eumenes (who made shew as if hee himselfe had scattered abroad those letters, to trie the faith of his men) he dealt apart with such Captaines, as he thought most easie to be wonne. Of these Captaines one rebelled, breaking out too hastily before anie helpe was neere him, yet looking so carelesly to himselfe, that he and his were surprised, when hee thought his enemies farre off. Another follower of Eumenes (or rather of good fortune, which hee thought now to bee in company with Antigonus) kept his treachery secret, reseruing it for the time of execution. Vpon confidence of the treason which this false man Apollonides had vndertaken, Antigonus presented battaile to Eumenes; in the heate whereof Apollonides, Generall of the Horse to Eumenes, fled ouer to the contrarie side, with such as he could get to follow him: but was closely followed by some, whose company he desired not. Eumenes, perceiuing the irrecouerable mischiefe which this traiterous practice had brought vpon him, pursued the villain, and cut him off before he could thrust himselfe into the troops of Antigonus, and boast of his treachery. This was some comfort to Eumenes in the losse of that battel, which disabled him vtterly to keep the field, and left it very hard for him to make a safe retrait. Yet one thing hee did which much amazed his enemies, and (though a matter of small importance) caused Antigonus himselfe to admire his high resolution. It was held no small part of the victorie to get possession of the dead bodies. Eumenes, whilest Antigonus held him in chase, turned out of the way, and fetching a compasse, returned to the place where the battaile had beene fought; there he burned (according to the manner of the time) the bodies of his owne men, men, and interred the bones and aſhes of the Captaines, and common Souldiers, apart, raiſing vp heapes of earth as Mountaines ouer them, and ſo went his way. As this bold aduenture bred in the Macedonians, (returned to their camp) great admiration of his braue ſpirit: ſo the newes which Menander (who was ſet to looke vnto their carriages) brought and publiſhed among them, enticed them to loue him as their honourable friend. Hee had found Menander in an open Plaine, careleſſe, as after an aſſured victory, and loaden with the ſpoyles of many Nations, the rewards of their long ſeruice; all which he might haue taken: but fearing leaſt ſuch a purchaſe ſhould proue a heauie burthen to him, whoſe chiefe hope conſiſted in ſwift expedition, hee gaue ſecret warning to Menander to flie to the mountaines, whileſt he detained his men (whom authority could not haue reſtrained) by this ſleight, ſetting them to bait their horſes. The Macedonians extolled him for this courteſie, as a noble Gentleman, that had forborne when it lay in his power to ſtrip them out of all their wealth, and make their children ſlaues, and to rauiſh their wiues: but Antigonus told them, that he had not forborne to doe this out of any good will to them; but out of meere ſubtiltie had auoyded thoſe precious fetters, which would haue hindred his ſpeedie flight. He told them true. For Eumenes did not onely thinke all cariages to bee ouer-burdenſome, but the number of his men to be more troubleſome than auaileable in his intended courſe. Wherefore he ſent them from him as faſt as he could, wiſhing them to ſhift for themſelues; and retaining onely fiue hundred horſe, and two hundred foote. When hee had wearied Antigonus a while in following him vp and downe, hee came to Nora: where againe, keeping no more about him, than neceſſity required to make good the place, he louingly diſmiſſed all the reſt. Nora was a little Fortreſſe in the borders of Lycaonia and Cappadocia, ſo ſtrongly ſituated that it ſeemed impregnable, and ſo well victualed and ſtored with all neceſſaries, that it might hold out for many yeeres. Thither did Antigonus follow him, with more deſire to make him his friend, than to vanquiſh him in warre. To this purpoſe hee entertained parlee with him, but in vaine. For whereas Antigonus offered him pardon, and his loue; Eumenes required reſtitution of his Prouinces, which could not be granted without Antipaters conſent. Then was Nora cloſed vp; where Antigonus leauing ſufficient ſtrength for continuance of the ſiege, tooke his iourney into Piſidia againſt Alcetus and Attalus, with whom he made ſhort worke. He came vpon them vnexpected, and ſeized on paſſages, which wanted not men, but ſuch a Captaine as Eumenes, to haue defended them. Alcetus and Attalus, as they had beene too ſecure before his comming, ſo were they too aduenturous, in fighting at the firſt ſight, vpon all diſaduantages: and their folly was attended with ſutable euent. Attalus with many principall Captaines was taken; Alcetus fled to the Citie of Termeſſus, where the loue of the yonger ſort toward him was ſo vehement, that ſtopping their eares againſt all perſwaſions of the ancient men, they needs would hazard their liues and their Countrie in his defence. Yet this auailed him nothing: For the Gouernours of the Towne hauing ſecretly compounded with Antigonus, cauſed the yong men to ſally out; and vſing the time of aduantage, they with their ſeruants did ſet vpon Alcetus, who vnable to reſiſt ſlew himſelfe. His dead body was conueied to Antigonus, and by him barbarouſly torne, was caſt forth without buriall. When Antigonus was gone, the yong men interred the carcaſſe with ſolemne funeralls, hauing once beene minded to ſet on fire their owne towne in reuenge of his death. Such fauor had he purchaſed with courteous liberalitie: but to make an able Generall, one vertue, how great ſoeuer, is inſufficient.

Ptolomie winnes Syria and Phœnicia. The death of Antipater.

WHileſt theſe things were in doing, the reſt of the Princes lay idle, rather ſeeking to enioy their Gouernments for the preſent, than to confirme or enlarge them. Onely Ptolomie looking abroad, wan all Syria and Phœnicia: an action of great importance, but not remarkeable for any circumſtance in the managing. He ſent a Lieutenant with an Armie, who quickly took Laomedon priſoner, that ruled there by appointment of Antipater, and formerly of Perdiccas; but (as may ſeeme) without any great ſtrength of Souldiers, farre from aſſiſtants, and vainely relying vpon the authority which had giuen him that Prouince, and was now occupied with greater cares, than with ſeeking to maintaine him in his Office.

Antipater was old and sickly, desirous of rest, and therefore contented to let Antigonus pursue the dispatch of those businesses in Asia. He had with him Polysperchon, one of the most ancient of Alexanders Captaines, that had lately suppressed a dangerous insurrection of the Ætolians, which Nation had stirred in the quarrell of Perdiccas, preuailing farre at the first, but soone losing all that they had gained, whilest Antipater was abroad in his Cilician expedition. In this Polysperchon, Antipater did repose great confidence; so farre foorth, that (suspecting the youth of his own Sonne Cassander of insufficiencie in so great a charge) hee bequeathed vnto him on his death-bed the Gouernment of Macedon and Greece, together with his Office of Protectorship. So Antipater died, beeing foure-score yeeres old, hauing alwaies trauelled in the great affaires of mighty Princes, with such reputation, that Alexander in all his greatnesse was iealous of him, and the successours of Alexander did either quietly giue place vnto him, or were vnfortunate in making oppositions. In his priuate qualities he was a subtile man, temperate, frugall, and of a Philosophicall behauiour, not vnlearned, as hauing beene Scholler to Aristotle, and written some Histories. He had beene much molested by Olympias, Alexanders mother, whom after the death of her Sonne, he compelled to abstaine from comming into Macedonia, or entermedling in matters of Estate: yea, at his owne death hee gaue especiall direction, that no woman should be permitted to deale in the administration of the Empire. But this precept was soone forgotten; and yet ere long, by sorrowfull experience approoued to haue beene sound and good.

§. XIII.

Of Polysperchon who succeeded vnto Antipater in the Protectorship. The insurrection of Cassander against him.

Polysperchon was very skilfull in the Art of Warre, hauing long time beene Apprentise in that occupation; other qualities, requisite in so high an Office as hee vnder-went, either Nature had not giuen to him, or Time had robbed him of them. He managed his businesse more formally than wisely, as a man of a second witte, fitter to assist, than command in chiefe. At the first entrance vpon the stage, he called to counsaile all his friends, wherein, for waighty considerations (as they who waighed not the contrary reasons held them) the Queene Olympias was reuoked out of Epyrus into Macedon, that the presence of Alexanders mother might countenance and strengthen their proceedings. For the condition of the times requiring, that the Gouernours of Prouinces abroad should keepe greater Armies, than were needfull or easie to be retained about the person of the King in Macedonia; it seemed expedient, that the face of the Court should bee filled with all Maiestie, that might giue authoritie to the Iniunctions from thence proceeding, and by an awfull regard containe within the limited bounds of dutie such as could not by force haue beene kept in order, being strong, and lying too farre off.

Such care was taken for preuention of imaginarie dangers and out of sight, whilest present mischiefe lay vnregarded in their bosomes. Cassander, the Sonne of Antipater, was not able to discouer that great sufficiencie in Polysperchon, for which his father had reposed in him so much confidence: neither could he discerne such oddes in the qualitie of himselfe and Polysperchon, as was in their fortune. He was left Captaine of one thousand; which Office by practice of those times was of more importance, than the title now seemes to implie. Hee should thereby haue beene as Campe-master, or Lieutenant generall to the other: a place no way satisfying his ambition, that thought himselfe the better man. Therefore he began to examine his owne power, and compare with the forces likely to oppose him. All that had relied on his Father, were his owne assured, especially such as commanded the Garrisons bestowed in the principall Cities of Greece. The like hope was of the Magistrates, and others of principall authoritie, in those Common-weales, whose formes had beene corrected by Antipater, that they would follow the side, and draw in many partakers: it concerned these men in their owne particular to adhere vnto the Captaines, by whom their faction was vp-held; and by whom the rascall multitude, couetous of regaining the tyrannous power which they had formerly exercised ouer the principall Citizens, were kept in order, obeying their betters perforce. Besides all these helpes, Cassander had the secret loue of Queene

Eurydice,

Eurydice, who had in priuate rendred him such curtesie, as was due onely to her husband. But neither the Queenes fauour, nor all his other possibilities, gaue him confidence to breake out into open rebellion; because he saw Polysperchon much reuerenced among the Macedonians, and strong enough to suppresse him, before he could haue made head. Therefore he made shew of following his pleasures in the Countrie, and calling many of his friends about him, vnder pretence of hunting, aduised with them vpon the safest course, and most free from all suspition. The necessitie was apparant of raising an Armie, before the businesse was set on foote; and to doe this, opportunitie presented him with faire meanes. Ptolomie had by fine force, without any commission, annexed Syria to his gouernment of Ægypt and Cyrene: this was too much either for the King to trust him with, or for him to part with. Antigonus vpon the first newes of Antipaters death, began to lay hold vpon all that he could get, in such sort, that he manifestly discouered his intent of making himselfe Lord of all Asia. These two therefore stood in neede of a ciuill Warre; which Cassander well noted, and presumed withall, That the friendship which had passed betweene his Father and them, would auaile him somewhat. Whereupon he secretly dispatched messengers to them both; and within a little while conueied himselfe on a sudden ouer the Hellespont, that he might in person aduance the businesse with greater speede. Much perswasion is needeleſse in winning a man to what he desireth. Antigonus coueted nothing more, than to finde Polysperchon worke, by raising some commotion in Greece. Yet (as formalities must not be neglected) Cassander did very earnestly presse him, by the memory of his Father, and all requisite coniurations, to assist him in this enterprise; telling him, that Ptolomie was ready to declare for them, and vrging him to a speedy dispatch. Antigonus on the other side repaied him with the same coine; saying, That for his owne sake, and his dead Fathers, whom he had very deerely loued, he would not faile to giue him all manner of succour. Hauing thus feasted one another with words, they were nothing slacke in perparing the common meanes, leading to their seuerall ends.

§. XIIII.

The vnworthy courses held by Polysperchon, for the keeping downe of Cassander.

GReat necessity there was of timely prouision. For Polysperchon needed no other instructions to informe him of Cassanders drift, than the newes of his departure. He was not ignorant of the ready disposition, which might be found in Antigonus and Ptolomie, to the strengthening of rebellion; and well he knew that one principall hope of Cassander was reposed in the confidence of such as ruled in the Grecian Estate. Therefore (louing to worke circumspectly) he called another Councell, wherein it was concluded, That the Popular forme of Gouernment should be erected in all the Cities of Greece; the Garrisons withdrawne; and that all Magistrates and principall Men, into whose hands Antipater had committed the supreme authority, should forthwith be either slaine or banished. This was a sure way to diminish the number of Cassanders friends, and to raise vp many enemies to him in all quarters. Yet hereby was discloſed both an vnthankefull nature in Polysperchon, and a factious malice in his adherents. For how could he be excused of extreame ingratitude, that for hatred of the Son went about to dishonour the Fathers actions, whose onely bountie had inabled him to doe it? Or what could be said in their defence, who sought to destroy many worthy men, friends to the State, by whom the Greekes were held restrained from stirring against the Macedonians? and in opposition to their priuate Enemie, gaue the rule of things to base Companions, and such as naturally maligned the Empire? But as in mans body, through sinnewes newly issuing from one branch, a finger is more vexed by inflammation of his next neighbour, than by any distemper in the contrary hand: so in bodies politique, the humours of men, subdiuided in faction, are more inraged by the disagreeable qualities of such as curbe them in their neereſt purposes, than they are exasperated by the generall opposition of such as are diuided from them in the maine trunke. Hereby it comes to passe, that contrary religions are inuited to helpe against Neighbour Princes; bordering enemies drawne in, to the part in ciuill warres; and ancient hatred called to counsaile against iniurious friends. Of this fault Nature is not guiltie; she hath taught the arme to offer it selfe vnto manifest losse in defence of the head: They are depraued affections, affections, which render men sensible of their owne particular, and forgetfull of the more generall good, for which they were created.

The decree, whereby the Greekes were presented with a vaine shew of liberty, ran vnder the Kings name; but so, as one might easily discerne, that Polysperchon had guided his pen. For the maine point was, That they should follow such directions, as Polysperchon gaue, and treate with him about all difficulties. In the rest it contained such a deale of kindenesse, as proceeding on a sudden from those who had kept them in hard subiection, might well appeare to haue some other roote than the pretended good will; and was of it selfe too base and vnfit for a King to vse toward his conquered Subiects, and often-subdued Rebels.

§. XV.

Of the great commotions raised in Athens by Polysperchons decree. The death of Phocion.

NEuertheleſſe the Athenians with immoderate ioy entertained this happy-seeming Proclamation, and sought how to put it in execution without further delay. But Nicanor, Captaine of the Garrison, which kept one of their Hauens, called Munychia, in the lower part of the Towne, would needes take longer time of deliberation, than was pleasing to their hastie desires.

Nicanor, as a trusty follower of Cassander, was by him shifted into the place, and Menillus (that was Captaine there before) discharged, when Antipater was newly dead. His comming to Athens was no way gratefull to the Citizens, who soone after hearing the newes of Antipaters death, cried out vpon Phocion, saying, That he had sufficient intelligence of that accident, and might by aduertising them in due time, haue put into their hands a faire opportunity of thrusting out the Macedonians. But these exclamations argued no more than a desire to shake off the Macedonian yoke. Far more grieuously would they haue beene offended, had they knowne the instructions which Cassander had giuen to Nicanor, and his resolution to follow them. It was concluded, That he should not onely retaine Munychia, any iniunction to the contrary notwithstanding; but that he should finde meanes to thrust some Companies into Piraeus, and fortifie that also, which was the principall Hauen, against the high-Towne. How to accomplish this, he rather wanted some reasonable pretence, than good ability. But the Athenians were not long in giuing him sufficient cause to do that, which he would haue done without any cause giuen. They desired him to come vnto their Councell, assembled in the Piraeus, there to consider of the Kings Proclamation: whither vpon Phocions word and safe conduct he came, and earnestly pressed them to hold with Cassander in the warre which was ready to break forth. Contrariwise they vrged him first of all, to make them Masters of their own, which how to vse, they might consult afterwards. Each of them refusing to condescend vnto the others demand; the Athenians (who did alwaies measure iustice by profit, yet seldome thriued by that course) practised with Dercyllus, a Captaine following Polysperchon, and then lying neere at hand, that he should enter into the Towne, and take Nicanor prisoner. But Phocion, who then gouerned in Athens, a man very vnlikly to the rest of the Citizens, being nothing pleased with such a tricke of politique dishonesty, did quietly suffer him to depart and saue himselfe.

Nicanor hereupon began to deuise vpon taking Piraeus; not as following now the project of Cassander, but prosecuting his owne iust reuenge. He leauied as many Souldiers as he could, and drew them closely into Munychia; which done, he issued into Piraeus, tooke it, and intrenched himselfe therein, to the exceeding discomfort of the Athenians, who lately impatient of his keeping the one Hauen, saw him now Master of both. Alexander, the sonne of Polysperchon, came thither shortly after with an Armie. Then were the Citizens in great hope of recouering all, and addressed themselues vnto him; who made faire shewes, intending meere mischiefe, which they perceiued not, being blinded with the vaine Epistles of his Father, and of Olympias the old Queene. Olympias taking vpon her to command, before she durst well aduenture to returne into Macedon, had peremptorily charged Nicanor to restore to the Athenians the places which he held: but he would first consider more of the matter. Polysperchon had further ordained, that the Isle of Samos should be rendred vnto them: a goodly offer, had it accorded with his power and meaning. He was (indeede) ſo farre from purpoſing to let them haue Samos, that as yet he did not throughly intend to let them haue themſelues. The commoditie of their Hauens was ſuch, as he would rather get into his owne hands, than leaue in theirs; yet rather wiſhed in theirs, than in Caſſanders. His ſon Alexander not ignorant of this, made faire ſhew to the Athenians, and ſpent much labour in communing with Nicanor, but ſuffered not them, for whom he ſeemed to labor, to intermeddle with the buſineſſe. Hereupon the Citizens grew iealous, and the diſpleaſure they conceiued againſt him, they powred out vpon Phocion, depriuing him of his office. This was done with much tumult: baniſhed men and ſtrangers, thruſting themſelues into the aſſembly of the Citizens, who diſtracted with ſundry paſſions, growing out of their preſent misfortunes, thought euery one that beſt could inueigh againſt things paſt, a moſt likely man to finde ſome remedy for the euill threatning them. In this hurly-burly was Alexander deuiſing how he might come to ſome good point of compoſition with Nicanor, and held much priuie conference with him; which he could not ſo ſecretly carry, but that his negotiation was diſcouered, whereby the vp-rore in the Towne was ſo farre increaſed, that Phocion with many of his friends, were accuſed, and driuen to ſeeke ſaueguard of their liues by flight. So they came to Alexander, who entertained them gently, and gaue them his letters of commendation to his Father, deſiring him to take them into his protection.

Polyſperchon was in the Countrie of Phocis, ready to enter with an Armie into Attica. Thither came Phocion with his Companions, hoping well that the letters which they brought, and their owne deſerts, (hauing alwaies beene friends to the Macedonians, as far as the good of their Countrie gaue leaue) ſhould be enough to get patronage to their innocency. Beſides all this, Dinarchus a Corinthian, Polyſperchons familiar friend, went along with them (in an euill houre) who promiſed to himſelfe and them great fauour, by meanes of his acquaintance. But Polyſperchon, was an vnſtable man, very earneſt in what he tooke in hand, yet, either for want of iudgement in following them, or of honeſty in holding the beſt of them, eaſily changing his intended courſes, and doing things by the halues, which made him commonly faile of good ſucceſſe. For feare of Caſſander, he had offered wonderfull kindneſſe to the Athenians; this had cauſed them to loue him: out of their loue he gathered hope of deceiuing them, which made him to change his minde, and ſeeke how to get into his owne hands thoſe keyes, with which Caſſander held them faſt lockt vp: finding himſelfe diſappointed of this purpoſe, and ſuſpected as a falſe diſhonourable man, he ſtood wauering betweene the contrary allurements of profit and reputation. To keepe the Athenians perforce at his deuotion, would indeede haue done well: but the effecting of this beganne to grow deſperate; and many Townes of importance in Greece began to caſt their eyes vpon his proceeding in that action. Wherefore he thought it the wiſeſt way to redeeme their good opinion, by giuing all contentment vnto the popular faction, which was then growne to be Maiſter of that Citie. And in good time for this purpoſe were the Athenian Embaſſadours come, treading (as one may ſay) vpon Phocions heeles, whom they were ſent to accuſe. Theſe had ſolemne audience giuen to them in the Kings preſence, who was attended by many great Lords, and for oſtentations ſake was glorified with all exteriour ſhewes of maieſtie; yet all too little to change Aridæus into Alexander: for hee did nothing there, but either laugh or chafe, as he ſaw others doe. For beginning of the buſineſſe Polyſperchon commanded that Dinarchus ſhould be tortured and ſlaine. This was enough to teſtifie his hearty affection to the Commonaltie of Athens, in that he ſpared not his old acquaintance for their ſake, whoſe Embaſſadours he then bad to ſpeake. When their errand was done, and anſwere to it made by the accuſed, who had no indifferent hearing, Phocion and the reſt were pronounced guiltie of treaſon; but to giue ſentence, and doe the execution vpon them, was (for Honours ſake) referred vnto the Citie of Athens, becauſe they were Burgeſſes. Then were they ſent away to Athens, where the rascall multitude, not ſuffering them to ſpeake for themſelues, condemned them to dye. So they periſhed being innocent. But the death of Phocion being very conſpicuous, made the fortune of the reſt to be of the leſſe regard. Fiue and fortie times had he beene choſen Gouernour of the Citie, neuer ſuing for the place, but ſent for when he was abſent: ſo well was his integritie knowne, and ſo highly valued, euen of ſuch as were no pretenders to the ſame vertue. He was a good Commander in Warre, wherein though his actions were not very great, yet were they of good importance, and neuer vnfortunate. Neuer did the Citie repent of hauing followed his counsaile: nor any priuate man of hauing trusted his word. Philip of Macedon highlyesteemed him; so, and much more did Alexander, who (besides other signes of his loue) sent him two hundred talents of siluer, and offered to bestow vpon him of foure Cities in Asia any one which he would choose. But Phocion refused these and other gifts, howsoeuer importunately thrust vpon him; resting well contented with his honest pouerty: wherein he liued aboue fourescore yeeres, and then was compelled by the vniust iudgement of wicked men to drink that poyson, which by iust iudgement of the righteous God, so infected the Citie of Athens, as from that day forwards it neuer brought forth any worthy man resembling the vertue of their Ancestors.

§. XVI.

Of Polysperchon his vaine expedition against Cassander.

NOt long after these things were done, Cassander with such forces as Antigonus lent him, entred into Piraus; which newes drew Polysperchon head-long into Attica, with a great Army, but so ill victualed, that he was fain to depart without any thing done. Onely he had giuen some impediment to the enemy; who not contented with defending what he held, began to looke out, and make new purchases abroad. Finding therefore himselfe vnable to driue Cassander out of Athens, he left his sonne Alexander, with such number of men, as exceeded not the proportion of victuals, to withstand his further incroaching. The greatest part of his Armie he carried into Peloponnesus, to make the Countrey sure to himselfe, wherein Cassander had many Friends.

His doings in Peloponnesus were such, as they had beene in other parts of Greece. First, he began to fight with Edicts, restoring the Democratie, or Popular forme of gouernement. Hee commanded that the principall Citizens, that had by Antipater beene made Rulers, should be either slaine, or driuen into exile. This decree tooke immediate effect in most places: The vulgar sort being very ready to seale the Charter of their freedome and authoritie, with the bloud of those who had kept them in subiection. Yet many Cities there were, which delighted in the rule of the chiefe Citizens; and many which wished well to Cassander, especially they of Megalopolis, on whom Polysperchon meant to inflict an exemplarie punishment of disobedience to him, which he tearmed Rebellion. Megalopolis had in it fifteene thousand seruiceable men, well furnished of necessaries, and resolued to endure the worst. And neede there was of such resolution. For Polysperchon comming thither with all his power, did so much, that he ouerthrew, by a Mine, three of their Bulwarks, and all the space of wall betweene them. But the Defendants manfully repelled the Macedonians which came vp to the breach; and at the same time with great labour they raised vp an inner wall, to beare out the next assault. The Assailants hauing failed to carry the Towne at the first attempt, tooke much paine to cleare the ground, and make faire way for their Elephants, whose violence was likely to ouerthrow all that came in their way. But the Towns-men perceiuing their drift, prepared boords driuen through with long nailes, which they vsed as gall-throps, bestowing them sleightly, couered with the points vpwards, in the way by which the beasts were to passe. Neither did they set any to encounter them in front, but appointed certaine light-armed men to beare vpon their sides with Arrowes and Darts, as they were instructed by some that had learned the manner of that fight in the Asian Warres. Of these prouisions they made happy vse in the next assault. For by them were the Elephants (wherein the enemy chiefly trusted) either sorely hurt, or driuen backe vpon the Macedonians, whom they trampled vnder feet. Polysperchon came as ill furnisht for long abode to Megalopolis as before to Athens. Therefore being neither able to dispatch the businesse quickly, nor to take such leisure as was requisite, he forsooke the siege, with some losse, and much dishonour; leauing some part of his Armie to lye before the Towne for his credit.

After this he sent Clitus, his Admirall, to Sea, to ioyne with Arideus that was come out of Phrygia, and to cut off all succour which might come to the enemy out of Asia. Cassander also sent his whole Fleet vnder Nicanor, who taking along with him some ships of Antigonus, came to the Propontis, where he fought with Clitus, and was beaten. But Antigonus hearing of the ouer-throw, gathered together the ships that were escaped, and and manning them very well, ſent out Nicanor againe, aſſuring him of the victory, as well he might. For he ſent out ſufficient numbers of light-armed men, whom he cauſed to be wafted ouer the Streights in ſmall Veſſels by night; theſe before day-light ſeizing vpon Clitus, draue his men, that lay ſecurely on the land, head-long into their ſhips; in which tumult Nicanor arriuing did aſſaile them ſo luſtily, that few or none eſcaped him.

This loſſe at Sea, together with his bad ſucceſſe by Land, brought Polyſperchon into great contempt. He had a good facility in penning bloudy decrees, but when the execution was referred to his owne ſword, he could finde the matter more difficult. Wherefore the Athenians, perceiuing that he had left them to ſhift for themſelues, and was not able to giue them Protection againſt the enemy which lay in their boſomes, came to agreement with Caſſander; accepting a Gouernour of his appointment; and reſtoring all things to the ſame ſtate wherein Antipater had left them. The like inclination to the party of Caſſander, was found in very many Cities of Greece, which daily and willingly reuolted vnto him; as to an induſtrious man, and likely to preuaile in the end. Thus was the whole Country ſet in a combuſtion, vneaſie to be quenched; which preſented vnto Antigonus an opportunity, that he neglected not, of making himſelfe Lord of Aſia.

§. XVII.

Antigonus ſeekes to make himſelfe an abſolute Lord: and thereupon treates with Eumenes, who diſappointeth him. Phrygia and Lydia wonne by Antigonus.

ANtigonus had in Antipaters life time a firme reſolution, to make vnto himſelfe the vtmoſt benefit that he might of the Army committed to his charge. And in faire ſeaſon for aduancement of his purpoſes came the newes of Antipaters death; euen then, when all the buſineſſe in Piſidia was diſpatched, and no more imployment for the Army remaining, ſaue onely the continuance of the ſiege of Nora, a ſmall thing of it ſelfe, but as hard as a greater matter; and requiring few men, but much time; when time of all things was moſt precious. Eumenes lay in that Fort of Nora, able to make the place good, and hoping that the mutability, to which the preſent eſtate was manifeſtly ſubiect, would in continuance of ſome yeres (which he might abide) worke more for him, than his enemies in that ſpace could worke againſt him. His moſt feare was, that for want of exerciſe in that narrow Caſtle, his men & horſes might grow ſickly and vnſeruiceable: which made him to practiſe many deuices of keeping them in health and luſtie. But when he had continued ſhut vp in this manner about a yeere, his hopes came to good paſſe, and he was eaſed of his cares by Antigonus himſelfe, whoſe forces held him beſieged.

Antigonus knowing the great ſufficiencie of Eumenes, and conſidering his fidelity ſhewed vnto Perdiccas, thought that he could not finde in all the world a fitter man than him, to imploy in managing thoſe high deſignes, wherein he doubted not that he ſhould be withſtood by the mightieſt Princes of the empire. He ſent therefore to Eumenes by one that was friend to them both, acquainting him with ſome part of his intent, and promiſing to make him a better Lord than euer hee had beene, and the next man to himſelfe, if things fell out as he deſired: in regard whereof hee required onely his friendſhip, and thereupon ſent him an oath to take; which done, he might at his good pleaſure iſſue ſafely out of Nora, and enioy his perfect libertie. Eumenes peruſing the forme of the oath, did perceiue the meaning of Antigonus; which was, rather to make him his follower than his fellow. For whereas, in a few words, it mentioned the King and Princes of the bloud, rather to keepe the Decorum, than vpon any loyall intent; the binding words and ſumme of all were ſuch, as tied him faſt onely to Antigonus, omitting all reſeruation of duety to the King or any other. This hee liked not, holding it vnſeemely to become a ſworne man to him, with whom he had fought for the maſterie; and being aſſured that his voluntary aſſiſtance, which way ſoeuer he gaue, would be more acceptable, and farre more honourable, than the courſe propounded. Yet would he not therefore breake off for the negotiation, and waite for ſome better occaſion of inlargement, which might perhaps be long in comming: but ſeeming to be well agreed with Antigonus, he prepared to giue vp his Hold and depart. As for the oath it ſelfe, when he came to take it, he made ſhew of diſlike, in that it was not ſolemne enough for such personages as they were, who could not be too ceremonious in testifying their Allegiance. The Macedonians which lay incamped before Nora, liked his words, and gaue him leaue to put in Olympias, and the children of Alexander, binding himselfe to them and their adherents, as well as to Antigonus; and so he departed.

Antigonus had taken vpon him, as soone as he came downe to the Sea-side, to remoue some of the Gouernours of the Prouinces, behauing himselfe according to the authoritie which he had receiued of Antipater, to exercise in the time of warre. Neither did he want sufficient pretence whereby to iustifie his proceedings. For if Polysperchon might lawfully hold the Protector-ship, which the old man doting on his death-bed bequeathed vnto him, as a legacie, without consent of the Princes or Souldiers; why might not he himselfe aswell retaine the Lieutenantship of Asia, that was granted vnto him for the generall good of the State, in presence of the whole Armie, by the King, and by Antipater, who had power to ordaine what should seeme conuenient whilest he liued, not to dispose of things that should happen after his death? To giue a faire colour to his ambition, this was enough: if any were not herewith satisfied, he had threescore thousand footmen, ten thousand horse, and thirtie Elephants in a readinesse to answere them.

The first that perceiued his drift, and prouided to resist him, was Aridæus Gouernour of Phrygia; who fortified the Townes of his owne Prouince, and sought to haue won Cyzicus, a faire Hauen Towne, and seated very conueniently for him, but was faine to goe away without it. Hereupon Antigonus tooke occasion to command him out of the Countrie. Aridæus was so farre from obeying him, that he sent forces to relieue Eumenes. Neuertheless finding that he was vnable of himselfe to make long resistance, he tooke such companies as he could draw along with him, and so passed ouer into Europe, to complaine at the Court. The like fortune had Clitus, who ruled in Lydia, and sought the like remedy of his fortune, with some hope at the first (for both of them were entertained with very good words) which quickly vanished, and grew desperate, when they were beaten at Sea, as hath already beene declared.

§. XVIII.

Antigonus pursues Eumenes. Eumenes hauing authoritie from the Court, raiseth great war against Antigonus in defence of the Royall house.

ANtigonus hauing thus gotten into his hands all, or most of all Asia the lesse, was able to haue entred Macedon, and seized vpon the Court; which that he forbare to doe, it proceeded (as may seeme) for some of these reasons. It would haue bred as much iealousie in Cassander, as feare in Polesperchon, which might haue brought them to tearmes of reconciliation. It would aske more time than he could spare; and the enuie which followed the Protector-ship was such, as he that had power enough without the Office, ought rather to shun, than to pursue. Besides all this, it was manifest that Eumenes would not onely refuse to take his part, but would make warre vpon him in defence of the Royall house, to which it was found that Antigonus did not stand well affected. Against him therefore he bent his course, and with an Army of twenty thousand foot, and foure thousand Horse, made great haste toward Cilicia, hoping to suppresse him before he should be able to make head.

Eumenes was one of those few that continued faithfull to their dead master, which being well knowne in the Court, he had commission sent vnto him from thence to raise an Armie, and make warre vpon Antigonus, taking of the Kings treasure as much as he should neede. Other letters also there were directed to all the Gouernours of Prouinces, requiring them to giue assistance to Eumenes, and be ordered by his direction: especially to the Captaines of the old Souldiers, called the Argyraspides, or siluer shielded bands, commandement was giuen to be at his appointment. He had of his old followers gathered together two thousand foot, and fiue hundred horse, before this authority was giuen him: but now he purposed with all the strength which he could make, to fight with Antigonus in defence of the Royall blood. Olympias had written to him, desiring him to bring helpe to her and to her Nephew the sonne of Alexander, and in the meane time to giue her his aduice in that which Polysperchon required of her: for shee was desirous to returne into Macedon, but suspected his ambition, as not contained within lawfull bounds. Eumenes therefore counselled her to remaine in Epirus, till such time as he could bring the warre to a good issue; which done, he promised that his faith and care should not be wanting to the seede of Alexander.

Strange it is to consider, that in all the Empire, scarce any one could be found among the Noble-men, in whom Alexanders mother, wiues, and children, might repose firme confidence, sauing onely this Eumenes, a stranger to the Macedonian bloud, borne at Cardia, a Citie of Thrace. His reputation was no more than his owne vertue had made it; his followers obeyed at their owne discretion; and compelled he was to trauaile as farre as Persia, to gather together an Armie sufficient, to resist the enemies that pursued his heeles.

§. XIX.

How the Princes of Macedon stood affected mutually. Olympias takes Aridæus and Eurydice, whom she cruelly puts to death.

NOW, forasmuch as in this present warre all the Rulers of the Prouinces did entermeddle; and great alterations happened, not onely in the parts of Asia, but Macedon it selfe, which brought a new face vnto the State, by the extirpation of the royall house of Philip and Alexander: I hold it conuenient in this place, before we enter into the particulars of the warre it selfe, to shew briefely how the great ones did mutually stand affected; and by what passions they were drawne into those courses, which ouer-threw most of them, and out of their ruines built the greatnesse of a few: as likewise to what extremitie the faction brake out in Macedon it selfe, about the maine controuersie of the title to the Crowne, whereupon all other quarels were or should haue beene depending.

Aridæus the King, beeing simple and fearefull, did onely what hee was bidden.

Polysperchon, desirous to continue long in Office, had a purpose to aduance the sonne of Alexander by Roxane to the kingdome, and become Gouernour to a King of his owne making.

Eurydice the Queene discouering plainly this intent, and meaning nothing lesse than to let her husband serue as a Stale, keeping the throne warme till another were growne old enough to sit in it, grew acquainted with Cassander, who hated the memory of Alexander, and was therefore the fitter for her turne.

Cassander held fresh in minde the danger wherein his family had beene through Alexanders malice, together with the indignitie offered to himselfe by Alexander, who knocked his head against a wall for deriding one that adored him after the Persian manner. The displeasure hereof, and the pleasure which he tooke in the amorous Queene, made him to resolue, both to suppresse the linage which he hated, and to maintaine his beloued mistresse, either by supporting her weake husband, or by taking her to be his owne wife.

The rest of the Lords held it a thing indifferent who reigned ouer all, so as they might reigne in their seuerall Countries, and establish their authority in such wise, that it might not be taken from them.

Among these, Ptolomie and Antigonus were well enough already, if their ambition would haue suffered them to see it.

Pitho and Seleucus lying farre off, and being strong, had some good hope to encroach vpon their neighbours. Against these, Peucestes and some others with much adoe hardly made resistance, vntill such time as Eumenes came to them; who propounded to himselfe great matters, which he lived not to accomplish.

Olympias the old Queene (as it is common with step-dames) hated the children of her husband by his other wiues. It was thought that she had giuen poyson to Aridæus, which failing to take away his life, had much impaired both his body and wits. Now she considering, that Eumenes was too full of businesse to come home so soone as she wished that he should; and that Cassander daily preuailed in Greece: thought it the best way to ioyne with Polysperchon, and set vp, as King, her Nephew Alexander, the son of Roxane, remouing Aridæus before Cassander were able to defend him. To this intent she procured men among her kindred in Epirus, and so tooke her way towards Polysperchon, who ioyning with her, entred into Macedon.

Eurydice hearing these newes, wrote very earnestly to Cassander, praying him to set aside all other businesse, and come to succour her. She her selfe by entreatie, gifts and promises, drew to her partie as many of the Macedonians as she could, vntill she thought her owne side strong enough; and then taking her husband with her, went boldly forth against Olympias, and the Traitor Polysperchon.

These two Queens met armed, as if the matter should haue beene determined by their own hands, which ended without any stroke stricken, by the reuolt of those who followed Eurydice. For as soone as the Macedonians beheld Olympias; calling to minde her former Estate, and the victorious reignes of her husband and sonne, they refused to lift any weapon against her. Eurydice finding her selfe thus forsaken, fled towards Amphipolis, but was intercepted and made prisoner with her husband.

Olympias hauing obtained this victory without bloud, thought that all things would succeed as easily, and that vpon the same considerations for which they had refused to beare Armes against her, the Macedonians would not sticke to maintaine her, whatsoeuer her proceedings were. Hauing therefore shut vp Aridæus and his wife in a close roome, where they could scarce turne round, she fed them through a little hole, till after a while it came in her head, (for feare lest the people should haue commiseration of him, that had reigned almost sixe yeeres and a halfe) to put them to death. So she deliuered Aridæus to some barbarous Thracians, who tooke away his life by cruell torments: to Eurydice she sent a sword, a halter, and a cup of poyson, willing her to choose the instrument of her owne death; who praying that the like presents might one day be sent to Olympias, yeelded her necke to the halter, hauing spent her last curses not in vaine. Nicanor the brother of Cassander, and a hundred the chiefe of his friends, did Olympias then choose out, all whom she commanded to be slaine. His brother Iolaus that was already dead and buried, she accused of poyson giuen to Alexander, & thereupon caused his Tomb to be throwne downe, and his bones to be scattered abroad. The Macedonians wondering at this furie, began to condemne themselues, and the folly of Polysperchon, who had, quite contrarie to Antipaters charge giuen on his death-bed, called this outragious woman to the gouernement of the Empire.

§. XX.

How Cassander was reuenged vpon Olympias.

†. I.

The great expedition of Cassander. Olympias shuts her selfe into Pydna, where Cassander besieged her. Æacides King of Epirus, comming to succour Olympias, is forsaken, and banished by his owne Subiects.

Cassander at that time lay before Tegea, in Peloponnesus; whither when all these ill tidings were brought to him, he neuer staied to take the Citie, nor to giue order for the State of things in that Countrie, (though Alexander the sonne of Polysperchon were there with an Armie) but compounding with them of Tegea, he willed his associates to looke to themselues as well as they could, till his returne; and so in all haste he tooke his iourney toward Macedon, carried headlong with the greedie desire of iust reuenge. The Ætolians had taken the Streights of Thermopylæ, in fauour of the Queene and Polysperchon, to hinder his passage; but he, not willing to mis-spend any time in in dealing with them, got together as many ſhippes as he could, great and ſmall, with which he tranſported his Army into Theſſaly. There he diuided his companies, appointing ſome vnder Callas, a ſubtile Captaine, to hold Polyſperchon buſied, who then lay incamped neere to Perhæbia; with the reſt he marched directly againſt Olympias. She, hauing once preuailed by the reſpect giuen to her dignitie, tooke more care how to appeare Maieſticall, than to make her ſelfe ſtrong. To this end ſhe made a ſolemne progreſſe to Pydna, a Sea-towne, and well fenced, hauing in her companie all the flowre of the Court, eſpecially the great Ladies, among whom was Roxane, and her yong ſon Alexander, heire to the great Alexander, by his grandmothers deſignement: who, during his minority kept the Soueraigne power in her owne hands. But all this pompe ſerued to little vſe, againſt the violence of the enemy, that ſoone preſented himſelfe before the wals; onely it fed the beſieged with a vaine hope of ſuccour, that would from all parts arriue, to reſcue perſons of their quality. And hereof there ſoone appeared faire likelihood, which as ſoone vaniſhed, and went away in ſmoke.

For Æacides King of Epirus, made great haſte to bring ſuccour to Olympias, his coſen, with whom Deidamia his daughter was alſo ſhut vp. Neuertheleſſe, his Subiects were nothing forward in this expedition; but finding certaine paſſages taken in the way by Caſſanders men, they called vpon him to retire, and quit the enterpriſe. The Kings importunitie vrging them to proceede, and the obſtinate refuſall of the Armie, brake out at length into ſuch termes, that when he had raged in vaine againſt the multitude, his authority, with which he thought to haue preuailed vpon them, was by them taken from him, and he compelled to forſake his Kingdome, and to wander vp and downe in forraine Countries a baniſhed man, his people ioyning with the enemy, againſt whom he had led them forth to warre.

Pydna in the meane time was cloſed vp ſtreightly, both by Sea and Land, ſo that neither any could iſſue out of the Citie, nor any reliefe be conueyed into it; but it held out as long as any food was left, no memorable ſeruice being done there, whilſt great actions were mannaged abroad.

†. II.

A continuation of Olympias her ſtorie. Polyſperchon defeated. Extreame famine in Pydna. Olympias yeeldes to Caſſander.

NOw, though order of time require it, that we ſhould rehearſe the doings of Eumenes and Antigonus in this place, leauing Olympias yet a while to the howre of her deſtiny, which growes the faſter vpon her, becauſe ſhe may diſcerne it comming; yet that wee may not be compelled to interrupt the courſe of our narration, by inſerting her Tragedie in the midſt of things, not manifeſtly coherent with it; we will here (as elſewhere we haue done, and elſewhere muſt) continue to an end one Hiſtory, that we may not be therewith diſtracted, when we ſhall come to the relation of another. All the hope of the beſieged, remaining in Polyſperchon, was in like manner diſappointed, as their former truſt had beene, which was repoſed in the ſuccours of the Epirot. For Callas, who was ſent againſt him, found the meanes to corrupt the greateſt part of his Armie with money, leauing him within a little while ſo ſlenderly accompanied, that he was fit for no other buſineſſe of warre, than a ſwift retrait. When famine had ſo farre preuailed in the Citie, that the horſes were killed as a precious food, many men feeding on the dead carcaſſes of their fellowes, and ſawduſt being giuen to the Elephants for prouender; ſome of the Souldiers obtaining the Queenes leaue, (who could not denie it) others, without asking leaue, yeelded themſelues to the enemie, and were by him gently relieued, and ſent abroad into the Countrey. The newes of the Queenes affaires, diſperſed by theſe men, did ſo affright her wel-willers, that ſuch as had reſerued themſelues to the euent, came in apace, and ſubmitted them to Caſſander. At length, when the mortalitie was ſo great in the Towne, that the liuing were euen poyſoned with the noyſome ſent of the dead; Olympias bethought her ſelfe of ſtealing away by Sea in a Galley that ſhe had: wherewith her ſucceſſe was as bad as in the reſt. For God had appointed this Towne, by her choſen as a place of refuge, to be vnto her as a houſe of torment, and a Iaile, out of which ſhe ſhould not be deliuered, but vnto an euill death. Being therefore vtterly broken with miſeries, which daily afflicted her and the other Ladies, vnaccuſtomed to ſo wretched a kind of life, ſhe offered compoſition, & with much labor hardly obtained of Caſſander (who hauing fetcht her Gally out of the Hauen, accounted himſelfe as good as maſter of her body) a grant of her own life. Immediately vpon her apprehenſion, Pella, the chiefe Citie of the Kingdome, was yeelded to Caſſander. Amphipolis did ſtand out: for Ariſtonus (to whom Olympias had giuen charge of ſuch forces as were left abroad in the Countrey, taking courage from the ſucceſſe of ſome petty ſeruices wherein he had preuailed) began to promiſe himſelfe great vnlikelihoods. But Olympias, to win Caſſanders fauour, very earneſtly required him vpon his faith to her, that he ſhould giue it vp. He did ſo, and preſently after was killed by his priuate enemies, that were ſet on by Caſſander, who partly hated him vpon old reſpects, partly doubted him, as a man likely to ſeeke innouation.

†. III.

The death of Olympias, and her conditions.

WHen Olympias had now heard ſorrowfull tidings of all her friends, ſhee her ſelfe was called into queſtion, and accuſed in an aſſembly of the Macedonians, for the murthers (they were ſo ſtiled in her affliction, which in time of proſperitie ſhe called iuſtice) by her committed. There was ſhe (being not heard nor called to ſpeake) condemned to die. The ſuite was commenced and proſecuted againſt her, by the kindred of thoſe whom ſhe had ſlaine. But it was at Caſſanders inſtigation; who (to haſten the execution) ſent her word, that he would furniſh her with a ſhip, and other neceſſaries, to ſaue her ſelfe by flight: which when ſhe refuſed, ſaying, that ſhe would plead for her ſelfe, and tell her owne tale; he diſſembled no longer, but ſent vnto her ſuch men as hated her moſt, who tooke away her miſerable life. She was daughter, and ſiſter, vnto two Kings of Epirus; wife, and mother, vnto two the mightieſt Kings, of that, or many other ages; a ſtout Lady, and of vnreproueable chaſtitie; but her ambition was boundleſſe, her hatred vnappeaſable, and her furie in reuenge, moſt vnwomanly. Her peruerſe conditions made her husband ſeeke other wiues and Concubines, which cauſed her to hate both him, and them. She was thought priuie to her husbands death; after which, very cruelly ſhe ſlew his late wife Cleopatra, hauing firſt murdered one of her two children in her armes, and with a beaſtly fury broiled the other aliue in fire, in a copper baſon. For theſe things, her ſonne Alexander (otherwiſe louing her well) forbad her to meddle in the gouernement of Macedon. But God more ſeuere vnto cruell Tyrants, than onely to hinder them of their wils, permitted her to liue and fulfill the reſt of her wickedneſſe, (which was his iuſtice vpon the adulteries of Philip, and the oppreſſion done by him and others;) after all which, He rewarded her malice, by returning it vpon her owne head.

†. IIII.

Caſſander celebrates the funerall of Aridæus and Eurydice; and ſeekes to make himſelfe King of Macedon.

AFter her death, Caſſander gaue honourable buriall to Aridæus and Eurydice, among their Progenitors, Kings of Macedon. And looking further into his owne poſſibilities of greatneſſe, he married the Lady Theſſalonica, whom he had taken at Pydna, being the daughter of King Philip, by another of his wiues; that by her he might haue ſome title to the Crowne. For the ſame end he committed Roxane, and her yong ſonne, to cloſe priſon, remouing thereby ſome part of his impediment. And, the better to encreaſe his fame, and purchaſe loue, built a Citie, called by his owne name Caſſandria, that ſoone grew to be very great and powerfull. He reædified likewiſe Thebes in Greece, and reſtored it vnto the old inhabitants, after it had laine twenty yeeres waſte, being vtterly razed by Alexander. By theſe meanes, eſpecially by the reſtauration of Thebes, whereunto all Greece voluntarily contributed, he grew ſo ſtrong, that few remained enemies vnto him; and they, with much labour, hardly could reſiſt him. Leauing him therefore daily preuailing in Greece, we will returne to them, who contended in Aſia, for leſſe titles, but larger Prouinces, with greater forces.

CHAP.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the great Lordship which ANTIGONVS got in Asia.

The iourney of Eumenes into Persia. His wise dealing with those that ioyned with him.

Eumenes, hauing ioyned vnto his company the Argyraspides, made haste into the Easterne parts. to take possession of those Countries, according to his commission, and strengthen himselfe against Antigonus. He tooke his iourney through Cœlosyria and Phœnicia, hoping to reclaime those Prouinces, vsurped with the rest of Syria (as hath beene shewed) by Ptolomie, to the Kings obedience. But to effect this, his haste of his passing forward was too great, his Armie too little; and the readinesse of the people, to returne to their due obedience, none at all. Besides all which impediments, one inconuenience troubled him in all his proceedings, making them the lesse effectuall. The Captaines of the Argyraspides were so froward, that they scorned to repaire to him, and take his directions; and their fidelity was so vnsteady, that he might more easily haue dealt with open traitors. It was not expedient, that he, being Generall, should weaken his authority by courting them; neither lay it in his power to keepe them in order by compulsion. Therefore he fained, that Alexander had appointed vnto him in a dreame, a place for their meeting, namely, in a rich pauilion, wherein an emptie throne was placed, as if Alexander himselfe had beene present at their consultations. Thus he freed himselfe from their vaine pride; but of their faith he could haue no assurance. Yet when Ptolomie requested them, and Antigonus bribed them to forsake him, they continued (though not without considering of the matter) to take his part. So hee marched on, sending before him the Kings warrant; which Pytho and Seleucus refused to obey; not as reiecting the Kings authority, but excepting the person of Eumenes, as a man condemned to die by the Macedonian Armie, for the death of Craterus. Eumenes, knowing well that hee was not to relye vpon their assistance, who stood otherwise affected then his affaires required, and were not to be dealt with by perswasion, sought passage by strong hand, through the Countrie of Babylon, in such wise that Seleucus, hauing in vaine assailed to hinder him, by opening the sluces of Euphrates, was glad at length to grant him friendly way, as desirous to be rid of him. Thus he came to Peucestes and the rest of the Easterne Lords, who were glad of his companie, because of the differences betweene Pytho, Seleucus, and themselues. Yet the contention about superiority, grew very hot among them; euery one finding matter enough, to feede his owne humour of selfe-worthinesse. But the former deuice of assembling in one pauilion, made all quiet; the conclusion euer being sure to follow that which Eumenes propounded, who was both wisest in giuing aduice, and best able to reward, by meanes of the authority giuen him, to take what he pleased of the Kings treasures. By these meanes he won to himselfe many of those, who had most power to doe good or hurt.

§. II.

Antigonus, hearing that Eumenes lay in the Prouince of Susa, had an earnest desire to follow him, and driue him further from the Kings treasures, which were kept there. To which end, as soone as he had made himselfe strong enough, he remoued out of Mesopotamia, where he had wintered; and taking to him Pytho and Seleucus, with their men, he marched directly against the enemies, with intent to giue them battaile. Eumenes had fortified the Castle of Susa, & was retired back toward Persia, keeping the Riuer of Tygris betweene him and his pursuers. The passages of the Riuer were well guarded, and good espiall kept vpon Antigonus, to obserue which way he took. Before he came to Tygris it selfe, he was to passe ouer Coprates, a great Riuer, and not foordable, which he sought to doe by small vessels, whereof he had no great store. A great part of his Armie had gotten ouer, when Eumenes, who kept a bridge vpon Tygris, came with a thousand horse, and foure thousand foot, to see their demeanour: and finding them out of order, charged them, brake them, and draue them headlong backe into Coprates, wherein most of them were drowned; very few escaping with life, except foure thousand that yeelded themselues prisoners, in sight of Antigonus, that was not able to relieue them. This losse made Antigonus glad to fall off, and the heate of that Countrie in the dog dayes, breeding diseases in his Armie, by which many perished, caused him to remoue as farre as into Media. So he tooke Python with him; (leauing Seleucus to besiege the Castle of Susa) and seeking to goe the neerest way, passed through sauage Nations, that continually vexing him with skirmishes, slew great numbers of his men, before he could arriue in Media, with his troupes that were quite heart-broken.

§. III.

Of Eumenes his cunning. A battaile betweene him and Antigonus.

AFter his departure, Eumenes with his associates fell into consultation, about the remainder of their businesse. Faine he would haue had them to enter vpon those Prouinces, which Antigonus had left behinde him; to which also the Captaines of the Argyraspides or Siluer-shields were very inclinable, as desiring to draw neerer to Greece. But Peucestes, and the rest, whose dominions lay in the high Countries, had more care of their owne particular Estates, and would needes march Eastward. These carried it; for the Armie was not strong enough to diuide it selfe into parts.

When they came into Persia, Peucestes, ruling there, feasted them royally, and sought by all meanes to win the Souldiers loue to himselfe. Eumenes perceiuing whereunto those doings tended, suffred him a while to keepe good cheare, till the time of war drew neere. Then did he faine an Epistle, directed, as from Orontes Gouernor of Armenia, to Peucestes himselfe: The purport whereof was, that Olympias had vanquished Cassander, and sent ouer a great Armie vnder Polysperchon, to ioyne with Eumenes. These newes, as they filled the Campe with vaine ioy, so they wrought in all mens mindes a great willingnesse to obey Eumenes, by whom was the likeliest apparance of their preferment; wherein they dealt wisely, he being farre the most sufficient Commander, as they found soone after. For when Antigonus, comming out of Media, drew neere vnto them, Eumenes by some mischance was fallen sicke, and faine to be carried in a Litter; the Armie marched in very bad array, and was likely to haue beene forced to take battaile in that disorder. But Eumenes, when the rest of the Captaines were amazed, was carried about the Armie in his Litter, and vpon the sodaine did cast his men into so good forme, that Antigonus, perceiuing him a farre off, could not refraine from giuing him deserued commendations. Yet he did not cease to promise great rewards to the Captaines, and all sorts of men, if they would forsake Eumenes: which hopes deceiuing him, he came to the triall of a battaile. Eumenes had more Elephants than Antigonus; otherwise, he was inferiour in number both of horse and foote by a third part. The battaile was fought with variable successe, and great losse on both sides, continuing a great part of the day, and of the night following. Yet the victory was vncertaine. For Eumenes could not force his men to lye farre from their carriages: by which meanes Antigonus (who had a more absolute command ouer his) incamping on the ground whereon they fought, had in his power the dead bodies; which was accounted the signe of victory; for he buried his owne, and gaue leaue to his enemies crauing it, to doe the like. But a greater signe of victory had Eumenes. For he abode still in the same place, and not onely buried his men very honourably, at great leisure, but held the Countrie round about; whereas Antigonus was glad (hauing tarried but one day) to steale away by night, and returne into Media, from whence he came.

Of diuers ſtratagems practiſed by Antigonus, and Eumenes, one againſt the other.

THus did the Warre continue doubtfull, and was protracted to a greater length, each part hauing ſtout Souldiers, and skilfull Generals: but the ſide which had hitherto preuailed, being hindred by the equall authoritie of many, from purſuing all aduantages to the beſt. Antigonus grew daily weaker, in men and reputation, ſo that to repaire himſelfe he could finde no way ſafer, than to put all to aduenture. Hee knew that his enemies lay in their wintering places, quartered farre aſunder, ſo that if hee could ſuddenly come among them, he was likely to put them in great diſtreſſe. Between him & them, the way was not long, being only nine daies iourney, but very bad, through a rough drie wilderneſſe, hardly paſſable. Another way, fairer and leading through a Countrie well peopled, but requiring 25. daies iourny, he forſooke, partly for the length, partly, and chiefly, becauſe he would come vndiſcouered. So therfore taking his iourney in the dead of winter, he forbade vnto his men the vſe of fire by night, becauſe hee would not haue them deſcried a farre off. This commandement had beene well obſerued foure or fiue daies, when continuance of time (as commonly) breeding negligence, and the cold weather pinching them, they were bold to cheriſh themſelues, being neere to their waies end. The light of theſe fires gaue notice of their comming; which being reported to Peuceſtes, and other Captaines, they were ſo aſtoniſhed with the ſodaine danger, that in all haſte they betooke themſelues to flight. But Eumenes, meeting with the newes, began to hearten his affrighted companions, promiſing to make Antigonus march leiſurely, and willing them to abide, and draw vp their men together. They could ſcarce beleeue him; yet they were content to be ruled, and did as he appointed, who failed not in making his word good. He tooke with him ſome companies of the readieſt men, where with he occupied certaine tops of mountaines, looking toward the Campe of Antigonus: there hee choſe a conuenient ground to incampe vpon, and made great ſtore of fires in ſundry places, as if the whole Armie had beene preſent. This was a ſorrowfull ſpectacle to Antigonus, who thought himſelfe preuented of his purpoſe; and began to feare leſt he ſhould be compelled to fight, whileſt his men were tired with a long & painfull iourney. Therefore he reſolued to turne aſide, and take the way to ſuch places, as might better ſerue to refreſh his Armie. This he did with great care and circumſpection, at the firſt, as knowing how ready Eumenes would be vpon all aduantages. But after a while, conſidering that no enemy ſtirred about him, he began to pauſe, and thinke in himſelfe, that ſome what or other was not fallen out according to his opinion. To be the better informed in the matter, he cauſed ſome Inhabitants of that Deſert to be taken, and brought before him; of whom he learned, that they had ſeene no other Armie than his thereabout, but onely a few men that kept fires on the hil-tops. It vexed him exceedingly to finde that hee had beene ſo deluded. Therefore he went againſt theſe troupes with great furie, meaning to take ſharpe vengeance on them, for hauing ſo deceiued him. But by this time, ſufficient ſtrength was arriued there, which could not bee forced without much buſineſſe, and long ſtay. All the Armie was come, ſaue onely Eudamus, Captaine of the Elephants, who, beſides thoſe beaſts, had no more than foure hundred horſemen in his company. Antigonus hearing of this ſupply comming to his enemies, ſent aboue two thouſand horſe, and all his light-armed footmen, to cut it off by the way. Eudamus beeing fallen into this danger, was faine to place his Elephants round about his carriages, and ſo to defend himſelfe as well as he could; for his horſemen, ouerlaied with multitudes, were quickely broken, and driuen to runne away vpon the ſpurre. Neither knew they, who ſate vpon the Elephants, which way to turne them; for on all ſides they receiued wounds, and were not able to requite them with the like. In this extremitie there appeared braue troupes of horſe and foot, that came vnexpected to the reſcue; and charging the aſſailants vpon the backe, draue them to ſeeke their owne ſafety by ſpeedy flight. Theſe were ſent by Eumenes; who though he knew not what his aduerſarie meant to doe, yet he knew very well what was fitteſt for him to doe: and therefore, playing both games himſelfe, prouided the remedie.

§. V.

The conspiracie of Peucestes and others, against Eumenes his life.

BY these meanes Eumenes wanne great honour, and was by the whole Armie acknowledged a most expert Generall, and well worthy of the chiefe command. But Peucestes, and the other Captaines, guilty of their owne much insufficiency, were so transported with enuie, that they could no longer containe their vile thoughts, but held communication, as vpon a necessary point, how they might finde meanes to murder him.

Surely, it is great injustice to impute the mischiefe contriued against worthy men, to their owne proud carriage, or some other ill deseruing: For, though it often happen, that small vices do serue to counterpoyse great vertues; (the sense of euill being more quicke and lasting than of good) yet hee shall bewray a very foolish malice, that, wanting other testimonie, will thinke it a part of wisedome, to finde good reason of the euills, done to vertuous men, which oftentimes haue no other cause than vertue it selfe. Eumenes, among many excellent qualities, was noted to bee of singular courtesie, of a very sweet conuersation among his friends, and carefull by all gentle meanes to winne their loue, that seemed to beare him any secret ill affection. It was his meere vertue that ouerthrew him, which euen they that sought his life acknowledged. For they concluded that hee should not be slaine, before the battaile were fought with Antigonus, wherein they confessed that it stood best with their safety, to be gouerned by his direction. Of this treason he was quickly aduertised by Eudamus, to whom hee had done many pleasures, and by some others of whom hee vsed to borrow money when hee needed not, to the end that they should be carefull of his good, for feare of losing their owne. Considering therefore, and discoursing with himselfe of the villany intended against him, he made his last Will, and burnt all his Writings that contained any matter of secret: which done, hee reuolued many things in his minde; being doubtfull what course he were best to follow. All the Nobles of the Empire stood ill affected to the Royall bloud, excepting those which were with him, that were more in number than in worth. How things at that time stood in Macedon and Greece, either he knew not, or, knowing the truth, knew nothing that might incourage him to seeke their helpe, that needed his. To make his owne peace with Antigonus, had beene against his faith to Olympias, and the Princes, that had committed this great power into his hands. For which cause also it may be thought, that he forbare either to lose the battaile willingly, or to flie into Cappadocia, and make shift for himselfe among his old friends. At length he resolued to do his best against the common enemy, and afterwards to looke to himselfe as well as he might.

The last battaile betweene Antigonus and Eumenes.

THe Souldiers, especially those olde bands of the Siluer-shields, finding Eumenes perplexed, and not knowing the cause, entreated him not to doubt of the victorie, but onely to bring them into the field, and set them in array; for the rest, they alone would take sufficient order. The like alacritie was generally found in the common Souldiers faces; but the chiefe Commanders were so mischieuously bent against him, that they could not endure to thinke of beeing beholding to him for the victorie. Yet hee ordered the battaile so well, that, without their owne great fault, they could hardly faile of getting the vpper hand.

Before the Armies came to ioyning, a horse-man from the side of Eumenes, proclaimed with a loud voice vnto the followers of Antigonus, That their wickednesse in fighting against their owne Fathers, would now be punished, as it well deserued. This was not spoken in vaine. For the Siuer-shields were men of threescore or seuenty yeeres olde, and strengthened more by continuall exercise than decayed by age, and excelling in courage, as hauing passed through greater dangers, than any like to bee presented in that fight. Therefore Antigonus his men (who had often beene beaten by them, and were now to trie their last hope with these resolute warriours, the most Ancient and best regarded of all Alexanders Souldiers) grew very pensiue, and aduanced heauily, heauily, ſuſpecting their owne cauſe, and fearing that the threatnings vttered would proue true.

Antigonus was now againe farre the ſtronger in horſe, which gaue him cauſe of great hope; the ground, on which they were to fight, beeing a plaine leuelled field. Placing therfore himſelfe and his ſonne Demetrius in the right wing, and committing the left wing to Pithon, hee did ſet forward couragiouſly againſt the enemies, that were ready to giue him a ſharpe entertainment.

Eumenes tooke vnto him Peuceſtes, with the reſt of the Lords, and ſtood in the left wing of his battaile, in the face of Antigonus; meaning both to preuent the Traitors, his Companions, of all meanes to make head againſt him on the ſodaine; and (withall) to giue proofe of his owne valour, which perhaps he ſhould no more doe, in the face of all his enemies. In the right wing, oppoſite vnto Pithon, he beſtowed the weakeſt of his Horſe and Elephants, vnder one Philip, an honeſt man, and (which was enough at ſuch a time) obedient: commanding him to protract the fight, and make a reaſonable retrait, expecting the euent of the other ſide.

So they ioyned very fiercely; Antigonus, labouring to make himſelfe maſter of all; Eumenes, to die an honourable death, or to winne ſuch a victorie vpon his open enemies, as might giue him leiſure and opportunitie to deale with his falſe friends.

The footmen of Antigonus, being euen in their owne opinions, farre inferiour to thoſe whom they muſt encounter, were at the firſt brunt preſently defeated by the Siluer-ſhields, who ſlew aboue fiue thouſand of them, loſing of their owne not one man. But in horſe, Eumenes was ſo ouer-matched, that hee could not repell Antigonus, who preſſed him very hard, but was faine to ſtand wholly vpon defence. Yet his courage wrought ſo well by example, among his followers, that the enemie could not winne one foot of ground vpon him, vntill ſuch time as Peuceſtes, with one thouſand fiue hundred horſe, withdrew himſelfe out of the battell, leauing his companions fighting to defend his backe.

Then did Eumenes deſperately ruſh amongſt his enemies, labouring to breake open the way vnto Antigonus himſelfe. And though he failed of his purpoſe; yet with great ſlaughter he did ſo beat vpon them which came in his way, that the victorie hung a long time in ſuſpence, vncertaine which way to incline.

The ground whereon they fought, being of a ſlight ſandie mould, through the trampling of horſes, men, and Elephants, did caſt vp ſuch a cloud of duſt, as hindred the proſpect, ſo that no man could ſee what was done a little from him. Antigonus finding this aduantage, diſpatched away ſome companies of horſe, that paſſed vndiſcouered beyond Eumenes his battailes, and came to his carriages, which lay about halfe a mile from the place of fight, ſlenderly guarded, (for that the whole body of the Army lay betweene them and danger) and therefore eaſily taken. Had Peuceſtes retired himſelfe no further than vnto the carriages, he might not onely haue defended them, but peraduenture haue ſurpriſed thoſe which came to ſurpriſe them, and ſo haue done as good a piece of ſeruice as a better man. But he was gotten ſomewhat further, to a place, where out of danger he might expect the euent: and Eumenes was ſo ouer-laboured both in body and minde, that hee could not poſſibly giue an eye to euery place, beeing not well able to continue where he was.

It happened ſo, that the Elephants meeting together, thoſe of Antigonus had the better hand; whereupon Eumenes, finding himſelfe euery way ouer-charged, beganne to giue backe, and withdrew himſelfe and his companies in good order, to the other ſide of the battaile, where Philip (as he was directed) had by fighting and retiring together, kept that wing from loſſe. The Antigonians had felt ſo much of Eumenes that day, that they were well content to let him depart quietly, and wiſhed not to ſee him come againe; as faine he would haue done.

The loſſe of the carriages was reported vnto him, as ſoon as he had any leiſure to heare how things went: whereupon he preſently ordered his men for a freſh charge, and ſent for Peuceſtes that was not far off, requeſting him to bring in his men, and renew the fight, whereby he truſted, not only to recouer their owne goods, but to enrich themſelues with the ſpoyles of the enemies. Peuceſtes not onely refuſed to ioyne with him, but immediately withdrew himſelfe into a ſafer place, where hee might be further from ſuch dangerous temptations.

By

By this, the night grew on; and both Armies, wearied with fighting, were desirous to returne into their Campes. Yet Antigonus conceiued hope of doing somewhat more; and therefore taking halfe his horsemen, he waited vpon Eumenes a part of his way homewards, but found no opportunity to offend him: the other halfe he committed to Pithon, willing him to set vpon the Siluer-shields in their retrait; which yet he forbare to doe, because it appeared too full of danger. So the battaile ended; wherein Antigonus had not so much the better in horse, as the worse in foot: but the spoyle which he got, by surprising his enemies carriages, made amends for all his other losses.

How Eumenes was betrayed to Antigonus, and slaine.

EVmenes, comming into his Campe, and finding the Siluer-shields extreamely discontented with their misfortune, began to cheere them vp, and put them in hope of recouering all with aduantage. For their braue demeanor that day had so crushed the enemy, that hee had no power left, wherewith to abide them in open field, and was much lesse able to draw their Carts after him, through that great Wildernesse, ouer the high mountaines.

But these perswasions auailed nothing. Peucestes was gone; the other Captains would needs returne into the high Countries; and the Souldiers had no desire either to flie or to fight, but onely to recouer their goods. Wherefore Teutamus, one of the two Captaines of the Siluer-shields, (who had in former times readily consented vnto traiterous motions, in hope of gaine, but was letted by his partner Antigenes) finding, as hee thought, a fit occasion of making himselfe great, and winning the loue of those bands, dealt secretly with Antigonus, requesting him to restore vnto those olde Souldiers their goods, which hee had taken, being the onely reward of their seruices, in the warres of Philip and Alexander.

Antigonus, as a subtile man, knew very well, that they which requested more than they had reason to expect, would also with little entreaty, performe a great deale more than they promised; and therefore he louingly entertained the messengers, filling them with hopes of farre greater matter than they desired, if they would put Eumenes into his hands, by whom they were seduced to make warre against him. This answere pleased them so well, that they forthwith deuised how to deliuer him aliue. Wherefore comming about him, as at other times, to doe their dutie, and pretending more ioy of their victorie, than sorrow of their losse, which they said they would redeem by another fight; in the middest of this goodly talke, they leapt vpon him, caught hold of his sword, and bound him fast. So they haled him away; and stopping their eares against all perswasions, would not yeeld so farre, as to loosen one of his hands and let him kill himselfe, but brought him aliue (that was their owne Generall, vnder whom they had obtained many victories) as it had beene in triumph, into the Campe of their enemies.

The presse of men, running out of the Campe to see him, was so great, that Antigonus was faine, to send a guard of horsemen and Elephants, to keepe him from being smothered; whom hee could not sodainely resolue, either to kill or saue. Very few they were that sued for his life; but of these, Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus was one; the rest were desirous to be rid of him quickly; thinking belike, that if he were saued, hee would soone be the chiefe in reputation, for his great abilitie. So after long deliberation, Antigonus concluded, that it was the safest way, to put him to death; which intending to haue done by famine (perhaps because he would keepe it a while in his owne power, to reuerse the sentence, as desiring, if it might be, to haue him liue his friend) haste of other busines made him doe it by the sword.

To this end came all the trauailes of that worthy Generall Eumenes; who had with great wisedome, fidelitie, and patience laboured in vaine, to vphold the family which God had purposed to cast downe. Hee is reckoned among the notable examples of Fortunes mutabilitie; but more notable was his gouernment of himselfe, in all her changes. Aduersitie neuer lessened his courage, nor Prosperitie his circumspection. But all his vertue, industrie, and wit, were cast away, in leading an Armie, without full power, to keepe it in due obedience. Therefore it was not ill answered, by Gaspar de Colligny, Admirall of France in our daies, to one that foretold his death, which ensued soone after in the massacre of Paris; That rather than to leade againe an Armie of Voluntaries, he would die a thousand times.

Antigonus himselfe gaue to the body of Eumenes honourable Funerall; and rewarded the Treason, wrought against him, with deserued vengeance. One chiefe Captaine of the Siluer-shields he burnt aliue; many of the other Captaines he slew; and to the whole multitude of the Siluer-shields, that had betraied so worthy a Commander, he appointed a Leader that should carry them into farre Countries, vnder pretence of warres; but with a priuy charge, to consume them all, as periured wretches, letting none of them returne aliue vnto his friends and kindred, or so much as once behold the Seas that beat vpon the shores of Greece and Macedon.

§. VIII.

How Antigonus slew Pithon, and occupied Media. How he removed Gouernours of Prouinces, and made himselfe Lord of Persia, carrying away Peucestes.

THe two Armies being ioyned thus in one, were carried into Media, where they spent the rest of the Winter; the common Souldier idly; the principall men intentiuely bent vnto the businesse ensuing. Pithon began to consider his owne deseruings; for that the whole warre had beene chiefly maintained by the strength and riches of his Prouince. Besides, he thought himselfe as good a man as Antigonus, vnlesse it were in the Souldiers opinion, which he iudged easie to be purchased with gifts, and therefore spared not to assay them with great liberality. But in following this course, hee was driuen by necessitie to trust many, of whom hee stumbled vpon some, that were insecret, and others, bearing him no sincere affection. Thus was his purpose discouered to Antigonus, who (nothing like to Pithon) dissembled his indignation, and rebuked the informers, as breeders of dissention betweene him, and his honourable friend, vnto whom he meant to commit the Gouernment of all those Countries: his owne businesse calling him into the lower Asia. These reports, comming daily to his eares, did finelie delude Pithon. By his greatnesse with Alexander; his authority in that Prouince where they lay, whereof he was Gouernor; and the loue of the Souldiers which he had bought with money; hee was strong enough to maintaine, euen an offensiue warre. But what need had he to vse the sword, when hee was likely without contention, to obtaine more than his owne asking? Therefore he came as soone as he was sent for, to take his farewell of Antigonus, and to diuide the Prouinces with him, that meant nothing lesse than to yeeld to any such diuision. As soone as he came, he was taken, and accused, condemned to die, and slaine out of hand. For Antigonus, hauing begun with Eumenes his ancient friend, was not afterward restrained by any consideration of olde acquaintance, from cutting downe indifferently all that stood in his way: but swamme carelesly through the bloud, wherein at the first he doubtfully waded.

When this businesse was ended, hee appointed a new Gouernour in Media, to order the Prouince, and a Captaine, to suppresse all commotions: thinking belike, that the power and authoritie, so diuided, would hardly agree in one against him, from whom both were deriued.

After this hee marched into Persia, where hee was entertained, as absolute Lord of Asia. There began hee to shew how well hee vnderstood his owne mightinesse. For he placed and displaced at his owne pleasure, Gouernours in all Prouinces, leauing none in Office, that were not his owne creatures, excepting such as lay too farre off to bee dislodged easily.

Peucestes, who ruled in Persia, thought with good cheere to redeeme olde offences, but was deceiued, hauing to doe with one that could not bee taken with such baites: hee was caried away, and feasted with goodly words of promise, that neuer after tooke effect. Thus hee, that enuied the vertue of his friend, was driuen to flatter (in vaine) the fortune of his enemie, after which he led a most contemptible life, till he died obscurely a man forgotten.

How Seleucus was chased out of Babylon by Antigonus. The great riches of Antigonus.

SEleucus was the next in this visitation; one that had from time to time continued in the same tenor of good will to Antigonus, & now gaue proofe of his hearty affection toward him, by making the Captaine of the Castle of Susa to meete him on the way, rendring vnto him that strong Peece, and all the treasures therein bestowed. This offer was so great, that Antigonus (though hauing in his hands the Keeper of the place) could hardly beleeue it; but vsed him with excessiue kindnesse, for feare so good a mood should change. In that Castle he found all the treasures of Alexander, with the Iewels of the Persian Kings, which added to his former store of money, made vp 25. thousand talents. Hauing all this, he might well account himselfe a happy man, if riches were sufficient to happinesse. But large dominion was the marke at which hee aimed; therefore he proceeded, with intent to leaue no Country behinde his backe, that should not acknowledge him for Soueraigne Lord. Comming to Babylon, hee was entertained by Seleucus with all possible demonstration of loue, and honoured with presents, beseeming the Maiestie of a King. All this he accepted with great grauitie, as being due to him; and began to require an account of the reuenues of that Prouince. This demand Seleucus held vnreasonable; saying, That it was not needfull for him to render vnto any man an account of that Prouince, which was giuen vnto him, in respect of his many good seruices to the State. But whether he spake reason or no, it sufficed, that Antigonus was powerfull; who vrged him daily to come to a reckoning. Manifest it was, that neither want of money, nor any other necessity, moued Antigonus to presse him thus, but onely the desire to picke matter of quarrell against him, whereof it was likely that hee should finde such issue, as Pithon and Peucestes had done. Therefore taking with him onely fifty horse, he conueied himselfe away, and fled into Ptolomies Dominions; desiring him to protect him from such a man as went about to oppresse all, that in former times had beene his betters, or at least his equalls. Antigonus was glad of his flight; for now all those Countries were yeelded vnto him without battaile, whereas to fight with Seleucus for them, he wanted all pretence; and to kill him it was not his desire, hauing receiued many benefits of him, and those not intermixed, as commonly it happens, with any iniuries. Yet it is reported, that the Chaldæans brought a strange Prophesie to Antigonus, bidding him look well to himselfe, and know, that if Seleucus did escape his hands, he should recouer Babylon, yea, winne all Asia, and kill Antigonus in battaile. Easie beleeuers may giue credit to this tale. Had it beene true, me thinkes, Antigonus rather should haue hanged those Chaldæans, for giuing him no warning till it was too late, than sent pursuers (as they say that he did) after him, whom the destinies preserued for so great purposes. When he had setled things at Babylon, he tooke his iournie into Cilicia, where he wintered. There hee took vp ten thousand talents more of the Kings treasures, and casting his accounts, found his yeerely income to amount vnto eleuen thousand Talents.

CHAP. V.

Of the great Warre betweene ALEXANDERS Captaines: and how they assumed the name and state of Kings.

§. I.

The combination of Ptolomie, Cassander, and others against Antigonus. Their demands and his answere.

THis great riches, and the rest of his power, made Antigonus dreaded, enuied, and suspected, whereby he quickly was embarked in a new Warre. Ptolomie, Cassander, and Lysimachus, had priuily combined themselues together, intending to hinder his further growth, and bring him to more reason, than of his owne accord he seemed like to yeeld vnto. Of their practices hee had some notice; the good good entertainment giuen vnto Seleucus, giuing him sufficient cause of mistrust. Therefore he sent Embassadors to them seuerally, entreating them to continue firme in their loue toward him, that would be ready to requite them with the like. The cold answeres which they made, occasioned his hasty preparation against the most forward of them, which was Ptolomie, it being likely that a good armie should preuaile more than a faire message. Therefore, as soone as the season of the yeere would permit, he tooke the way toward Syria, & was encountred by Embassage from them all. These told him, that their Lords did much reioyce at his victorie, obtained against Eumenes their common enemie, and the honour that he had thereby gotten. In which warre, forasmuch as they being his Confederates, must haue endured great losse, with hazard of their whole Estates, if the contrary faction had preuailed; they held it very iust, that all should bee partakers in the fruits of that voyage, wherein they had beene all aduenturers. Wherefore they desired him, that making betweene them all an equall diuision of the treasures that were in his hands, (a thing easie to be done) he would also take some conuenient order for enlarging their Dominions, according to the rate of his new purchases. This might best be to euerie ones liking, if he would make ouer Cappadocia, with Lycia, to Cassander; and Phrygia, bordering vpon the Hellespont, to Lysimachus; for whereas his owne Dominions were so much extended Eastward by his late victory, he might well spare some of those westerne Prouinces, to those that were seated in the West. As for Ptolomie, he would not craue any new addition, but rest contented within his owne Territories. Prouided alwaies, that Seleucus their common friend, and partner in the late warre, might be restored to his owne, out of which hee had beene driuen so iniuriously, that all of them were forced to take it deeply to heart; requiring amends, with his friendly consent vnto their demands, which otherwise they must labour to obtaine with armed hands.

Antigonus knew, that after many losses receiued, hee should yet bee able to redeeme peace whensoeuer he listed, with these, or perhaps with easier conditions. Neither was hee so weake, to giue away quietly any part of his strength into the hands of such bad friends, for feare onely, lest it should be taken from him perforce. Rather he hoped that he should be able to finde them worke, more then enough to defend their owne. Therefore he roundly answered the Embassadors, that it was no part of his meaning to communicate with other men the profit of that victorie, which he alone without other mens helpe had obtained. Though indeed they had already sufficiently gained by him, if they could see it, hauing by his meanes kept their gouernments, whereof they were like to be dispossessed by Polysperchon, and the councell of estate in Macedon. But what maruell was it, if they considered not how he had saued them, seeing one of them had forgotten the time, when comming to him as a fugitiue, and begging succour, he was by his meere bountie relieued, and enabled to get all that he now held? Cassander did not (said hee) in those daies command mee to surrender Prouinces, and giue him his equall share of my treasures; but (for his Fathers sake) desired mee to pittie him, and helpe him against his enemies: which I did; by lending him an Armie, and Fleet, on confidence whereof he now presumes to threaten me. As for Seleucus, how can hee complaine of wrong, that durst not stay to plead his right? I did vse him well; but his conscience told him that he had deserued ill: else he would not haue fled. Let them that so curiously search into my doings, consider well their owne, which some of them can hardly iustifie. I am now in the way to Syria, meaning to examine Ptolomies proceedings, and after him to deale with others, if they continue to prouoke me.

§. II.

The preparation and beginnings of the Warres.

WHen the Embassadors were dismissed with this answere, nothing was thought vpon but warre. Antigonus perceiuing that he should be inuaded from Europe, as soone as he were entred into Syria; left his Nephew Ptolomie to guard the Sea-coasts, and hinder Cassander from landing in Asia: giuing him also in charge, to driue out of Cappadocia some that were already sent ouer to molest him. Likewise he dispatched Messengers into Greece and Cyprus, not vnfurnished of mony, to draw friends to his side, and raise vp troubles to his enemies. Especially, hee laboured to make himselfe the ſtrongeſt by Sea; to which purpoſe he rather haſtened, than foreſlowed his iourney into Syria, that he might get poſſeſſion of Mount Libanus, which affoorded many excellent commodities for building of a Nauie. Therefore, hauing erected Beacons, and laid poſt-horſes throughout all Aſia, to giue ſwift aduertiſement of all occurrences, hee inuaded Syria, that was not held againſt him by any power ſufficient to maintaine the field.

Ptolomie lay in Ægypt, the ſtrength and heart of his Dominion, where he was beloued and honoured of the people as their naturall Lord: his other Prouinces hee kept with a few Garriſons, better ſeruing to containe the people within obedience, than to confront a forraine enemie. So Antigonus tooke many Cities, and Places, of that Countrie, and began to ſet great numbers of Artificers on worke in making ſhips, which was one of his moſt earneſt cares. In theſe buſineſſes he conſumed a yeere and three moneths; not idly. For he tooke Ioppe, and Gaza, which were yeelded vnto his diſcretion, and well vſed. The ſtrong Citie of Tyrus held out long, but was compelled in the end by famine, to render it ſelfe vpon compoſition, that Ptolomies Souldiers might depart with their Armes; which was permitted.

Ptolomie was not aſleepe, whileſt theſe things were in doing, though hee kept himſelfe within the bounds of Ægypt, as indeed it behoued him to doe. His forces were not able to ſtand againſt Antigonus in plaine field, but likely they were to increaſe, which made him willing to protract the time. Neuertheleſſe by Sea (where his enemie was as yet vnready) he ſent his Fleet into all quarters, whereof Seleucus had the chiefe command.

Seleucus paſſed with an hundred ſaile along the coaſt of Syria, in the full view of Antigonus, and his Armie, to their no little diſcomfort. He landed in Cyprus, which was then gouerned by many pettie Lords; of whom the greateſt adhered to Ptolomie; the reſt were by the Factors of Antigonus, bought for him with gold, but now redeemed by the Ægyptian with ſharpe ſteele.

The ſame commoditie of aide by Sea encouraged the Preſident of Caria (called alſo Caſſander, but not the ſonne of Antipater, howſoeuer by the painefull and learned writer Reinerus Reineccius, he is by ſome ouerſight, counted for the ſame) to declare for Ptolomie and his Confederates, and buſily imploy in their quarrell all his forces, which he had hitherto kept in good neutralitie, and thereby enioyed reſt; but now he threw himſelfe into dangerous warre, chooſing rather to vndergoe trouble at hand, than to fall vnder certaine ruine, though ſomewhat further diſtant, which would haue ouerwhelmed him, if Antigonus had beaten all the reſt.

§. III.

How each partie ſought to winne the aſſiſtance of Greece. Antigonus his declaration againſt Caſſander. Alexander the ſonne of Polyſperchon reuolteth from Antigonus who had ſet him vp.

IN the meane ſeaſon all care poſſible was taken on both ſides, to aſſure vnto them the people of Greece, whoſe aide which way ſoeuer it inclined was of great importance. Herein at the firſt, Antigonus ſped ſo well by large effuſion of his treaſure, that he drew to him the Lacedæmonians, and other Peloponneſians, of whom hee waged eight thouſand, and cauſed Polyſperchon (who had a good while made hard ſhifts) to rowſe himſelfe againe, and taking vpon him the title of Captaine of Peloponneſus, to make head againſt Caſſander.

Theſe hopefull beginnings encouraged him to proceed further in the ſame kinde. Wherefore to make Caſſander the more odious, hee called together both his owne Souldiers, and all the Greekes and Macedonians that were to be found thereabouts. To theſe he declared, that Caſſander had very cruelly ſlaine Olympias, mother to the great Alexander; and not herewith contented, had ſhut vp in cloſe priſon the poore Lady Roxane, Alexanders wife, and his ſonne begotten on her bodie. That all this proceeded from a deſire to make himſelfe King ouer the Macedonians; which well appeared by his enforcing the Ladie Theſſalonica, Daughter to King Philip, a match vnfit for a man of no greater parentage than he, to ioyne with him in marriage. That in meere deſpight of thoſe dead Princes, Philip and Alexander, he had planted the Olynthians, rooted out by Philip, in a new Citie by him built, and called by his owne name Caſſandria; and had reedified the City of Thebes, which for the great treaſon of the inhabitants, was leuelled with the ground by by the victorious hand of Alexander. For these reasons hee required them to make a decree, that Cassander should restore to absolute libertie the Ladie Roxane, and her son; and should yeeld obedience to the Lord Lieutenant Generall of the Empire, (by which name Antigonus himselfe was vnderstood) or else should be reputed a Traitor, and open Enemie to the State. Furthermore he propounded, that all the Cities of Greece should be restored into freedome; this he did, not because he was carefull of their good, but for the need which he had of their assistance.

These things beeing decreed, Antigonus was perswaded, that not onely the Greekes would adhere vnto him, as to their louing Patron, and fall off from Cassander; but that the Rulers of Prouinces, who had hitherto suspected him as a man regardfull of nothing but his owne benefit, would correct their opinion, and thinke him the most faithfull of all others to the Royall bloud. But concerning his loyaltie to the yong Prince, the world was too wise to be deceiued with vaine shewes. His vndertaking for the libertie of the Greekes was more effectuall, and got easie beleefe, in regard of his present hatred to Cassander. Yet heerein also Ptolomie strooe to be as earnest as he, making the like decree, in hope to winne to himselfe that valiant Nation, which afforded men farre more seruiceable in warre, than were to be found in any Prouince of the Empire.

And this indeed was the point, at which both sides aimed. Wherein Antigonus thinking to make all sure, deceiued himselfe, not without great cost. For he gaue to Alexander the sonne of Polysperchon fiue hundred talents, willing him to set the warre on foot in Peloponnesus, whereby it might appeare, that on his side was meant nothing else, than what was openly pretended.

In Peloponnesus, Cassanders men had with much bloud-shed, grieuously afflicted the contrarie faction; and he himselfe perceiuing, that they were more easily spoiled as enemies, than retained as friends, thought it the best way, to make what vse he could of them, that were not long like to continue his. Finally, perceiuing that Alexander came furnished with plentie of gold, wherewith he was able, not only to winne the doubtfull, but to corrupt such as might seeme best assured: he thought it a part of wisedome, to surrender vpon faire conditions, that which hee could not assure himselfe to hold any long time by force. Therefore he sent one to deale with Alexander, about the matters in controuersie; telling him, that Antigonus was very skilfull in setting men together by the eares, not caring who preuailed, but onely desiring haue them to weary themselues, whilest he was busied elswhere; that so at length he might find opportunity to set vpon the stronger. If therefore Alexander were so wise, as to keepe in his purse the fiue hundred Talents which he had, and without stroke stricken, to receiue the whole Lordship of Peloponnesus; it should bee freely put into his hands by Cassander. Prouided, that hee should from thenceforth renounce all confederacy made with Antigonus, and enter into a sure & faithfull league with Ptolomie, Cassander, & the rest of the Confederates. Otherwise, he might well perswade himselfe, that the Countrie which his Father could not keepe, when hee was indeede the Lieutenant of the Empire, should not in haste bee wonne by him, that was onely the Factor of a proud iniurious man, so stiling himselfe, but not acknowledged by others.

Alexander had liued a while with Antigonus since the beginning of these wars; among whose followers it was not hard to discouer the intent, (which he did not carrie very secret) of making himselfe absolute Lord of all. Therefore he was soone entreated to accept so good an offer; and did not sticke to enter into that league, whereby he was to become a free Lord, and subiect vnto no mans controll.

Howbeit this his honour continued not long, ere he lost both it and his life together, by treason of the Sicyonians; who thinking thereby to haue made themselues free, were soone after vanquished in battaile by Cratesipolis, Alexanders wife, a discreet and valiant Ladie. Shee in reuenge of her husbands death, crucified thirtie of the Citizens taken in fight; and hauing by seueritie taught them obedience, did afterwards continue her Armie in good order, and gouerned those places that shee held, with the commendation of her Subiects and Neighbours.

§. IIII.

The Ætolians rise against Cassander in fauour of Antigonus, and are beaten. A fleet and land-armie of Antigonus, vtterly defeated by Ptolomies Lieutenant. In what termes the warre stood at this time. Antigonus drawes neerer to Greece.

ANtigonus, when he found, that with so much money he had only bought an enemie, began to raise troubles to Cassander and his other aduersaries in Greece, by stirring vp the Ætolians against them; Likewise he laboured to winne to his partie the Ilands in the Greeke Seas, by whose assistance hee might be the better able to deale with Ptolomie, that greatly preuailed by reason of his strong fleet. But neither of these attempts had the successe which he expected. The Ætolians, a factious Nation, & alwaies enuying the greatnesse of their Neighbours, were often in commotion, but so, that commonly their gaines equalled not their losses. Cassander wanne some of their own Countrie; fortified the Acarnanians against them, and compelled Glaucias, King of the Illyrians, whom hee vanquished in battaile, to forsake their side, and binde himselfe to beare no Armes against Cassanders friends.

On the other side, as many pettie Ilands were drawne to ioyne with Antigonus: so the fleet of the Rhodians vnder Theodatus, who was Admirall to Antigonus, passing along the coast of Asia towards Cyprus, with an Armie vnder conduct of Perilaus marching on the shore for mutuall assistance, was quite ouerthrowne by Ptolomies Nauie. Polyclytus, who in Ptolomies behalfe had beene sent into Peloponnesus against Alexander, finding no need of his seruice in that Countrie, because Alexander was come ouer to their side, returned homewards, and by the way heard of the course which these Antigonians held, whom he very cunningly surprised. Hee rode with his Fleet behinde a Cape, which the enemies were to double; his Land-forces he placed in ambush, whereinto Perilaus falling was taken prisoner, with many of his men, and many were slaine, making little resistance. Theodatus the Admirall perceiuing this, made all haste to help his fellowes that were on Land; but whilest he with all his Fleet were intentiue onely to that businesse, Polyclytus appeared at their backs; who as soone as he perceiued their disorder, hastened about the Cape, and charging them behinde, suffered not one of them to escape him. These ill tidings caused Antigonus to deale with Ptolomie about some composition. First, he sent Embassadors; afterwards they met in person. But Antigonus would not yeeld vnto the demands of Ptolomie: so the parlie was vaine.

Hitherto each part seemed to haue indifferently sped in the warre, and thereby to haue equall cause of hope and feare. This late victorie with the good successe of his affaires in Cyprus, did seem to make amends to Ptolomie for his losses in Syria. Likewise the reuolt of Alexander from Antigonus did equal the Confederacy, made betweene the Ætolians and him; as also those pettie skirmishes, that had beene in Asia the lesse, to Antigonus his aduantage, were sufficiently recompensed by others of like regard, but aduerse to him; and by the troubles brought vpon his estates in those parts by the two Cassanders.

Contrariwise, Antigonus valued the losse of his men, monie, and shippes, no otherwise than as the paring of his nailes, that were left long enough, and would easily grow againe; but the enlargment of his Territorie by addition of Syria, hee prized at a higher rate, as if thereby he had fed vpon a limbe of Ptolomie his enemie, and strengthened the body of his owne Empire. Concerning other accidents, whereof the good were hitherto sufficient to counterpoyze the bad, he meant to proceed as occasion should direct, which commonly is not long wanting to them, that want no monie.

That which most molested him, was the attempts of his enemies vpon Asia the lesse; wherein though as yet they had gotten little, yet had he cause to feare, lest the people being tied vnto him by no bond of allegeance, might vpon small occasion reuolt from him, to men of as honourable reputation as he himselfe. To preuent this, and to be neerer to Greece, he held it expedient for him to be there in person, where his affaires did seeme to prosper the worse, by reason of his absence. Therefore he left part of his Armie in Syria vnder his sonne Demetrius, to whom being then but two and twenty yeeres old, hee appointed many ancient Captaines or assistants, or rather as Directors: the rest hee carried with him into Phrygia, where he meant to winter.

§. IV.

How Lysimachus and Cassander vanquished some enemies, raised against them by Antigonus. The good successe of Antigonus in Asia and Greece: with the rebellion of many Cities against Cassander.

THe comming of Antigonus into those parts, wrought a great alteration in the processe of his businesse thereabouts. For his enemies had short leisure to thinke vpon molesting him in Asia: they themselues were held ouer-hardly to their owne worke on Europe side. Seuthes a King of the Thracians, ioyning with some Townes that rebelled against Lysimachus, brought also the bordering Scythians into the quarrell. All these relyed vpon Antigonus, who was to helpe them with mony and other aide. The Aetolians likewise tooke courage, and rose against Cassander, hauing Aacides, lately restored to the Kingdome of Epirus, their assistant. But Lysimachus gaue vnto his Rebels no time to confirme themselues. Hee sodainely presented himselfe before two of the Cities that had rebelled, and compelled them by feare to returne vnto their former dutie. Hee fought a battaile with the Scythians, and wilde Thracians, and draue them out of the Countrie. Finally, hee ouercame Seuthes; and following the heate of his victorie, slew Pausanias in battaile, whom Antigonus had sent ouer with an Armie; and all his men hee did either put to ransome, or fill vp with them his owne Bands. The like successe had Philip, Cassanders Lieutenant, against the Aetolians. For hee wasted their Countrie; fought with the Epirotes, that came to helpe them; and after the victory, fought againe with their forces ioyned in one, ouerthrowing them, and killing Aacides that vnfortunate King. Finally, hee draue the Aetolians out of most of their Countrie, and forced them to seeke their safety among the wilde Mountaines. Of the Epirotes hee sent as prisoners to Cassander, the principall authors of the Kings restitution, and of the present Warre.

Yet these actions required some time, and wearied Antigonus his aduersaries with painefull trauaile; after which they remained onely sauers. Antigonus himselfe at faire leisure, wanne all Caria the whilest, and sent Armies into Peloponnesus, and other parts of Greece, bestowing liberty vpon all the Cities hee tooke out of Cassanders hands. The whole Countrie of Peloponnesus (excepting Sicyon and Corinth) with the Isle of Eubœa, and many places of the firme Land, were by those meanes wonne to be his in true and vehement affection, readie to doe or suffer any thing for him that had made so euident a demonstration of his readinesse, to giue them the libertie in deede, which others had promised in idle words. Many States desirous of the same benefite, would faine haue shewed their good will; but they were kept in by Cassanders Garrisons, who was too wise to trust them loose. Therefore Antigonus made shew as if hee would passe ouer into Macedon: by which terror hee forced Cassander to repaire thither in all haste, with the best of his strength, leauing many good Townes of Greece so weakelie guarded, that well they might take courage to helpe themselues, if any forraine succour appeared. The aide which they desired was not long wanting. The Lieutenant of Antigonus, taking the aduantage of Cassanders departure, entred the Countrie; draue his Garrisons out of diuers Cities; forced the Gouernour of Athens to enter into league with their Lord; wanne the Citadell of Thebes, and set the people at libertie. This last action was somewhat remarkeable. For Thebes had not long before beene raised out of her olde ruines by the meere power of Cassander; of which act he was accused by Antigonus, as if it had beene some hainous crime. Yet now the same Antigonus winneth the Citie, and the loue of the Inhabitants, onely by expelling him that was their Founder. So much are men readier to thanke the Increaser, than the Author of their good; and rather to looke forward vpon those hopes, which vainely they extend beyond all measure, than backeward vpon their miserable nullitie, that held them vncapable of being any thing.

§. VI.

Victories of Ptolomie by Sea. A great battaile at Gaza, which Ptolomie and Seleucus won, against Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus.

AS the presence or neerenesse of Antigonus gaue life to his affaires in the lower Asia, and Greece; so the designes of his enemies, taking aduantage of his absence, ruined the very foundations of those great workes in the Easterne parts, wherewith in the yeere preceding he had ouer-topped them. The Isle of Cyprus, whose Princes wauered betweene contrary affections, inclining one while to Antigonus, another while faintly regarding their couenant with Ptolomie, was visited by an Aegyptian fleete, wherewith Ptolomie, in his owne person easily reduced them to a more setled order, putting some to death, carrying others away prisoners, and leauing a Lieutenant of his owne appointment, Gouernour of the whole Countrie. With the same fleet hee ranne alongst the Sea-coasts, wasting a great part of Caria and Cilicia, with the spoyles of which he enriched his followers, and returned loden to Cyprus. Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus, hearing frequent reports of the miseries, wherewith his Fathers subiects were oppressed, made all haste out of Syria to the rescue, taking onely his Horse and light-armed foote with him, because the businesse required expedition. But in vaine did hee tire himselfe and his followers, in hastie seeking of one, that by lanching out into the deepe, could in a few minutes delude the labour of so many daies, if need had so required. Answerable to the vanitie of this expedition was the successe. For Ptolomie was gone, before Demetrius came into Cilicia. Neither was it certaine, whether hauing lightned his ships of their burthen in Cyprus, he would return vpon those maritime Countries; or make towards Syria, where his comming was expected. He was indeed gone into Aegypt, and there with Seleucus was describing a royall Army, which he leuied with all conuenient speed, for the recouerie of Syria. This was more then Demetrius knew. Therefore hee was faine to choose out of vncertainties the most likelihood, and returne the way that he came, with all his companies, which were fitter for seruice in the open field, than to be bestowed in Garrisons among the Cilicians. Hee had scarce refreshed his Men and Horses in Syria, when the newes arriued of Ptolomies comming with a puissant Armie, to giue him battaile. Hereupon hee called to counsaile his principall friends, who aduised him to giue way to the time, and expect some better opportunity in the future: being a yong man, and weakely furnished with meanes to resist such ancient and famous Generalls, as Ptolomie & Seleucus. This counsaile seemed rather to proceed from the cold temper of those aged men that gaue it, than from any necessity growing out of the present businesse. For Demetrius considering himselfe to be the son of Antigonus, and now Generall of his Fathers Armie, thought his own title waighty enough to be laid in ballance against the bare names of those two great Commanders. Neither found he much reason that should moue him to distrust his forces, as insufficient. His men were better exercised than the enemies, and promised as much as could be required. Therefore perswading himselfe, that such oddes of number, and of great fame, would rather serue to adorne his victorie, than hinder him in obtaining it, he resolued to put the matter to triall, without expecting the aduantage of more helpe. So animating his Souldiers with hope of spoyle and rewards, he abode the comming of the Enemies at Gaza, with purpose to encounter them, as soone as they had finished their wearisome iournie ouer the Deserts of Arabia.

Ptolomie and Seleucus issuing out of so rich a Prouince, as Aegypt, came so well prouided of all necessaries, that their Armie felt not any great grieuance of the euill way, when battaile was presented them, which confidently they vndertooke. In all things else they had the ods of Demetrius; of Elephants they were vtterly vnprouided. But how to deale with those beasts they were not ignorant. They had prepared a kinde of Palisado, fastened strongly together with chaines, and sharpened in such a manner, that the Elephants could not seeke to breake vpon it, without receiuing much hurt. The rest of their forces, (which (besides that they had aduantage in multitude) were heartened with many fortunate seruices, by them performed that yeere, whilest the enemies had wearied themselues, either with vaine iournies, or long and dulling expectation,) they disposed in such order, as best answered to the forme, wherein Demetrius was embattailed. The fight beganne, and was maintained with equall courage, for a long time, each part striuing striuing more to win honour, than to satisfie any other passion, as hauing little cause of hatred, or reuenge. But after some continuance, the greater number holding better out, the errour of Demetrius, who vpon no necessitie would needes fight a battaile with disaduantage, began to appeare by his losses. Hee had committed himselfe to Fortune, hauing more to lose by her than he could get: but in this fight she was idle, and left all to be decided by strong hands; vnlesse it may be said, that the terror brought vpon his men, by the losse of his Elephants, was bad lucke. Those beasts were in that kinde of warre hardly to be resisted on plaine ground, and therefore at the first they made great spoile amongst Ptolomies men. Afterward seeking to breake through the Palisado, they were sorely hurt, and euery one of them taken. This disaster caused the Horsemen of Demetrius to faint. They had laboured hard, and preuailed little, till now perceiuing that all must lye vpon their hands, who were ill able to make their owne places good, they began to shrinke, and many of them to prouide for their safetie by timely flight, which example the rest quickly followed. When Demetrius had strouen so long in vaine to make his men abide, that he himselfe was likely to be lost; he was faine to giue place to the stronger, making a violent retrait as farre as to Azotus, which was about thirtie miles from the place of battaile. A great part of his carriages was in Gaza, whither some of his company turned aside, hoping to saue such goods, as in haste they could pack vp. This foolish couetousnesse was their destruction, and the losse of the Towne. For whilest they forgetfull of the danger, had filled the streets with sumpter Horses, and cloyed vp the gates, thronging, some to get in and fetch; others, to carry out what they had already loden; Ptolomies Armie brake in without resistance, taking them with their goods and the Citie altogether.

This victory restored vnto Ptolomie the best part of Syria, a Prouince more easie in those times to get, than to keepe; and opened the way vnto all the greatnesse of Seleucus. For betweene Gaza and Phœnicia no place offered resistance. In Cœlosyria and Phœnicia, some Townes held out a while, but were soone taken in by Ptolomie. Among these were the great Cities of Tyrus and Sidon; of which Sidon was giuen vp by the Inhabitants; Tyrus by the Garrison, falling to mutinie against their Captaine; who trusting to the strength of it, had made great vaunts, but was pardoned by Ptolomie, and honourably entertained, in respect of his fidelity.

How Seleucus recouered Babylon, and made himselfe Lord of many Countries, in the highest Asia. The Æra of the Kingdome of the Greekes, which began with the Dominion of Seleucus.

WHile Ptolomie followed his businesse with such prosperity, Seleucus tooke leaue of him, and went vp to Babylon, to trie his owne fortune; which he found so fauourable, that recouering first his owne Prouince, he became at length master of the better part of Alexanders purchases.

This expedition of Seleucus was very strange, and full of vnlikelihoods. His traine consisted of no more than eight hundred foote, and two hundred horse, a number too small to haue beene placed as Garrison, in some one of those maine great Cities, against which he carried it into the higher Asia. But little force is needefull, to make way into strong places, for him that already stands possessed of their hearts which dwell within the wals. The name of Seleucus was enough; whom the Babylonians had found so good a Gouernour, that none of them would finde courage to resist him; but left that worke to Antigonus his owne men, wishing them ill to speede. Some of the Macedonians that were in those Countries, had the like affection; others made a countenance of warre, which by easie compulsion they left off, and followed new Ensignes. This added courage to the people, who came in apace, and submitted themselues ioyfully to Seleucus. In a defection so generall, it was not a safe course for the Antigonians, to thrust themselues into the Townes of most importance: for euery man of them should haue beene troubled with daily enemies, in his owne lodging. It remained that they should issue forth into the field, and trie the matter by fight. But the treason of one principall man, who reuolted to the enemie, with more than a thousand Souldiers following him, so dismaied the rest, that that they did no more than seeke to make good one strong place, wherein were kept the Hostages and Prisoners, that Antigonus held for his security in those quarters. This Castle, belike, they had not fortified in times of leisure, against dangers, that were not then apparent. Seleucus quickly tooke it; and so got the entire possession of Mesopotamia and Babylon.

Antigonus had bestowed in Media and Persia, forces conuenient for defence of those Prouinces, that were the vtmost of his Dominion. In the Countries about Euphrates he had not done the like: for his owne great Armie lay betweene them and all enemies. Therefore when the victorie at Gaza had opened vnto Seleucus the way into those parts; hee found little impediment in the rest of his businesse. Hauing now gotten what he sought; it behooued him to seeke how he might keepe his gettings: for his owne forces were too small, and his friends were ill able to lend him any more. That which his friends could not doe for him; his enemies did. Nicanor, to whom Antigonus had committed his Armie in Media, ioyning vnto himselfe, out of Persia and other Countries, all needefull helpe, came with ten thousand foote, and seauen thousand horse, either to saue all from being lost, or to driue Seleucus out of that which he had won.

Against this power, Seleucus had onely foure hundred horse, and somewhat aboue three thousand foote, wherewith to oppose himselfe: his large conquest of vnwarlike Nations hauing yeelded him many louing Subiects, but few Souldiers. Therefore when his enemies were neere to the Riuer of Tigris, hee withdrew himselfe from the place where his resistance was expected, into certaine marishes not farre off; where he lay secretly waiting for some aduantage. Nicanor thought that he had beene fled, and was the lesse carefull in fortifying his campe. In recompence of this vaine securitie, his campe was taken by surprise, the first night of his arriuall; the Satrapa, or Lieutenant of Persia, together with sundry of the Captaines, were slaine, hee himselfe was driuen to flee for his life into the Desarts; and the whole Armie yeelded vnto Seleucus: whose gentle demeanour, after the victory, drew all Media, Susiana, and the Neighbour Prouinces, to acknowledge him their Lord without any further stroke stricken.

This victory of Seleucus gaue beginning vnto the new stile, of The Kingdome of the Greekes, an accompt much vsed by the Iewes, Chaldæans, Syrians, and other Nations in those parts. I will not make any long disputation about the first yeere of this Æra. The authoritie of that great Astrologer Ptolomie, from which there is no appeale, makes it plaine, that the fiue hundred and nineteenth yeere of Nabonassar, was the fourescore and two yeere of this accompt. Other inference hereupon is needelesse, than that note of the learned Gauricus, That the first of these yeeres was reckoned compleat, at Babylon, together with the end of foure hundred thirtie and eight yeeres after Nabonassar. With the obseruation of the Saturne, recorded by Ptolomie, agrees (as it ought) the calculation of Bunting; finding the same Planet to haue beene so placed in the signe of Virgo, as the Chaldeans had obserued it, in the same yeere; which was from Nabonassar the fiue hundred and nineteenth; from Seleucus the fourescore and two yeere; and the last of the hundred thirtie and seauenth Olympiad. These obseruations of the Celestiall bodies, are the surest markes of time: from which he that wilfully varies, is inexcusable. As for such occurrences in Historie, and the yeeres of succeeding Princes (that are not seldome ambiguous, by reason of vnremembred fractions) if they seeme to be here-against, it is not greatly materiall. Yet thus much is worthy of note; that these yeeres of the Greekes were not reckoned in all Countries from one beginning; as plainely appeares in the difference of one yeere, that is found betweene actions, related by the seuerall Authors of the two Bookes of the Machabees, who follow diuers accompts. He that shall adhere to the time defined by Ptolomie, may apply the other supputations thereunto, as being no farther from it, than a yeeres distance.

§. VIII.

How Ptolomie loſt all he wonne in Syria. What the cauſes were of the quiet obedience, performed vnto the Macedonians, by thoſe that had beene ſubiect vnto the Perſian Empire. Of diuers pettie enterprizes, taken in hand by Antigonus and Demetrius, with ill ſucceſſe.

IN a happy houre did Seleucus aduenture, to goe vp to Babylon, with ſo few men as his friend could then well ſpare: for had he ſtaied longer vpon hope of getting more Souldiers, Ptolomie could haue ſpared him none at all. Demetrius the ſonne of Antigonus, hauing loſt the battaile at Gaza, receiued from Ptolomie all his owne goods, his Pages, and Seruants, in free gift, and therewithall a courteous meſſage, to this effect: That no perſonall hatred was the ground of this Warre, which he and his Confederates held with Antigonus; but onely tearmes of honour, wherein they would ſeeke to right themſelues after ſuch manner, that other friendly Offices, without reference to the quarrell, ſhould not be forgotten.

This Noble dealing of Ptolomie, did kindle in Demetrius an earneſt deſire of requiting him, with ſome as braue liberalitie. Which to effect, he gathered together the remainder of his broken troupes, drew as many as could be ſpared, out of the Garriſons in Cilicia, or other Prouinces thereabouts, and aduertiſing his Father of his misfortune, beſought him to ſend a new ſupply, wherewith he might redeeme his honour loſt. Antigonus vpon the firſt newes of this ouerthrow, had ſaid, That the victory which Ptolomie wan vpon a beardleſſe Boy, ſhould be taken from him by bearded men: yet vpon deſire that his ſonne, whom he tenderly loued, ſhould amend his owne reputation, he was content to make a ſtand in Phrygia. Ptolomie hearing of Demetrius his preparations, did neuertheleſſe follow his owne buſineſſe in Cœloſyria; thinking it enough to ſpend part of his Armie vnder Cilles his Lieutenant, againſt the remnant of thoſe, that had beene already vanquiſhed, when Cilles too much vnderualued the power of ſuch an Enemie. Hee thought that this young Gallant, hauing lately ſaued his life by flight, would now be more carefull of hauing a faire way at his backe, than aduenturous in ſetting further forward, then vrgent reaſon ſhould prouoke him. In this confidence he paſſed on without all feare; as one that were already Maſter of the field, and ſhould meete with none, that would iſſue out of their places of ſtrength, to make reſiſtance. When Demetrius was informed of this careleſſe march; he tooke the lighteſt of his Armie, and made his iournie with ſuch diligence, one whole night, that early in the morning, he came vpon Cilles vnexpected, and was on the ſuddaine, without any battaile, Maſter of his Campe: taking him aliue, with his Souldiers, and their carriages all at once.

This exploit ſerued not onely to repaire the credit of Demetrius, which his loſſe at Gaza had almoſt ruined: but further it enabled him, to recompence the bountie of Ptolomie, with equall fauour, in reſtoring to him Cilles, with many other of his friends, accompanied with rich preſents. But neither was Ptolomie ſo weakened by this loſſe, nor Demetrius ſo emboldened by his victory, that any matter of conſequence therupon enſued. For Demetrius feared the comming of Ptolomie; and therefore he fortified himſelfe in places of aduantage: Ptolomie on the other ſide was loth to engage himſelfe in an enterpriſe, wherein he might perceiue, that if the comming of Antigonus found him entangled, he ſhould either be driuen to make a ſhamefull retrait, or a dangerous aduenture of his whole eſtate, in hope of not much more than already he poſſeſſed.

Antigonus, indeede, was nothing ſlow in his way towards Syria; whither hee made all haſte, not ſo much to relieue his ſonne, as to embrace him. For he reioyced exceedingly, that the young man had ſo well acquitted himſelfe, and being left to his owne aduice, performed the office of a good Commander. Wherefore to increaſe the reputation of this late victorie, he brought ſuch forces, as might ſerue to re-conquer all Syria: meaning, that the honour of all, ſhould be referred vnto the good foundation, layed by his ſonne; whom from this time forwards, he imployed in matters of greateſt importance.

Ptolomie had now leſſe reaſon to encounter with Antigonus, than before his comming to haue aſſailed the Campe of Demetrius. Yet he made it a matter of conſultation; as if he

he had dared more than he meant. But all his Captaines aduiſed him to retire into Ægypt; alleaging many good arguments to that purpoſe: which they might well perceiue to be agreeable to his owne intent, by his propounding that courſe; not without remembrance of the good ſucceſſe againſt Perdiccas, in the like defenſiue warre. So he departed out of Syria, preſeruing his honour; as being rather led by mature deliberation, than any ſuddaine paſſion of feare: and he departed at faire leiſure, not onely carrying his treaſures along with him, but ſtaying to diſmantle ſome principall Cities, that he thought moſt likely to trouble him in the future. All the Countrie that he left at his backe, fell preſently to Antigonus, without putting him to the trouble of winning it by pieces: ſo eaſie was it in thoſe times, for the Captain of a ſtrong Armie, to make himſelfe Lord of a great Prouince.

We may iuſtly wonder, that theſe Kingdomes of Syria, Media, Babylon, and many other Nations, (which the victory of Alexander had ouer-run, with ſo haſtie a courſe, as gaue him not leiſure to take any good view of them) were ſo eaſily held not onely by himſelfe, but by the Captaines of his Armie after him. The hot contentions for ſuperioritie betweene the King of Iſrael, and thoſe of Damaſcus; betweene Ægypt, and Babylon; Babylon, and Nineue; the Perſians, and many Countries; argue a more manly temper, to haue once beene in thoſe people; which are now ſo patient of a forraigne yoke, that like Sheepe or Oxen, they ſuffer themſelues to be diſtributed, fought for, won, loſt, and againe recouered, by contentious Maſters; as if they had no title to their owne heads, but were borne to follow the fortune of the Macedonians. This will appeare the more ſtrange, if we ſhall conſider, how the ſeuerall States of Greece (many of which had neuer poſſeſſed ſo large Dominion, as might cauſe their Spirits to ſwell beyond their abilitie) did greedily embrace all occaſions of libertie: and how theſe proud Conquerours were glad to offer it, deſiring to haue them rather friends than ſeruants, for feare of further inconuenience.

It muſt therefore be noted, that moſt of theſe Countries had alwayes beene ſubiect vnto the rule of Kings, or pettie Lords, whom the Babylonians and Perſians long ſince had rooted out, and held them in ſuch bondage, that few of them knew any other Law, than the command of forraigne Maſters. This had vtterly taken from them all remembrance of home-borne Princes, and incorporated them into the great body of the Perſian Empire: ſo that wanting within themſelues all ſoueraigne power, or high authoritie, the life and ſpirit of euery Eſtate; they lay as dead, and were bereaued of motion, when that Kingdome fell, whereof they lately had beene members.

Why the Perſian Satrapæ, or Princes of that Empire, did not when Darius was taken from them, as the Macedonian Captaines, after the death of Alexander, ſtriue to lay hold vpon thoſe Prouinces, which had many ages been ſubiect vnto them, & ſcarce foure yeers in quiet poſſeſſion of their enemies; or why at leaſt they contended not (when the terrible name of that great Conquerour did ceaſe to affright them) to get their ſhares among his followers, if not wholly to diſpoſſeſſe them of their new purchaſes: it is a queſtion, wherein, who is not ſatisfied, may finde no leſſe reaſon to ſuſpect the Hiſtorie, than authoritie to confirme it. For we ſeldome reade, that any ſmall Kingdome, preuailing againſt a farre greater, hath made ſo entire a conqueſt, in the compaſſe of ten yeeres, as left vnto the vanquiſhed no hope of recouerie, nor meanes to rebell; eſpecially when ſuch diſorders, or rather vtter confuſion hath enſued, by the furie of ciuill warre among the Victors.

The cauſe why the Macedonians held ſo quietly the Perſian Empire, is well ſet downe by Machiauell; and concernes all other Kingdomes, that are ſubiect vnto the like forme of Gouernment: the ſumme whereof is this; Whereſoeuer the Prince doth hold all his Subiects vnder the condition of ſlaues, there is the conqueſt eaſie, and ſoone aſſured: Where ancient Nobility is had in due regard, there is it hard to winne all, and harder to keepe that which is wonne. Examples of this are the Turkiſh Empire, and the Kingdome of France. If any Inuader ſhould preuaile ſo farre vpon Turkie, that the great Sultan, and his Children (for brethren he vſeth not to ſuffer aliue) were taken or ſlaine: the whole Empire would quickely be wonne, and eaſily kept, without any danger of rebellion. For the Baſſaes, how great ſoeuer they may ſeeme, are meere ſlaues; neither is there in all that large Dominion, any one man, whoſe perſonall regard could get the people to follow him in ſuch an attempt; where in hope of priuate gaine, ſhould not counteruaile all apparent matter of feare. Contrariwiſe, in France, it were not enough for him that would make a conqueſt, to get into his hands the King and his Children; though he further got the better part of the Countrie, and were by farre the ſtrongeſt in the field. For, beſides the Princes of the Royall bloud, there are in that Kingdome ſtore of great men; who are mightie in their ſeuerall Countries, and hauing certaine Royalties and Principalities of their owne, are able to raiſe Warre, in all quarters of the Realme; whereunto the remembrance of their owne ancient Families, and long continued Nobilitie, will alwayes ſtirre vp and inflame them: ſo that vntill euery one piece were won, and euery one (an endleſſe worke) of the chiefe Nobilitie, brought vnder or deſtroyed, the victorie were not compleat, nor well aſſured. It is true, that ſuch power of the Nobilitie, doth often-times make way for an Inuader; to whom the diſcontentments of a few can eaſily make a faire entrance. But ſuch aſſiſtants are not ſo eaſily kept, as they are gotten: for they looke to be ſatisfied at full, in all their demands; and hauing what they would, they ſoone returne to their old allegeance, vpon condition to keepe what they haue, vnleſſe they be daily hired with new rewards: wherein it is hard to pleaſe one man, without offending another as good as himſelfe. The Turke, on the other ſide, needs not to feare any perill, that might ariſe from the diſcontented ſpirits of his principall men. The greateſt miſchiefe that any of them could worke againſt him, were the betraying of ſome frontier Towne, or the wilfull loſſe of a battaile: which done, the Traitor hath ſpent his ſting, and muſt either flye to the enemie, whereby he loſeth all that he formerly did hold; or elſe, in hope of doing ſome further harme, he muſt aduenture to excuſe himſelfe vnto his Maſter, who ſeldome forgiues the Captaine, that hath not ſtriuen by deſperate valour againſt misfortune. As for making head, or arming their followers againſt the great Sultan, and ſo ioyning themſelues vnto any Inuader; it is a matter not to be doubted: for none of them haue any followers or dependants at all, other than ſuch, as are ſubiect vnto them, by vertue of their Offices and Commiſſions. Now as this baſe condition of the principall men, doth leaue vnto them no meanes, whereby to oppoſe themſelues againſt the flouriſhing eſtate of their Prince; ſo would it weaken both their power and their courage in giuing him aſſiſtance, if aduerſitie ſhould make him ſtand in neede of them. For there is ſcarce any one among the Turkes Baſſaes, or prouinciall Gouernours, that knowes either from whence he was brought, or from whom deſcended, nor any one among them, that by the loſſe and vtter ruine of the Turkiſh Empire, can loſe any foote of his proper inheritance; and it is the proper inheritance of the ſubiect, which is alſo a Kingdome vnto him, which makes him fight with an armed heart againſt the Conquerer, who hath no other deuice painted on his Enſigne, than the picture of ſlauery.

As is the Turkiſh Empire, ſo was the Perſian, voide of libertie in the Subiects, and vtterly deſtitute of other Nobilitie, than ſuch as depended vpon meere fauour of the Prince. Some indeede there were of the Royall bloud, and others, deſcended from the Princes that ioyned with Darius, the Sonne of Hyſtaſpes, in oppreſſing the Magi: theſe were men of reputation in Perſia; but their reputation conſiſted onely in their Pedigree, and their ſafetie in not medling with affaires of State, which made them little eſteemed. In what ſmall account theſe Perſian Princes were held, it may appeare by this, that the Kings Vncles, Couſin Germans, and Brethren, were called by the Kings, Their Slaues, and ſo did ſtile themſelues, in ſpeaking vnto theſe great Monarchs. That vpon euery light occaſion of diſpleaſure they were handled as Slaues; it is eaſie to be diſcerned, in that example of crueltie, practiſed by Xerxes vpon his owne brother Maſiſtes, which hath beene formerly noted, in place more conuenient. As for the Satrapæ, or Gouernours of the Prouinces, it is needeleſſe to cite examples, prouing them to haue beene meere ſlaues: it may ſuffice, that their heads were taken from them at the Kings will; that is, at the will of thoſe Women and Eunuches, by whom the King was gouerned.

To this want of Nobilitie in Perſia, may be added the generall want of libertie conuenient among the people: a matter no leſſe auaileable, in making eaſie and ſure the conqueſt of a Nation, then is the cauſe aſſigned by Machiauel. For as Æſope his Aſſe did not care to run from the enemies, becauſe it was not poſſible, that they ſhould loade him with heauier burthens, then his Maſter cauſed him daily to beare: ſo the Nations, that endure the worſt vnder their owne Princes, are not greatly fearefull of a forraigne yoke;

Nor

Nor will be hastie to shake it off, if by experience they finde it more light, than was that whereunto they had beene long accustomed. This was it that made the Gascoignes beare such faithfull affection to the Kings of England; for that they gouerned more mildely than the French: this enlarged the Venetian iurisdiction in Lombardie; for the Townes that they wan, they wan out of the hands of Tyrannous oppressours: and this did cause the Macedonians, with other Nations, that had beene subiect vnto the posteritie of Alexanders followers, to serue the Romans patiently, if not willingly; for that by them they were eased of many burthens, which had beene imposed vpon them by their owne Kings.

So that of this tamenesse, which we finde in those that had beene subiects of the Persian Kings, the reasons are apparent. Yet some of these there were, that could not so easily be contained in good order by the Macedonians: for they had not indeede beene absolutely conquered by the Persian. Such were the Sogdians, Bactrians, and other Nations about the Caspian Sea. Such also were the Arabians bordering vpon Syria: against whom Antigonus sent part of his Armie; thinking therewith to bring them vnder; or rather to get a rich bootie. The Captaines that he sent, fell vpon the Nabathaans, at such time as they were busied in a great Mart; wherein they traded with the more remote Arabians, for Myrre, Frankincense, and other such commodities. All or most of these rich wares, together with fiue hundred talents of siluer, and many prisoners, the Macedonians laid hold vpon: for their comming was suddaine and vnexpected. But ere they could recouer Syria, the Nabatheans ouertook them, & finding them wearie with long marches, made such a slaughter, that of foure thousand foote, and sixe hundred horse, onely fiftie horse escaped. To reuenge this losse, Demetrius was set out with a greater power: yet all in vaine; for he was not resisted by any Armie, but by the naturall defence of a vaste Wildernesse, lacke of water, and of all things necessary. Therefore he was glad to make peace with them; wherein he lost not much honour: for they craued it, and gaue him presents. Returning from the Nabathaans, he viewed the Lake Asphaltites, whence he conceiued hope of great profit that might be raised, by gathering the Sulphure. With this good husbandrie of his sonne, Antigonus was well pleased, and appointed men to the worke: but they were slaine by the Arabians, and so that hope vanished.

These pettie enterprises, with the ill successe accompanying them, had much impaired the good aduantage against Ptolomie: when the newes of Seleucus his victories in the high Countries, marred all together. For neither was the losse of those great and wealthy Prouinces, a matter to be neglected, neither was it safe to transport the warre into the parts beyond Euphrates, whereby Syria and the lower Asia should haue beene exposed, to the danger of ill-affected Neighbours. A middle course was thought the best; and Demetrius, with fifteene thousand foot and three thousand horse, was sent against Seleucus. These forces being sent away, Antigonus did nothing, and his sonne did lesse. For Seleucus was then in Media; his Lieutenants about Babylon withdrew themselues from necessitie of fight; some places they fortified and kept; Demetrius could hold nothing that he got without setting in Garrison more men than he could spare, neither did he get much; and therefore was faine to set out the brauery of his expedition, by burning and spoiling the Countrie; which he did thereby the more alienate, and as it were acknowledge to belong vnto his enemie, who thenceforth held it as his owne assured.

Antigonus had laid vpon his sonne a peremptorie commandement, to returne vnto him at a time prefixed: reasonably thinking (as may seeme) that in such an vnsetled state of things, either the Warre might be ended, by the furie of the first brunt; or else it would be vaine to striue against all difficulties likely to arise, where want of necessaries should frustrate the valour, that by strength of time was like to become lesse terrible to the Enemie. Demetrius therefore leauing behinde him fiue thousand foote, and a thousand horse, rather to make shew of continuing the warre, than to effect much, where himselfe, with greater forces could doe little more then nothing, forsooke the enterprise, and went backe to his Father.

A generall peace made and broken. How all the houſe of Alexander was deſtroyed.

THeſe ambitious heads, hauing thus wearied themſelues with vneffectuall trauaile, in ſeeking to get more then any one of them could hold; were contented atlength to come to an agreement: wherein it was concluded, that each of them ſhould hold quietly, that which at the preſent he had in poſſeſſion. As no priuate hatred, but meere deſire of Empire had moued them to enter into the warre; ſo was it no friendly reconciliation, but onely a dulneſſe growing vpon the ſlow aduancement of their ſeuerall hopes, that made them willing to breathe a while, till occaſion might better ſerue to fight againe.

Beſides that maine point, Of retaining the Prouinces which euery man held, there were two Articles of the peace, that gaue a faire, but a falſe colour, to the buſineſſe; That the ſonne of Alexander by Roxane, ſhould be made King, when he came to full age; and, That all the Eſtates of Greece ſhould be ſet at liberty. The aduancement of yong Alexander to his Fathers Kingdome, ſeemes to haue beene a matter, forceably extorted from Antigonus; in whom was diſcouered a purpoſe, to make himſelfe Lord of all. But this, indeede, more neerely touched Caſſander. For in his cuſtody was the yong Prince and his Mother: neither did he keepe them in ſort anſwerable to their degree; but as cloſe priſoners, taken in that warre, wherein they had ſeene the old Queene Olympias taken and murdered, that ſought to put them in poſſeſſion of the Empire. The mutuall hatred and feare betweene them, rooted in theſe grounds, of iniuries done, and reuenge expected; vpon this concluſion of peace, grew vp faſter than any time before, in the heart of Caſſander: who ſaw the Macedonians turne their fauourable expectation, towards the ſonne of their late renowned King.

All this, either little concerned Antigonus; or tended greatly to his good. The yong Prince muſt firſt haue poſſeſſion of Macedon: whereby Caſſander ſhould be reduced to his poore office, of Captaine ouer a thouſand men, if not left in worſe caſe. As for them that held Prouinces abroad, they might either doe as they had done vnder Aridæus; or better, as being better acquainted with their owne ſtrength. He in the meane time, by his readineſſe to acknowledge the true Heire, had freed himſelfe from that ill-fauoured imputation, of ſeeking to make himſelfe Lord of all that Alexander had gotten.

The like aduantage had he in that Article, of reſtoring the Greeks to their liberty. This libertie had hitherto beene the ſubiect of much idle diſcourſe: but it neuer tooke effect. Antigonus held ſcarſe any Towne of theirs, Caſſander occupied moſt of the Countrie: which if he ſhould ſet free, he muſt be a poore Prince; if not, there was matter enough of quarrell againſt him, as againſt a Diſturber of the common peace.

In the meane ſeaſon, the Countries lying betweene Euphrates and the Greeke ſeas, together with a great Armie, and money enough to entertaine a greater, might ſerue to hold vp the credit of Antigonus, and to raiſe his hopes, as high as euer they had beene.

With much diſaduantage doe many men contend, againſt one that is equall to them all in puiſſance, Caſſanders friends had left him in an ill caſe; but he could not doe withall: for where euery one mans helpe is neceſſary to the warre, there may any one make his owne peace; but no one can ſtand out alone, when all the reſt are weary. The beſt was, that he knew all their affections: which tended to no ſuch end as the becomming Subiects vnto any man; much leſſe to the ſonne of an Aſiatique woman, of whom they had long ſince refuſed to heare mention. Therefore he tooke a ſhort courſe, and cauſed both the childe and his Mother to be ſlaine: freeing thereby himſelfe in a trice, from the dangerous neceſſity of yeelding vp his gouernment, which he muſt haue done when the childe had come to age. Roxane was a Lady of ſingular beauty, which was perhaps the cauſe, why Perdiccas deſired to haue her ſonne, being as yet vnborne, proclaimed Heire to the great Alexander. Immediatly vpon the death of Alexander, ſhe had vſed the fauour (if it were not loue) of Perdiccas, to the ſatisfying of her owne bloudy malice, vpon Statira, the Daughter of King Darius; whom Alexander had likewiſe married according to the cuſtome of theſe Countries, wherein pluralitie of wiues is held no crime. For hauing by a counterfait letter, in Alexanders name, gotten this poore Lady into her hands, ſhe did, by aſſiſtance of Perdiccas, murder her and her Siſter, and threw their bodies into a Well, causing it to be filled vp with earth. But now, by Gods iust vengeance, were she & her sonne made away, in the like secret fashion; euen at such time, as the neere approaching hope of a great Empire had made her life, after a wearisome imprisonment, grow dearer vnto her than it was before.

The fact of Cassander was not so much detested in outward shew; as inwardly it was pleasing vnto all the rest of the Princes. For now they held themselues free Lords, of all that they had vnder them; fearing none other change of their estates, than such as might arise by chance of warre; wherein euery one perswaded himselfe of successe, rather better than worse. Hereupon all of them (except Lysimachus and Seleucus, that had worke enough at home) began to rowze themselues: as if now the time were come, for each man to improue his owne stocke. Antigonus his Lieutenants were busie in Peloponnesus, and about Hellespont: while their Master was carefull in following other, and some greater matters that were more secretly to be handled. He pretended the liberty of Greece: yet did the same argument minister vnto Ptolomie, matter of quarrell, against both him and Cassander; Ptolomie complaining (as if he had taken the matter deepely to heart) that Antigonus had put Garrisons into some Townes, which ought, in faire dealing to be set at liberty. Vnder colour of redressing this enormitie, he sent an Armie into Cilicia; where he wan foure Townes, and soone after lost them, without much labour of his owne or his enemies.

After this, putting to Sea with a strong Fleet, he ran along the coast of Asia, winning many places: and in that voyage allured vnto him a nephew of Antigonus (a good Commander, but discontented with the ill requitall of his seruices) whom finding shortly, as false to himselfe as he had beene to his owne Vncle, he was faine to put to death. But in doing these things, his desire to set the Greekes at liberty, appeared not so plaine, as he wished that it should: for their case was no way bettered, by his molesting Antigonus in Asia. Therefore to get the loue of that valiant Nation, He made at the last an expedition into Greece it selfe: where hauing set free some little Ilands, and landed in Peloponnesus, he raised so great an expectation of finishing the long desired worke, that Cratesipolis, the Widdow of Alexander, Polysperchons sonne, gaue vp into his hands the Townes of Sicyon and Corinth.

Ptolomie had conceiued a vaine beliefe, that the Greeks emboldened by his countenance and assistance, would all of them take heart, and rise vp in armes: whereby with little labour, their liberty might be gotten; and he be acknowledged as Author of this immortall benefit. But long seruitude had wel-neere extinguished the ancient valour of that Nation: and their ill fortune, in many likely attempts to recouer freedome, had so tired their spirits, that they would no more stirre in pursuit thereof; but sate idly still, as wishing it to fall into their mouthes.

The Lacedæmonians, about these times, began to fortifie their Towne with wals; trusting no longer in their vertue (for both it, and the discipline that vpheld it were too much impaired) that had beene a wall to their Towne and Territorie.

The Athenians were become as humble seruants, as they had beene, in times past, insolent Masters: erecting as many statuaes in honour of Demetrius Phalereus, as there were daies in the yeere. This Demetrius was now their Gouernor; and he gouerned them with much moderation: but in spight of their hearts, as being set ouer them by Cassander. By this base temper of the principall Cities, it is easie to gather, how the rest of the Countrie stood affected. Ptolomie could not get them to set their helping hands to their own good, and to furnish him with the promised supplies of monie and victuals. Credible it is, that he had a true meaning to deliuer them from thraldome; as iudging the commoditie that would arise by annexing them to his party, a matter of more weight, than the losse that Cassander should receiue thereby, who could hardly retaine them, if once Antigonus tooke the worke in hand. But when he found such difficulty in the businesse, he changed his purpose: and renewing his former friendship with Cassander, he retained Sicyon, and Corinth in his owne possession.

Before the comming of Ptolomie into Greece, Cassander had beene held occupied with very much worke. For (besides his paines taken in warres among barbarous Princes) hee found meanes to allure vnto himselfe, the Lieutenants of Antigonus, that were in Peloponnesus, and about Hellespont: making his owne aduantage, of their discontentments. By the like skilfull practice, Hee freed himselfe from a greater danger, & made those thoſe murders which he had committed ſeeme the leſſe odious, by teaching his enemies to doe the like. Old Polyſperchon, that had made ſo great a ſtirre in the reigne of Aridæus, did after the death of Roxane and her Childe, enter againe vpon the Stage: leading in his hand another ſonne of the great Alexander, and meaning to place him in his Fathers Throne.

The name of this yong Prince was Hercules: he was begotten on Barſine, the Daughter of Artabazus a Perſian; but had beene leſſe eſteemed than the ſonne of Roxane, either for that his Mother was held no better than a Concubine, or elſe perhaps, in regard of the fauour which Perdiccas, and after him Olympias, did beare vnto Roxane. At this time, the death of his brother had moued ſuch compaſſion, and regard of his being Alexanders onely liuing childe, had procured vnto him ſuch good will, that the demand which Polyſperchon made in his behalfe, was deemed very iuſt and honourable. There were indeed more hearts then hands, that ioyned with this yong Prince: yet wanted he not ſufficient ſtrength of hands, if the heart of him that leaſt ought, had not beene moſt falſe. Caſſander had raiſed an Armie, to withſtand his entrie into Macedon: but little truſt could he repoſe in that Armie, whoſe wiſhes he perceiued to be with Hercules. Therefore he aſſailed Polyſperchon himſelfe, with gifts and promiſes; wherewith at length he preuailed ſo far, that the old Vilaine was contented to murder his Pupill; chooſing rather with many curſes, and foule diſhonour, to take the offered Lordſhip of Peloponneſus, and Commander of an Armie; than to purchaſe a Noble fame with dangerous trauaile, in maintaining his faith, vnto both his dead and liuing Soueraignes.

Antigonus had not all this while been aſleepe; though his loſſes were hitherto the chiefe witneſſes, of his hauing beene a ſtirrer in theſe commotions, He thought it enough for him at the preſent, to retaine his owne: and therefore tooke order for the recouerie of thoſe places, which Ptolomie had taken paines to winne. As for the reſt, it no way grieued him, to ſee Caſſander incur the generall hatred of men by committing thoſe murders, of which the profit was like to redound vnto him that was the moſt powerfull: or to ſee Polyſperchon and Ptolomie ſweat, in a buſie warre againſt Caſſander. If they would haue continued their quarrels, he could well haue affoorded them leiſure, and haue thought the time well ſpent, in beholding their contentions. For he was throughly perſwaded, that when the reſt had wearied themſelues in vaine with long ſtrife, his armies and treaſures, wherein he exceeded them all, would bring all vnder. According to theſe haughtie conceipts, he demeaned himſelfe among his followers; looking big vpon them, and like a King before his time. This was it that cauſed ſo many of them to reuolt from him: but it was no great loſſe to be forſaken by thoſe that looked with enuious eyes vpon that fortune whereon their owne ſhould haue depended. Againſt this enuie of his owne men, and the malice of others, Antigonus buſily ſought a remedy, ſuch as was like to giue him a goodly title to the whole Empire.

Cleopatra, Siſter vnto the great Alexander, lay for the moſt part in Sardes; whom he had a great deſire to take to wife. This his deſire was not without good hope: for howſoeuer ſhe diſcouered much vnwillingneſſe thereunto, yet was ſhe in his power, and might therefore be entreated, were it onely for feare of being enforced. But it was not his purpoſe, to get her by compulſiue meanes: either becauſe his fancie being an old man, was not ouer-violent; or rather becauſe his ambition, whereunto all his affections had reference, could haue made ſmall vſe of her, by doing ſuch apparent wrong. She had beene married vnto Alexander King of Epirus, after whoſe death ſhe came to her brother in Aſia; hoping belike, to finde a new husband in his Campe. But neither any of thoſe braue Captaines, that were, in times following, ſo hot in loue with her, durſt then aſpire vnto her marriage: nor did her brother, full of other cares, trouble himſelfe with prouiding her of an husband. She therefore, being a luſtie widow, ſuffered her bloud, ſo farre to preuaile againſt her honour, that ſhe ſupplied the want of an husband by entertainment of Paramours. Alexander hearing of this, turned it to a ieſt: ſaying, that ſhe was his ſiſter, and muſt be allowed this libertie, as her portion of the Empire. When by his death, the Empire lay in a manner voide, and the portion due to her therein, grew, in mens opinion, greater than it had beene: then did many ſeeke to obtaine her, while ſhe her ſelfe deſired onely a proper man, with whom ſhee might leade a merry life. To this purpoſe did ſhe inuite Leonatus vnto her; who made great haſte; but was cut off by death, ere he came to her preſence. Now at the laſt, after long tarrying, she had her choise of all the great Commanders: Antigonus, Ptolomie, Lysimachus, and Cassander, being all her earnest wooers. All these (Antigonus excepted) had wiues already; Ptolomie had many wiues, and many Concubines, whom he respected as much as his wiues, being noted of too much dotage in that kinde. This hindred not his suite: peraduenture it aduanced it, by giuing to Cleopatra, some hope of mutuall toleration. To him therefore she bequeathed her selfe, and was taking her iournie from Sardes towards him; when Antigonus his Deputie in that Citie, made her to stay, vntill his Masters further pleasure should be knowne. Antigonus had now a Wolfe by the eares: he neither could well hold her, nor durst let her goe. Shee would not be his wife; hee had none honest pretence to force her; and to keepe her prisoner, had been the way, by which he might haue incurred a generall hatred, lasting perhaps beyond her life; as the course taken by Cassander against Roxane (a Lady lesse respected than Alexanders owne sister) did well testifie. Therefore he thought it the wisest way to procure her death: for to let any other enioy the commoditie of so faire a title to the Kingdome, it was no part of his meaning. To this purpose he sent instructions to the Gouernour of Sardes, willing him in any case to doe it secretly. So the fact was committed, and certaine women about her put in trust with the murder: which women afterwards were put to death, as mischieuous conspirers against the life of that good Lady. So was Antigonus freed from blame, at the least, in his owne opinion: but the world was lesse foolish, than to be so deluded. How the murther was detected, we neede not aske: for seldome is that bloody crime vnreuealed, and neuer so ill smothered, as when great persons are the Authors.

Thus was the whole race of Philip and Alexander the Great extinguished, and it was extinguished by the hands of such as thought vpon nothing lesse than the execution of Gods iustice, due vnto the cruelty of these powerfull, but mercilesse Princes. Wherefore the ambitious frames, erected by these Tyrants, vpon so wicked foundations of innocent bloud, were soone after cast downe, ouer-whelming themselues or their children, with the ruines, as the sequele will declare.

How Demetrius, the sonne of Antigonus, gaue liberty to Athens, expelling the Garrisons of Cassander out of those parts. The immoderate honour decreed by the Athenians to Antigonus and Demetrius.

NOne being left aliue, that had any title to the Kingdome; it stood with good reason, that they which were Lords of the Prouinces, acknowledging no Superiour, should freely professe themselues Kings in name, as they were already in substance. Yet had this name ill beseemed the weaker, while the strongest of all did forbeare it: neither seemed it conuenient in the iudgement of Antigonus, to crowne his last action with such a title, as if he had attained vnto greatnesse by that foule murder, the infamie whereof he was carefull how to discharge from his owne head. He purposed therefore to vndertake a plausible enterprise, euen the liberty of Greece: whereby it was apparent, that he might get such honour as would not onely drowne all bad reports, but make him be thought equall to any name of royalty, whereof in seeming modestie, hee was not couetous. To this purpose, he deliuered a strong Armie, with a Nauie of two hundred and fiftie saile, and fiue thousand talents of siluer, vnto Demetrius his sonne: willing him to begin at Athens, and thence to proceede, in setting all the Countrie free.

Demetrius came to Athens before he was expected: so that without resistance hee entred the Hauen; it beeing thought that a fleete of Ptolomie, Cassanders good friend, had beene arriued. But when it was knowne, both who hee was, and what was the cause of his comming; the ioy of the Citizens brake out into loud acclamations; Demetrius Phalereus forsooke the Towne, and withdrew himselfe to Thebes, vnder safe conduct; onely the Garrison in Munychia stroue to make good that piece, which after a while was wonne vpon them by force. During the siege of Munychia, Demetrius went to Megara; whence he expelled the Garrison of Cassander, and so restored the Citie to libertie.

I thinke it not impertinent, sometimes to relate such accidents, as may seeme no better than meere trifles: for euen by trifles, are the qualities of great Persons as well

disclosed, as by their great actions; because in matters of importance, they commonly straine themselues, to the obseruance of generall commended rules; in lesser things they follow the current of their owne Natures. The Lady Cratesipolis lay in Patras, and had a great desire to see Demetrius, hoping, belike, that she might, by his meanes, better her estate, and recouer her Townes of Sycion and Corinth, detained by Ptolomie; to whose Lieutenant, in those places, Demetrius before his departure out of Greece, offered money for the surrender of them. Yet the onely businesse pretended was loue. He being aduertised hereof, left his forces in the Countrie of Megara, and taking a company of his lightest armed, for guard of his person, made a long iournie to meete with her. This troupe also, he caused to lodge a great way from his Tent, that none might see her when shee came. As closely as the businesse was carried, some of his enemies had gotten knowledge of it; whereby they conceiued good hope, that the diligence of a very few men, might ouerthrow all the great preparations of Antigonus; and bring him to any tearmes of reason, by taking his deare sonne prisoner. Their proiect fell but a little short of the effect. For they came so suddenly vpon him, that he had no better shift, than to muffle himselfe in an old cloake, and creepe away disguised, leauing them to ransacke his Tent. There was in this Prince a strange medly of conditions; especially an extreame dissolutenesse in wanton pleasures, and a painefull industry in matter of warre. He was of a most amiable countenance, a gentle nature, and a good wit; excellent in deuising Engines of warre, and curious in working them with his owne hands. He knew better how to reforme his bad fortune, then how to rule his good. For aduersitie made his valour more actiue: prosperity puffed him with ouerweening, wherein he thought, that he might doe what he listed. His fortune was changeable, as were his qualities: turning often round, like the picture of her wheele, till she had wound vp the threed of his life, in such manner as followeth to be shewed.

Returning to his Campe, and finishing his businesse at Megara; he resolued no longer to attend the issue of a siege, to assaile Munychia by force, that so he might accomplish the liberty of Athens: which, vntill it was fully wrought out, he refused to enter into the Citie. Munychia was strongly fortified: yet by continuance of the assault, the multitude without, through helpe of their Engines that scoured the wals, preuailed vpon the resolution of those that lay within it, and wan the place in two dayes. The wals, and all the defences of that piece against the Citie, were leuelled with the ground, and so was it freely put into the Citizens hands, to whom withall was giuen their liberty, with promise to aide them in maintaining it.

The fame of this action was lowder, than of any other victory, gotten by Demetrius with greater skill and industry. For the Athenians, hauing forgotten how to employ their hands, laboured to make vp that defect with their tongues: conuerting to base flattery, that eloquence of theirs, which the vertues of their Ancestors had suted vnto more manly arguments.

They decreed, vnto Antigonus and Demetrius, the name of Kings; they consecrated the place, in which Demetrius leaped from his Chariot, when he entred their Citie, and built there an Altar, calling it of Demetrius the a-lighter; they called them by the Names of the gods their Sauiours, ordaining that euery yeere, there should be chosen a Priest of these gods; and further, that such as were employed by their State, in dealing with either of these two Princes, should not be called Embassadours, but Theori, or Consulters with the gods; like as were they, whom they sent vnto the Oracle of Iupiter or Apollo.

It were a friuolous diligence, to rehearse all their flatteries; these being so grosse. Hereby they not onely corrupted the yong Prince; but made that acclamation, which best would haue pleased the old man, to be of no vse. For he could not handsomely take vpon him the name of King, as imposed by the Athenians; vnlesse he would seeme to approue their vanity, in loading him with more than humane honors. Yet was he so tickled with this their fine handling him, that when their Theori, or Consulters came shortly after, desiring him to relieue them with Corne, and Timber to build ships; he gaue them almost a hundred thousand quarters of wheat, and matter sufficient to make a hundred Gallies. So gracious was his first Oracle: or rather, so weake is great power in resisting the assaults of flatterie.

§. XI.

The great victory of Demetrius against Ptolomy in Cyprus. How Antigonus and Demetrius tooke vpon them the stile of Kings; wherein others followed their example.

FRom this glorious worke, Antigonus called away Demetrius, vnto a busineſſe of greater difficulty; meaning to imploy his ſeruice againſt Ptolomy in Cyprus. Before his departure out of Greece, he was willed to eſtabliſh a generall Counſail, that ſhould treate of matters concerning the common good of the Countrie. About the ſame time, Antigonus withdrew his owne Garriſon out of Imbros, committing their libertie entire, into the peoples hands; whereby it might appeare, that as hee would not permit any other to oppreſſe the Greekes, ſo would he be farre from doing it himſelfe. This was enough, to holde his reputation high, among theſe new purchaſed Friends: it followed, that hee ſhould conuert his forces, to the winning of ground vpon his Enemies.

A pittifull Tragedy had lately hapned in Cyprus; through the indiſcretion of Menelaus, Ptolomies brother, and his Lieutenant in that Iſle. Nicocles, king of Paphos, was entred into ſome practice with Antigonus: yet not ſo farre that he thought himſelfe paſt excuſe; by which confidence, he was perhaps the more eaſily detected. To cut off this negotiation, and the falſe-hearted King of Paphos at one blow, Menelaus was ſent thither: who ſurrounding Nicocles his houſe with Souldiers, required in Ptolomies name, to haue him yeelded to the death. Nicocles offered to cleare himſelfe; but Menelaus tolde him, that dye he muſt, and bad him come forth quietly. This deſperate neceſſity, cauſed the vnhappie King to rid himſelfe of life: and his death ſtrooke ſuch an impreſſion into his wife, that ſhe not onely ſlew her ſelfe, but perſwaded the wiues of her husbands brethren to do the like. Alſo thoſe Brethren of Nicocles, vnto whom Ptolomie had intended no ill, being amazed with the ſodainneſſe of this calamity, did ſhut vp the Palace, and ſetting it on fire, conſumed it, with all that was in it, and themſelues together.

Whatſoeuer the crime obiected was: Nicocles periſhed as a man innocent, becauſe he was not ſuffered to make his anſwer. Of this ſad accident, though Menelaus deſerued the blame, for his rigorous proceeding: yet is it to be thought, that much diſlike fell alſo vpon Ptolomie: as men that are greeued, caſt an ill affection, euen vpon thoſe, that gaue the fartheſt remoued occaſion.

Not long after this, Demetrius came into Cyprus, with a power ſufficient, againſt any oppoſition that Ptolomie was like to make. The Cypriots did little or nothing againſt him: either becauſe they had ſmall ſtrength, or for that they held it a matter indifferent, whom they acknowledged as their Lord, being ſure that they ſhould not themſelues haue the rule of their owne Country. Menelaus therefore, out of his Garriſons, drew foorth an Army, and fought with Demetrius. But he was beaten, and driuen to ſaue himſelfe within the wals of Salamis, where he was ſo hardly beſieged, that without ſtrong ſuccour, he had no likelihood to make good the place, much leſſe to retaine poſſeſſion of the whole Iland. His greateſt helpe at the preſent, was the fidelity of his Souldiers; whom no rewards could win from him, nor good vſage (when any of them were taken priſoners, and inrolled in the enemies bands) keepe from returning to him, with the firſt opportunitie. Moſt of them were Mercenaries: but all their goods were in Ægypt, which was enough to keepe them faithfull. Yet could not this their reſolution haue ſtoode long, againſt the ods of number, which Demetrius had of men as reſolute, and againſt his terrible Engines of battery, if Ptolomie had not haſted to the reſcue.

Ptolomie brought with him, a hundred and forty Gallies, beſides two hundred ſhips of burden, for tranſporting his Army and Carriages. This Fleete made a terrible ſhew, when it was deſcried afarre; though more then halfe of it was vnfit for ſeruice, in fight at Sea. Wherefore to make the opinion of his forces the more dreadfull, Ptolomie ſent vnto Demetrius, a threatning meſſage: willing him to be gone, vnleſſe he would be ouerwhelmed with multitudes, and trampled to death in a throng. But this yong Gallant repaied him with words of as much brauery, promiſing to let him eſcape, vpon condition, that he ſhould withdraw his Garriſons out of Sycion and Corinth.

Demetrius had no more then one hundred and eighteene Gallies; but they were, for the moſt part, greater than thoſe of Ptolomy; better ſtored with weapons fit for that ſeruice; uice; and very well furniſhed with Engines in the prowes, to beate vpon the enemy. Neuertheleſſe he ſtood in great doubt of threeſcore gallies that lay in the Hauen of Salamis, leſt Menelaus with them ſhould ſet vpon his backe: in which caſe, it was very likely that all ſhould go very ill with him. Againſt this miſchiefe, he beſtowed ten of his own Gallies in the mouth of that Hauen, to keepe Menelaus from iſſuing foorth, and ſetting his horſemen on the ſhore, to giue what aſſiſtance they could, he with the reſt of his Fleete, puts to Sea againſt Ptolomy.

The fight beganne early in the morning, and continued long, with doubtfull ſucceſſe. The Generals were not ranged oppoſite one to the other; but held each of them the left wing of his owne fleete. Each of them preuailed againſt the ſquadron wherewith hee encountred; but the ſucceſſe of Demetrius was to better purpoſe. For his victorie in one part was ſuch, as cauſed others to fall out of order, and finally draue all to betake themſelues vnto ſpeedy flight. As for Ptolomy, hee was faine to leaue his aduantage vpon the enemy in one part of the fight, that he might releeue and animate thoſe of his own which needed him in another. Wherein he found his loſſe ouer-great to be repaired, by contending any longer againſt the fortune of that day; and therefore he labored only to ſaue himſelfe, in hope of better euent, that might follow ſome other time.

There fell out in this battaile no vnuſuall accident; yet was the victorie greater then could haue bene expected. The occaſions whereof were, partly the great skill in Sea-ſeruices, which the Greekes and Phœnicians, that were with Demetrius, had, aboue thoſe which followed Ptolomie: partly the good furniture of the Ships, wherein conſiſted no leſſe, than in the quality of thoſe with whom they were manned. Further, wee may reaſonably iudge, that the two hundred ſhips of burthen, carrying the ſtrength of Ptolomies Army, did not more encourage his owne men, and terrifie his enemies the day before the fight; than breed in each part the contrary affections, when in the beginning of the fight they fell off, and ſtood aloofe. For though it were fitting, that they ſhould ſo doe; yet a multitude, prepoſſeſſed with vaine conceits, will commonly apprehend very ſlight occaſions, to thinke themſelues abandoned. Beſides all this, the expectation, that Menelaus iſſuing with his fleet out of Salamis, ſhould charge the enemies in ſterne, was vtterly fruſtrate. He was kept in perforce, by the ten ſhips appointed to barre vp the mouth of the Hauen: which they manfully performed, as great neceſſity required.

Such diſappointment of expectation, doth much abate the courage of men in Fight; eſpecially of the aſſailants: whereas on the contrary, they that finde ſome part of their feares vaine, do eaſily gather hopefull ſpirits, and conceiue an opinion of their own ability, to do more than they thought vpon, out of their not ſuffering the harme that they had imagined.

Whatſoeuer the cauſes of this victory were, the fruit was very great. For Ptolomy had no more than eight Gallies that accompanied him in his flight: al the reſt of his fleet was either taken, or ſunk. Neither did Menelaus any longer ſtriue againſt the violence of Fortune; but yeelded vp all that hee held in Cyprus, together with his Army, conſiſting of twelue thouſand foote, and a thouſand and two hundred horſe, and thoſe Gallies in the Hauen of Salamis. The ſame deiection of ſpirit was found in the common Souldiour, as well that was taken at Sea, as that had ſerued the Egyptian by Land: none of them repoſing any more confidence in Ptolomie, but willingly becoming followers of a new Lord, whoſe Armie they now increaſed.

It was generally beleeued, that much more depended on the euent of this fight, than the Iſle of Cyprus; for which they contended. Wherefore the common expectation was great; eſpecially Antigonus, whom it moſt concerned, was deeply perplexed with cares, thinking euery day a yeare, till he were aduertiſed of the iſſue. In this mood Ariſtodemus found him, a noble flatterer, whom Demetrius had honoured with the Meſſage of theſe good newes. Ariſtodemus had bethought himſelfe of a tricke, whereby to double the welcome of his ioyfull errand: Hee cauſed his ſhips to ride at Anchor, a good diſtance from the ſhore; he himſelfe landed in a Cock-boat, which he ſent immediately backe to the ſhip; and ſo all alone, he went forward, looking very ſadly that no part of his tydings might appeare in his countenance. Report of his arriuall (for it was not knowne where he had bene) came preſently to Antigonus, who ſent Meſſenger after Meſſenger, to meet him on the way, and bring ſpeedy word how all went. But neither any anſwer, nor ſo much of a looke, as might intimate the purport of his errand, could be wonne from this demure demure Gentleman. Thus marched hee faire and softly forward with a great throng at his heeles (that serued well to set out his Pageant) vntill he came in sight of Antigonus; who could not containe himselfe, but went downe to meete him at the Gate, and heare the newes. Then did Aristodemus, vpon the suddaine, with a high voyce salute Antigonus by the name of King; vttering the greatnesse of the victorie (with as much pomp, as before hee had couered it with silence) in the hearing of all the people; who with loude acclamations, gaue that name of King, both to Antigonus and his sonne Demetrius. Antigonus, in requitall of the long suspence, wherein Aristodemus had helde him, sayd, that it should also bee long ere hee receyued his reward. But the Title of King, together with the Diademe, which his friends did set on his head, hee could not wish a fayrer occasion to assume: wherefore he readily accepted them, and sent the like to his sonne.

When it was once noysed abroad, that Antigonus and Demetrius called themselues Kings; it was not long ere their fellowes were ready to follow the good example. Ptolomie his friends would by no meanes endure, that their Lord should be thought a man dejected for the losse of a fleet; therefore they saluted him also King. Lysimachus in Thrace had boldnesse enough, to put the Diademe about his owne head. Seleucus had, before this time, among the barbarous people, taken vpon him as King: but now hee vsed the stile indifferently, as well among the Greekes and Macedonians, as in dealing with others. Only Cassander held himselfe contented with his owne name: whereby howsoeuer he might shadow his pride, hee no way lessened the fame of his cruelty against his Masters house. But the name which he forbore, his sonnes after him, were bold to vsurpe, though with ill successe, as will appeare, when they shall enter vpon the Stage; whereon these old Tragedians, vnder new habits, as no longer now the same persons, begin to play their parts, with bigger lookes, and more boisterous actions, not with greater grace and iudgement, than in the Scenes already past.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Warres betweene the Kings of Ægypt, Asia, Macedon, Thrace, and others: vntill all Alexanders Princes were consumed.

§. I.

The Expedition of Antigonus against Ægypt, with ill successe.

ALL the rest of these Kings had taken that name vpon them, in imitation of Antigonus himselfe, as beseeming his greatnes: which was such as gaue him hope to swallow them vp, together with their new titles. Being not ignorant of his owne strength, he resolued to single out Ptolomie, and make him an example to others: who should hardly be able to stand, when the greatest of them was fallen. To this purpose hee prepared an Armie of eighteene thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, with fourscore and three Elephants: as likewise a fleet of a hundred and fifty Gallies, and a hundred ships of burthen. The Land-forces he commanded in person: of the Nauy Demetrius was Admiral.

When all was ready for the iourney, the Sea-men aduised him to stay yet eight dayes longer, and expect the setting of the Pleiades. But his hastie desire to preuent all preparations for resistance that Ptolomie should make, reiected this counsaile; imputing it rather to their feare than skill: wherefore he departed from Antigonia (a Towne which hee had built in Syria, and called after his owne name, that was soone changed into Seleucia, by his mortall enemie) and came to Gaza, where hee met with his Fleet. The neerer that he drew to Ægypt, the more haste he made: thinking by celeritie to preuaile more then by his great power. Hee caused his Souldiers to carrie tenne dayes prouision of Victualles; and had manie Camels loaden with all necessaries for passing the Desarts, ouer which he marched with no ſmall toile, though he met with no reſiſtance. At Mount Caſius, which is neere adioyning to Nilus, he ſaw his Fleete riding at Anchor, not farre from the ſhore; in ill caſe, and many ſhippes wanting. It had beene ſorely beaten with foule weather, wherein ſome were loſt, others driuen backe to Gaza, or ſcattered elſewhere into ſuch creekes, as they could recouer: Demetrius himſelfe, with the beſt and ſtrongeſt veſſels, did ſo long beat it vp againſt the wind, that all his freſh water was ſpent; in which extremity, he and all his muſt haue periſhed, had not the tempeſt ceaſed when it did, and Antigonus appeared in ſight, from whom theſe ouer-wearied, thirſty and Sea-beaten Souldiers receyued reliefe. After theſe painfull trauailes, there followed a warre no leſſe painfull than to little purpoſe; for Ptolomie had ſo fortified all the paſſages vpon the Riuer of Nilus, as he aſſured himſelfe either to end the warre there, or if his guardes ſhould happen to be forſt, yet could it not be done, but ſo much to the weakning of the Aſſailants, as he ſhould afterward, with a ſecond Armie (which he held entire) entertain the Inuader vpon aduantage enough. All that Antigonus ſought, was to come to blowes ſpeedily: Ptolomie on the contrary, to beat Antigonus by the belly. It is true that Nilus giue him water enough, but wood he had none to warme it, and while Antigonus aſſaulted the Rampiers raiſed vpon the Riuer in vaine, Ptolomie aſſaied the faith of his ſouldiers with good ſucceſſe, for with great gifts and greater promiſes, he ferried them ouer ſo faſt, as had not Antigonus thruſt ſome aſſured Regiments, vpon the paſſages next the enemy, and in the meane while taken a reſolution to returne, Ptolomie had turned him out of Ægypt ill attended.

Some of them indeede he laid hands on, in the way of their eſcape, and thoſe he put to death with extreme torments; but in all likelihood with the ſame ill ſucceſſe that Perdiccas had formerly done, when he inuaded Ægypt: had he not readily remoued his armie further off, from the noiſe of their entertainment, that had already bene won from him. To preuent therefore as wel the preſent danger of his ſtay, as the ſhame following a forſt retrait, he ſecretly practiſed the aduice of his Councell, vpon whom the burthen muſt be laid of his entrance, and leauing Ægypt.

It is indeede leſſe preiudiciall in ſuch like caſes, that errors, diſhonours, and loſſes, bee laid on Counſellors & Captaines, than on Kings; on the Directed, than on the Director: for the honour and reputation of a Prince is farre more precious, than that of a Vaſſall. Charles the fift, as many other Princes haue done, laide the loſſe and diſhonour he receiued in the inuaſion of France, by the way of Prouence, to Antonie de Leua, whether iuſtly or no, I know not; but howſoeuer, all the Hiſtorians of that time agree, that the ſorrow thereof coſt that braue Captaine his life. Certainly to giue any violent aduice in doubtfull enterpriſes, is rather a teſtimony of loue, than of wiſedome, in the giuer; for the il ſucceſſe is alwaies caſt vpon the Councell, the good neuer wants a Father, though a falſe one, to acknowledge it. Yet I haue ſometime knowne it, that great Commanders, who are for the preſent in place of Kings, haue not onely bene diſſwaded, but held in a kind by ſtrong hand, from hazarding their owne perſons, and yet haue thoſe kinde of Mutiners neuer bene called to a Marſhals Court.

§. II.

How the Citie of Rhodes was beſieged by Demetrius.

THis departure of Antigonus, left behind it many dead carcaſſes, and a great deale of ioy in Ægypt. Ptolomie held a ſolemne Feaſt, and ſent Meſſengers abroad, loaden with glad newes, to Seleucus, Lyſimachus, and Caſſander his Confederates: ſtrongly encouraging all that ſide, with the report of this his late felicity, though it appeared but in a defenſiue Warre. Antigonus on the contrary, flattered himſelfe with another interpretation, calling the ioyes of his enemies for witneſſes of his owne greatneſſe, ſeeing they aroſe but from ſo little things: his enemies being but bare ſauers by the laſt bargaine, and himſelfe, as he ſuppoſed, hauing loſt but a little time, and no part of his honour in the late retraite. Howſoeuer it were, yet he meant to follow his affayres henceforth in another faſhion, for that which hee could not cleane a-funder by great blowes, he purpoſed by little and little to pare off, by cutting off the branches firſt, to fell the Tree it ſelfe with the more facilrie. To effect which, he reſolued (leauing the great ones to grow a while) to roote vp the Dependants of his Enemies: Dependants, whom the forenamed Confederates should be forst, either to relieue, or to lose; and hereby hee doubted not, to draw them into the field, where the aduantage of power, and of all other warlike prouisions, promised him victorie.

At this time the Citie of Rhodes was very mightie, being well gouerned, and hauing long held it selfe in good Neutralitie, it drew the better part of all the trade of those parts, and there a great deale of riches to it selfe, to maintaine which, and to increase it, it furnished and kept on the Seas a Fleete of well armed shippes, by which it not onely beate off all Pyrates and pettie Theeues, but the reputation of their strength was thereby so much increased, as all the neighbour Princes sought their alliance and confederacie.

In this so dangerous a time (in which they must either refuse all that sought them, and so stand friendlesse and apart, or ioyne themselues to some one; and thereby forgoe the peace, by which their greatnesse had growne) their affections carried them to the Ægyptian: both because the greatest part of their trade lay that way, as also for that Antigonus his disposition, greatnes, and neighbourhood was fearefull vnto them. This affection of theirs, with some other passages, more apparent; gaue argument of quarrell to Antigonus, who began to declare himself against them by pettie iniuries, of taking some of their ships, with such other grieuances, while hee made a more waighty preparation, to pursue the warre against them, openly and strongly. All things soon after ordered according to the greatnesse of the enterprise, hee employed his sonne Demetrius against them in their owne Iland, who brought such terror vpon the Citizens, that laying aside all respect of friendship and honor, they offered him their assistance, and seruice against whomsoeuer. Demetrius, who knew from whence this change came, and that the alteration was perswaded by feare, & not by loue; raised his demands to an intollerable height, requiring a hundred Hostages to be deliuered him, and liberty to lodge in their Port as many ships of warre as himselfe pleased. These conditions more properly to bee imposed vpon a State already conquered, then on those who as yet had heard of nothing but a constrained assistance, restored vnto the Rhodians their lost courage, and made them resolue to defend their libertie to the last man: this taught them to infranchise all their able bondmen, and wisely rather to make them their fellow-Citizens, than to make themselues fellow-slaues with them.

Demetrius hauing refused the faire conditions offered, (as the Rhodians the fearefull ones propounded vnto them) makes preparation for a long siege, and finding no appearance to carrie the place in furie, hee set in hand with his Engines of batterie; in the inuention and vse of which, hee did neuer shew himselfe a greater Artisan, than in this warre. But in conclusion, after the Citizens had sustained all the assaults giuen them for a whole yeere, after many braue sallies out of the Towne, and the famine which they endured within the Towne, which had proued farre more extreame, if Ptolomie had not with many hazards relieued them, Demetrius by mediation of the Grecian Embassadors, gaue ouer the siege; a hundred Hostages they gaue him for performance of the peace made, but with exception of all the Magistrates and Officers of the Citie.

Hereunto Demetrius was brought by the vsuall policie of warre, and state: for while with the flowre of all his fathers forces, he lay before Rhodes, Cassander recouered many of those places in Greece, which Demetrius had formerly taken from him; neither did Cassander make the warre as in former times, by practice and surprise, but by a strong and well compounded armie, which he himselfe ledde as farre as into Attica, and therewith greatly distressed & indangered Athens it selfe. On the other side (though with lesse successe) did Polysperchon inuade Peloponnesus. These dangerous vndertakings vppon Greece, aduised the Athenians and Ætolians to dispatch their Embassadours towards Demetrius, and aduised Demetrius, rather to abandon the enterprise of Rhodes, than to abandon the great honour which hee had formerlie gotten, by setting all Greece at libertie.

Demetrius was no sooner out of the Iland, then that the Rhodians erected statues in honour of Lysimachus and Cassander, but for Ptolomie, whom they most affected, and from whom they receiued their most reliefe, they cõsulted with the Oracle of Iupiter, whether it were not lawfull to call him a god. The Priests which attended in the Temple of Hammon, gaue the same faire answer for Ptolomy, which they had formerly done for Alexander his his Maſter, for as Alexander conſulted the Oracle with an Armie at his heeles; ſo was Ptolomie at this time Lord of the ſoile: and yet was this a farre more cleanly creation, than that done by the Athenians, who Deified Antigonus and Demetrius, by decree of the people. A madde age it was, when ſo many of Alexanders Captaines could not content themſelues with the ſtile of Kings, but that they would needs be called gods.

§. III.

How Demetrius preuailed in Greece. Caſſander deſires peace of Antigonus, and cannot obtaine it. Great preparations of warre againſt Antigonus.

Demetrius comming with a ſtrong Fleet and Armie into Greece, quickely draue Caſſander out of Attica; and purſuing his fortune, chaſed him beyond the ſtraits of Thermopyla. Herein his reputation did much auaile him; which was ſo great, that ſixe thouſand of his enemies Souldiers reuolted vnto him. So partly by the greatneſſe of his name, partly by force, hee recouered in ſhort ſpace all that Caſſander held in thoſe ſtraits, and giuing libertie vnto the people, hee beſtowed vpon the Athenians thoſe peeces, which had beene fortified againſt them, to blocke them vp. Then went hee into Peloponneſus, where hee found the like, or more eaſie ſucceſſe: for hee ſuddenly tooke Argos, Corinth, Sicyon, and the moſt of the Countrie, beſtowing libertie vpon ſuch as needed it. The Towne of Sicyon he tranſlated by conſent of the Citizens, from the old ſeat into another place, and called it after his owne name Demetrias. This done, hee betooke himſelfe to his pleaſure. At the Iſthmian games, he cauſed himſelfe to be proclaimed Captaine Generall of Greece, as Philip and Alexander had beene in former times: whereupon (as if hee were now become as great as Alexander) hee deſpiſed all others, making it a matter of ieſt, that any, ſaue himſelfe or his father, ſhould vſurpe the name of King. But in his behauiour he was ſo farre vnlike to a King, that in all the time of his leiſure, he deſerued none other name then of a drunken Palliard. Yet were the Athenians as readie as euer to deuiſe new honours for him: among which they made one Decree, that whatſoeuer King Demetrius ſhould command, ought to be held ſacred with the gods, and iuſt with men.

All Greece being now at the diſpoſition of Antigonus, Caſſander ſtood in great feare, leſt the warre ſhould fall heauily vpon him in Macedon: which to auoid, he knew no better way then to make peace with his enemies betimes. And to that purpoſe he ſent Embaſſadors; but had no better anſwere from Antigonus, then that hee ſhould ſubmit his whole eſtate to his diſcretion. This proud demand made him looke about him, and labour hard in ſolliciting his friends, both to aſſiſt him, and take heed to themſelues; neither found he them ſlow in apprehending the common danger: for Lyſimachus knew that if once Caſſander had loſt Macedon, Demetrius would ſoone be maſter of Thrace. Neither were Ptolomie and Seleucus ignorant of that, which was like to befall them, if Antigonus were ſuffered to put himſelfe in quiet poſſeſſion of thoſe Prouinces in Europe. Wherefore it was agreed, that with ioynt forces they ſhould all together ſet vpon the common Enemie.

Heereof Antigonus had notice: but ſcorned all their preparations, ſaying, That hee would as eaſily ſcatter them, as a flocke of birds are driuen away with a ſtone. With theſe conceipts he pleaſed himſelfe, and no way hindred the proceedings of his Enemies. He lay at that time in his Towne of Antigonia (a name that it muſt ſhortly looſe) where he was carefully prouiding to ſet out ſome ſtately game and Pageants, in oſtentation of his glorie. But thither was brought vnto him the tumultuous newes of Lyſimachus his victories about Helleſpont. For Caſſander had committed vnto Lyſimachus part of his forces, wherewith to paſſe ouer into Aſia, while hee himſefle with the reſt ſhould oppoſe Demetrius on Europe ſide. So Lyſimachus paſſing the Helleſpont, began to make hot Warre vpon the ſubiects of Antigonus; getting ſome of the Cities in thoſe parts, to ioyne with him, by faire meanes: winning others by force, and waſting the Country round about.

To repreſſe this vnexpected boldneſſe, Antigonus made haſtie iournies, and came ſoone enough to recouer his loſſes, but not ſtrong enough to driue Lyſimachus home, or compell him to come to battaile. Lyſimachus waited for the comming of Seleucus; keeping ping himselfe the whilest from necessity of fighting. But Babylon was farre off; and Seleucus his preparations were too great to bee soone in a readinesse. The Winter also did hinder his iourney: which inforced them on both sides to rest in some quiet, without performing any matter of importance. This delay of debating the quarrell in open field, held all those Nations in a great suspence, & bred much expectation. Yet might all haue come to nothing, had not Antigonus been so forward, that he refused to yeeld vpon any peaceable conditions. At length Seleucus drew neere with a mighty Armie of his owne (for hee had gathered strength in that long time of leysure, which Antigonus had giuen him) and with great aid from Ptolomie, that was ioyned with his forces.

To helpe in this needfull case, Demetrius was called ouer into Asia by his Fathers letters: which hee readily obeyed. Before his departure out of Greece, he made peace with Cassander, vpon reasonable termes: to the end hee might not bee driuen to leaue any part of his Army for defence of the Countrie; and that his iournie might bee without any such blemish of reputation, as if hee had abandoned his Dependants: for one Article of the peace was, That all the Cities of Greece should bee at libertie. Cassander was glad to be so ridde of an Enemy that was too strong for him. Yet would this league haue done him little good, if things had fallen out contrariwise then they did in Asia; seeing the ratification thereof was referred vnto Antigonus. It sufficed, that for the present, euery one found meanes to cleere himselfe of all incumbrances else-where, to the end that each of them might freely apply himselfe to the triall of the maine controuersie in Asia.

Seleucus, with his sonne Antiochus, ioyning with Lysimachus, compounded a great Armie, which was (all considered) not inferiour to that of the Enemie. In greatnesse of name (that helpeth much in all warres, but especially in the Ciuill) they were rather vnanswerable, than vnequall to their aduersaries: for Antigonus had of long time kept them vnder with a mastering spirit, and had beene reputed a King indeed, when the rest were held but Vsurpers of the title. Likewise Demetrius was generally acknowledged a braue Commander, hauing giuen proofe of his worth in many great seruices of all kinds, and inriched the Art of war with many inuentions, whicheuen his enemies, and particularly Lysimachus, did much admire. Seleucus, who had sometimes flattered Antigonus, & fearefully stolen away from him to saue his life; with yong Antiochus, a Prince not heard of before this iournie; and Lysimachus; that had liued long in a corner, hardly keeping his owne from the wilde Tracians; wanted much in reputation, of that which was yeelded to their opposites: yet so, that as ancient Captaines vnder Philip and Alexander, two of them were held worthy enough, to receiue any benefit that fortune might giue, and the third a Prince of great hope, whereof he now came to make experience.

The Souldiers, on both sides, were for the most part hardy & well exercised: many of them hauing serued vnder Alexander; though of those old Companies, the long space of two and twenty yeeres had consumed the greatest number. But concerning their affections, the followers of Seleucus were easily perswaded, that in this battaile they must either get the vpper hand, or put in extreame danger all that belonged vnto the Confederate Princes: whereas Antigonus his men could discerne no other necessitie of fighting, than the obstinate qualitie of their Lord, that needes would be Master of all. Antigonus had about three-score and ten thousand foot, ten thousand horse, and threescore and fifteene Elephants. His enemies were sixe thousand short of him in number of their foot; in horse they had the oddes of fiue hundred; of Elephants they had foure hundred, and a hundred and twenty armed Chariots of warre; which helpes, though they little had availed the Persians, yet were they not to be despised, in the hands of a good Captaine.

Antigonus himselfe, either troubled with the vnexpected greatnesse of his enemies forces, or presaging little good like to ensue, grew very pensiue, communing much in priuate priuate with his sonne whom he commended to the Armie as his successor: whereas in former times he had neuer been so iocund, as towards the houre of battaile, nor had been accustomed to make his sonne, or any other, priuate to his counsaile, before it required execution. Other tokens of bad lucke, either foegoing the fight, or afterwards deuised, I hold it needlesse to recount: Diana of Ephesus dwelt neere to the place of battaile, a busie goddesse in many great fights, and therefore likely to haue beene thrust into the fable, if any matter, neerely resembling a miracle, had chanced.

It is easie to beleeue, that these two so gallant Armies, containing well-neere all the strength of Alexanders whole Empire, performed a notable fight, being led by such worthy Commanders, and whom the issue thereof did highly concerne. Yet are few of the particulars recorded: an easie losse in regard of the much variety, wherewith euery story aboundeth in this kinde. The most memorable things in the battaile, were these: Demetrius with his best force of horse, charged valiantly vpon yong Antiochus; whom when he had broken, and put to flight, he was so transported with the heat of his good successe, that he neuer gaue ouer his pursuit, but left his Father naked, and lost thereby both him, and the victory. For when Seleucus perceiued this aduantage, he enterposed his Elephants, betweene Demetrius and the Phalanx of Antigonus: and with many troupes of horse offering to breake vpon the enemies battaile, wheresoeuer it lay most open, he did so terrifie the Antigonians, that a great part of them rather chose to reuolt from their Lord, whilst they were fairely inuited, than to sustaine the furie of so dangerous an impression. This cowardize or rather treason of some, discouraged others; and finally, cast them all into flight; exposing their Generall to the last end of his destinies. Antigonus was then foure-score yeeres old, very fat and vnweildy, so that he was vnapt for flight, if his high spirit could haue entertained any thought thereof. He had about him some of his most trusty followers, and as many others as hee could hold together. When one that perceiued a great troupe making towards his person, told him, Sir King, yonder company meanes to charge you; hee answered, Well may they; for who defends me? but anone Demetrius will relieue vs. Thus expecting, to the very last, that his sonne should come to the rescue, he receiued so many Darts into his body, as tooke away his lately ambitious, but then fearfull hopes, together with his troublesome life.

His great ability in matter of Armes, together with his vnsatiable desire of Empire, haue sufficiently appeared in the whole Volume of his actions. He was more feared by his enemies, than loued by his friends; as one that could not moderate his fortune, but vsed insolence towards all alike, as if it had been some vertue neerest representing a Kingly Maiestie. This was the cause that so many of his followers reuolted to his enemies; and finally, that a great part of his Armie forsooke him in his last necessity. For those Kings and Princes that call all the carefull indeuours of their Vassals, onely dutie and debt; and are more apt to punish the least offences, than to reward the greatest seruices: shall finde themselues vpon the first change of fortune, (seeing it is loue onely that staies by aduersitie) not onely the most friendlesse, but euen the most contemptible, and despised of all other. This Antigonus found true in part, while he liued; in part he left it to be verified vpon his sonne.

How Demetrius forsaken by the Athenians after his ouerthrow, was reconciled to Seleucus and Ptolomie, beginning a new fortune, and shortly entring into quarrels.

Or Demetrius, at his returne, from the idle pursuit of yong Antiochus, finding all quite lost, was glad to saue himselfe, with foure thousand horse and fiue thousand foote, by a speedy retrait vnto Ephesus, whence he made great haste vnto Athens, as to the place, that for his sake would suffer any extremity. But whilest he was in the middest of his course thither, the Athenian Embassadours met him with a decree of the people, which was, that none of the Kings should be admitted into their Citie. These were Embassadours, not Theori, or Consulters with the Oracle. It was a shamelesse ingratitude in the Athenians, to reward their Benefactor, in his miserie, with such a decree: neither did any part of his calamitie more afflict the vnfortunate Prince, than to see his aduersity despised by those whom he had thought his surest friends.

Yet was he faine to giue good words. For he had left many of his ships in their Hauen, of which he now stood in great neede, and therefore was faine to speake them faire, that sometimes had grosly flattered him. But he shall liue to teach them their old language, and speak vnto them in another tune. When he had gotten his ships, he sailed to the Isthmus, where he found nothing but matter of discomfort. His Garrisons were euery where broken vp; the Souldiers hauing betaken themselues to his enemies pay. So that he was King onely of a small Armie and Fleet, without money or meanes wherewith to sustaine him and his followers any long time. All the rest, or the greatest part of his Fathers large Dominion, was now in diuiding among the Conquerers, and those few places which as yet held for him (hauing not perchance heard the worst of what had happened) he no to way knew how to relieue: for to put himselfe into the field on that side of the Sea, he had no power; and to inclose himselfe in any of them, how strong soeuer, were but to imprison his fortune, and his hopes, or therein indeede to burie himselfe and his estate: He therefore creeping thorow those bushes that had fewest briers, fell vpon a corner of Lysimachus his Kingdome, whereof he gaue all the spoyle that was gotten, to his Souldiers, his owne losses hauing beene too great to be repaied againe by small prizes.

In the meane while the Confederate Princes had wherewithall to busie themselues, in the partition of those Prouinces, of which their late victory had made them Lords, wherein Seleucus had a notable aduantage by being present, and Master of the field, for neither Ptolomie nor Cassander were at the ouerthrow giuen, hauing onely sent certaine troupes to re-inforce the Armie which Seleucus led, who tooke hold of a part of Asia the lesse, and all Syria, being no otherwise deuided from his owne Territorie, than by the Riuer of Euphrates. For there had not any order beene taken by the Confederates, for the diuision of all those Lands: because they did not expect so prosperous an issue of that warre, which they made onely in their owne common defence. It was therefore lawfull for Seleucus, to make the best benefit that he could of the victory, at which, neuertheless others did repine; and though they neither could nor durst accuse him of ill dealing for the present, yet seeing the ouer-greatnesse of Seleucus brought no lesse danger to the rest of the new Kings, than that of Antigonus had done, they consulted vpon the same reason of State as before, how to oppose it in time. Neither was Seleucus ignorant of what they had determined, for he read it in the Law vniuersall of Kingdomes and States, needing no other intelligence. Hereupon they forget friendship on all sides, and cure themselues of all vnprofitable passion, the hatred of each to other, and their loues being laid on the one side, against their profits on the other, were found so farre too light, as Seleucus, who had to day slain Antigonus the father, and driuen Demetrius the sonne out of Asia, fought to morrow how to match himselfe with Stratonica, Demetrius his daughter, and so by Demetrius to serue his turne against Lysimachus.

The storie of this Stratonica, with whom young Antiochus, the sonne of Seleucus fell so passionately in loue, and so distempered, as Seleucus his father, to saue his sonnes life, gaue her (though she were his wife) vnto him, and how his passion was discouered by his pulse, is generally noted by all Writers. But neither did this aliance betweene Seleucus and Demetrius; betweene Ptolomie and Lysimachus; betweene Demetrius and Cassander; betweene Demetrius and Ptolomie; though for the present it brought him againe into the ranke of Kings; otherwise tye any of them to each other, than the marriages betweene Christian Kings haue done in later times, namely betweene the Austrians, the Aragonians, the French, and other Princes; neither haue the Leagues of those elder times beene found more faithfull, then those of the same later times haue been; as in the stories of Charles the eighth of France, and of Charles the Emperour, of Francis the first, and of the Kings of Naples, Dukes of Millan and others, the Reader may discerne: betweene whom from the yeere of our Lord, One thousand, foure hundred, ninetie and fiue, when Charles the eighth vndertooke the Conquest of Naples, to the yeere one thousand fiue hundred fiftie and eight, when Henrie the second died; the Histories of those times tell vs, that all the bonds, either by the bed or by the boolle, either by weddings, or Sacrament all Oathes, had neither faithfull purpose nor performance. Yet did Demetrius reape this profit by giuing his daughter to his enemy Seleucus, that he recouered Cilicia from Plistarchus, the brother of Cassander; who had gotten it his his ſhare in the diuiſion of Antigonus his poſſeſſions: for the Intruder was not ſtrong enough to hold it by his proper forces from him, that entred vpon it as a lawfull Heire, neither would Seleucus lend him any helpe, as by the rule of Confederacie he ſhould haue done againſt the common enemy. So Pliſtarchus with very angry complaint, as well againſt Seleucus as Demetrius, went vnto Caſſander; whither Phila, their ſiſter, followed him ſhortly, to pacifie them both, and keepe all quiet; being ſent for that purpoſe by Demetrius her husband, that was not ſtrong enough to deale with Caſſander, and therefore glad to make vſe of that bond of aliance betwixt them, whereof in his owne proſperitie, he neuer tooke notice to the others good. About the ſame time hee tooke to wife a daughter of Ptolomie (plurality of wiues being familiar with theſe Macedonians, that had learned it in their Eaſterne conqueſts) and ſo was hee by two marriages rather freed from two enemies, then ſtrengthened with two friends, for neither of them wiſhed him any good, otherwiſe then might ſeeme to aduance their owne ambitious deſires.

Seleucus and Ptolomie could both of them haue beene contented better, that Demetrius, with helpe of their countenance, ſhould ſeeke his fortune ſomewhat farther off, than ſettle his eſtate vnder their noſes. Particularly, Seleucus thought that Cilicia lay very fitly for himſelfe: and Ptolomie had a great appetite (which yet he concealed a while) to the Iſle of Cyprus. Now whether it were ſo, that Seleucus would faine haue ſet his new father in law vpon the necke of Lyſimachus; or whether he were indeede greedie of the bargaine, he offered to buy of Demetrius for ready money, his late purchaſe of Cilicia. Hereunto Demetrius would not harken, but meant to keepe as much Land as he could, hauing already found in Cilicia twelue thouſand talents of his fathers treaſure, that would ſerue him to make ſport a while. This refuſall ſo diſpleaſed Seleucus, that in angry termes hee demanded the Cities of Tyre and Sidon, to be ſurrendred vnto him; which were the onely places in Syria, that had not followed the fortune of the late great battaile. Inſtead of giuing them vp, Demetrius tooke preſent order to haue them better manned; and ſpake it ſtoutly, That were hee ouer-come a thouſand times, yet would hee not hire Seleucus to become his ſonne in law. In this quarrell Seleucus was generally reprehended, as one of a malignant diſpoſition, that would breake friendſhip with his father in law for two Townes, from whom hee had already taken more then well he knew how to gouerne. But the fire conſumed it ſelfe in words, which had it faſtned vpon armes, like it is that the weaker ſhould haue found friends out of enuie to the ſtronger.

§. VI.

How Demetrius wan the Citie of Athens, and preuailed in Greece, but loſt in Aſia. Of troubles in Macedon following the death of Caſſander.

IN the meane while, the Athenians not knowing how to vſe the liberty, which Demetrius had beſtowed on them, were fallen by ſedition, vnder the tyranny of Lachares. Through which alteration their diſtempered Citie was ſo weakened, that it ſeemed ill able to keep off the puniſhment due to their late ingratitude. This aduantage haſtened him, whom they had once called their God and Sauiour, to preſent himſelfe vnto them, in the habit of a reuenging furie. He brought againſt them all the force that he could well ſpare from other employments, which were at that time perhaps the more, becauſe his doubtfull Eaſterne friends, were vnwilling to giue impediment to any buſineſſe, that might entangle him in Greece. His firſt enterpriſe in Athens had ill ſucceſſe; a great part of his fleet periſhing in a tempeſt. But he ſoone repaired the loſſe; and (after ſome victories in Peloponneſus, where he wan diuers Townes that had fallen from him) returning to the enterprize, waſted the Countrie of Attica, and cut off all reliefe from the Citie, both by Land and Sea.

Athens was not able to feede the great multitude within it, any long time: for it ſtood in a barren ſoile, and wanted now the command of thoſe Ilands, and places abroad, from whence it was wont to be ſtored with victuals, being alſo deſtitute of meanes to keep ſuch a Nauie, as might bring in ſupply, or dare to doe any thing at Sea, againſt that of Demetrius. Yet was there ſome hope of ſuccour from Ptolomie, who (truſting thereby to win the loue of Greece) had loaden a hundred and fiftie ſhips with corne, and ſent them to releeue the hungry Citie. But theſe hundred and fiftie were vnable to deale with three hundred good fighting ſhips, which Demetrius had; rather they feared to become a prey to him, and therefore haſted them away betimes, as hauing done enough, in aduenturing to come ſo neere, that they might be diſcried. This brake the heart of the people; among whom the famine was ſo extreame, that a Father and his Son did fight for a dead Mouſe, which dropped downe betweene them from the houſe top. Wherefore they ſent Embaſſadors to yeelde vp the Towne, and craue pardon, hauing ſo farre offended, that out of deſperation, they made it a capitall offence, to propoſe any motion of peace. Yet were they faine to aboliſh this decree: rather becauſe they knew not what elſe to doe, then becauſe they hoped to be forgiuen.

Demetrius, contented with the honour of the victory, did not onely forbeare to take away the liues of theſe vnthankefull men, which they had ſubmitted vnto his mercy; but out of his liberality gaue them foode, and placed in Office amongſt them ſuch as were moſt acceptable to the people. Neuertheleſſe he was growne wiſer then to truſt them ſo farre as he had done in times paſt. And therefore, when (among other flattering acclamations) they bade him take their Hauens, & diſpoſe of them at his pleaſure; he was ready to lay hold vpon the word, and leaue a ſure Garriſon within their wals, to keepe them honeſt perforce. After this he went into Peloponneſus, vanquiſhed the Lacedæmonians in two battailes, and was in very faire poſſibilitie to take their Citie: when the dangerous newes called him in all haſte, of Lyſimachus and Ptolomie; that preuailed faſter vpon him elſewhere, than himſelfe did vpon his enemies in Greece. Lyſimachus had wonne many Towns in Aſia; Ptolomie had gotten all the Iſle of Cyprus, except the Citie of Salamis, wherein Demetrius had left his Children & Mother, that were ſtraightly beſieged. Whilſt he was bethinking himſelfe which way to turne his face, a notable piece of buſineſſe offered it ſelfe, which thruſt all other cares out of his head.

Caſſander was lately dead in Macedon, and ſoone after him, Philip his eldeſt ſon, whoſe two yonger brethren, Antipater and Alexander, ſought for the Kingdome. In this quarrell Theſſalonica the Daughter of King Philip, whom Caſſander had married, ſeemed better affected to Alexander, then to her elder ſonne: who thereupon grew ſo enraged, that moſt barbarouſly he ſlew his owne Mother. The odiouſneſſe of this fact gaue a faire luſtre to Alexanders cauſe: drawing the generality of the Macedons to take his part, as in reuenge of the Queens death, vpon that wicked parricide Antipater. But Antipater was ſo ſtrongly backed by Lyſimachus, whoſe daughter he had married; that Alexander could not hope to make his party good without ſome forreigne aide. For which cauſe he called in both Pyrrhus and Demetrius; who how they dealt with him, it wil ſoone appeare in the following Tragedy, of him and his brother. Their Father Caſſander had beene one that ſhifted well for himſelfe, at ſuch time as euery man ſought how to get ſomewhat, in the ill ordered diuiſion of the Empire. He was cunning in practice, and a good Souldier: one of more open dealing then were his Companions, but withall more impudent, rudely killing thoſe, whom others would more wiſely haue made away. He deeply hated the memory of Alexander, that had knocked his head againſt a wall, vpon ſome opinion of contempt. With Olympias he had an hereditary quarrell, deriued from his Father, whom ſhe could not abide. Her feminine malice did ſo exaſperate him, by cruelty, that ſhe vſed againſt his friends, both aliue and dead; as it made him aduenture vpon ſhedding the Royall bloud; wherewith, when once he had ſtained his hands, he did not care how farre he proceeded in that courſe of murder. His carefulneſſe to deſtroy thoſe women and children, whoſe liues hindred his purpoſe, argues him to haue beene rather skilfull in matters of Armes, than a valiant man: ſuch cruelty being a true marke of cowardize, which feares a-far off the dangers, that may quietly paſſe away: and ſeekes to auoide them by baſe and wicked meanes, as neuer thinking it ſelfe ſafe enough, vntill there be nothing left, that carries likelihood of danger. Of Olympias and Roxane it may be ſaid, that they had well deſerued the bloudy end which ouer-tooke them; yet ill beſeemed it Caſſander to doe the office of a Hang-man. But Alexanders children had by no law of men, deſerued to dye for the tyranny of their Father. Wherefore, though Caſſander died in his bed, yet the diuine Iuſtice brought ſwords vpon his wife and children, that well reuenged the cruelty of this bloudy man, by deſtroying his whole houſe, as he had done his Maſters.

Of Pyrrhus and his doings in Macedan. The death of Cassanders children. Demetrius gets the Kingdome of Macedon; preuailes in warre against the Greekes; Loseth reputation in his warre against Pyrrhus, and in his ciuill Gouernment, and prepares to win Asia. How all conspire against Demetrius. Pyrrhus and Lysimachus inuade him, his Armie yeeldes to Pyrrhus, who shares the Kingdome of Macedon with Lysimachus.

Pyrrhus, the Sonne of that vnfortunate Prince Æacides, which perished in warre against Cassander, was hardly preserued, being a suckling Infant, from the furie of his Fathers enemies. When his Fosterers had conueighed him to Glaucias, King of Illyria; the deadly hatred of Cassander would haue bought his life with the price of two hundred talents. But no man can kill him that shall be his Heire. Glaucias was so farre from betraying Pyrrhus, that he restored him by force to his Fathers Kingdome, when he was but twelue yeeres of age. Within the compasse of sixe yeeres, either the indiscretions of his youth, or the rebellious temper of his Subiects, draue him out of his Kingdome, and left him to trie the world anew. Then went he to Demetrius (who married his sister) became his Page, followed him awhile in his warres; was with him in the great battaile of Ipsus, whence he fled with him to Ephesus, and was content to be hostage for him, in his reconciliation with Ptolomie. In Ægypt he so behaued himselfe, that he got the fauour of Berenice, Ptolomies principall wife; so that he married her Daughter, and was thereupon sent home, with monie and men, into Epirus, more beholding now to Ptolomie, than to Demetrius. When he had fully recouered the Kingdome of Epirus, and was setled in it, then fell out that businesse betweene the children of Cassander, which drew both him and Demetrius into Macedon.

Antipater, the elder of Cassanders sonnes, was so farre too weake for Pyrrhus, that he had no desire to attend the comming of Demetrius, but made an hastie agreement, and diuided the Kingdome with his yonger brother Alexander; who likewise felt the aide of Pyrrhus so troublesome, that he was more willing to send him away, than to call in such another helper. For Pyrrhus had the audacitie to request, or take as granted, by strong hand, Ambraeia, Acarnania, and much more of the Countrie, as the reward of his paines: leauing the two brethren to agree as well as they could about the rest. Necessitie enforced the brethren to composition: but their composition would not satisfie Demetrius, who tooke the matter hainously, that he was sent for, and made a foole, to come so farre with an Armie, and finde no worke for it. This was a friuolous complaint; whereby it appeared, that Demetrius had a purpose to doe as Pyrrhus had done, and so much more, by how much he was stronger. Hereupon it seemed to Alexander a wise course, to remoue this ouer-diligent friend, by murdering him vpon some aduantage. Thus Demetrius reported the storie, and it might be true; though the greatest part, and perhaps the wisest, beleeued it not. But the issue was, that Alexander himselfe was feasted and slaine by Demetrius; who tooke his part of the Kingdome, as a reward of the murder; excusing the fact so well, by telling his owne danger, and what a naughtie man Cassander had beene, that all the Macedonians grew glad enough to acknowledge him their King. It fell out happily, that about the same time Lysimachus was busied in warre with a King of the wilde Thracians: for thereby he was compelled to seeke peace of Demetrius, which to obtaine, he caused the remainder of Macedon to be giuen vp; that is, the part belonging to Antipater, his sonne in law. At this ill bargaine Antipater grieuously stormed, though he knew not how to amend it: yet still he stormed; vntill his Father in law, to saue the labour of making many excuses, tooke away his troublesome life. Thus in haste, with a kinde of neglect, and as it were to auoide molestation, were slaine the children of Cassander: of Cassander that had slaine his owne Masters children, in a wise course of policy, with carefull meditation (so much the more wicked as the more long) studying how to erect his owne house, that fell downe vpon his graue, ere the earth on it was throughly setled.

It might be thought, that such an accesse of Dominion, added much to the greatnesse of Demetrius. But indeede it shewed his infirmity; and thereby made him neglected by many, and at length hated by all. For he had no Art of ciuill Gouernment: but thought (for shewed by his actions that he thought) the vse and fruit of a Kingdome, to be none other, other, than to doe what a King listed. Hee gaue himselfe ouer to Women and Wine, laughing openly at those which offered to trouble him with supplications, and the tedious discourse of doing iustice. Hee had more skill in getting a Kingdome, than in ruling it: warre being his recreation, and luxurie his nature. By long rest (as sixe yeeres reigne is long to him, that knowes not how to reigne one yeere) hee discouered so much of his worst conditions, as made the people both weary of his idlenesse; and the Souldiers, of his vanitie. He was freed from care of matters in Asia, by hearing that all was lost: though more especially, by hearing that Ptolomie had with great honour, entertained and dismissed his mother and children. This affoorded him the better leisure, of making warre in Greece: where he vanquished the Thebans, and won their Citie twice in fiue to space, but vsed his victorie with mercy. Against Lysimachus hee would faine haue done somewhat (the peace betweene them notwithstanding) at such time as hee was taken by the Thracians; but Lysimachus was freely dismissed, and in good case to make resistance ere Demetrius came; so as this iourney purchased nothing but enmitie. Another expedition he tooke in hand against Pyrrhus, with no better, or rather with worse euent. Pyrrhus held somewhat belonging to Macedon, which he had indeede as honestly gotten, as Demetrius the whole Kingdome; he had also made excursions into Thessalie. But there needed not any handsome pretence of quarrell, seeing Demetrius thought himselfe strong enough, to ouer-runne his enemies Countrie, with two great Armies. It is a common fault in men, to despise the vertue of those, whom they haue knowne raw Nouices in that facultie, wherein themselues are noted as extraordinarie. Pyrrhus was a Captaine, whom later ages, and particularly the great Hannibal, placed higher in the ranke of Generals, than either Demetrius, or any of Alexanders followers. At this time, hee missed that part of the Armie, which Demetrius led, and fell vpon the other halfe; which hee ouerthrew, not with more commendations of his good conduct, than of his priuate valour, shewed in single combat against Pantauchus, Demetrius his Lieutenant; who being a strong man of body, challenged this young Prince to fight hand to hand, and was vtterly beaten. The losse of this battaile did not so much offend the Macedonians, as the gallant behauiour of Pyrrhus delighted them. For in him they seemed to behold the liuely figure of Alexander in his best qualitie. Other Kings did imitate, in a counterfeit manner, some of Alexanders graces, and had good skill in wearing Princely vestures: but (said they) none, saue Pyrrhus, is like him in deede, in performing the office of a Captaine.

These rumours were not more nourished by the vertue of the Epirot, than by dislike of their owne King; whom they began to dis-esteeme, not so much in regard of his vnprofitable iourney into Epirus (for hee had wasted much of the Countrie, and brought home his Armie in good case) as of his insolence, that grew daily more and more intolerable. His apparell seemed, in the eyes of the Macedons, not onely too sumptuous and new-fangled, but very vnmanly; and seruing chiefly to be a daily witnesse, how much he contemned them and their good opinion. Of his Souldiers liues hee was retchlesse: and suffered vnwisely this vn-princely sentence to escape out of his mouth; That the more of them died, the fewer he was to pay. Hee made a mockerie of iustice; and (as it were, to publish vnto all his Subiects, how little he esteemed it or them) hauing by a shew of popularitie inuited Petitioners, and with a gracious countenance entertained their Supplications, hee led the poore suters after him in great hope, till comming to a bridge, hee threw all their writings into a Riuer; pleasing himselfe, in that hee could so easily and so boldly delude the cares of other men. By these courses hee grew so odious, that Pyrrhus gathered audacitie, and inuading Macedon, had almost wonne it all with little resistance. Demetrius lay then sicke in his bed: who recouering health, and taking the field, had such great oddes of strength, as made Pyrrhus glad to forsake his winnings and be gone.

At length he began to haue some feeling of the generall hate; which to redresse, hee did not (for hee could not) alter his owne conditions; but purposed to alter their idle discourses of him, by setting them on worke in such an action, wherein his best qualities might appeare; that is, in a great warre. His intent was to inuade Asia, with a Royall Armie: wherein the fortune of one battaile might giue him as much, as the fortune of another had taken from him. To this end, he first made peace with Pyrrhus; that so hee might leaue all safe and quiet at home. Then did he compose a mighty Armie, of of almost a hundred thousand foot, and twelue thousand horses with a Nauie of fiue hundred saile, wherein were many ships, farre exceeding the greatnesse of any that had beene seene before; yet so swift and vsefull withall, that the greatnesse was least part of their commendation.

The terrible fame of these preparations, made Seleucus and Ptolomie suspect their owne forces, and labour hard with Lysimachus and Pyrrhus, to ioyne against this ambitious son of Antigonus; that was like to proue more dangerous to them all, than euer was his Father. It was easily discerned, that if Demetrius once preuailed in Asia, there could be no security for his friends in Europe, what league soeuer were of old concluded. Therefore they resolued to begin with him betimes, and each to inuade that quarter of Macedon, that lay next his owne Kingdome. Lysimachus came first, and against him went Demetrius with a great part of his Armie: but whilst he was yet on the way, newes were brought into his Campe, that Pyrrhus had won Berrhea. The matter was not ouer-great: were it not, that mindes prepared with long discontent, are ready to lay hold vpon small occasions of dislike. All the campe was in vproare: some wept, others raged, few or none did forbeare to vtter seditious words, and many desired leaue of Demetrius, to goe to their owne houses, meaning indeede to haue gone to Lysimachus.

When Demetrius perceiued the bad affection of his Armie, he thought it the wisest way, to leade the Macedonians further off from Lysimachus their own countriman, against Pyrrhus that was a stranger: hoping by victory against the Epirot, to recouer the loue of his followers, in such sort that he might afterwards at leisure deale with the other. But herein his wisedome beguiled him. For the Souldiers were as hastie as he; to meet with Pyrrhus; not intending to hurt him, but longing to see that noble Prince, of whom they daily heard the honourable fame. Some spake of his valour; some enquired, others answered, of his person, his armour, and other tokens whereby he might be knowne; as particularly, by a paire of Goats hornes, that he wore on his crest. It was not likely, that these men should hurt him. Diuers of them stole away, and ranne ouer into Pyrrhus his campe: where the newes that they brought, were better welcome than their persons. For they said, and it was true, that if the Macedonians might once get sight of Pyrrhus, they would all salute him King. To trie this, Pyrrhus rode forth, and presented himselfe bareheaded in view of the campe, whither some were sent before to prepare his welcome. The newes of his arriuall found a generall applause, and euery one began to looke out, with desire to set eye on him. His face was not so well knowne as his Helmet; therefore he was admonished to put it on; which done, all came about him, and proffered their seruice; neither were there any, that spake for Demetrius; onely some (and they the most moderate of tongue) bad him be gone betimes, and shift for himselfe. So Demetrius threw aside his maskers habit, and attyring himselfe poorely, did fearefully steale away out of his owne Campe, deseruing well this calamitie: whether it were so, that he would not hearken to the good counsaile of his friends, or whether his behauiour depriued him of such friends, as would dare to let him heare the vnpleasant sound of necessary truth.

Whilest Pyrrhus was making this triumphant entry into the Kingdome of Macedon; Lysimachus came vpon him very vnseasonably, and would needes haue halfe: saying, that he had done as much as Pyrrhus in the warre, and therefore had reason to challenge his part of the gaines. The bargaine was quickly made, and the diuision agreed vpon: each of them being rather desirous to take his part quietly, than to fight for the whole; as hoping each of them, to worke his fellow quite out of all, vpon better opportunitie.

§. VIII.

How Demetrius gathering forces, enterprised many things with ill successe, in Greece and Asia. How he was driuen vpon Seleucus, and compelled to yeelde himselfe. His imprisonment and death.

THe Athenians, were as vnthankefull to Demetrius in this his aduersitie, as they had beene in former times. For they presently forsooke his friendship, and called Pyrrhus out of Macedon to be their Patron. Demetrius, when he went against Lysimachus, had left a great part of his forces in Greece, vnder his sonne Antigonus. Therefore it is like, that he had soone gotten an Armie; though Phila his wife (who

(who is highly commended for a wife and vertuous Ladie) did poyſon her ſelfe, vpon deſperate greefe for his misfortune. The firſt, vpon whom hee attempted to ſhew his anger, were the Athenians that had well deſerued it. He began to lay ſiege to their Town: but was pacified by Crates the Philoſopher, whom they had made their ſpokeſman; and taking faire words in ſtead of ſatisfaction, paſſed ouer into Aſia, with eleuen thouſand Souldiers, meaning to trie his fortune againſt Lyſimachus, for the Prouinces of Lydia and Caria.

At his firſt comming into thoſe parts, fortune ſeemed to ſmile vpon him. For many good Townes, willingly, or by compulſion, yeelded to his obedience. There were alſo ſome Captaines that fell from Lyſimachus to him, with their companies and treaſures. But it was not long, ere Agathocles the ſonne of Lyſimachus, came vpon him with an Armie ſo ſtrong, that it was not for Demetrius his good, to hazard his laſt ſtocke againſt it. Wherefore, he reſolued to paſſe through Phrygia and Armenia, into Media, and the Prouinces of the higher Aſia; truſting to finde a Kingdome ſomewhere in thoſe remote quarters. The execution of this counſaile was grieuouſly impeached by Agathocles: who purſued him cloſe, and cut off all his prouiſions, driuing him to take which waies hee could, without following his intended courſe. In many skirmiſhes Demetrius vanquiſhed this troubleſome enemie: neuertheleſſe, he could not be ſhaken off, but continued afflicting the poore titularie King, with extreame famine. At length, in paſſing the riuer Lycus, ſo many of Demetrius his men were loſt, that the reſt could no longer make reſiſtance: but were driuen to trauaile with ſuch ſpeed as might well be called a plaine flight. So that with famine, peſtilent diſeaſes following famine, and other accidents of warre, eight thouſand of them were conſumed: the reſt, with their Captaine, eſcaped into Cilicia. Seleucus had gotten poſſeſſion of Cilicia, whileſt Demetrius was occupied in Greece: yet was it no part of Demetrius his errand, to lay claime to the Countrie; but with vehement and humble letters he beſought his ſon in law, to call to minde their alliance, and to pitty him in his great miſery. Theſe letters, at the firſt wrought well with Seleucus, and he condeſcended to the requeſt: yet conſidering further how Demetrius had carried himſelfe, when he recouered ſtrength after the battaile at Ipſus, he changed his purpoſe, and went againſt him with an Armie.

Many treaties were held betweene them; of which none tooke effect, through the ielouſie of Seleucus. Therefore, meere deſperation enforced Demetrius, to fight like a mad man; and his furies got him ſome victories, though of ſmall importance. At length ſickneſſe tooke and held him fortie dayes, in which time, a great number of his few men, ran to the enemie. This notwithſtanding he ſtill held out, and once had like to haue taken Seleucus in his bed, had not his comming beene diſcouered by fugitiues, that gaue alarme. Finally, when all his Armie had forſaken him, and left him with a few of his friends to ſhift for himſelfe, he was compelled by the laſt of thoſe adherents (for euen ſome of thoſe few forſooke him) to yeelde vnto Seleucus.

Seleucus hearing this, was exceeding glad, and ſent him very comfortable meſſages. But the approbation of his owne humanitie, by his followers, was ſuch, as renewed his iealous thoughts; and hindred him from admitting Demetrius to his preſence, though otherwiſe he vſed him with as much fauour, as any priſoner could wiſh. He was kept vnder ſure guard in a demie-Iland, wherein were goodly walkes, Orchards, and Parkes for hunting. Hee had all that he asked royally, and friends allowed to viſit him, at his, and their pleaſure. Onely his libertie was reſerued vnto the comming of young Antiochus and Stratonica, out of the high Countries. In this ſort he ſpent three yeeres, liuing merily all the while (as one that now enioyed the happineſſe, which with ſo much trauaile and bloud-ſhed, hee had ſought in vaine) and then dyed, leauing to his ſonne Antigonus, the ſame which his father had left vnto himſelfe; that is, friends and hope. His aſhes were honourably buried in Corinth; his qualities haue appeared in his actions, and the fortune of his houſe will ſhew it ſelfe hereafter, in times and places conuenient.

IV. IX.

The death of Ptolomie, of Lysimachus, and of Seleucus, that was last of Alexanders Captaines: with other occurrences.

ABout the same time that Demetrius died, did also Ptolomie King of Ægypt, a vertuous Prince, warlike, gentle, bountifull, and (which in those times was a rare commendation) regardfull of his word. He had, by many Wiues and Concubines, many children, out of whom hee selected Ptolomie Philadelphus, and caused him to reigne together with himselfe, two or three yeeres before he died, that so hee might confirme him in the inheritance of the Kingdome. At this, Ptolomie Ceraunus (for all of that house assumed the name of Ptolomie) was grieuously incensed. But no man cared for his anger. Therefore he went to Seleucus, who gaue him louing entertainment. There were now onely two of Alexanders Captaines left, Seleucus and Lysimachus. These two needs would fight for it, who should be the longest liuer of that braue Companie. The true ground of their quarrell was, their neere equalitie of strength, and want of one to part them. The pretence was the murders which Lysimachus had committed vpon many of his Nobles, together with his poysoning Agathocles his eldest sonne: whose wife and children fled vnto Seleucus for aide.

The Macedons after seuen Moneths pause, hauing spent their first heate of admiration, began to harken so well to Lysimachus, their naturall Countrie-man, that they forsooke Pyrrhus, vpon none other ground than because he was an Alien. This they had knowne well enough before: but they did him no great wrong in taking lightly from him, that they lightly gaue him. Lysimachus had reigned about fiue yeares aloue, when the Citie of Lysimachia (built by him, and called after his name) falling by an earthquake, appeared, by euents, to haue foreshewed the fall of his house. His owne iealousie, and the instigation of a mother in law, caused him to poyson his Sonne Agathocles, which drew vpon him that Warre, wherein (after the losse of all his fifteene children that were taken away by diuers accidents) he perished himselfe.

Seleucus was encountred by Lysimachus on Asia side, where one battaile concluded the warre, with Lysimachus his death. It pleased Seleucus more than the victorie, that he was the last of all the great Heröes that followed Alexander. For now he seemed to himselfe as Lord and Heire of all the conquered world. So hee passed ouer into Macedon, to take possession of Europe, where there was none to withstand him. But there hee ended his daies, and within seauen moneths followed Lysimachus, and other of his fellowes, by a bloudie death, being treacherously slaine by Ptolomie Ceraunus, whose friend and Patron he had beene. Seuentie and seuen yeere old he was, when hee fought with Lysimachus, and Lysimachus was seuenty and foure. With them ended the generation of olde Captaines, that had seene the daies as it were of another world vnder the Persian: yet was there left one equall to any of them in the Art of Warre: euen Pyrrhus the Epirot, of whom we spake before; that is now ready to enter into warre with the Romanes, a more warlike people, than Alexander himselfe did euer encounter. Of which warre, and of which people, it is needfull that we heere make mention, as of a storie more important, than any likely to ensue in Greece, or in the great Kingdomes that were held by Alexanders Successors, with lesse (and still decreasing) vertue, than was that, by which they were first purchased.

CHAP. VII.

The growth of Rome: and setling of the Easterne Kingdomes.

§. I.

How the Romans enlarged their Dominion in Italie, from the death of Tullus Hostilius, vnto such time as they were assailed by Pyrrhus.

HOw Rome was founded by Romulus; setled in good order by Numa Pompilius; and by many, though small, victories, it gathered strength; vnto such time as it became the head of Latium, by the conquest of Alba, in the reigne of Tullus Hostilius: it hath beene already noted, in due order of time. But whereas now the Roman greatnes beginneth to encounter the power of Greece; and extending it selfe out of Italie, to ouerwhelme the Dominions of other States and Princes: I hold it conuenient (as in like cases I haue done) briefly to set downe the growth of this mightie Citie, in a compendious relation, of those many actions, which could not haue beene deliuered in the ages, wherein they were seuerally performed, without much interruption of the Historie, that was then occupied in matter more important.

After the death of Tullus Hostilius (who when he had reigned two and thirtie yeares, was burnt together with his house by lightning) Ancus Martius, Grandchilde to Numa Pompilius by his daughter, and not much vnlike him in disposition, succeeded in the Kingdome of Rome. Hee walled the Citie about; enlarged it with the hill Auentine, which he enclosed; built a bridge ouer Tybris, & the Citie of Ostia vpon the Sea, sixteene miles distant from Rome. Finally, hauing reigned foure and twenty yeeres, he died, and by his last Will he left his children in charge with one Lucumon, the sonne of Damaratus a Corinthian, who auoyding Cypselus King of Corinth his tyranny, had fled into Hetruria, and dwelt in Tarquinij, by the name of which Town he was afterwards called Tarquinius. From that Citie in Hetruria comming to Rome, and encouraged by some ominous occurrents, together with his wife Tanaquils prophecie, he grew a fauorite of Ancus Martius; by his Gracian wit humouring the factions of the Roman Court, insomuch that after his decease, he became not onely Protector to the children, but Gouernour to the Citie. He doubled the number of Senators, and enlarged the Centurions of Horsemen: neither was he lesse eminent in warre, than in peace: for he preuailed often against the Tuscans, and from his victories, the chiefest ornaments of triumph tooke their originall. When this Lucius Tarquinius had reigned eight and thirty yeeres, he was slaine by the sonnes of Ancus Martius, to whom he had beene left Guardian. But Tanaquil his wife, perceiuing what was done, enformed the people, from out of an high Turret, that her Husband was wounded, and sicke, but not dangerously. And withall signified vnto them, that in the interim of his sickenesse, one Seruius Tullius, whom from his birth shee alwaies propheeied to be borne to great hopes, (the sonne of P. Corniculanus and Ocrisia, a well descended, but captiue woman) brought vp in her house, and husband vnto her daughter, should supply her husbands place, in gouerning the State, vntill his recouerie: which gouernement, being thus at first obtained by cunning, he afterwards vsurped as his right. He first ordained Ratements, Subsidies, and valuations of the peoples wealth; among whom, at that time, fourescore thousand were mustered, of which number consisted their whole corporation; and by distinction of Dignities, Ages, Trades, and Offices, hee managed the Kingdome in as good sort, as if it had beene a priuate household. At length, hauing two daughters of different natures, the one milde and gentle, the other fierce and outragious: and finding also that the two sonnes of Tarquinius Priscus, Sextus and Arunt, which had beene committed vnto his tuition, were of different dispositions, proportionably answering to his daughters; hee (willing to adde water, not oyle, to fire) gaue the middle daughter to Sextus the hot-headed sonne; and the violent, to Arunt the gentle in marriage. But whether by intended courses, or by accident, it hapned; the two milde ones being made away, the furious natures were readily ioyned in marriage: who soone ſoone concurring, and calling the Senate together, began to lay claime to the Kingdome. Vpon this tumult, Seruius Tullius haſtning to the Senate, (where he thought by authority to haue bridled inſolencie) was throwne downe the ſtaires, and going home ſore bruiſed, was ſlain by the way, when he had reigned fortie and foure yeres. Then Tullia his daughter, firſt proclaiming her husband Tarquinius Superbus King; returning home, enforced her Coach-man to driue his Chariot ouer her fathers corpes; whereupon the ſtreet had the denomination of wicked ſtreet. This Tarquine, exerciſing cruelty without iuſtice, and tyrannie without mercie, vpon the people and Senators; hauing tired himſelfe and them at home, vſed the ſame rage of treacherie vpon his borders. He tooke Ocriculam, Sueſſa, Pometia, and the Gabij. The iſſue of beſieging Ardea, a towne eighteene miles diſtant from Rome, was of bad ſucceſſe. In the heat of which warre, his ſonne Sextus Tarquinius violently rauiſhed that chaſte Ladie Lucretia, his kinſman Collatines wife: who in way of expiation for ſo vnchaſte a deed, thought good to waſh out thoſe ſpots of infamie with her owne bloud; ſo (hauing firſt bequeathed the reuenge vnto her father Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, her husband Collatine, & Iunius Brutus) ſhe kil'd her ſelfe: whereupon (chiefly by Iunius Brutus his reſolution) Taquinius Superbus, with his wife and children, was depoſed and baniſhed; and fledde to Porſenna King of Hetruria for ſuccour, in the fiue and twentieth yeere of his reigne, and the two hundred fortie and fourth from the building of their Citie: in which ſpace Rome had ſcarce gotten poſſeſſion of fifteene miles round about her.

Iunius Brutus by the helpe of Collatine, hauing expelled Tarquine, and freed his Countrey from that heauy yoke of bondage, inforced the people by ſolemne oath, neuer to admit any gouernment by Kings amongſt them: whereupon they ranſacked their Kings goods, conſecrated their fields to Mars, and conferred the gouernment of the State vpon Brutus and Collatine. But becauſe the name of King was odious in their eares, they changed the manner of their gouernment, from perpetuall to annuall, and from a ſingle gouernour to a double; leſt perpetuall or ſole dominion might be ſome motiue to vſurpation; and in ſtead of Kings they called them Conſuls, ſignifying, as it may be interpreted, Prouiders: that their titles might remember them of their place, which was to be alwaies mindefull of their Citizens welfare. And yet was it ſo hard ſetling of troubled waters, that the people, after this innouation of State, ſcarce daring to aſſure themſelues of their owne ſecuritie, enforced Tarquinius Collatine to reſigne vp his authoritie, fearing that tyrannie would bee hereditarie, and ſuppoſing that the very name and affinitie with the houſe of Tarquine, ſauoured alreadie of their condition. In his roome was ſubſtituted Valerius Publicola, who that hee might (as his name importeth) be gracious in the peoples eies, gaue liberty, in matters of controuerſie, to appeale from the Conſuls to the people: and that hee might as well in goods as in perſon, auoyde occaſion of ſuſpition, cauſed his owne houſe to bee pulled downe, becauſe it was built in a place defenſible, as if it had beene a Citadell. Neither was Brutus any waies deficient in matter of greater moment; which concerned as well the peoples ſafetie, as their fauour: for hauing got intelligence, that ſome greener wits, and in the firſt ranke his owne ſonnes, were itching after innouations, hoping to reſtore the baniſhed Kings; hee cauſed them, publikely in the Market-place, to be whipt, and then to bee brought all vnpartially to the blocke.

Hitherto the Romanes, hauing by the vnblemiſhed integritie of Brutus, wel appeaſed all inbred quarrels at home, now hereafter imploy their military deſignements, againſt Forrainers; firſt, for their liberty; ſecondly, for enlarging of their poſſeſſions; and laſtly, for defending their confederate Prouinces, and extending their Empire. For Rome, ſituated as it were in the mid-way betweene Latium and the Tuſcans, hauing as yet but narrow bounds, being in her minoritie, could not but giue occaſion of offence to her neighbors; vntill by maine oppoſition, hauing preuailed againſt her borderers, ſhe vſed them as inſtruments, whereby to obtaine the reſt.

Their firſt warre, in the firſt yeere of Conſuls, was againſt Porſenna King of Hetruria: who being ouer-perſwaded by Tarquines lamentation, came to Rome, together with the baniſhed King, and with great forces, to ſeate him againe in his Kingdome.

In the firſt conflict, Horatius Cocles, hauing long time borne the maine brunt of his enemies, on the bridge ouer Tibris; at length, feeling himſelfe too faint to ſtand againſt ſo many, cauſed the bridge behinde him to be broken downe, and with his armour, leaping into the Riuer, like a hunted Stagge, refreshed his hot spirits, and returned safe to his fellowes, with the like resolution to sustaine a new charge. Porsenna although by this he had well-nigh won the hill Ianiculus, which is the verie entrance into the Citie, and found the victorie, in a manner, assuredly his owne: yet admiring their valour, and terrified by the constant resolution of Mutius Scæuola (who hauing by errour slaine Porsenna his Secretarie, in stead of the King himselfe, did in scorne of torments threatned, burne off his owne hand) he thought it not any whit preiudiciall, either to his safetie, or credit, to enter league with them at the worst hand. And yet the edge of Tarquinius his spleene, was not quite abated, though Aruns his sonne, and Brutus his enemie, in single combat, had slaine each other. And here the Romans, although they lost Brutus, got the field; and their Ladies, whose Champion he was, for their chastitie, not for beauty, mourned the losse of him one whole yeere. Into his place, for the residue of his yere, was subrogated Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, father to Lucretia: and in his roome (deceasing naturally before the yeere expired) Horatius Puluillus.

Tarquine, vpon his ouerthrow, feeling the fates disastrous, thought it no boot to striue against the streame, and spent the residue of his time; which was about fourteene yeeres, priuately at Tusculum. Yet his sonne-in-law Mamilius Tusculanus, stomaching a-fresh at those olde repulses, because Porsenna had made peace with the Romans, and denied further succor vnto the Tarquines, mustered vp his Latines, and gaue battaile to the Romans, at the Lake Regillum; where the conflict was fierce, and the issue vncertaine, vntill Aulus Posthumus, the Roman Dictator, (for they had created this Magistracy greater than Consulls, purposely for this Warre, when first it was expected) to exasperate his Souldiers courage, threw their owne Ensignes amidst the Enemies; and Cossus or Spurius Cassius (master of the Horse-men, an assistant Officer to the Dictator) commanded to take off their bridles, that they might runne with free violence, to recouer againe their Ensignes. This fight was so well performed, that a report went of Castor and Pollux, two gods, who came on milke-white Steeds, to be eye-witnesses of their valour, and fellow-helpers of their victorie; for the Generall consecrated a Temple to them, as a stipend for their paines. After this the Romans fierce spirits, hauing no obiect of valour abroad, reflected vpon themselues at home; and the sixteenth yeere after the Kings expulsion, vpon instigation of some desperate banckrouts, thinking themselues wrongfully oppressed by the Senate and Consulls, they made an vprore in the holy Mount; vntill by Menenius Agrippa, his discreet allusion, of the inconuenience in the head and bellies discord, to that present occasion, they were reconciled to the Senate: with condition, that they might haue some new Magistrates created, to whom they might appeale in cases of variance, and make them Solicitors in all their controuersies, the Consuls authoritie notwithstanding. This was enacted, and they were called the Tribunes of the people. After this attonement among themselues, they had continuall War with the Latines, concerning their bounds and limits, and with other neighbouring States. Amongst these, the Volsci and Æqui held them longest; who made Warre, of themselues, vpon the Romans: whereby they lost the best Citie in their whole iurisdiction, Corioli.

In this conquest, T. Martius got the surname of Coriolanus: a name honorable then, as deriued from a great victory: although, by reason of the pouerty of the Town, a Roman Generall, in after times, would haue been ashamed of that title. But yet these graces had bin no occasion of disparagement, had he not afterwards, in a great time of dearth, aduised to sell corne, which they procured from Sicil, at too high a rate, to the people: whereupon, Decius Mus, their Tribune, in their behalfe, accused him, & after iudgement banished him. Coriolanus flying to the Volsci, whom lately before he had vanquished, incensed them to renue their forces againe; which being committed vnto him, and to Attius Tullus, he preuailed in field, so far forth, that he was come within foure or fiue miles of the City. Incamping there, he made so sharpe warre, and was at such defiance, with his Country, that he would not relent by any supplication of Embassadors, vntill his Mother Veturia, & Volumnia his Wife, with a pittifull tune of deprecation, shewing themselues better Subiects to their Countrie, then friends to their sonne and husband, were more auaileable to Rome, then was any force of Armes. Heereupon Coriolanus dismissing his Armie, was after put to death among the Volsci, as a Traitor, for neglecting such opportunitie; or (as others surmise) liuing with them vntill old age, he died naturally.

Not

Not long after this, the Veij in Hetruria, prouoked the Romans; againſt whom the Fabij, three hundred and ſixe in number, all of one Familie, intreated and obtained, that they only might be imployed, as it had bin in a priuate quarrell. Theſe Fabij, after ſome good ſeruices, lying incamped at Cremera, were circumuented, and all ſlaine: one only of that whole houſe, had been left, by reaſon of infancie, at home; from whom afterward ſprang Fabius Maximus, who vanquiſhed Hannibal.

In proceſſe of time, the Romans were alſo troubled with the Volſci, at the hill of Algidum, two miles from Rome; where Lucius Minutius their Conſull, with his whole Army, had beene diſcomfited, had not L. Quintius Cincinatus choſen Dictator, and taken from the plough to the higheſt honor in Rome, with ſucceſſe anſwerable to his expedition, diſperſed his enemies, and freed his Countrie in the ſpace of ſixteene daies. In the continuance of this Volſcian warre it was, that Appius Claudius, one of the ten men, whom they had two yeeres before choſen Gouernours of the State, and inactors of Solons lawes amongſt them, procured from Athens (abrogating in the meane while the Conſuls, and all other Magiſtrates) would haue rauiſhed Virginia, the daughter of T. Virginius, Captaine of a Companie, and lying then in campe at Algidum. Heereupon the people, in an vproare, tooke the Hill Auentine, and after much variance, enforced the ten men, to reſigne vp their authoritie againe, to new Conſuls.

After this, either new quarrells, or deſire to reuenge old loſſes, drew the Romans into a new war, againſt the Veientes, and their adherents, vpon whom hauing tried their forces, with diuerſitie of Captaines, and varietie of euent, they vanquiſhed the Faliſci, and the Fidenates, and vtterly ſubdued the Veientes. In conquering the Faliſci, Furius Camillus ſhewed no leſſe integritie then fortitude. For when a Schoolemaſter, by trayning forth into the Roman campe, many children of the principall Citizens, thought to betray the Towne, yeelding them all vp as Hoſtages: Camillus deliuered this Traitor bound vnto his Schollers, willing them to whip him backe into the Citie; which forthwith yeelded vnto him in reuerence of his iuſtice. The ſiege of Veij was ten yeres, and ſo troubleſome, that the Romans were there firſt enforced to winter abroad vnder beaſts skinnes (to which they were the more eaſily induced, becauſe then firſt they receiued pay) and to make vowes neuer to returne without victorie.

At length winning the Citie by a Mine, they got ſo large ſpoyls, that they conſecrated their tenths to Apollo Pythius: & the whole people in generall, were called to the ranſacking of the Citie. But yet they were no leſſe vnthankfull to Camillus for his ſeruice, then before they had beene to Coriolanus; For they baniſhed him the Citie, vpon ſome occaſion of inequality in diuiding the ſpoyles: yet he requited their vnkindneſſe with a new peece of ſeruice, againſt the furie of the Gaules: who being a populous Countrie, and very healthfull, the fathers (as ſometimes now) liued ſo long, that the ſonnes, deſtitute of meanes, were enforced to roaue abroad, ſeeking ſome place, where to ſet vp their reſt: and withall being a Nation vaſte in body, rude by nature, and barbarous in conditions, wandred as Rouers ouer many Countries. Some of them lighting on Italie, ſet vpon Cluſium, a Towne in Hetruria: whereof Rome hauing information, (and being carefull of her Confederate Townes) ſent Embaſſadours, warning them to deſiſt from ſuch iniurious enterpriſes. But the barbarous people, not regarding the meſſage, vpon ſome iniurie offered by the Romane Embaſſadours, conuerted their forces from Cluſium towards Rome; and giuing a great ouerthrow vnto the Romans, by the Riuer Allia, vpon the ſixteenth day before the Calends of Auguſt (which day was after branded for vnlucky, and called Allienſis in the Romane Kalendar) they haſtened towards the Citie. Then was Rome the true map of miſerie and deſolation. For ſome leauing the Citie, ſome creeping into holes; Prieſts hiding their reliques; and euery one ſhifting for himſelf, ere the enemie came; Rome was abandoned, as indefenſible. The Veſtall Virgins, in this tumult, were ſafely conuaied away; the Ancients of the City, gathering boldneſſe out of deſperate feare, did put on their Robes, and taking their leaue of the world, did ſeat themſelues in Thrones, in their ſeuerall houſes, hourely expecting the meſſengers of death, and meaning to die, as they had liued, in State. The yonger ſort, with M. Manlius their Captaine, tooke vpon them to make good the Capitoll.

By this, the Gaules were entred the Citie, who ſeeing all quiet, at firſt ſuſpected ſome ambuſh; afterward finding all ſecure, they fell to the ſpoyle, committing all to the fire and ſword. As for the old Senators, they ſate in their Maieſty, with a graue reſolution:

hauing first reuerenced them as gods, anon they tried whether they would die like men. When the Citie was throughly rifled, they attempted the Capitoll: which held them worke for the space of seuen Moneths. Once they were like to haue surprised it by night, but being descried by the gagling of Geese, M. Manlius did awaken, and kept them from entrance. At length a composition was agreed vpon: the Gaules being weary, and the Romans hungrie. The bargaine was, that the Gaules should take a thousand pound waight in gold, to desist from their siege. Whilest the gold was in waighing, the Gaules, with open insolencie, made their waights too heauie: Brennus, their Captaine, casting his sword into the ballance, and, with a proud exprobration, saying, that the vanquished must be patient perforce. But in the midst of this cauilling came Furius Camillus, with an Armie, from Ardea, (where he had liued in his banishment) and fell vpon the Gaules, with such violence, that hee dispersed their troups, quenched the fire of the Citie with their bloud, forcing them to restore the spoyles with aduantage, and forbeare the gold, in accepting which, they had lately beene so nice. Further, hauing rid the Citie of them, he so hotly pursued them, through a great part of Italie, that the remainder of their Armie, which escaped from him, was very small. Other Armies of the Gaules, which followed this first, had the like ill successe. They were often beaten by the Romans; especially the victories of M. Torquatus, and of M. Valerius Coruinus (each of which in single fight slew a seuerall Champion of the Gaules) abated their presumption, and restored courage to the Romans. Camillus, for his notable seruice, was afterwards accompted a second Romulus.

The people, after this destruction of their Citie, were earnestly bent to goe to the Veij to inhabite; but Camillus disswaded them.

About the same time, somewhat before the siege of Veij, they changed their gouernment from Consuls to militarie Tribunes. The gouernment of these also, after some yeares, was by ciuill dissension interrupted: so that one while Consulls ruled, another while there was an Anarchie: Then the Tribunes were restored and ruled againe, till after many yeres expired, the Consular authoritie was established; it being enacted, that one of the Consuls should alwaies be a Plebeian. This was after the building of the City 365. yeeres. And now Rome by suppression of her neighbour Countries, creeping well forward out of her Minoritie, dares set forth against the warlike Samnites, who dwelt almost one hundred and thirtie miles off: situated between Campania and Apulia. These did so strongly inuade the Campanians their Neighbours, that they forced them to yeeld themselues subiects to Rome, and vndergoe any conditions of Tribute, or whatsoeuer else to obtaine protection: which the Romans, although both Countries had beene their Confederates, yet not willing that the greater, like fish, should deuoure the lesse, easily allowed of; aiming themselues at the good situation of Campania, the aboundance of Corne and Wine, pleasant Cities and Townes, but especially Capua it selfe, the fairest Citie then in all Italie.

The families of the Papyrij and Fabij were most imployed in the managing of this warre, which endured the space of fiftie yeeres. And in this season were the Romans oftentimes dangerously encountred by the Samnites, as when T. Veturius, and Sp. Postumius were Consulls, and discomfited by Pontius at Caudium, with no small ignominie: and when Q. Fabius Gurges lost the field with three thousand men. But for those losses, many great victories made large amends: The greatest whereof were gotten by L. Papyrius, and by Quintus Fabius Maximus.

The Samnites drew the Hetrurians into their quarrell. But the force of the Samnites was well broken, ere the Hetrurians (the greater and richer, but lesse warlike Nation) began to stir. So the one and the other of these two Countries, became at length, tributary to Rome. In the continuance of this long warre it was, (though in time of truce between the Romans and Samnites) that the Latines beganne to challenge equall freedome in the Corporation of Rome, and right in bearing office, so that they required to haue one of the Consuls yeerely chosen out of them.
